

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. JUDICIAL AND STATUTORY DEFINITIONS

OF

WORDS AND PHRASES.

VOLUME 8.

SUPERSEDE.

To "supersede" is to set aside or annul, and an order which sets aside or annuls a decree dissolving an injunction must reinstate the injunction. New River Mineral Co. v. Seeley (U. S.) 117 Fed. 981, 982.

"In the military sense 'to be superseded' means to have one put in the place which by the ordinary course of military promotion belongs to another." Ex parte Hall, 18 Mass. (1 Pick.) 261, 262.

SUPERSEDEAS.

A supersedeas is a writ issued to a ministerial officer commanding him to suspend or desist in a proceeding under another writ previously issued to him. Tyler v. Presley, 13 Pac. 856, 857, 72 Cal. 290 (citing Abb. Law Dict.).

A "supersedeas" is a statutory remedy by which the enforcement of a decree of a court is superseded or delayed during appeal. State v. Lafin, 58 N. W. 936, 937, 40 Neb. 441.

Jacob in his Law Dictionary says that "supersedeas" is a writ that lies in a good many cases. It signifies, in general, the command to stay some ordinary proceedings at law, on good cause shown, which ought otherwise to proceed. This court, in the case of Blackerby v. People, 10 Ill. (5 Gilman) 266, 267, said that the order allowing a supersedeas does not operate as a suspension of the judgment until the bond is filed and the writ of error issued. When these proceedings are had, the clerk issues the certificate, the object of which is to notify all other parties that the proceedings are stayed. Perteet v. People, 70 Ill. 171, 177.

A supersedeas is a statutory remedy, and is only obtained by strict compliance with all the required conditions. It does not relate back to the date of an order appealed from, so as to annul proceedings already had, or restore rights under it already lost. The stay simply leaves the proceedings on the order, and the rights of the appellant under it, just as they are when it takes effect on the date of filing the bond. Woolfolk v. Bruns, 45 Minn. 96, 97, 47 N. W. 460.

The writ of supersedeas is an auxiliary process designed to supersede the enforcement of the judgment of the court below, brought up by writ of error for review. Williams v. Bruffy, 102 U. S. 249. Originally it was a writ directed to an officer, commanding him to desist from enforcing the execution of another writ which he was about to execute, or which might come into his hands. In modern times the term is often used synonymously with "stay of proceedings," and is "employed to designate the effect of an act or proceeding which of itself suspends the enforcement of a judgment." Dulin v. Pacific Wood & Coal Co., 33 Pac. 123, 124, 98 Cal. 304.

A "supersedeas," in the language of the Civil Code, is a written order, signed by the clerk, commanding the appellee and all others to stay proceedings on the judgment or order, meaning, of course, the judgment or order appealed from. Roberts v. Jenkins, 4 Ky. Law Rep. 648, 650, 80 Ky. 666. It is a remedy provided by law for the unsuccessful litigant, who complains of certain errors committed to his prejudice by the court below, and stops all proceedings on the judgment until this court disposes of the appeal. Smith v. Western Union Tel. Co., 83 Ky. 269, 271.

tion is issued, it is a prohibition emanating from the court of appeal against the execution of the writ. It operates from the time of the completion of those acts which are requisite to call it into existence. If, before those acts are performed, an execution has been lawfully issued, a writ of supersedeas directed to the officer holding it will be necessary; but, if the writ of execution has been not only lawfully issued but actually executed, there is no remedy until the appellate proceedings are ended, when, if the judgment or decree be reversed, a writ of restitution will be awarded. Hovey v. McDonald, 3 Sup. Ct. 136, 141, 109 U. S. 150, 27 L. Ed. 888.

A supersedeas suspends the efficacy of the judgment, but does not, like a reversal, annul the judgment itself. Its object and effect are to stay future proceedings, and not to undo what is already done. It has no retroactive operation, so as to deprive the judgment of its force and authority from the beginning, but only suspends them after and while it is itself effectual. A consequence of this is that whatever is done under the judgment after and while it is suspended, being done without authority from the judgment, which is then powerless, should be set aside as improperly and irregularly done, but that whatever is done according to the judgment before the supersedeas takes effect is upheld by the authority of the judgment, and not overreached by the supersedeas. Runyon v. Bennett, 34 Ky. (4 Dana) 509, 29 Am. Dec. 431 (cited, approved, and followed in Weber v. Tanner [Ky.] 64 S. W. 741, 742).

A supersedeas has the effect to suspend further proceedings in relation to a judgment, but it does not, like a reversal, annul it. The supersedeas, being preventive in its nature, does not set aside what the trial court has adjudicated, but stays other proceedings in relation to the judgment until the appellate court acts thereon. In Florida, so long as an appeal with supersedeas from an order granting injunction is pending, the power of the court to enforce the injunction or to punish as contempt acts in violation of its terms committed during such time is suspended. Powell v. Florida Land & Improvement Co., 26 South. 700, 41 Fla. 494.

"Supersedeas," as the word indicates, supersedes the judgment of the court below, and no step should be taken toward execution after the Supreme Court has determined prima facie that the defendant has not been legally convicted, and has ordered that a writ of error in a criminal case be made supersedeas. Ritchey v. People, 43 Pac. 1026, 1028, 22 Colo. 251.

A writ of certiorari, issuing out of the Supreme Court and directed to the court for the trial of small causes, is in its nature and effect a "supersedeas," and ought to stay all further proceedings in the cause; for, after it is received, the justice has no right to take any proceeding or issue any writ. Mairs v. Sparks, 5 N. J. Law (2 Southard) 513, 516.

A supersedeas is a written order, signed by the clerk, commanding appellee and all others to stay proceedings on the judgment or order. Ind. T. Ann. St. 1899, § 795.

SUPERSEDEAS BOND.

A "supersedeas bond" merely operates to stay an execution or other final process on the judgment. It does not vacate the judgment, nor prevent any party thereto from invoking it, as an estoppel. Ransom v. City of Pierre (U. S.) 101 Fed. 665, 669, 41 C. C. A. 585.

SUPERSTITIOUS USE.

The statute of mortmain has been extended to Pennsylvania only so far as it prohibits dedication of property to superstitious uses and grants to corporations without a statutory license. A trust in favor of an unincorporated religious society is not a gift to a superstitious use. "Superstitious use" by the British courts has been extended to all uses which are subordinate to the interest and will of the Established Church. Methodist Church v. Remington (Pa.) 1 Watts, 219, 225, 28 Am. Dec. 61.

A bequest of money made by a member of the Roman Catholic church to a priest for the celebration of a mass for the soul of the testator and another, though it would be void under the English common law as being for "superstitious uses," is valid and will be upheld in the United States, where such provision of the common law never became a part of the law of the country. Harrison v. Brophy, 51 Pac. 883, 884, 59 Kan. 1, 40 L. R. A. 721.

SUPERSTRUCTURE.

"Superstructure," as used in Act April 21, 1858, providing that where property of a railroad company, except the superstructure of the road and water stations, should be subject to taxation by ordinance for city purposes, means the roadbed, with whatever has been constructed upon it, although the word might in present railway engineering phraseology be limited to sleepers, rails, and fastenings. City of Philadelphia v. Philadelphia & R. R. Co., 35 Atl. 610, 611, 177 Pa. 292.

"Superstructure," as used in Comp. St. c. 77, § 39, requiring the officers of railroad corporations to return to the Auditor of Public Accounts for assessment and taxation the number of miles of railroad in the state, including roadbed, right of way, and superstructure thereon, cannot be construed to include a bridge over the Missouri river. Webster defines the word "superstructure," referring to railroad engineering, to be the sleepers, rails, and fastenings, in distinction from the roadbed, called also "permanent way." Cass County v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co., 41 N. W. 246, 25 Neb. 348, 2 L. R. A. 188.

SUPERVISE.

"Supervising" means taking part in the work, and hence, where an insured had stated that he was a confectioner, and his duties were supervising, the insurance company will be liable on the policy, though the policy classified him as a proprietor, not working, and his death was caused while working. Schmidt v. American Mut. Acc. Ass'n, 71 N. W. 601, 602, 96 Wis. 304.

SUPERVISING FARMER.

The term "supervising farmer," in a classification of the risks of an insurance company, covers a person who employs farm laborers and does but little work himself. "We think that the supervision of a farm includes in its care and oversight the doing of such incidental things as may be required for keeping it in order, and does not mean absolute idleness as far as physical labor is concerned." National Acc. Soc. of City of New York v. Taylor, 42 Ill. App. 97, 102.

SUPERVISION.

"Webster says 'supervision' means to oversee for direction, to superintend, to inspect, as to supervise the press for correction." It is so used in Rev. St. U. S. § 441 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 252], charging the Secretary of the Interior with the supervision of the office relating to the public lands; and hence the statute gives the Secretary of Interior and, under his direction, the Commissioner of the General Land Office, the power to review all the acts of the local officers, and to correct and direct a correction of any error committed by them. Van Tongeren v. Heffernan, 38 N. W. 52, 56, 5 Dak. 180.

"Supervision," as used in the Constitution of Wyoming, providing that the state shall control the public waters in the state, and such control shall consist in a supervision of the waters, their appropriation, distribution, and diversion, by a board of control, etc., includes official action, administrative, rather than judicial, in its fundamental character, although as a necessary incident thereto there is involved quasi judicial authority to determine respective right. Farm Inv. Co. v. Carpenter, 61 Pac. 258, 266, 9 Wyo. 110, 50 L. R. A. 747, 87 Am. St. Rep. 918.

Const. art. 11, § 4, providing that the "supervision of instruction" in the public schools shall be vested in the board of education, does not mean that the board shall enter into the details of giving instruction or carrying on the schools. It means no more than a general oversight over the matter of instruction, and would not include the selection of books on particular subjects. State ex rel. Wolfe v. Bronson, 21 S. W. 1125, 1126, 115 Mo. 271.

"Supervision" is defined by Webster to be "the act of overseeing, inspection, or superintendence," and is so used in an act giving a board of transportation general supervision of railroads; and hence the act clothes the board with necessary powers for such purposes. State v. Freemont, E. & M. V. R. Co., 35 N. W. 118, 124, 22 Neb. 813.

SUPERVISOR.

See "Road Supervisor."

A supervisor is an officer of the civil township, as are justices of the peace and constables, and is charged with the opening, repairing, and keeping in repair the public roads or highways within his road district. Woodworth v. State, 26 Ohio St. 196, 197.

A supervisor is a ministerial officer, whose duties and authority are prescribed and limited by statute, and which, for the most part, are confined to his own district. His duties, generally, are to open and keep in repair and unobstructed the public roads in his district not owned or operated under private charters or by incorporated companies. Grove v. Mikesell, 13 Ohio St. 158, 165.

The word "supervisors," when applied to county officers, has a legal signification, and means those officers having the general management of the affairs of the county. The duties of such officers are various and manifold, sometimes judicial, and at others legislative and executive. From the necessity of the case it would be impossible to reconcile them to any particular head, and therefore, in matters relating to the police and physical regulation of counties, they are allowed to perform such duties as may be enjoined on them by law, without any nice examination into the character of the powers conferred. This rule preserves the utility of these officers, while at the same time the rule is in harmony with the spirit of state Constitutions. State v. Ormsby County Com'rs, 7 Nev. 392, 397 (citing People v. Eldorado County Court, 8 Cal. 58; People v. Marin County Sup'rs, 10 Cal. 344; Waugh v. Chauncey, 13 Cal. 12; Robinson v. Sacramento County Sup'rs, 16 Cal. 208).

A "supervisor" cannot be created by legislative enactment. The office of supervisor is a constitutional one (Const. art. 3, § 22), and is elective; and to clothe any one with powers of a supervisor who has not been elected would be to act in direct conflict with the spirit and intent of that portion of the Constitution making supervisors elective. Williams v. Boynton, 25 N. Y. Supp. 60, 67, 71 Hun, 309.

An action brought by "the supervisors of the town" means the supervisors of the town eo nomine, without use of their personal names, and the action is that of the town, and not of the supervisors personally. State v. Town of Decatur, 17 N. W. 20, 22, 58 Wis. 291.

SUPERVISORY CONTROL.

The term "supervisory control," as used in Const. art. 8, § 2, giving the Supreme Court supervisory control, implies something to supervise, as well as something to control, and the exercise of judicial discretion on the part of the court. The supervisory power granted to this court is a co-ordinate power, and, as with its original and appellate jurisdiction, so with this. The power thus conferred will only be exercised after consideration, deliberation, and a judicial determination of the merits of the controversy with reference to which it is sought to be invoked. It cannot be appealed to, and a remedy had under it, as a matter of course. In re Weston, 72 Pac. 512, 516, 28 Mont. 207.

SUPPLEMENT.

A "supplement" is that which supplies a deficiency; that which fills up, completes, or makes an addition to something already organized, arranged, or set apart; a part added to or a continuation of. It is used sometimes as a synonym of "appendix." State v. Wyandot County, 16 Ohio Cir. Ct. R. 218, 221 (quoting 9 Ohio Dec. 90, 91).

"Supplement" is a supplying by addition of what is wanting. Thus it was held that where an act authorized the construction of waterworks for a city, but required the assent of the voters, the purpose of a subsequent act repealing the provision as to assent was sufficiently expressed by its title as a supplement to, etc. Rahway Sav. Inst. v. City of Rahway, 20 Atl. 756, 757, 53 N. J. Law, 48.

SUPPLEMENTAL ACT.

The word "supplemental" is defined by Webster as that which supplies a deficiency or meets a want. A legislative act, providing that so much of a certain other act which changed the time for holding court in a certain county as required the court to be held in such county on a certain day should not take effect until the following year, etc., may be fairly described as a "supplemental" act, and not an amendatory act, within the provisions of Const. Tex. art. 7, § 25, forbidding the amendment of an act by reference to its title. Loomis v. Runge, 66 Fed. 856, 859, 14 C. C. A. 148.

SUPPLEMENTAL AFFIDAVIT.

A "supplemental affidavit" is not confined to an explanation of the original affidavit, but may set up a new and different defense. The setting up of a new or different defense, however, is suspicious, and requires that the same shall be closely scrutinized. Callan v. Lukens, 89 Pa. 134, 136.

SUPPLEMENTAL ANSWER.

A "supplemental answer" is in the nature of a plea puis darrein continuance under the old practice, which it was necessary to plead at the first opportunity, and before the next continuance, and could only be pleaded at a later date by leave granted by the court in its discretion, on showing a satisfactory excuse for the negligence. The ends of justice require the same rule to be applied in the case of supplemental answers. Where, pending an action, matter has arisen constituting a good technical, though an inequitable, defense, which, the defendant, having notice, has for several years neglected to plead, one trial having intervened, the court, after such delay, in the exercise of its discretion will, on the ground of laches, refuse leave to file a supplemental answer setting up such matter as a defense. French v. Edwards (U. S.) 9 Fed. Cas. 778, 780.

SUPPLEMENTAL BILL.

See "Bill of Revivor and Supplement."

A supplemental bill "is a bill filed for the purpose of supplying a defect which has arisen in the progress of the suit by the happening of some event subsequent to the filing of the original bill, and is in continuation of the original suit." Butler v. Cunningham (N. Y.) 1 Barb. 85, 87.

A supplemental bill is a mere continuation of the original suit by or against a party having or acquiring the interest of the former party, and it forms, together with the original bill and the proceedings under it, but one record. Harrington v. Slade (N. Y.) 22 Barb. 161, 166.

A supplemental bill is a bill which is merely "in continuation of the original suit and filed for the purpose of filling up such a deficiency as does not cause a material alteration in the matter in litigation or a change of the principal parties, and when, therefore, it is only requisite to add something to the former proceedings in order to attain complete justice." Bowie v. Minter, 2 Ala. 406, 411.

A supplemental bill is considered merely as an addition to the original bill, and, while it is often permissible and proper to introduce matter that has occurred after the institution of the suit, and of such a nature as cannot be properly the subject of an amendment, yet such new matter must not be such as to change the rights and interests of the parties before the court. Ledwith v. City of Jacksonville, 13 South. 454, 458, 32 Fla. 1.

A "supplemental bill," says Story, Eq. Pl. § 332, "is merely an addition to the original bill, in order to supply some defect in its original frame or structure. In many cases an imperfection in the frame of the original bill may be remedied by an amendment. Generally a mistake in the bill in the statement of a fact should be corrected by an amendment, and not by a right statement of the fact in a supplemental bill; but the imperfection of a bill may remain undiscovered while the proceedings are in such a state that an amendment can be permitted according to the practice of the court, or it may be of such a nature, having occurred after the suit is brought, as may not properly be the subject of an amendment. By the practice of the court no amendment is generally allowable after the parties are at issue upon the points of the original bill and witnesses have been examined; nor is it generally allowable to introduce into the bill by amendment any matter which has happened since the filing of the bill. In such cases a supplemental bill is the appropriate remedy, and such a supplemental bill may not only be for the purpose of putting in issue new matter, which may vary the relief prayed in the original bill, but also for the purpose of putting in issue matter which may prove the plaintiff's right to the relief originally prayed." Bloxham v. Florida Cent. & P. R. Co., 22 South. 697, 704, 39 Fla. 243, Ely v. Wilcox, 26 Wis. 91, 98.

A supplemental bill is an addition to an original bill, and is ordinarily filed to correct imperfection or mistake in the original bill, or to bring some new party into the case. It may also be filed in some cases to bring before the court new matters which have occurred since the filing of the original bill, and in that event the relief originally prayed for may be modified or enlarged to meet the case as presented after the addition of the new matter. Schwab v. Schwab, 49 Atl. 331, 93 Md. 382, 52 L. R. A. 414 (citing Story, Eq. Pl. § 333 et seq.).

When an event happens subsequently to the filing of an original bill, which gives a new interest in the matter in dispute to any person, whether or not already a party, without depriving all of the original plaintiffs of their interest, the defect arising from this event may be settled by a supplemental bill. 1 Fost. Fed. Prac. p. 409, § 187. This bill may be filed at any time during the progress of the suit, as well after as before a decree, and even during the pendency of an appeal. A defendant may file a supplemental bill, which may also be brought in behalf of the defendant in the suit. The authorities are clear that when new parties must be brought in, or new matter is brought forward by persons not parties to the original suit, but whose rights and interests are affected by the decree already made, and who seek to set up matters which occurred during the pendency of the action, the filing of a supplemental bill in the nature of a bill of review is the proper practice. Thompson v. Schenectady R. Co. (U. S.) 119 Fed. 634, 638.

Strictly speaking, a "supplemental bill" relates to matters occurring after bill filed, as changes of interest pendente lite, etc. Melton v. Withers, 2 S. C. (2 Rich.) 561, 567.

SUPPLEMENTAL COMPLAINT.

Any complaint made by the representative of a deceased plaintiff, though it be the first filed in the action, is a "supplemental complaint," within the meaning of Rev. St. § 2803, authorizing actions to be revived, on motion, within one year from the death, etc., "or afterwards, on a supplemental complaint." Plumer v. McDonald Lumber Co., 42 N. W. 250, 252, 74 Wis. 137.

A supplemental complaint is an additional complaint, consisting of facts arising after the filing of an original, and it and the original constitute the complaint in the cause. Under Rev. St. 1881, § 399, providing that the court may on motion allow supplemental pleadings showing facts which occur after the former pleadings were filed, it is within the discretion of the trial court to allow the filing of additional pleadings after the issues are closed. Pouder v. Tate, 132 Ind. 327, 329, 30 N. E. 880.

SUPPLEMENTAL PETITION.

A petition containing merely a statement of transactions constituting his cause of action arising before the bringing of the suit is technically an "amended petition," and it was incorrect to designate it as "supplemental petition," since it pleaded no new facts accruing after the filing of his original petition. Scroggin v. Johnston, 64 N. W. 236, 238, 45 Neb. 714.

SUPPLEMENTARY.

"Supplementary," as used in a contract reciting that it was a supplementary agreement, is a term which well comports with the idea of new provisions in a contract. A liability created on the part of one of the parties, where none existed before, is rather supplementary, than explanatory. Wescott v. Mitchell, 50 Atl. 21, 23, 95 Me. 377.

SUPPLEMENTARY COMPLAINT.

The office of a supplementary complaint is to add to the cause of action already averred, not to enable the plaintiff to recover upon a cause of action which has accrued since the action was commenced. Halsted v. Halsted, 27 N. Y. Supp. 408, 7 Misc. Rep. 23.

SUPPLEMENTARY PROCEEDING.

As action, civil action, or special proceeding, see "Action"; "Civil Action—Case—Suit—Etc."; "Special Proceeding."

A supplementary proceeding is a separate proceeding in an original action, in which the court where the action is pending is called upon to exercise its jurisdiction in aid of the judgment in the action, and is entirely statutory. Bryant v. Bank of California (Cal.) 7 Pac. 128, 130.

Supplementary proceedings are not an action on a judgment, within Code Civ. Proc. § 382, subd. 7, providing that an action on a judgment rendered in a court not of record must be commenced within six years. Green v. Hauser (N. Y.) 18 Civ. Proc. R. 354, 358, 9 N. Y. Supp. 660.

SUPPLY.

The phrase "to supply" signifies to make provision for; to provide; to serve instead of; to take the place of. The repealing clause in Act 1889, art. 19, § 2, providing that "all acts or parts of acts, inconsistent herewith or supplied by the provisions hereof, be, and the same are, hereby repealed," means simply that, when the subject of an existing enactment is fully and completely covered by the provisions of such act of 1889, the power, right, or proceedings, as the case may be, shall thereafter be treated as based upon that act, rather than upon the older one supplied by it. The phrase "supply" seems obviously to have reference to other enactments concerning those subjects upon which the statute in question has made full and complete provision, designed to take the place of the former and to serve in their stead. City of Reading v. Shepp, 2 Pa. Dist. R. 134, 140.

Where a person obtained gas from another customer of a gas company, it was not "supplied" in any fair sense of the term, or within the meaning of Laws 1890, c. 566, § 65, requiring gas companies to supply any owner or occupant of a building, on compliance with certain conditions, with gas, under certain penalties. Jones v. Rochester Gas & Electric Co., 60 N. E. 1044, 1045, 168 N. Y. 65.

"Supplying," as used in a city ordinance granting a water company the right and privilege, for the term of 25 years, of supplying the city and its inhabitants, was intended in its primary sense, intending thereby to give the water company the right to furnish all the water the city and its inhabitants may need to have furnished during such period. City of Brenham v. Brenham Water Co., 4 S. W. 143, 147, 67 Tex. 542.

"Supplying," as used in an exemption from local taxation of the property used in supplying electricity, includes the manufacturing of such electricity. The power to supply includes the power to manufacture. Southern Electric Light & Power Co. v. City of Philadelphia, 43 Atl. 123, 191 Pa. 170.

A contract requiring a coke manufacturing company to furnish 15 cars of coke per day for a certain time at an agreed price, but providing that the company were "not to be held in damages for the railroad company's failure to supply transportation," means, in the light of an established custom that a coke manufacturer will divide his supply of cars ratably among all orders on hand when a shortage occurs, a failure to supply cars and other means of transportation equal to the demands of the trade, and the company were not liable for failure to supply the 15 cars, though the railroad company furnished such a number per day. McKeefrey v. Connellsville Coke & Iron Co. (U. S.) 56 Fed. 212, 216, 5 C. C. A. 482.

SUPPLY (Noun).

See "Full Supply"; "Necessary Supplies"; "Operating Supplies"; "Plantation Supplies"; "School Supplies."

The word "supply" is defined in the Standard Dictionary as "that which is or can be supplied; available aggregate of things needed or demanded; an amount sufficient for a given use or purpose." In the Imperial Dictionary, "that which is supplied; sufficiency of things for use or want; a quantity of something furnished or on hand." As used in a contract to purchase all supplies of a certain description for a certain period from a certain firm, the word means all of the specified goods necessary for the purchaser's business during such period. W. P. Fuller & Co. v. Schrenk, 68 N. Y. Supp. 781, 784, 58 App. Div. 222.

A primary meaning of the word "supply" is "an amount sufficient for a given use or purpose." It was held used in such sense in a contract whereby plaintiff agreed to furnish defendant borough a supply of water for its fire hydrants, to be used for the purpose, and no other, of extinguishing fire.

"The clause, fairly construed, not only restricted the use of the water, but clearly implied that the supply through these hydrants should be of sufficient force and volume to be reasonably effective for the purpose for which the company agreed to supply it." Waymart Water Co. v. Borough of Waymart, 4 Pa. Super. Ct. 211, 220.

If we are to stand upon the mere etymology of the word "supply," in the act prohibiting any officer or agent of any corporation or municipality to be interested in the sale or furnishing of any supplies or materials to the organization or body which he represents or of which he is a member (Act March 31, 1860, § 66), we find it derived from "sub," meaning under, and "plere," to fill, and defined by Webster as "the act of furnishing with what is wanted." As a noun it is generally used in the plural, and we are unable to see why the word "supplies" cannot be applied to horses, wagons, cars, or labor indiscriminately. Under such section township supervisors are prohibited from employing their own teams or minor children upon the township roads. In re Hazle Tp. (Pa.) 6 Kulp, 491, 493.

"Supplies" has a fairly well defined meaning; that is to say, such stores of food, etc., as are kept on hand for daily use. So it is held that a mortgage of a steam saw-mill, with all supplies on hand, does not include saw logs. Conner v. Littlefield, 79 Tex. 76, 77, 15 S. W. 217.

Dry goods such as calico, lawn, poplin, white cotton hose, and the like, sold to laborers on a plantation, gave no privilege to the vendor on the crop of cotton of that year, since a privilege is only given on the growing crop for necessary supplies. Wallace v. Urquhart, 23 La. Ann. 469, 470.

Supplies for agricultural purposes.

"Supplies," as used in Code 1871, making the husband the general agent of the wife to contract for supplies for carrying on agricultural operations on her plantation, embraces such things as are necessary or adapted to the conduct of agricultural operations; and whether an article falls within the class designated by the word "supplies" must be determined by resort to the usages and customs of the agricultural interests. Wright v. Walton, 56 Miss. 1, 5.

"Supplies" means that which is or can be supplied; available aggregate of things needed or demanded; an amount sufficient for a given use or purpose. As used in a contract between a landlord and tenant, giving the landlord a lien on the crops of the tenant for supplies furnished and to be furnished, it includes money furnished by the landlord and used by the tenant in making and gathering the crops. Strickland v. Stiles, 33 S. E. 85, 86, 107 Ga. 308.

"Supplies," as used in Code, § 1978, providing that landlords furnishing supplies to their tenants may secure themselves thereon upon the crops, includes board furnished a tenant by the landlord. Jones v. Eubanks, 12 S. E. 1065, 1066, 86 Ga. 616.

Mules purchased by a tenant of his landlord are "supplies," within Code 1890, § 1301, giving a landlord a lien on the crops produced by the tenant for all advances for "supplies" furnished during the term of the lease. Trimble v. Durham, 12 South. 207, 70 Miss. 295.

Hutch. Code, § 498, which declares that all contracts for the purchase of "supplies for the plantation," etc., owned by any married woman, made by the husband or wife, or either of them, shall be obligatory upon the husband and wife, etc., means whatever is necessary for the cultivation of the plantation, and includes work horses or mules which are used on the plantation. Robertson v. Ward, 20 Miss. (12 Smedes & M.) 490, 491.

Supplies for city.

"Supplies," as used in reference to a city, in its broad etymological sense embraces anything which is furnished to a city or its inhabitants; but as used in section 419 of the Greater New York charter, requiring competitive bids for supplies, it has no application to contracts for furnishing water to the inhabitants of New York. Gleason v. Dalton, 51 N. Y. Supp. 337, 338, 28 App. Div. 555.

In a general sense, the word "supplies" comprises anything yielded or afforded to meet a want; but the use of a pier, hired by a city for the purpose of removing offal from the city, is not a "supply" furnished, within Laws 1853, c. 217, § 12, providing that all work to be done for the city and all supplies to be furnished for the corporation involving an expenditure of more than $250 must be by contract founded on sealed bids. Farmers' Loan & Trust Co. v. City of New York, 17 N. Y. Super. Ct. (4 Bosw.) 80, 89.

Supplies for county offices.

"Supplies," as used in Comp. Laws, § 609, as amended by Laws 1889, c. 49, § 104, providing that all contracts for the furnishing of stationery, blank books, and supplies generally for all county offices shall be made at a certain time, clearly signifies pencils, paper, rubber bands, blanks, ink, and articles of that description required and constantly used by county officers. Dewell v. Hughes County Com'rs, 66 N. W. 1079, 1080, 8 S. D. 452.

Supplies to loggers.

The word "supplies" is used in Rev. St. § 3330, providing for a lien in favor of persons furnishing supplies to men engaged in getting out logs and timber in that county, though stated in the statute to mean feed used for teams and food necessarily used in camp to support the men, also includes the board of men, where furnished at a hotel in a city several miles from the place where they are at work. Kollock v. Parcher, 9 N. W. 67, 69, 52 Wis. 393.

Supplies for manufacturing or mercantile company.

"Supplies" includes pig iron furnished a rolling mill, whose business is to manufacture iron, steel, and other metals, within the meaning of Code, § 2485, giving a lien for fuel and all other supplies necessary to the operation of any manufacturing company. Virginia Development Co. v. Crozer Iron Co., 17 S. E. 806, 807, 90 Va. 126, 44 Am. St. Rep. 893.

"Supplies" are necessities collected and held for distribution and use, and a kiln for the drying of lumber cannot be classed as "supplies necessary" to the operation of a corporation organized for the manufacture and sale of lumber, under Code, § 2485, giving a lien for such supplies furnished to certain classes of corporations. Boston Blower Co. v. Carman Lumber Co., 26 S. E. 390, 391, 94 Va. 94.

In a mortgage of a steam sawmill, with all its fixtures and appurtenances and all the supplies on hand, "supplies" should be construed to refer to a commissary, where there was one attached to the mill, and to include the stores therein kept, and other farm produce and merchandise kept ordinarily on hand for operating the mill, but not to include saw logs at the mill, nor an iron safe used therein. Conner v. Littlefield, 15 S. W. 217, 218, 79 Tex. 76.

"Supplies furnished," as used in a statute entitling liens for supplies furnished to priority over a lien created by a mortgage, does not include goods delivered by a firm to laborers in payment of orders on a mercantile firm for merchandise in payment of their wages. Seventh Nat. Bank v. Shenandoah Iron Co. (U. S.) 35 Fed. 436, 440.

"Supplies furnished," as used in a statute entitling persons who have a lien for supplies furnished to priority over a lien created by a mortgage, does not include a debt due a railroad company for freight charges for carrying iron, coal, etc., for an iron manufacturing company. Seventh Nat. Bank v. Shenandoah Iron Co. (U. S.) 35 Fed. 436, 440.

Supplies to paupers.

Acts of kindness or charity or aid furnished as a gift or loan do not constitute "supplies" within the pauper act making the town wherein the person furnished with such supplies has his settlement liable therefor. Inhabitants of Hampden v. City of Bangor, 68 Me. 368, 369.

Under Rev. St. 1840, c. 32, § 7, providing that any person resident in any town at the date of the passage of this act, who has not within one year previous to that date received support or supplies from some town as a pauper, shall be deemed to have a settlement in the town where he dwells and had his home, supplies cannot be considered as furnished to a man as a pauper, unless furnished to himself personally or to one of his family, and those only can be considered as his family who continue under his care and protection. Green v. Inhabitants of Buckfield, 3 Me. (3 Greenl.) 136, 140.

Supplies for vessels.

The word "supplies," as applied to a vessel, means those articles which a boat may find to be necessary for consumption and use on a voyage. Gibbons v. The C. J. Caffrey, 40 Mo. 257, 259.

"Supplies," as used in Rev. St. c. 122, tit. 26, § 1, providing that every ship, boat, or vessel used in navigating the waters of the state shall be subject to a lien for all debts contracted by the master, owner, agent, or consignee thereof on account of supplies furnished for the use of such ship, boat, or vessel, has a well-defined meaning, and cannot by any fair construction be so construed as to include material furnished. Lawson v. Higgins, 1 Mich. (Man.) 225, 226.

The word "supplies," in article 3204, Civ. Code, relative to ships, does not cover money advanced to purchase materials for a vessel, although both words, "materials" and "supplies," are used in the article. Shaw v. Grant, 13 La. Ann. 52, 53.

Whisky furnished to the master of a boat to supply the place of other whisky lost in the course of transportation, and to thus enable the boat to fulfill a contract of af-freightment, will not be deemed "supplies," within a statute subjecting the boats and vessels to a lien for all the debts contracted by the master, owner, agent, or consignee of such boat or vessel on account of stores or supplies furnished for the use thereof. Bailey v. The Concordia, 17 Mo. 357, 358.

Merchandise furnished the master of a steamboat for the purpose of enabling him therewith to purchase wood and other necessities for the boat in the prosecution of her trip becomes a debt contracted by the master on account of "supplies" furnished for the use of such boat, within the meaning of the act concerning boats and vessels (Act March 19, 1835), providing that every boat or vessel used in navigating the waters of the state shall be liable for all debts contracted by the master on account of supplies furnished for the use of such boat or vessel. The Gen.-Brady v. Buckley, 6 Mo. 558, 561.

Section 1 of the act concerning boats and vessels, giving a lien on a boat on account of debts contracted by the master and owner thereof for stores and supplies for the use of the boat, cannot be interpreted to mean supplies of money for all the purposes for which money may be required in the navigation of the vessel. In its ordinary acceptance "supplies" are understood to mean those articles which a boat may find it necessary to purchase for consumption and use on the voyage. It is something different from wages, for which a lien is also specifically given. Moneys loaned for the specific purpose of enabling a boat to purchase such supplies, or to pay wages or debts incurred already or to be incurred in future, for things which are liens, have been held to be a debt contracted for those things, and therefore a lien also on the boat; but money loaned to enable the boat to pay her debts or expenses generally, which may be for things which are not liens as well as for those which are, will not be a lien under the statute. Gibbons v. The Fanny Barker, 40 Mo. 253, 254; Bryan v. The Pride of the West, 12 Mo. 371, 374.

SUPPORT.

Not only does the word "support" include "bearing weight," but it is also used by the student and understood in common phraseology as covering "to keep from falling," and other kindred expressions, and will be so construed when necessary to sustain a patent for an invention. Hatch Storage Battery Co. v. Electric Storage Battery Co. (U. S.) 100 Fed. 975, 981, 41 C. C. A. 133.

Gen. St. c. 25, § 73, declares that it shall not be lawful for any person to drive any horse or other beast at a rate faster than a walk on any bridge with string pieces 30 feet long between the supports on which they rest. Held, that the word "supports," as used in the statute, refers to that on which the bridge stands or rests, and which supports it from beneath, such as abutments, on the banks, or piers or trestles standing between the abutments, on which the string pieces rest. Abbott v. Town of Wolcott, 38 Vt. 666, 668.

A condition in a mining lease that the lessee shall "support the superincumbent bed of rock" is not equivalent to a representation or assurance by the lessor that there is such a bed of rock over the coal. Beatie v. Rocky Branch Coal Co., 56 Mo. App. 221, 225.

"Support," as used in reference to common schools, means maintaining the schools by continuing the regular expenditures, so that a fund for the support of common schools cannot be used for building a new house or purchasing the site. Sheldon v. Purdy, 49 Pac. 228, 230, 17 Wash. 135.

SUPPORT (Of person).

See "Competent Support"; "Good and Comfortable Support and Maintenance"; "Good and Sufficient Support"; "Means of Support"; "Reasonable Support"; "Right of Support."

"Support," according to Webster, means to sustain; to supply funds for the means of continuing, as to support the expenses of the government. Opinion of Justices, 13 Fla. 687, 689 (quoting Webst. Dict.).

The words "comfort and support," as used in Rev. Code, § 2370, providing that the wife's separate statutory estate shall be liable for all contracts for articles of comfort and support of the household, suitable to the degree and condition in life of the family, and for which the husband would be responsible at common law, have the same meaning and are synonymous with "maintenance," and are expressive of the narrowest signification of necessities at common law; and, when the household has been supplied with food, raiment, habitation, medical assistance, and medicine, the boundary prescribed by the statute has been reached. Eskridge v. Ditmars, 51 Ala. 245, 255.

A declaration which alleged defendant's breach of an undertaking to pay to plaintiff such sums of money as might be necessary for her food, etc., was variant with proof showing the promise to have been to "support" the plaintiff, inasmuch as defendant might have supported plaintiff, without paying or giving to her any money whatever. Bull v. McCrea, 47 Ky. (8 B. Mon.) 422, 424.

Const. art. 16, § 18, providing that each county and incorporated city shall "make provision for the support of its own officers," subject to such regulations as may be provided by law, means to make provision for the fees or per diem of those officers. The support of an officer is derived from the emoluments of the office, and these emoluments, under the Constitution, consist of fees or per diem. Gadsden County v. Greem, 22 Fla. 102, 110.

A contract between the council of a borough and a county that all prisoners should be confined in the jail of the county, and should receive their "support and maintenance" therein at so much a head, construed to not merely require such prisoners to be supplied with room, clothing, bedding, and fuel, but to also include salaries of officers and expenses of repairs of the prison, and hence that the borough was not responsible for the latter charges in addition to the agreed compensation. Reg. v. Council of Borough of Gravesend, 5 El. & Bl. 459, 467.

"Supporting," as used in St. 1892, No. 55, § 1, providing that the town shall give assistance to one in need, and that, if such person has not resided in such town for three years supporting himself and family, the town so furnishing assistance may recover the expense from the town in which such person last resided for the space of three years supporting himself and family, is synonymous with "maintaining." In construing the words "maintains himself and family," it was said in Town of Tunbridge v. Town of Norwich, 17 Vt. 493: "It is not to be inferred from the expression 'and family' that a man, in order to change his settlement, must have a family, or that he must necessarily have maintained himself and family, independent of all aid from any source whatever besides his own personal labor and services. This would be an unreasonable, not to say an absurd, construction. But the meaning of the statute undoubtedly is that he shall maintain himself, or himself and family, if he have one, so that neither shall become chargeable to any town for support. But if the man or his family should receive presents, or if either should inherit property, or if the family should maintain him, instead of his maintaining the family, as is sometimes the case, it would not prevent the change of settlement. All that is necessary is that he should have his permanent domicile in the town, and keep himself and family from being chargeable to either town." Town of Craftsbury v. Town of Greensboro, 29 Atl. 1024, 1026, 66 Vt. 585.

The word "supported," as used in the statute providing that every insane person supported in any county asylum shall be personally liable for his maintenance, means every person maintained in any county asylum, and the provision was not intended to be limited to the pauper or indigent insane. Board of Chosen Freeholders of Camden County v. Ritson, 54 Atl. 839, 840, 68 N. J. Law, 666.

As used in Gen. Laws Dak. 1891, c. 123, relating to the amount recovered by administrators for the wrongful death of their decedent, and providing that any demand "for the support of the deceased" and funeral expenses shall be first deducted and paid, does not extend to demands for the support of the family and does not make the sum subject to payment of all debts incurred by the deceased for the support of himself and family, but means only such as were incurred in consequence of, or at any rate after, the injury causing the death. State v. Probate Court, 53 N. W. 463, 464, 51 Minn. 241.

The word "support," like most words, has a variety of meanings. One of the illustrative examples of its use, given by Webster, is "to support a student at college." The use of the word "support" in Bastardy Act (Revision, p. 72) § 12, requiring a bond to indemnify the township against costs and expenses incurred for the support of the child, was meant to include the performance of all those duties which are due from a father to a child, and which the public may be called upon to execute in case of the father's default. It includes those services on behalf of the infant, against the expenses for which, in the entire history of the bastardy statutes, the father has been compelled to indemnify the parish or the township. Education is one of the duties owing to the child. State v. Such, 53 N. J. Law (24 Vroom) 351, 354, 21 Atl. 852, 853.

Act March 11, 1889 (St. 1889, p. 111), as amended by Act March 23, 1893 (St. 1893, p. 328) § 24, providing that money to be contributed by counties of the state for the care and support of the inmates of the reform school should be placed in the state treasury in the fund of such school for its use, and also providing that county funds were for the "keeping and taking care of each minor committed to such institution," did not authorize the trustees of such reform school to erect buildings out of such fund; the court saying: "Of course, the word 'support' * * * may be said to mean 'for the use of such institution'; but, conceding this, it does not, in our opinion, aid the plaintiff's construction. On the contrary, as we view it, it is strong proof that the Legislature never intended to give the trustees unlimited power to convert the county and state money to the erection of buildings, which money was appropriated by the state and contributed by the counties for the support and the care and keeping of the children committed to the school." Mitchell v. Colgan, 122 Cal. 296, 300, 54 Pac. 905, 907.

The word "support," as used in the section relating to insane paupers and indigent persons, shall be construed to mean all necessary food, clothing, medicine, and medical attendance. Gen. St. Conn. 1902, § 2742.

Benefit distinguished.

See "Benefit."

As limited to board.

"Support," as used in Pub. St. c. 87, § 31, providing that the price for the support of paupers in state lunatic hospitals should be a certain sum per week, should be construed to include, not merely board, but everything necessary to proper maintenance. Gould v. City of Lawrence, 35 N. E. 462, 463, 160 Mass. 232.

The word "support," according to Webster, means maintenance, subsistence, or an income sufficient for the support of a family. As used in a contract whereby one agrees to support another and his wife, it does not include merely sufficient provisions, but such other conveniences and necessities as are reasonable and suitable to make such party and his wife comfortable. Wall v.

"Support," as used in the act for the relief of insolvent debtors, providing that, when a person imprisoned for debt shall be unable to support himself in prison, the plaintiff shall stand chargeable, etc., embraces food and lodging; but as, under the law, the county must furnish the lodging, such plaintiff is only compelled to furnish food. Buttles v. Carlton, 1 Ohio, 33, 85.

"Support," as used in a will by which a husband gave his wife, in lieu of dower, a decent and comfortable support out of his estate, in sickness and in health, during her lifetime, does not mean such sum as would be requisite to support her in a boarding house, but means a sufficient amount to maintain her in housekeeping at the place of her residence and in the manner to which she had been accustomed while living with her husband. Tolley v. Greene (N. Y.) 2 Sandf. Ch. 91, 94.

Building of house.

"Support," as used in a will providing a fund for the support of testatrix's mother, cannot be construed to include the building of houses in whole or in part. The building of a house, in whole or in part, cannot be considered a part of the support of a person who is to occupy it. Morford v. Dieffenbacker, 20 N. W. 600, 608, 54 Mich. 593.

Comfort synonymous.

See "Comfort."

Education.

"Support," as used in a will wherein the testator directed that all his property should be kept together until his son should arrive at full age, for the support of the family with respect to the infant children, should be construed to embrace a suitable education for each, as well as board and clothing. Addison v. Bowie (Md.) 2 Bland, 606, 627.

A will directing that the interest accruing on the residue of testator's estate after the death of his wife, or so much thereof as might be necessary, should be applied to the "support and maintenance" of his infant grandchildren during their minority, should be construed to include their proper education at a private school. Patterson v. Read, 9 Atl. 579, 580, 42 N. J. Eq. 146, 621.

In a will providing that property shall be applied to the support of S. and his family, the word "support" was intended to include the education of the children. Whelan v. Rellly, 3 W. Va. 597, 610.

Family expense distinguished.

See "Family Expense."

As food, clothing, and shelter.

"Support and maintenance," as used in a petition to recover damages for death, which alleges that the plaintiff and children were dependent upon deceased for support and maintenance, means food, clothing, and shelter. Kearney Electric Co. v. Laughlin, 63 N. W. 941, 943, 45 Neb. 390.

Irregular gifts.

The irregular and infrequent bestowal of comparatively diminutive gifts upon a person cannot properly be regarded as "support of a family." Gregg v. Brickley, 69 N. E. 1072, 1073, 27 Ind. App. 154.

Keeping boarding house.

In construing Code, § 1826, providing that no married woman may contract, so as to affect her estate, except for the support of the family, without the written consent of the husband, the court said, in answer to the claim that family supplies procured to keep up a boarding house, from which the family derived their support, were embraced within the words: "We think it has a more restricted meaning, and is confined to goods bought for the direct benefit of the members of the family, such as food, clothing, and other necessities, and not for the successful prosecution of a business from the profits of which such support is to be obtained, whether by keeping a boarding house, or a hotel, or by engaging in any other general occupation. For these larger outside operations, whose results are speculative, the written consent of the husband, whose advice should be sought, must be obtained, and this is the protection secured to her by the statute." Clark v. Hay, 4 S. E. 190, 192, 98 N. C. 421.

Medical attendance.

In an agreement whereby a person who conducted the business of a store belonging to another was to have a support for himself and family out of it as a compensation for his services, "support" includes clothing and food for the family and necessary medical attendance to those of them that are sick. Morse v. Powers, 45 Vt. 300, 302.

Medicines.

"Support" generally means articles for ordinary sustenance, as food, etc., and does not include medicines, unless the context shows such intention. An order to let a family have whatever they want for their "support," addressed to one who is not a physician or druggist, does not authorize him to buy drugs for them in sickness. Grant v. Dabney, 19 Kan. 388, 389, 27 Am. Rep. 125.

Money.

An allegation in a claim against a decedent's estate for services in the care of and "aiding and supporting" decedent's sister and minor children includes aid and support by the contribution of money. Grimm v. Taylor's Estate, 55 N. W. 447, 448, 96 Mich. 5.

Necessaries.

"Support," as used in Rev. St. 1894, § 7288, making licensed saloon keepers liable on their bond for illegal sales to any person who shall sustain any injury or damage to his means of support on account of the use of such intoxicating liquors so sold, is necessarily a flexible term, and should not be limited to mean actual necessities of life, or that one's means of support is only damaged, where such person is reduced to a state of dependency; and hence the loss of the services of a son, who contributed by his earnings to the expenses of his father's family, is a damage to the father's means of support, though the earnings of the father may be sufficient to keep the family from becoming dependent. Reath v. State, 44 N. E. 808, 809, 16 Ind. App. 146.

As determined by position in life.

The word "support," as used in Comp. Laws, pp. 218, 220, § 27, providing that, when a divorce is granted a wife, the court may set apart such portion for her support and the support of the children as shall be deemed just and equitable, includes everything—necessities and luxuries—which a person in such wife's position is entitled to have and enjoy. Lake v. Bender, 7 Pac. 74, 78, 18 Nev. 361.

"Support and education," as used in a will in which the testator charged his estate with the support and education of a child, without naming any amount therefor, means such sum as would support the child in a comfortable manner. Williams v. MacDougall, 39 Cal. 80, 83.

An undertaking whereby one agrees to "support and take care of another" is to be construed according to the various circumstances of the party, and does not necessarily imply that the person to be supported is not to use any exertions to support himself. Bull v. McOrea, 47 Ky. (8 B. Mon.) 422, 425.

As creating a trust.

"Support," as used in a will giving all the testator's estate, both personal and real, to his wife for life, for her support and comfort, merely express the purpose and motive of the gift, and does not make the gift conditional. It has little, if any, more significance than the words "to be for her benefit and enjoyment," and is not sufficient to cut down the clearly expressed absolute gift to a qualified or conditional one. Maynard v. Cleaves, 149 Mass. 307, 21 N. E. 376.

As the word "support" means sustenance, maintenance, subsistence, etc., its use in a will, giving the income of property to the use and support of the testator's son, implies the creation of a spendthrift trust, and prevents the vesting of the property in the son in fee. The word indicates that the son is to have out of the income those things which are essential to his personal physical subsistence. Winthrop Co. v. Clinton, 46 Atl. 435, 437, 196 Pa. 472, 79 Am. St. Rep. 729.

The phrase "for the support of himself and family, and for no other purpose," incorporated into a will, in which testator bequeaths a sum of money to his son, for the support of himself and family, and for no other purpose, operates to make the bequest in trust for the declared purpose. White's Ex'r v. White, 30 Vt. 338, 343.

SUPPORT OF THE POOR.

A bequest for the "support of the poor" of the county is to be construed as a charitable bequest. Heuser v. Harris, 42 Ill. 425.

SUPPOSE.

"Suppose," as used by a witness who, after stating that he had known a slave, in answer to interrogatories as to such slave's value, said "I suppose he was worth _____ dollars," is used in the sense of "believe," and the witness really gave his opinion of the slave's value. Ward v. Reynolds, 32 Ala. 384, 389.

"Supposed," as used in an instruction that if plaintiff in an action in good faith supposed he had a cause of action against the defendant on account of personal injuries, which he believed resulted from the conduct of the defendant, and threatened to sue defendant on account thereof, and defendant executed the note sued on in consideration that the plaintiff would not sue him, which was accepted by plaintiff in settlement, such compromise and settlement was a good and lawful consideration for such note, means substantially the same thing as "believed." The definition of "suppose" is given in Webster's Unabridged Dictionary as "imagine, to believe, or to receive as true"; and the same authority gives the definition of "believe" as "to think; to suppose." Parker v. Enslow, 102 Ill. 272, 276, 40 Am. Rep. 588.

"Supposed to have been forfeited" as used in Act March 28, 1797 (Laws N. Y. 1797, p. 162, c. 52), providing that no person having any claim or demand in or to any lands, messuages, tenements, or hereditaments "supposed to have been forfeited" to the people of the state, in consequence of the attainder or conviction of any persons for any act or crime done or committed during the late war after the lapse of a certain period of time, referred to the estate which has been sold where there might be room for supposition and mistake, but not to the fact of attainder or conviction, which must ever be a matter of record and notoriety, and about which there could be no doubt or mistake. There must have been an actual forfeiture by the attainder or conviction of some person, and a sale by the commissioners of some property supposed to have belonged to such attainted and convicted person, but in fact claimed by some one else. Fisher v. Hamden (U. S.) 9 Fed. Cas. 129, 132.

Death is "supposed to have been caused by violence," within Rev. St. § 1221, providing for inquest by the coroner when a dead body is found within the county and when death is supposed to have been caused by violence, whenever, from such observation as the coroner may be able to make and from the information that may come to him, there is substantial reason for belief or surmising that death was caused by unlawful means. State v. Bellows, 56 N. E. 1028, 1029, 62 Ohio St. 307.

SUPPOSED CODICIL.

An instruction in a will contest, referring to an instrument as the "supposed codicil," is not equivalent to telling the jury that the codicil was not the real codicil of the testator. Such use of the word casts no discredit upon its validity, and the instruction cannot be considered to amount to a statement that the instrument is not a codicil. Smith v. Henline, 51 N. E. 227, 232, 174 Ill. 184.

SUPPOSED DEBT.

It has been held that a reference in a plea to the "supposed debt" is a virtual admission. Gale v. Capern, 1 Adol. & E. 102. But a reference to the "supposed debt, if any such there be," is not an admission. Margetts v. Bays, 4 Adol. & E. 489. And the words "claimed and demanded" are equivalent to "supposed." Scadding v. Eyles, 9 Q. B. 858, 860, 862.

SUPPOSED LEGAL TITLE.

A conveyance under which defendant claimed title, which vested an estate for life in the plaintiff, with remainder in fee to the defendant, subject to be revested in the plaintiff on the nonperformance by the defendant of conditions annexed, was not a "supposed legal title," within the meaning of Gen. Laws, c. 224, § 6, relating to the right of betterments of one holding under a supposed legal title. Walker v. Walker, 5 Atl. 460, 461, 64 N. H. 55.

SUPPOSITION.

In an instruction that "if the evidence, though in part circumstantial, is to your mind consistent with the supposition that defendant is guilty of this charge and inconsistent with the supposition that he is innocent of it," etc., "it is your duty to find him guilty," the word "supposition" is used in the sense of hypothesis, and as meaning primarily what is not known to be true and not proved; and hence the instruction was not erroneous. State v. Harras, 65 Pac. 774, 775, 25 Wash. 416.

Requested instructions in a criminal case used the words "suppositions, hypotheses, and theories," and asserted, if two of them may be drawn or may arise out of the testimony, one consistent with the defendant's innocence and the other tending to establish his guilt, the defendant shall be acquitted. The court said: "These charges are faulty in several respects. Supposition has no legitimate sphere or habitation in judicial determination. So, in the connection in which they were invoked, the words 'hypotheses' and 'theories' have very doubtful and indefinite significations." Johnson v. State, 102 Ala. 1, 16 South. 99, 104.

On a criminal prosecution it is error to instruct that the evidence should exclude every supposition, save the guilt of accused, in order to warrant a conviction. Baldwin v. State, 111 Ala. 11, 15, 20 South. 528.

SUPPRESS.

See "Motion to Suppress Deposition."

Under a charter authorizing the common council to provide for the suppression of vice and immorality, the council has authority to pass ordinances making certain acts misdemeanors and providing for their punishment, since "suppress" means to prevent, put down, or end by force, and no better way exists to put down than to provide for punishment. Ogden v. City of Madison, 87 N. W. 568, 569, 111 Wis. 413, 55 L. R. A. 506.

The words "abate" and "suppress," in a statute giving a city power to abate nuisances and suppress gambling houses, are practically synonymous. Incorporated Town of Nevada v. Hutchins, 13 N. W. 634, 635, 59 Iowa, 506.

Power to license implied.

"Suppress," as used in the Chicago charter, empowering the council to suppress and restrain disorderly houses and groceries, means to prevent, and not to license or sanction, and the city was authorized to prohibit the sale of liquor absolutely. Schwuchow v. City of Chicago, 68 Ill. 444, 448.

Where a penal statute of Texas prohibits disorderly houses in the state, and another statute confers on a certain city power to "suppress and restrain" such houses, and authorizes the city council to "restrain and punish" the inmates and to prevent and punish the keeping of such houses, and authorizes the adoption of summary measures for the removal or suppression, or the regulation and inspection, of all such establishments, the words "suppress, restrain, and regulate" should not be construed as giving power to license such houses. Ex parte Garza, 13 S. W. 779, 28 Tex. App. 381, 19 Am. St. Rep. 845.

Power to punish implied.

The power to suppress or restrain did not authorize the city to punish a keeper of a disorderly house. City of Chariton v. Barber, 6 N. W. 523, 54 Iowa, 360, 37 Am. Rep. 209 (cited in City of Centerville v. Miller, 10 N. W. 293, 294, 57 Iowa, 56).

St. 1885, conferring on the city of Denver power by ordinance to "prohibit and suppress" disorderly houses, means that the city is given the right to provide a punishment to be inflicted on those maintaining such houses. Rogers v. People, 12 Pac. 843, 845, 9 Colo. 450, 59 Am. Rep. 146.

SUPPRESSION.

Where there is an obligation to speak, a failure to speak will constitute the "suppression of a fact"; but, where there is no obligation to speak, silence cannot be termed "suppression." Chicora Fertilizer Co. v. Dunan, 46 Atl. 347, 351, 91 Md. 144, 50 L. R. A. 401.

The "suppression of a deposition" destroys it for all evidential purposes, and while the paper upon which it was written may remain in the files of the court, and purport on its face to bear the signature of the party to the case, so that what is set down therein would be competent, as admissions and the like against the party, upon proof of the signature or of his assent to the statements contained in the paper, in and of itself, having lost by the suppression the verification which it had as a deposition, it is no more than any other paper, casually and accidentally in the file, purporting to have been signed by a party sought to be charged by the admissions embraced in it, and not evidence against him, unless preliminary proof connecting him with it is adduced. Gross v. Coffey, 20 South. 428, 430, 111 Ala. 468.

SUPREME COURT.

See "Next Supreme Court."

The "supreme court" is a court for the correction of errors at law. State v. Bailey, 1 S. C. 1, 5.

The word "supreme," as applied to a court, means "highest," in the sense of final or last resort. "The errors of this court, in absence of a federal question, are beyond the pale of correction by any human tribunal, as the title of this court indicates, being the 'Supreme Court of Appeals.'" Koonce v. Doolittle, 37 S. E. 644, 645, 48 W. Va. 592.

"The name 'Supreme Court' indicates that it is a court of the highest authority in the state, and so it is in this state. Yet in New York this name is given to courts possessing similar jurisdiction to that given to the district courts in this state, and the name 'Court of Appeals' is given to the highest court. In Texas the name 'Court of Appeals' is given to a court having appellate jurisdiction in criminal cases, and the name 'Supreme Court' applies to the court having appellate jurisdiction in civil cases." State v. Atherton, 10 Pac. 901, 906, 19 Nev. 332.

Under the provisions of the Constitution that "the Supreme Court shall consist of three judges, a majority of whom shall be necessary to form a quorum and pronounce a decision," if the office of one of the judges becomes vacant, the other two may act. Snider v. Rinehart, 31 Pac. 716, 718, 18 Colo. 18.

SUPREME LAW.

The "supreme law" is the Constitution of the United States and the state. Jones v. McMahan, 30 Tex. 719, 735.

"Supreme law of the land," as used in Const. art. 1, § 2, providing that the Constitution of the United States is the "supreme law of the land," relates to those matters wherein the general government assumes to control the individual states; and, the requirement of a presentment by a grand jury not being one of them, the further provision of the state Constitution relating to prosecutions by information, and dispensing with grand juries, is not affected by section 2. In re Rafferty, 25 Pac. 465, 466, 1 Wash. St. 382.

SUPREME LODGE.

The words "grand or supreme lodge," when used "in their ordinary and popular sense, apply only to secret organizations or supreme bodies constituted from and having jurisdiction over secret societies." The term is so used in Laws 1885, c. 131, § 30, in reference to insurance, which provides that the act shall not apply to any association of religious or secret societies now existing or under the supervision of a grand or supreme lodge. State v. National Ass'n of the Farmers' & Mechanics' Mut. Aid Ass'n, 9 Pac. 956, 960, 35 Kan. 51.

Judicial notice will be taken that the term "Supt." stands for the word "superintendent," and, as the superintendent is a managing agent in a replevin suit, an affidavit in replevin signed by a certain person as Supt. is a sufficient compliance with Rev. St. 1879, § 2882, providing that the statement shall be verified by the affidavit of the plaintiff, his agent, or attorney. South. Missouri Land Co. v. Jeffries, 40 Mo. App. 360, 361.

SURCHARGE.

"Surcharge" is the term applied in an action of account to the entering on the account of any debit or credit which ought to have been made and which has been omitted. Phillips v. Belden (N. Y.) 2 Edw. Ch. 1, 23.

An account stated is not absolutely conclusive; but if any of the parties can show an omission for which credit ought to be, that is a "surcharge," or if anything is inserted that is a wrong charge he is at liberty to show it, and that is a "falsification." Rehill v. McTague, 7 Atl. 224, 228, 114 Pa. 82, 60 Am. Rep. 367 (citing Pit v. Cholmondeley, 2 Ves. Sr. 565).

Surcharging applies to the balance of the whole account, and supplies credits omitted which ought to be allowed. Leave to surcharge and falsify an account does not authorize a restatement of it on different principles. The principles of an accounting are all settled, but all items of overcharge or mischarge and of failure to credit may be corrected. Such correction would carry with each item a change of its incidents, such as commissions and interest, and necessarily requires a restatement on the principles already established. Kennedy v. Adickes, 15 S. E. 922, 923, 37 S. C. 174.

SURETIES.

"Sureties," as used in Code, § 1853, relating to judicial proceedings, and requiring a bond therein, with sureties, though plural in form, should be construed to include the singular number also, in the same way that a word importing a singular number may be extended to mean several persons or things. Elliott v. Stevens, 10 Iowa, 418, 422.

SURETY.

See "Common Surety"; "Sufficient Sureties."

A surety is a person who binds himself for the payment of a sum of money, or for the performance of something else, for another who is already bound for the same. Young v. McFadden, 25 N. E. 284, 125 Ind. 254.

The word "surety" is defined by Webster to mean certainty; safety; security against loss or damage; security for payment; in law, one who enters into a bond or recognizance to answer for another's appearance in court, or for his payment of a debt, or for the performance of some act. Pitkins v. Boyd (Iowa) 4 G. Greene, 255, 259.

A surety is defined as a person who, being liable to pay a debt, is entitled, if it is enforced against him, to be indemnified by some other person, who ought himself to have made payment before the surety was compelled to do so. Johnson v. Young, 20 W. Va. 614, 657. A surety is a person who, being liable to pay a debt or perform an obligation, is entitled, if it is enforced against him, to be indemnified by some other person who ought himself to have made payment or to have performed before the surety is compelled to do so. Smith v. Shelden, 35 Mich. 42, 24 Am. Rep. 529 (quoted with approval in Chattanooga Foundry & Pipe Works v. Hembree, 117 Ala. 301, 23 South. 38, 39); Wise v. Miller, 45 Ohio, 388, 399, 14 N. E. 218; Cassan v. Maxwell, 39 Minn. 391, 40 N. W. 358; Wentlandt v. Sohre, 33 N. W. 700, 701, 37 Minn. 162; Hoffman v. Habighorst, 63 Pac. 610, 612, 38 Or. 261, 53 L. R. A. 908.

A surety is one who, at the request of another and for the purpose of securing to him a benefit, becomes responsible for the performance by the latter of some act in favor of a third person or hypothecates property as security therefor. Civ. Code Cal. 1903, § 2831; Civ. Code Mont. 1895, § 3670; Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 4649; Civ. Code S. D. 1903, § 1993; Sather Banking Co. v. Arthur R. Briggs Co., 72 Pac. 352, 353, 138 Cal. 724; O'Connor v. Morse, 44 Pac. 305, 306, 112 Cal. 31, 53 Am. St. Rep. 155; Valentine v. Donohoe-Kelly Banking Co., 65 Pac. 381, 382, 133 Cal. 191; London, Paris & American Bank v. Smith, 35 Pac. 1027, 1028, 101 Cal. 415.

A surety or guarantor is one who becomes responsible for the debt, default, or miscarriage of another person. The words "surety" and "guarantor" are often used indiscriminately as synonymous terms; but, while a surety and guarantor have in common that they are both bound for another person, yet there are points of difference between them which should be carefully noted. A surety is usually bound with his principal in the same instrument, executed at the same time, and on the same consideration. He is an original promisor and debtor from the beginning, and is held ordinarily to know every default of his principal. Usually he will not be protected, either by the mere indulgence of the creditor to the principal, or by want of notice of the default of the principal, no matter how much he may be injured thereby. On the other hand, the contract of the guarantor is his own separate undertaking, in which the principal does not join. It is usually entered into before or after that of the principal, and is often founded on a separate consideration from that supporting the contract of the principal. The original contract of the principal is not his contract, and he is not bound to take notice of its nonperformance. Hall v. Weaver (U. S.) 34 Fed. 104, 106.

A surety, says Chancellor Wythe, "is one bound that something shall be done, not by himself in the first instance, but by some other hand, and, in case of default by this prior agent, that the obligor shall perform the act or compensate for nonperformance." Field v. Harrison (Va.) Wythe, 273, 281. To make one a surety, he must be bound by contract or engagement entered into at the request of another, who is the real debtor. Sherman's Adm'r v. Shaver, 75 Va. 1, 4.

The contract or undertaking of a surety is a contract by one person to be answerable for the payment of some debt or the performance of some act or duty, in case of the failure of another person who is himself primarily responsible for the payment of such debt or the performance of the act or duty. Roberts v. Hawkins, 38 N. W. 575, 578, 70 Mich. 566.

A surety is one who contracts to answer for a debt, default, or miscarriage of another—an obligation accessorial to that of the principal debtor; but the relation of surety does not exist where the consideration moves directly to or from the person claiming the privilege of a surety. Mobile & O. R. Co. v. Nicholas, 12 South. 723, 735, 98 Ala. 92.

The word "surety" generally means a co-obligor or co-promisor entering into a contract with the principal jointly, or jointly and severally, and at the same time. Read v. Cutts, 7 Me. (7 Greenl.) 186, 189, 22 Am. Dec. 184.

In Gen. St. c. 66, § 36, allowing parties severally liable upon the same obligation or instrument, and sureties on the same instrument, to be included in the same action, a "surety," within the meaning of the statute, is any one who is bound on the same instrument for its payment with another, who, as between themselves, is the principal debtor, whatever may be the particular form of the undertaking. Hammel v. Beard-sley, 17 N. W. 858, 859, 31 Minn. 314.

A surety has always the right to pay the debt of the principal, and when he does so he becomes entitled to be subrogated to the rights of the creditor and to receive the benefit of any surety which the creditor may hold against him. Willis v. Davis, 3 Minn. 17, 27 (Gil. 1, 5).

The term "surety" in its broadest sense includes every person whose estate is obligated to answer for the default of another. Waitress v. Pierce, 32 N. H. 560; Magill v. Brown, 50 S. W. 642, 20 Tex. Civ. App. 662.

"Sureties," as used in Comp. Laws 1876, p. 403, § 1240, providing that persons severally liable upon some obligation or instrument, including the parties to bills of exchange and promissory notes and sureties on the same or separate instruments, may all or any of them be included in the same action at the option of plaintiffs, includes guarantors. "Surety" is a general term, and "guaranty" is a special. In a statute where there is nothing to limit it, "surety" is taken to include "guaranty." Gagan v. Stevens, 9 Pac. 706, 707, 4 Utah, 348.

Sureties are not bound beyond the strict terms of engagement, and their liability is not to be extended by implication beyond the terms of their contract. A city council elected a superintendent of waterworks, while there was no law or ordinance specifying his duties or requiring him to give any bond. He gave the bond, with sureties, conditioned for the proper discharge of his duties of superintendent and the payment of moneys that might come to his hands as such. Subsequently an ordinance was passed providing for the appointment of such superintendent and defining his duties, one of which was the collection of water rents. He collected the rents and became a defaulter to a large amount thereof. The sureties were not liable for the default; the additional and different duty of collecting water rents imposed being an additional peril to the sureties beyond their engagement. City of Lafayette v. James, 92 Ind. 240, 243, 47 Am. Rep. 140.

A surety has all the rights of a guarantor, may compel the principal to perform the obligation when due, may satisfy the principal obligation, with or without legal proceedings, "and compel the principal to reimburse him, with costs and expenses." is entitled to all the security held by the creditor, is entitled to enforce all the remedies which the creditor has against the principal, and may require his creditor to proceed against the principal, or to pursue any other remedy in his power which the surety cannot himself pursue, and which would lighten his burden. Civ. Code, § 1681; Kennedy v. Falde, 29 N. W. 667, 670, 4 Dak. 319.

A surety has the right to stand on the very terms of his contract, and, where his undertaking is that his principal shall perform the conditions of a contract regarding the sale on commission of implements to be furnished him in the future, the surety is not liable for default of the principal respecting implements already on hand, which the principal and the owner, without the knowledge of the surety, had afterwards agreed should be sold as though furnished under the contract of suretyship. Weir Plow Co. v. Walmsley, 110 Ind. 242, 248, 11 N. E. 232.

Sureties on the bond on appeal from the judgment of a justice of the peace for possession of real estate and damages for its detention are not liable beyond the penalty, notwithstanding Rev. St. 1881, § 5236, providing that in such cases damages on appeal by defendant shall be deemed as covered by the appeal bond, and section 1221, providing that where official bonds, recognizances, etc., are defective, the principal and sureties shall be bound to the full extent contemplated by the law requiring the same, and the sureties to the amount specified in the bond. Graeter v. De Wolf, 112 Ind. 1, 2, 13 N. E. 111.

On appearance bond.

A surety on an appearance bond is something more than a simple obligor; for the principal is supposed to be in the surety's constant custody, and the former, being the latter's jailer, may at any time surrender him to the custody of the law. State v. Toups, 11 South. 524, 527, 44 La. Ann. 896.

On note.

A surety on a note is an original maker, and becomes primarily liable to any person lawfully holding the paper; and it is held that the mere addition of the word "surety," written after the name of a person signing the note as a surety, is not sufficient to restrict his liability to that of an indorser. Ballard v. Burton, 24 Atl. 769, 772, 64 Vt. 387, 16 L. R. A. 664.

Where a person makes a promissory note in the singular number, and another signs the same, adding the word "surety," after the name, both are liable, and may be sued together as makers. Such a note is joint and several, and both parties are principals. Dart v. Sherwood, 7 Wis. 523, 76 Am. Dec. 223.

The word "surety," affixed to the name of the maker of a promissory note, does not show that he stands in such a relation to the transaction in which it was given that he may not be made liable to a recovery on a common count for money had and received, or for money lent, or for money paid out. Vaughn v. Rugg, 52 Vt. 235, 237.

In a note signed by P., under which is the signature of C., with the words "security for the fulfillment of the above," C. was not a "guarantor," but an immediate party. His name was signed at the foot, beneath that of P., the principal debtor, but, to exclude misconception of his character in the transaction, with the marginal annexation of the words "security for the fulfillment of the above," which are not inconsistent with the direct engagement. They serve to note that he had signed, not as a "guarantor," but as a "surety." They are not technical words in a contract of guaranty, and the juxtaposition of the signatures, as well as the absence of apt words to indicate a contingent responsibility, shows that the parties intended to be jointly bound. Craddock v. Armor (Pa.) 10 Watts, 258.

Where the surety on a promissory note pays it after the principal has been discharged under the insolvency act, the surety may recover the amount from the principal, whose discharge will be no bar to the action. Paxson v. Haster, 11 N. J. Law (6 Halst.) 410.

Though a person added the word "surety" to his name when signing a note, it is quite possible that he was in truth a principal debtor; and though a jury, in the absence of proof to the contrary, might infer from the tenor of the note that he was a surety, still it would be a presumption of fact to be made by the jury, and not a presumption of law to be declared by the court. Sisson v. Barrett, 2 N. Y. (2 Comst.) 406, 407.

One may become a party to a promissory note or a bill of exchange as a surety, and is entitled to all the privileges applicable to that character as fully as though he was a surety in some other form of contract. Griffith v. Reed (N. Y.) 21 Wend. 502, 503, 34 Am. Dec. 267.

SURETY FOR THE PEACE.

"Surety for the peace" is one of the branches of preventive justice, and consists in obliging those persons of whom there is probable ground to suspect future misbehavior to stipulate with and give full assurance to the public that such offense as is apprehended shall not happen, by finding pledges or securities for keeping the peace. Hyde v. Greuch, 62 Md. 577, 582 (citing 4 Bl. Comm. 251).

SURETYSHIP.

"Suretyship" is a direct contract to pay the debt of another. McIntosh-Huntington Co. v. Reed (U. S.) 89 Fed. 464, 466.

A suretyship is a primary obligation, and a guaranty of collateral undertaking. A surety is directly liable for the debt; a guarantor, only after a due and unsuccessful effort to collect from the debtor. Allegheny County Light Co. v. Reinhold, 21 Pa. Ct. R. 118, 119.

"The relation of suretyship," say the editors of White & Tudor's Leading Cases in Equity, "grows out of the assumption of a liability at the request of another and for his benefit. It may consequently arise, though the name of the principal does not appear in the instrument which constitutes the evidence of the debt." Hoffman v. Habighorst, 63 Pac. 610, 612, 38 Or. 261, 53 L. R. A. 908 (quoting Lead. Cas. Eq. [4th Ed.] 149).

A contract of a wife in executing a new note, after the married women's act of 1881 went into effect, in renewal of a note executed by the husband and wife for money loaned to the wife and used by the husband before the passage of such act, was a contract of suretyship. Lackey v. Boruff, 53 N. E. 412, 414, 152 Ind. 371.

Rev. St. § 5119, prohibiting married women to enter into any "contract of surety," etc., does not apply to a note executed by a wife in payment of a transcript of a judgment against her husband, necessary to appeal the case. Morningstar v. Hardwick, 29 N. E. 929, 930, 3 Ind. App. 431.

A warranty in a wife's conveyance of her separate realty in discharge of her husband's debt is not a contract of suretyship, within Burns' Rev. St. 1894, § 6964 (Rev. St. 1881, § 5119), avoiding her contracts of suretyship; the transaction having extinguished the debt. Nichol v. Hays, 50 N. E. 768, 769, 20 Ind. App. 309.

The term "suretyship," rather than that of "guaranty," applies to the promise in which the promisor binds himself to do that which another is bound to do, if the latter does not do it himself, as it is an original undertaking. Woody v. Haworth, 57 N. E. 272, 273, 24 Ind. App. 634.

An instrument of writing reciting: "We hereby guaranty that the town of Homer will furnish a free right of way to the La. & N. W. R. R. Co."—is in terms and in legal effect an ordinary contract of commercial guaranty, and not of suretyship, and the parties signing the same bind themselves jointly. Louisiana & W. R. Co. v. Dillard, 26 South. 451, 453, 61 La. Ann. 1484.

"Whenever a contract is shown which upon the face of it shows defendant to be a surety, certain principles immediately apply, one of which imposes on the creditor the duty of showing that nothing has been done on his part tending to exonerate the principal and burden the security." Williams v. Collins, 4 N. C. 382, 388.

A contract of guaranty or suretyship is said to be strictissimi juris, and one in which the guarantor has the right of prescribing the exact terms upon which he will enter into the obligation and to insist on his discharge if those terms are not observed. It is not a question whether he is harmed by a deviation to which he has not assented. Schoonover v. Osborne, 79 N. W. 263, 264, 108 Iowa, 453.

A note executed by a wife in payment of a transcript of a judgment against her husband, necessary to appeal the case, is not a contract of surety, within Rev. St. § 5119, prohibiting married women to enter into any such contract. Morningstar v. Hardwick, 29 N. E. 929, 930, 3 Ind. App. 431.

Payment by a surety, though it may discharge the debt and extinguish liens held by the creditor, does not have that effect as between the principal debtor and his surety. As between them, payment by the latter is in the nature of a purchase from the creditor, and operates as an equitable assignment of the debt. Thomas v. Stewart, 117 Ind. 50, 51, 18 N. E. 505, 506, 1 L. R. A. 715.

Where a husband receives the entire consideration for a sale of a certain business, and his wife joins in a covenant that neither would engage in it again for a certain time, she was a principal therein and was personally bound thereby. Koh-i-moor Laundry Co. v. Lockwood, 141 Ind. 140, 143, 40 N. E. 677.

"Suretyship" is an accessorial promise, by which a person binds himself for another already bound, and agrees with the creditor to satisfy the obligation if the debtor does not. Civ. Code La. 1900, art. 3035.

Guaranty distinguished.

See "Guaranty."

As requiring strict construction.

The contract of a surety is to be construed strictly, both in law and equity, and his liability is not to be extended by any implication beyond the terms of his contract. Reynolds v. Hall, 2 Ill. (1 Scam.) 35, 38.

A contract of suretyship is one whereby one obligates himself to pay the debt of another. The liability of a surety is said to be strictissimi juris; that is, the obligation of a surety must not be extended to another subject, or to any other person or period of time than is expressed or necessarily included in it. The contract, however, is subject to common-sense rules of interpretation, such as govern any commercial instrument. No surety is to be bound beyond the extent of the engagement, which shall appear from the expression of the security and the nature of the transaction, to have been in his contemplation at the time of entering into it. The intent or latitude of the contract of suretyship is to be ascertained by fair and liberal construction of the instrument, in furtherance of the intention of the parties, and the liability of the surety can in no way be extended by implication. In short, the strict construction of the obligation of a surety applies to its nonextension to subjects, persons, or periods of time not necessarily or expressly included in it; otherwise, it is subject to the ordinary rules of construction. Fisse v. Einstein, 5 Mo. App. 78, 87.

As requiring a primary obligation.

A contract of suretyship is collateral to and predicated upon a primary obligation. In order to establish suretyship, it is first necessary to prove the existence of the primary contract. Thornburg v. Allman, 35 N. E. 1110, 8 Ind. App. 531.

"A contract of suretyship is accessory to an obligation contracted by another person, either contemporaneously, or previously, or subsequently," to answer on the default of the principal. "It is the essence of the contract that there be a subsisting, valid obligation of a principal debt. Without a principal there can be no accessory, and by the extinction of the former the latter becomes extinct." Russell v. Fallor, 1 Ohio St. 327, 329, 59 Am. Dec. 631.

According to the civil law a party who enters voluntarily into an agreement is bound by his stipulation, and he who accepts the guaranty looks to it for the ultimate fulfillment of the original undertaking. According to Code La. art. 3004, suretyship is an accessory promise by which a person binds himself for another already bound, and agrees with the creditor to satisfy the obligation, if the debtor does not. Pothier says a suretyship is a contract by which a person obligates himself on behalf of a debtor to a creditor for the payment of a whole or a part of what is due from such debtor, by way of accession to his obligation. Ringgold v. Newkirk, 3 Ark. (3 Pike) 96, 108.

A "suretyship" is a mere accessory promise by which a person binds himself for another already bound. An individual member of a copartnership cannot, therefore, become surety on an attachment bond executed by his firm as principal; for he cannot be both principal and surety at one and the same time, in the same obligation, and for the same liability. Bayne v. Cusimano, 23 South. 361, 363, 50 La. Ann. 361.

A contract of suretyship is usually defined to be a contract whereby one person engages to be answerable for the debt, default, or miscarriage of another. It is an obligation accessorial to that of the principal debtor. Therefore, if the principal is discharged because of matters inherent in the transaction, even after judgment against the surety, the latter will be exonerated thereby. Where a tax collector executed an additional bond, on which was one new surety besides the sureties on the first bond, and separate actions were brought and the same breaches assigned for a default covered by each, a judgment on a verdict in an action on the first bond in favor of the obligors operated as a discharge of the principal and sureties on the second bond. State v. Parker, 72 Ala. 181, 183.

Rev. Civ. Code, art. 3035, defines "suretyship" to be "an accessory promise by which a person binds himself for another already bound, and agrees with the creditor to satisfy the obligation if the debtor does not." Lachman v. Block (La.) 15 South. 649, 650.

The obligation of a surety is an obligation accessory to that of a principal debtor. It is said the essential of this obligation is that it should be a valid obligation of such principal. Bernd v. Lynea, 43 Atl. 189, 71 Conn. 733.

SURFACE.

"Surface" means that part of the land which is capable of being used for agricultural purposes. Murray v. Allred, 43 S. W. 355, 358, 100 Tenn. 100, 39 L. R. A. 249, 66 Am. St. Rep. 740 (citing Railway Co. v. Checkley, L. R. 4 Eq. 19; Hext v. Gill, 7 Ch. App. 699; Attorney General v. Timeline, 5 Ch. Div. 762).

The word "surface," when specifically used as a subject of conveyance, has a definite and certain meaning, and means that part of the land which is or may be used for agricultural purposes. The very fact of conveying the surface carries with it the idea of an express grant alone of the surface, and severs it from every other material composing the land. Williams v. South Penn Oil Co., 43 S. E. 214, 215, 52 W. Va. 181 (citing Knight v. Iron Co., 47 Ind. 105, 17 Am. Rep. 692).

"Surface," as used in a grant of minerals, wherein it was provided that the grantee should take his right under the servitude that he would support the surface above his mine, meant all strata superincumbent upon the mineral strata granted, and not merely the geometrical surface. Yandes v. Weight, 66 Ind. 319, 325, 32 Am. Rep. 109.

"Surface," as used in Municipal Code, § 494 (66 Ohio Laws, p. 232), providing that the owner or possessor of a city or village lot shall be liable for damage occasioned to buildings on any adjoining lots by excavation which he makes on his own lot to the depth of more than nine feet below the curb of the street, or, if there be no curb, below the surface of the adjoining lots, means "an actual existing surface, whether it be a natural surface, or the result of filling or grading the lots." Burkhardt v. Hanley, 23 Ohio St. 558, 559.

SURFACE LINE.

The "surface line" of a street is as essential a part of the street as its laterals lines. Righter v. City of Philadelphia, 28 Atl. 1015, 1016, 161 Pa. 73.

SURFACE RIGHTS.

"Surface rights," as used in a contract sale of surface rights of land, means the entire surface of the land, reserving the minerals to the grantor. Keweenaw Ass'n v. Friedrich, 70 N. W. 896, 897, 112 Mich. 442.

SURFACE STREAMS.

"Surface streams" are streams which flow in a permanent, distinct, well-defined channel from the land of one owner to that of another. Tampa Waterworks Co. v. Cline, 20 South. 780, 782, 37 Fla. 586, 33 L. R. A. 376, 53 Am. St. Rep. 262.

"Surface streams" are regarded as a species of private property, and their use is regulated by rules differing very materially from the rules applied to subterranean streams. Roath v. Driscoll, 20 Conn. 533, 541, 52 Am. Dec. 352.

SURFACE WATERS.

"Surface waters" are those which, however originating, are shed and passed from the lands of one proprietor to those of another, without any distinct or well-defined channel. Tampa Waterworks Co. v. Cline, 20 South. 780, 782, 37 Fla. 586, 33 L. R. A. 376, 53 Am. St. Rep. 262.

"Surface water" is water on the surface of the ground, the source of which is so temporary or limited as not to be able to maintain for any considerable time a stream or body of water having a well-defined and substantial existence; and where water from surrounding lands collects in a basin, which in rainy season holds large quantities of water, and there is no natural outlet, but the basin sometimes becomes dry by evaporation, the water is surface water. Brandenburg v. Zeigler, 39 S. E. 790, 791, 62 S. C. 18, 55 L. R. A. 414, 89 Am. St. Rep. 887 (citing Cairo, V. & C. Ry. Co. v. Brevoort [U. S.] 62 Fed. 129, 131, 25 L. R. A. 527; Lawton v. South Bound R. Co., 39 S. E. 752, 61 S. C. 548).

"Surface waters" are waters of a casual and vagrant character, which ooze through the soil or diffuse or squander themselves over the surface, following no definite course. They are waters which, though customarily and naturally flowing in a known direction and course, have nevertheless no banks or channels in the soil, and include waters which are diffused over the surface of the ground, and are derived from rains and melting snows, occasional outbursts of water, which in time of freshet or melting of snows descend from the mountains and inundate the country, and the moisture of wet, spongy, springy, or boggy ground. Lawton v. South Bound R. Co., 39 S. E. 752, 753, 61 S. C. 548; Neal v. Ohio River R. Co., 34 S. E. 914, 915, 47 W. Va. 316.

The law is well settled in this state that water overflowing the banks of a stream must be regarded as "surface water." Edwards v. Missouri, K. & T. R. Co., 71 S. W. 366, 367, 97 Mo. App. 103 (citing Abbott v. Kansas City, St. J. & C. B. R. Co., 83 Mo. 271, 280, 53 Am. Rep. 581).

The superabundant water of a stream, which at times of ordinary floods spreads out and overflows its bank and channel, is deemed "surface water." The flow of a river, when swollen beyond the low-water mark of the dry seasons by the ordinary rains which fall in wet seasons or by the melting of snows, does not constitute surface water. Surface water is that which is diffused over the ground from falling rains or melting snows, and continues to be such until it reaches some bed or channel in which water is accustomed to flow. Cairo, V. & C. R. Co. v. Brevoort (U. S.) 62 Fed. 129, 131, 133, 25 L. R. A. 527.

"Surface water" includes such water as is carried off by surface drainage; that is, drainage independently of the water course. Bunderson v. Burlington & M. R. R. Co., 61 N. W. 721, 722, 43 Neb. 545 (cited in Morrissey v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co., 38 Neb. 406, 56 N. W. 946).

All water courses are made up more or less from surface water, but, after it enters into the stream and commences to flow within its banks, it is no longer to be considered "surface water." Surface water is considered a common enemy, that each proprietor of land may and must fight for himself, with a view to protect himself without being responsible to others therefor, provided he does so in a usual and careful manner. Jones v. Hannovan, 55 Mo. 462, 467.

"Surface water" is that which is diffused over the surface of the ground, derived from falling rains and melting snows, and continues to be such until it reaches some well-defined channel in which it is accustomed to, and does, flow with other waters, whether derived from the surface or springs. A flood water, becoming severed from the main current, or leaving the stream never to return, and spreading out over low grounds, is "surface water." Morrissey v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co., 56 N. W. 946, 38 Neb. 406; Crawford v. Rambo, 7 N. E. 429, 431, 44 Ohio St. 279; O'Connell v. East Tennessee, V. & G. Ry. Co., 13 S. E. 489, 491, 87 Ga. 246, 13 L. R. A. 394, 27 Am. St. Rep. 246.

Overflow from a river in time of high water is "surface water." Jean v. Pennsylvania Co., 36 N. E. 159, 9 Ind. App. 56;

Shane v. Kansas City, St. J. & C. B. R. Co., 71 Mo. 237, 247, 38 Am. Rep. 480.

Some courts hold that flood waters from a stream are "surface water"; but the larger number class such water as part of the stream, and hold that it is not surface water. In O'Connell v. East Tennessee, V. & G. Ry. Co., 13 S. E. 489, 87 Ga. 246, 13 L. R. A. 394, 27 Am. St. Rep. 246, the authorities on the question as to what constitutes surface water and as to the rights of parties to divert water, whether surface or otherwise, are fully reviewed. The court says: "If the flood water becomes severed from the main current, or leaves the stream never to return, and spreads out over the lower ground, it has become surface water; but if it forms a continuous body with the water flowing in the ordinary channel, or if it departs from such channel animo revertendi presently to return, as by the recession of the waters, it is still to be regarded as part of the river." In Cairo, V. & O. Ry. v. Brevoort (U. S.) 62 Fed. 129, 25 L. R. A. 527, the court says: "Surface water ceases to be such when it enters a water course in which it is accustomed to flow; for, having entered the stream, it becomes a part of it and loses its original character. Surface water is that which is diffused over the ground from falling rains or melting snows, and continues to be such until it reaches some bed or channel in which water is accustomed to flow." Sullivan v. Dooley, 73 S. W. 82, 83, 31 Tex. Civ. App. 589.

A lake fed by streams which in times of flood find exit by rapid percolation through a bed of gravel, so that there is a sensible current toward the gravel bed, is a water course and not merely surface water. Hebron Gravel Road Co. v. Harvey, 90 Ind. 192, 194, 46 Am. Rep. 199.

A stream does not cease to be a water course, and become merely surface water, because at a certain point it spreads out over a level meadow several rods in width, and flows for a distance without defined banks, before flowing again in a definite channel. It is sometimes difficult to distinguish between a water course and mere surface water. Much may depend upon the soil and other surroundings and conditions. It is well known that certain Western streams—some marked as rivers upon the map—have quite extended sections which for months are perfectly dry. In defining a water course, Chief Justice Dixon said: "There must be a stream usually flowing in a particular direction, though it need not flow continually. It may sometimes be dry. It must flow in a definite channel, having a bed, sides, or banks, and usually discharge itself into some other stream or body of water. It must be something more than a mere surface drainage over the entire face of a tract of land, occasioned by unusual fresh-ets or other extraordinary causes." Blohowak v. Grochoski, 96 N. W. 551, 553, 119 Wis. 189.

SURFACED—SURFACING.

The use of the word "surfaced," in a contract with a railroad company to lay its tracks and to make the track in good running order, well surfaced, high, evenly and firmly embedded, etc., is employed in the sense of those engaged in the construction of such roads, and may be explained by extrinsic evidence. Western Union R. Co. v. Smith, 75 Ill. 496, 502.

"Surfacing," as used in a contract for railway construction, seems to be a technical term among civil engineers, and does not include filling in between the ties nor raising the roadbed. Snell v. Cottingham, 72 Ill. 161, 167.

"Surfacing track," as applied to a railroad, means filling the dirt and gravel between the ties, and dressing up the surface. Heine v. Chicago & N. W. Ry. Co., 17 N. W. 420, 58 Wis. 525.

See "Police Surgeon"; "Veterinary Surgeon."

A dentist is one whose profession is to clean and extract teeth, repair them when diseased, and replace them, when necessary, by artificial ones; and a dentist will not be held to be a surgeon or physician, within the statutes relating to privileged communication. People v. De France, 62 N. W. 709, 711, 104 Mich. 563, 28 L. R. A. 139 (citing State ex rel. Flickinger v. Fisher, 24 S. W. 167, 119 Mo. 344, 22 L. R. A. 799); City of Cherokee v. Perkins, 92 N. W. 68, 69, 118 Iowa, 405.

SURGERY.

Webster's Dictionary describes "surgery" as a branch of medical science. It cannot be denied that practical surgery is ordinarily thus spoken of. United States v. Massachusetts General Hospital, 100 Fed. 932, 938, 41 C. C. A. 114.

The practice of surgery was said, in Smith v. Lane (N. Y.) 24 Hun, 632, to be limited to manual operations usually performed by surgical instruments or appliances. Nelson v. State Board of Health, 57 S. W. 501, 504, 108 Ky. 769, 50 L. R. A. 383.

"Therapy" is the treatment of disease, and "surgery" is therapy of a distinctly operative kind. Stewart v. Raab, 55 Minn. 20, 21, 56 N. W. 256.

The term "surgery" is applied to a place where medicines for the use of passengers were kept by the physician employed on board a passenger ship. Allan v. State S. S. Co., 30 N. E. 482, 484, 132 N. Y. 91, 15 L. R. A. 166, 28 Am. St. Rep. 556.

SURNAME.

Where a testator devised lands to M. for life, he taking and using the testator's surname of L., instead of his own surname, with limitations over to his first and other sons in strict settlement, they severally taking and using the testator's surname, instead of their own, and with limitations over to other persons, after which the will provided that, when any of the premises should vest in any person not bearing the surname of L., that person should take on himself such name and use the same for his own, and should within three years procure his name to be altered to the testator's surname, the word "surname" was not used to denote a name inherited from the father, and a bearing de facto answered every useful purpose of an actual change, and was sufficient to satisfy the general and ordinary meaning of the words "bearing the surname," and therefore one who took under the limitation over, who was bearing the name de facto, did not forfeit his right by not having the change made by legislative act within the time limited. Luscombe v. Yates, 5 Barn. & Ald. 544.

SURPLUS.

See "Accumulated Surplus."

"Surplus" is defined as "overplus; that which remains when use is satisfied; excess beyond what is prescribed or wanted in law; the residue of an estate after the debts and legacies are paid." People's Fire Ins. Co. v. Parker, 35 N. J. Law (6 Vroom) 575, 577.

"Surplus," as used in Ky. St. § 2132, providing that, after the death of either the husband or wife, the survivor shall have an absolute estate in one-half of the surplus personalty left by such decedent, means what is left after payment of funeral expenses, charges of administration, and debts. Towery v. McGaw (Ky.) 56 S. W. 727, 728.

"Surplus," as used in a will giving the use, etc., of the testator's real estate to his wife for life, and also his personal estate of every description absolutely, "having full confidence that she will leave the surplus to be divided at her decease justly among his children," means all that shall remain thereafter, and does not give any right of disposition to the widow during her life. Appeal of Coates, 2 Pa. (2 Barr) 129, 137.

Expert evidence has been held admissible that the word "surplus," among insurance people, when applied to life insurance "means a sum of money or assets which has been accumulated over and above all debts and liabilities of any and all kinds whatsoever." Fry v. Provident Sav. Life Assur. Soc. of New York (Tenn.) 38 S. W. 116, 126.

A provision in an insurance policy entitling insured to participate in the distribution of the "surplus" of the company issuing it, according to such methods as may be adopted by the company, means the amount of funds in the hands of the company after deducting its liabilities, as ascertained by certain rules adopted by the insurance department for determining the value of each risk. Greeff v. Equitable Life Assur. Soc., 54 N. E. 712, 715, 160 N. Y. 19, 46 L. R. A. 288, 73 Am. St. Rep. 659.

War Revenue Act July 13, 1898, c. 448, § 2, 30 Stat. 448 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 2286], provides that bankers and persons and firms engaged in various occupations, employing a capital not exceeding $25,000, shall pay a certain additional sum for every $1,000 of capital above $25,000, and in estimating capital surplus should be included. It was held that, as the act did not refer exclusively to national banks, the word "surplus," as used in the act, would not be restricted, in assessing national banks, to the meaning given it in previous national bank legislation as covering only so much of the surplus profits as the board of directors have set apart for a reserved capital, but includes the entire surplus of assets over liabilities. Leather Mfrs' Nat. Bank v. Treat (U. S.) 116 Fed. 774, 775.

Capital stock distinguished.

The surplus of a banking corporation is not the same as its capital stock, but is that portion of the property, over and above the capital stock, which is the property of the bank until it is divided among the stockholders. Bank of Commerce v. Tennessee, 16 Sup. Ct. 456, 461, 161 U. S. 134, 40 L. Ed. 645.

Real estate.

Where a testator, after making several devises, declared that of the "rest, residue, and remainder of my estate I give and bequeath" several legacies, and that "if, after the payment of all these legacies, there should remain a surplus undisposed of, I do give and bequeath the same unto my sons," the word "surplus" should be construed to include the real estate. Lamb v. Lamb, 30 N. E. 133, 131 N. Y. 227.

A Pennsylvania testator gave to his wife a life estate in the homestead and two lots, and charged upon his goods and lands an annuity to her, but did not mention his lands in any other part of the will, and then, after sundry legacies, bequeathed the surplus to be applied to the purposes of a Presbyterian church. Held, the word "surplus" did not relate to his lands. Allen's Ex'rs v. Allen, 50 U. S. (18 How.) 385, 391, 15 L. Ed. 396.

SURPLUS EARNINGS.

In 1 Rev. St. p. 415, § 6, providing that moneyed corporations shall be liable to taxation on a valuation equal to the amount paid in and their surplus earnings, "surplus earnings" means an amount owned by the company over and above the capital and actual liabilities, and includes one-half of the premiums received on unexpired policies of a fire insurance company. People v. Commissioners of Taxes and Assessments, 76 N. Y. 64, 68.

SURPLUS MONEY.

"Surplus money" realized by sale of lands owned under a deed of trust is treated as realty, and not personality, in respect to rules of law governing its disposition. It remains real estate in the hands of the trustee, to be disposed of according to the law of real property. Eubank v. Finnell (Mo.) 73 S. W. 354, 355.

SURPLUS PROCEEDS.

"Surplus proceeds," as used in Act 1855, § 18, providing that, after a certain railroad shall be completed, equipped, and in operation, it shall be required to pay into the treasury of the state the surplus proceeds of all land sales or such other securities as may be provided, etc., means only so much of such proceeds as remains after deducting the amount of all expenses and obligations lawfully incurred by the corporation in completing, equipping, and putting in operation its railroad. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. v. Bartlett, 123 Mass. 15, 19.

SURPLUS PROFITS.

"Surplus profits," as used in Act April 11, 1862, § 10, providing that it shall not be lawful for a banking corporation or the directors to make any dividends, except from surplus profits arising from the business of the corporation, imports an excess of receipts over expenditures, and without receipts there cannot properly be said to be profits. Money earned as interest, however well secured or certain to be presently paid, cannot in fact be distributed as dividends to stockholders, and does not constitute surplus profits, within the meaning of the statute. People v. San Francisco Sav. Union, 13 Pac. 498, 72 Cal. 199.

SURPLUS WATER.

Where the original owner of land on both sides of the river operated a gristmill on the west side, where the river bed was divided into two channels, and where the water in the west channel was sufficient for such mill, and he afterwards conveyed the land, with a provision that the grantee might put a dam across the river and use the surplus of water on his side of the river, not to the injury of the grantor's gristmill, the word "surplus" should be construed to mean the surplus of water in the east channel over the amount necessary to run grantor's mill. Eastman v. Parker, 27 Atl. 611, 612, 65 Vt. 643.

Water running from a higher to a lower level of a canal, the use of which in its passage has been leased by the state to individuals, is not "surplus water," within the intention of St. 1833, p. 261, § 1, declaring that the canal commissioners, after diverting the waters of a stream, must first resume the use of all surplus water which had been leased on that level. Lynch v. Stone (N. Y.) 4 Denio, 356, 359.

SURPLUSAGE.

"Surplusage" is another allegation without which the pleading would be adequate at law. State v. Whitehouse, 49 Atl. 869, 871, 95 Me. 179; State v. Watson, 42 S. W. 728, 727, 141 Mo. 338.

"Surplusage" is defined in And. Law Dict. as "matter in any instrument foreign to the purpose; whatever is extraneous, impertinent, superfluous, or unnecessary." Surplusage, in construing a writing, may be rejected. Adams v. Capital State Bank, 20 South. 881, 882, 74 Miss. 307.

"Surplusage" is that which is impertinent or entirely superfluous, as not being necessary either to the substance or the form of the pleading. Gould, Pl. c. 3, § 11. Where attached property is replevied, and, after a judgment for plaintiff in the attachment suit and a judgment for defendant in the replevin suit for a return of the property, the sheriff brings an action against the surety on the replevin bond, an allegation in the complaint that search has been made on the execution on the judgment in the attachment suit for property of the judgment debtors, and that none could be found, is mere surplusage, since, if it were stricken out, a good cause of action would remain. Bradley v. Reynolds, 61 Conn. 271, 278, 23 Atl. 928.

Surplusage allegations in an indictment do not render it insufficient, when there is sufficient matter alleged to indicate the crime and the person charged. State v. Sarlis, 34 N. E. 1129, 1130, 135 Ind. 195.

Rest or residue distinguished.

"Surplusage," as used in a will directing the surplusage of property to be divided pro rata among the beneficiaries therein, is not equivalent to "rest" or "residue," having a more restricted meaning than either of such terms, and more properly applied to moneys than lands; and under such will the residuary legatees will take only the residue of personality. Bragaw v. Bolles, 25 Atl. 947, 950, 51 N. J. Eq. 84.

SURPRISE.

"Surprise" is the act of taking un-awares; sudden confusion or perplexity. Davis v. Steuben School Tp., 50 N. E. 1, 5, 19 Ind. App. 694.

"Surprise" is defined by Mr. Story to be, "in private transactions, an undue advantage taken of a party under circumstances which mislead, confuse, or disturb the just results of his judgment, and thus expose him to be the victim of the artful, the importunate, and the cunning." Turley v. Taylor, 65 Tenn. (6 Baxt.) 376, 386.

"Surprise" is defined in practice to be that situation in which a party is unexpectedly placed, without any default of his own, which will be injurious to his interest. Gidionsen v. Union Depot R. Co., 31 S. W. 800, 802, 129 Mo. 392 (citing Graham & W. New Trials).

The word "surprise," in its legal acceptation, denotes an unforeseen disappointment against which ordinary prudence would not have afforded protection. Patrick v. Boonville Gaslight Co., 17 Mo. App. 462, 463, 465; Peers v. Davis' Adm'rs, 29 Mo. 184, 190.

A party to an action cannot claim a new trial on the ground of "surprise," where he was not misled by any person, but he assumed that the witnesses knew more than it transpired they did know. Van Tassell v. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co., 20 N. Y. Supp. 715, 716, 1 Misc. Rep. 312.

The word "surprise," as employed in Rev. St. 1879, § 3704, denotes an unforeseen disappointment in some reasonable expectation, against which ordinary prudence would have afforded no protection. If there is any element of negligence in the case, there is no surprise. Fretwell v. Laffoon, 77 Mo. 26, 27.

Going to trial in a case without depositions which have been taken in it constitutes no legal surprise to the adverse party which will entitle him to have the verdict set aside on such ground, as, if the depositions have not been transmitted to the court before trial, either party may, if he wants to use them, move for a continuance until they come to hand, or if they have been transmitted, and the party by whom they were taken does not offer them in evidence, the adverse party may offer them, or any part of them, in evidence. Heath v. Scott, 4 Pac. 557, 560, 85 Cal. 548.

As equivalent to accident.

"Surprise," though not necessarily synonymous with "accident," when used as a ground for a new trial, has substantially the same meaning in legal practice, as each is used to denote some condition or situation in which a party to a cause is unexpectedly placed, to his injury, without any fault or neglect of his own, which ordinary prudence could not have guarded against. Zimmerer v. Fremont Nat. Bank, 81 N. W. 849, 850, 59 Neb. 661 (citing McGuire v. Drew, 83 Cal. 229, 23 Pac. 313).

As reasonable surprise.

"Surprise," as used in Code N. O. § 274, providing that the judge may, in his discretion, etc., relieve a party from a judgment, order, or other proceeding taken against him through his mistake, inadvertence, surprise, or excusable neglect, does not mean any surprise, but is confined to a reasonable surprise, occasioned by some fact or some thing that has or has not been done, of which the complaining party ought to have knowledge, and which, if he had had such knowledge, might have prevented the judgment, order, or other proceeding of which he complains. Skinner v. Terry, 12 S. E. 118, 119, 107 N. O. 103.

Mistake of or misapprehension as to law.

A mistake as to the law, or a misapprehension of it, does not constitute such surprise as to warrant a continuance of the cause. Bemis v. Williams (Tex.) 74 S. W. 332, 334 (citing Phillips v. Wheeler, 10 Tex. 536).

Neglect of counsel.

The term "surprise," in Code Cr. Proc. § 135, authorizing the setting aside of a judgment taken through the mistake, inadvertence, surprise, or excusable neglect of a party, includes a case where the party retains an attorney to enter a plea for him and the attorney fails so to do. Griel v. Vernon, 65 N. C. 76, 78.

The terms "mistake, inadvertence, surprise, or excusable neglect" in Code, § 274, providing that the court may, in its discretion, within one year, without notice thereof, relieve the party from a judgment taken against him through such neglect, was construed to apply to a judgment taken against the defendant, who attended court for four days during the return term, and then left his case in charge of counsel, who failed to look after the case, thinking the action had been brought in another county, where properly it should have been brought, thus permitting a default judgment to go against his client. Taylor v. Pope, 11 S. E. 257, 258, 106 N. C. 267, 19 Am. St. Rep. 530.

Surprise as a ground for new trial was held in McFarland's Adm'r v. Clark, 39 Ky. (9 Dana) 136, to be altogether a different ground from that of the discovery of testimony to impeach a witness who testified on the trial. The court said that surprise "does not, like discovery, imply negligence, but shows a satisfactory reason for the non-production of the testimony known to exist, but the materiality of which, on the trial, results entirely from the unexpected fact respecting which the party seeking a new trial had been lulled, either by the antagonistic party or the witness of that party; and therefore been surprised." In a case between landlord and tenant which involved the subletting of premises, the tenant testified on the trial that the landlord's president had consented to such subletting. The president was absent at such time, and the question of consent had not been raised in the trial in the justice's court. It was held that the landlord was entitled to a new trial on the ground of surprise. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Bickel, 30 S. W. 600, 602, 97 Ky. 222.

In an action on a warranty of a slave to be sound, defendant is not entitled to a new trial on the ground that he was "surprised" by testimony of plaintiff as to the unsoundness of the slave. Anderson v. Duffield, 8 Tex. 237, 238.

"Surprise," as used in Burns' Ann. St. 1894, § 568 (Rev. St. 1881, § 569), providing that a new trial may be granted for surprise which ordinary prudence could not have guarded against, cannot be construed to permit a new trial merely because defendant produced evidence not anticipated. Working v. Garn, 47 N. E. 951, 953, 148 Ind. 546.

Violation of agreement.

The words "surprise, mistake, inadvertence, or excusable neglect," in Hill's Ann. Laws, § 102, authorizing a court to set aside its judgment at any time within a year, if the judgment has been procured against the party asking such relief through his mistake, inadvertence, surprise, or excusable neglect, included a judgment procured in violation of an agreement to extend the time to answer. Mr. Black says: "It is probable that the species of surprise primarily contemplated by these statutes is that which results from the taking of a judgment against a party in violation of an agreement or understanding that the case shall be continued, or not pressed, or not brought to trial, though that is also a kind of fraud." Thompson v. Connell, 48 Pac. 467, 468, 31 Or. 231, 65 Am. St. Rep. 818 (quoting 1 Black. Judgm. 336).

SURRENDER.

Abandonment distinguished, see "Abandon—Abandonment."

The word "surrender" means yield, render, or deliver up. Nolander v. Burns, 50 N. W. 1016, 1018, 48 Minn. 13.

The surrender of property is the relinquishment that a debtor makes of all his property to his creditors when he finds himself unable to pay his debts. Civ. Code La. 1900, art. 2170.

The word "surrender," as used in a count of an indictment for violation of Rev. St. § 5209 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3497], in that defendant abetted the cashier of a national bank in defrauding the bank by the surrender and delivery of an unpaid note to the defendant without receiving any part of the sum due thereon, carries with it something more than a mere delivery, and indicates a transfer of title, as well as of possession. Evans v. United States, 14 Sup. Ct. 934, 937, 153 U. S. 584, 38 L. Ed. 830.

The term "surrender," as used in Code Civ. Proc. § 751, providing that no money or securities in the custody of the court shall be surrendered, except on the certified order of the court, does not apply to the transfer by the county treasurer of securities in which the funds are invested. The term "surrender" does not in any sense suggest the transaction of a sale and delivery. It involves the idea of yielding, of delivering in response to a demand, and cannot be intended to include every transfer or delivery that it might become necessary for the treasurer to make in the course of the management of any particular fund. Tompkins County v. Ingersoll, 81 N. Y. Supp. 242, 244, 81 App. Div. 344.

Merger distinguished.

The doctrine of merger applies as well where the remainder interest comes into the possession of the life tenant as when the life estate comes into the ownership and possession of the remainderman. In either event the two estates become merged in one. A distinction is pointed out between "surrender" and "merger," and it is said that "merger" is a wider term than "surrender," in that it takes place when the two estates are united, either in the hands of the remainderman or reversioner, or in the hands of the tenant of the particular estates, without regard to the method in which the two estates were united, while surrender is confined to the relinquishment by the tenant of the particular estate to his successor in reversion or remainder. Harrison v. Johnston, 70 S. W. 414, 417, 109 Tenn. 245 (citing Fisher v. Edington, 80 Tenn. [12 Lea] 189).

Charters are in many respects compacts between the government and the corporations; and as the former cannot deprive the latter of their franchises in violation of the compact, so the latter cannot put an end to the compact without the consent of the former. It is equally obligatory on both parties. The surrender of a charter can only be made by some formal, solemn act of the corporation, and will be of no avail until accepted by the government. There must be the same agreement of the parties to dissolve, that there was to form, the compact. It is the acceptance which gives efficacy to the surrender. The dissolution of a corporation, it is said, extinguishes all its debts. The power of dissolving itself by its own act would be a dangerous power, and one which cannot be supposed to exist. Boston Glass Manufactory v. Langdon, 41 Mass. (24 Pick.) 49, 53, 35 Am. Dec. 292.

"Surrender" is defined to be the resignation of a particular estate for life or for years to one in the immediate reversion or remainder. Bedford v. Terhune (N. Y.) 27 How. Prac. 422, 447; Coe v. Hobby, 72 N. Y. 141, 145, 28 Am. Rep. 120; Welcome v. Hess, 27 Pac. 369, 370, 90 Cal. 507, 25 Am. St. Rep. 145; Gluck v. City of Baltimore, 32 Atl. 515, 516, 81 Md. 315, 48 Am. St. Rep. 515; Dayton v. Craik, 1 N. W. 813, 815, 26 Minn. 133.

A surrender is the yielding up of an estate for life or years to him that hath the immediate estate in reversion or remainder, wherein the estate for life or years may be drowned by mutual agreement. Springstein v. Schermerhorn (N. Y.) 12 Johns. 357, 361; Schleffelin v. Carpenter (N. Y.) 15 Wend. 400, 404; Brewer v. National Union Bldg. Ass'n, 46 N. E. 752, 753, 166 Ill. 221; Hays v. Goldman, 72 S. W. 563, 564, 71 Ark. 251.

"Surrender" is the yielding up of an estate for life to him who has the immediate estate in reversion or remainder, by which the lesser estate is merged in the greater by mutual agreement. Fisher v. Edington, 80 Tenn. (12 Lea) 189, 194; Dayton v. Craik, 1 N. W. 813, 815, 26 Minn. 133.

"Surrender" is the yielding up of an estate for life or years to him who has the immediate reversion, wherein the estate becomes subdivided by mutual agreement between the two parties. Churchill v. Lammers, 60 Mo. App. 244, 248.

A surrender is a flowing of a lesser estate into a greater, like an estate for years into an immediate remainder in fee. Witmark v. New York El. R. Co., 27 N. Y. Supp. 777, 778, 76 Hun. 302.

Where a transfer of the whole interest in an estate for life or for years is made to the person holding the immediate reversion or remainder in fee, the estate transferred is extinguished by merger, and the transfer operates as a surrender, even though the instrument was called a "lease," and, the sum reserved was called a "rent." Scott's Ex'x v. Scott (Va.) 18 Grat. 150, 159.

"Surrender" is a yielding up of an estate to the landlord, so that the leasehold interest becomes extinct by mutual agreement between the parties. Brown v. Cairns, 77 N. W. 478, 481, 107 Iowa, 727; Robertson Bros. v. Winslow Bros., 74 S. W. 442, 443, 99 Mo. App. 546; Buck v. Lewis, 46 Mo. App. 227, 232; Huling v. Roll, 43 Mo. App. 234.

"Surrender" applies to the termination of a renting term before it has expired by the acceptance on the part of the landlord of a surrender of the premises. Excelsior Steam Power Co. v. Halsted, 5 App. Div. 124, 125, 39 N. Y. Supp. 43.

A surrender is either in express words, by which the lessee manifests his intention of yielding up his interest in the premises, or by operation of law, where the parties, without express surrender, do some act which implies that they have both agreed to consider the surrender made. Robertson Bros. v. Winslow Bros., 74 S. W. 442, 443, 99 Mo. App. 546 (citing Huling v. Roll, 43 Mo. App. 234); Brewer v. National Union Bldg. Ass'n, 46 N. E. 752, 753, 166 Ill. 221; Woodward v. Lindley, 43 Ind. 333, 342; Dayton v. Craik, 26 Minn. 133, 1 N. W. 813.

"Surrender" is either in express words, by which the lessee expresses his intention of yielding up the premises, or else by operation of law. Buck v. Lewis, 46 Mo. App. 227, 232.

A surrender may be made by agreement of parties or by operation of law, and, when made, the estate of the lessee terminates, and the relation of landlord and tenant ceases. Hays v. Goldman, 72 S. W. 563, 564, 71 Ark. 251.

A surrender, such as will terminate a lease and the obligations of the parties thereunder, may be by agreement, express or implied, or by operation of law; but in any case the facts must suffice to establish an acceptance by the landlord or an intent upon his part to terminate the agency. Where a lessee removed from demised premises before the end of the term, testimony of the lessor that the shelving, etc., used by the lessee was merely covered with curtains, but was not used by the lessor, and that the floor space in the show window was used by the lessor, but not in such manner as to interfere with the use to which the lessee put it, is sufficient to sustain a finding that there was not a surrender and acceptance. Requa v. Domestic Pub. Co., 32 N. Y. Supp. 125, 126, 11 Misc. Rep. 322.

The effect of a surrender on the part of a tenant is to pass the estate of the tenant to the landlord, and this results in the extinguishment of the rent reserved, which is not due at the time of the surrender. Milling v. Becker, 96 Pa. 182, 185.

A landlord leased a building for five years, and after the tenant had occupied the premises for about a year he abandoned the same and sent the keys to the landlord. About two months later the landlord painted the front of the building, obliterated the signs of the tenant, and made repairs. Soon afterwards he relet the premises at a less rent for a period of five years, without notifying the tenants that he did it on their account. It was held that the landlord accepted the surrender of the lease by the tenant. Welcome v. Hess, 27 Pac. 369, 370, 90 Cal. 507, 25 Am. St. Rep. 145.

Sending a key to the owner, without more, is not such a surrender and acceptance as will discharge a tenant's liability for rent. Newton v. Speare Laundering Co., 37 Atl. 11, 12, 19 R. I. 546.

Plaintiff had leases of four lots, executed before the construction of defendant's elevated railroad in a street on which the lots abutted; the leases requiring the lessee to erect buildings on the lots, and the lessor covenanting to renew the leases for two terms. The leases expired after the construction of the road, and plaintiffs, who had erected five buildings, took five leases for a renewal term, instead of four, in order to partition their interests, and surrendered the original leases. Held, that the estate created by the original leases was not thereby surrendered, but the subsequent leases were simply renewals. Witmark v. New York El. R. Co., 27 N. Y. Supp. 777, 778, 76 Hun. 302.

Where a lessor tells the lessee to quit the premises, and the lessee does quit, and the lessor takes possession himself or accepts rent from another, such change of possession by mutual agreement operates as a surrender of the lease. Boyd v. George (Neb.) 89 N. W. 271, 272.

A surrender of a term by agreement, whether express or implied, is the act, not of the law, but of the parties. Felker v. Richardson, 32 Atl. 830, 831, 67 N. H. 509.

Of insurance policy.

To "surrender" means to cancel or yield up. Such was held to be its meaning in a life policy stipulating that after the payment of three annual premiums the insured might surrender the policy within six months after default and receive a paid-up policy for the stated amount. Wells v. Vermont Life Ins. Co., 63 N. E. 578, 28 Ind. App. 620, 88 Am. St. Rep. 208.

Plaintiff's first count in an action on a policy insuring chattels alleged a condition prohibiting a removal of the chattels, a waiver thereof, removal to another place with defendant's consent, and a loss. The second count alleged a surrender of the policy at defendant's request, that it might be modified to cover the goods in the new place, an agreement to insure until the policy was modified, and a loss before modification.

Held, that the word "surrender" meant a handing over of the document to the insurance company for the purpose of modification. Goodhue v. Hartford Fire Ins. Co., 55 N. E. 1039, 1040, 175 Mass. 187.

SURRENDER BY OPERATION OF LAW.

"A surrender may arise either from the express agreement of the parties or by operation of law, and whenever a surrender is implied from acts of the parties it is a surrender by the operation of law." Hart v. Pratt, 53 Pac. 711, 712, 19 Wash. 560.

"Surrender by operation of law" may be derived from the acts of the parties, or effected by words manifesting the intention of the lessee to yield up the estate, or by acts of the parties which imply that both agree to consider the surrender as made. A surrender is implied and effected by operation of law when another estate is created by the reversioner, with the assent of the tenant, incompatible with the existing estate or term, as by the taking of a new lease by the lessee. Copper v. Fretnoranaky, 16 N. Y. Supp. 866, 867.

To constitute a surrender of a term by operation of law, overt acts of both parties inconsistent with the continuance of the term are essential. Felker v. Richardson, 32 Atl. 830, 831, 67 N. H. 509.

To constitute a "surrender by operation of law," there must not only be an abandonment by the tenant, but an acceptance thereof by the landlord as a surrender. It is only when the minds of the parties to a lease concur in a common intent to relinquish the relation of landlord and tenant, and execute this intent by acts which are tantamount to a stipulation to put an end thereto, that a surrender by act and operation of law arises. Where a lease authorized a landlord, if the premises became vacant during the term, to re-enter and relet the same, and apply the rent to the expense of re-entering and reletting, and of the rent due, a re-entry and reletting of the premises by the landlord on their vacation by the tenant was not a surrender by operation of law. Jones v. Rushmore, 50 Atl. 587, 588, 67 N. J. Law, 157.

A surrender in law arises where the parties, without any express surrender, do an act so inconsistent with the subsisting relation of landlord and tenant as to imply an intention that the lessor should be in the same situation as if an express surrender had been made. A surrender of a lease by operation of law may arise from any condition of facts voluntarily assumed by the parties, and incompatible with the continued existence of the relation of landlord and tenant between them. McAdam, Landl. & T. p. 1270. Where a tenant voluntarily vacates the premises before the expiration of the term, and delivers the keys to the landlord at the latter's request, who retains them, and during the term advertises the premises for rent, an implied surrender arises by operation of law, and the tenant is not liable for future rent. Ledsinger v. Burke, 88 S. E. 313, 113 Ga. 74.

A surrender by a tenant to his landlord by operation of law is said to exist when the owner of a particular estate has been a party to some act having some other object than that of surrender, but which object cannot be effected while the particular estate continues, and the validity of which act he is by law estopped from disputing. Such surrender is said to be the act of the law, and takes place independently of the intention of the parties. Brown v. Cairns, 77 N. W. 478, 481, 107 Iowa, 727.

A surrender exists by act or operation of law when the parties, without any express surrender, do some act so inconsistent with the subsisting relation of landlord and tenant as to imply that they have both agreed to consider the surrender as made. Where a tenant of premises made a contract for the purchase of the same, and made part payment, the agreement providing for the execution of a deed on payment of the balance, and thereafter refused to pay the balance of the purchase price until the title was approved, no demand being made for the rent and none being paid, there was a surrender of the lease, and the relation of landlord and tenant ceased. Lewis v. Angermiller, 35 N. Y. Supp. 69, 70, 89 Hun, 65.

A surrender by operation of law takes place where the owner of a particular estate has been a party to some act, the validity of which he is by law afterwards estopped from disputing, and which would not be valid if his particular estate had continued to exist. Smith v. Pendergast, 3 N. W. 978, 980, 26 Minn. 318.

A surrender in law was effected by the acceptance of a new lease of the premises from the lessor for the whole or a part of the time embraced in the former one, because it necessarily implied a termination and surrender of that lease. Schieffelin v. Carpenter (N. Y.) 15 Wend. 400, 404.

A surrender is implied, and so effected by operation of law, when another estate is created by the reversioner or remainderman, with the assent of the termor, incompatible with the existing estate or term. Coe v. Hobby, 72 N. Y. 141, 145, 28 Am. Rep. 120.

SURRENDER IN FACT.

A surrender in fact is one by express words fairly manifesting the intention of the lessee to yield up his interest. Ledsinger v.

Burke, 88 S. E. 313, 113 Ga. 74 (citing McAdam, Landl. & T. p. 1263).

SURRENDER VALUE.

See "Cash Surrender Value."

SURREPTITIOUSLY.

The word "surreptitiously," as used in Rev. St. § 4920 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901. p. 3394], requiring one who contests the validity of a patent on the ground of prior conception to show that the patentee has surreptitiously or unjustly obtained the patent, is not synonymous with the word "unjustly," as used in the statute; and therefore it is not necessary that actual fraud and theft of the idea by the patentee should be shown, for, though the word "unjustly" may include the idea of a thing done fraudulently and secretly, its ordinary meaning is contrary to justice or that which is right. Yates v. Huson (D. C.) 8 App. Cas. 93, 99.

Allegations in a bill that certain things were done surreptitiously is a mere statement of conclusion, not admitted by demurrer. It neither informs the conscience of the court of the facts of the case upon which it is asked to act, nor enables the defendant to meet the accusation of wrongdoing made against him. Lumley v. Wabash R. Co. (U. S.) 71 Fed. 21, 28.

SURROGATE.

The settlement of estates of deceased persons from very early times has devolved upon other than common-law courts. Our surrogate's court dates back to the act of March 16, 1778. Before the Revolution the powers and duties of the surrogate vested in the colonial Governor, who by virtue of his office was judge of the prerogative court, or the court of probates, as it was sometimes called. When the government of this province was committed to Gov. Nicolls, by the Duke of York, there was framed what was afterwards known as the "Duke's Laws." Under these laws the province was divided into three ridings, in each of which was a court of sessions, composed of the justices of the peace residing therein, who held a session twice a year. To this court was committed the probate of wills, the appointment of executors and administrators, and the appointment of guardians; but, if the estate exceeded £100, all proceedings upon the probate of wills and all records in cases of administration had to be transmitted to the secretary of the province, where they were required to be recorded, and where letters testamentary, of administration, and of the final discharge of executors and administrators were granted by the Governor under seal of the province. In 1686 instructions were transmitted to Gov. Dongan, directing him to add to the jurisdiction of the Governor, as judge of the prerogative court, the ecclesiastical jurisdiction of the Archbishop of Canterbury; and three years later there was also added the ecclesiastical jurisdiction of the Bishop of London, so far as it related to testamentary matters or the administration of the estates of intestates. Subsequently, when the colony became more extensively settled, the Governor appointed deputies, to whom were delegated the power to act for him in such cases, and these deputies subsequently became known by the title of surrogates. Malone v. Sts. Peter & Paul's Church of Brooklyn, 64 N. E. 961, 963, 172 N. Y. 269.

The word "surrogate" where it is used in the text, or in a bond or undertaking given pursuant to any of the provisions of the chapter relating to surrogates' courts, includes every officer or court vested by law with the functions of surrogate. Code Civ. Proc. N. Y. 1899, § 2514, subd. 7.

SURROGATE'S COURT.

Distinct tribunals for the establishment of wills and administration of the assets of men dying with or without wills are variously called "prerogative courts," "probate courts," "surrogate courts," and "orphans' courts." Robinson v. Fair, 9 Sup. Ct. 30, 35, 128 U. S. 53, 32 L. Ed. 415.

A surrogate's court is a creation of the statute, of inferior and limited jurisdiction. Those claiming under the decree of a surrogate must show affirmatively his authority to make it and the facts which give him jurisdiction. In respect to accountings by testamentary trustees or guardians, a surrogate takes no incidental powers or constructive authority by implication which is not expressly given by statute. In re Hawley, 10 N. E. 352, 357, 104 N. Y. 250.

A surrogate's court is to carry out and give effect to the provisions of a will, and not to defeat it. In re Cornell's Will, 41 N. Y. Supp. 255, 258, 17 Misc. Rep. 468 (citing Hartnett v. Wandell, 60 N. Y. 346, 19 Am. Rep. 194).

SURVEY.

See "Chamber Survey"; "Including Survey"; "Inclusive Survey"; "Notorious Survey"; "Regular Survey."

"To survey" has several significations. It may mean to inspect, or take a view of; to view with attention; to view with a scrutinizing eye; to examine with reference to condition, situation, and value; to measure as land; and many others. "Survey" as a noun may mean an attentive or particular view or examination, with the design to ascertain the condition, quantity, or value. Fulton v. Town of Dover, 6 Atl. 633, 638, 6 Del. Ch. 1.

In insurance.

In considering a condition of an insurance policy, which made the application, plan, and survey or description of the property a part of the contract and a warranty by the assured, the court said: "A careful study of the cases will show, what was likewise testified to by experts on the stand, that 'plan,' 'application,' and 'survey' were often used in the contracts as meaning the same thing. 'Survey' is the word employed most commonly, and it is not difficult to discover how it came to be used instead of 'application.' When a person wrote to a company for insurance upon his house or mill, his letter was an application, but not often a full and satisfactory one, and the company would send back a form for a more full application. This paper usually had a caption stating that it was to be the basis for the insurance, and contained printed questions, with directions how they should be answered. This paper was filled out and signed by the assured, or by his agent, or by the agent of the company, and was the final application; but, to avoid misunderstanding, it came to be called a 'survey,' as in many cases the original letter might be called an 'application.'" In the case at bar, the application was oral to the president of the insurance company, who said: "Send me a copy of the plan, and your statements, and I will insure." The assured sent a memorandum of the facts which he had stated and a map or plan showing the premises. These papers the court held did not constitute such an application, plan, survey, or description as was referred to in the conditions of the policy. Albion Lead Works v. Williamsburg City Fire Ins. Co. (U. S.) 2 Fed. 479, 483, 484.

Same—Marine insurance.

"A 'survey,' as the term is used in marine insurance," says Mr. Justice Story, "is a common public document, looked to by both underwriters and owners as affording the means of ascertaining upon the very spot, at the very time, the state and condition of the ship and other property at hazard." In the case of The Henry (U. S.) 11 Fed. Cas. 1153, Judge Betts examines the office and nature of a survey. The wise precaution of the maritime law has pointed to one item of proof, which, if not necessary, will nevertheless be demanded, unless its absence be satisfactorily accounted for; that is, a precedent examination of the vessel by competent surveyors, and their report stating her condition and advising a sale. A survey by competent surveyors, containing a statement of the injury and a strong recommendation to sell, will be an important element in the proofs in determining the character of the emergency, and especially the good faith of the master. Hathaway v. Sun Mut. Ins. Co., 21 N. Y. Super. Ct. (8 Bosw.) 33, 68.

The word "survey," as used in a marine insurance policy, means a common public document, looked to, both by underwriters and owners, as affording the means of ascertaining upon the very spot, at the very time, the state and condition of the ship and other property at hazard. In some policies, as, for example, when what is technically called the "rotten clause" is inserted, such a document seems indispensable, as the survey may amount to a discharge of the underwriters. Potter v. Ocean Ins. Co. (U. S.) 19 Fed. Cas. 1173, 1178.

"Survey," as used in the law of marine insurance, in its strict signification, as well as in the broader meaning which it may be supposed to have as applied to the subject-matter, can be taken to import only a plan and description of the present existing state, condition, and mode of use of the property. Denny v. Conway Stock & Mutual Fire Ins. Co., 79 Mass. (13 Gray) 492, 497.

A "survey of lands," under the Spanish government, as with us, meant and consisted in the actual measurement of land, ascertaining the contents by running lines and angles with compass and chain, establishing corners and boundaries, and designating the same by marking trees, fixing monuments, or referring to existing objects of notoriety on the ground, giving bearings and distances, and making descriptive field notes and plots of the work. Winter v. United States (U. S.) 30 Fed. Cas. 350 (citing Ellicott v. Pearl, 35 U. S. [10 Pet.] 441, 9 L. Ed. 475; United States v. Hanson, 41 U. S. [16 Pet.] 198, 10 L. Ed. 935).

The word "survey," as used in a statute relating to the fixing of boundary lines between counties, providing that the state engineer shall run out and establish such lines as nearly as may be in accordance with defective description, in company with the county surveyors, but provided that, if the county surveyors shall not appear and assist in making such survey after due notice, it shall not affect or invalidate such survey, does not of necessity mean an actual survey. Hinsdale County v. Mineral County, 48 Pac. 675, 678, 9 Colo. App. 368.

A survey in which all the corners are marked, and all the lines run and marked, except the closing line between the first and last corner stones, is a legal survey under the Utah statutes; and, if three sides of a quadrilateral survey are run, the fact that the street line connecting the extremity of the two side lines is not run does not render the survey insufficient. Alford v. Devin, 1 Nev. 207, 214.

A survey under a proprietary title is not a conveyance. It is an instrument sui generis in the nature of a partition; a customary mode in which a proprietor has set off to himself in severalty a part of the common estate. Jennings v. Burnham, 56 N. J. Law, 289, 291, 28 Atl. 1048.

Same—As grant or location.

"Survey," as used in a description in a trust deed conveying "the B. survey, lying in what is known as the I. pasture, in C. and A. counties," is synonymous with the word "land," or "grant," or "location." Clark v. Gregory (Tex.) 26 S. W. 244.

Same—As map or plat.

In a contract for the conveyance of land according to a certain survey, the words "survey" applies as well to the map or plat, showing the result of the actual examination of the ground, as to the examination itself. Hahn v. Cotton, 37 S. W. 919, 920, 136 Mo. 218.

Same—Underground survey.

"Survey" means to inspect or examine with reference to situation, condition, or value; to determine the boundaries, extent, position, etc. So that, as used in Code Civ. Proc. § 1682, providing that in actions relating to real estate the court may grant leave to enter on property to make a survey, does not limit the survey to the surface, but may allow an underground survey, where the defendant has tunneled from his land in the plaintiff's land in removing materials. Howe's Cave Line & Cement Co. v. Howe's Cave Ass'n, 34 N. Y. Supp. 848, 851, 88 Hun, 554.

Of logs.

Gen. St. § 2406, providing that no survey of any logs shall be received in any court in this state, except the survey of the surveyor general or his deputy, "survey" means the act of counting and measuring the logs, and ascertaining how many feet they contain, and does not mean the scale bill, or the record thereof, or any other written document or record. Antill v. Potter, 71 N. W. 935, 936, 69 Minn. 192.

Of railroad.

"Map and survey," as used in reference to the location of a railroad, means not only a delineation on paper or other material, giving a general or approximate idea of the situation of the road, but also such full and accurate notes and data as are necessary to furnish complete means for identifying and ascertaining the precise position of every part of the line, with courses and distances throughout, so that there can be no doubt where any portion of it is to be found. San Francisco & S. J. Valley Ry. Co. v. Gould, 55 Pac. 411, 412, 122 Cal. 601 (citing Convers v. Grand Rapids & I. R. Co., 18 Mich. 466).

The word "survey" does not necessarily, ex vi termini, mean a map or profile. They are sometimes used as convertible terms, but not always. Books filed by a railroad in the office of the Secretary of State, containing a description in words and figures of the commencement of the road, the different stations, the courses and distances between such stations, and the number of stations to the termination of the road, are a survey, within the meaning of the company's charter, requiring that a survey of its route and location shall be deposited in the office of the Secretary of State. Attorney General v. Stevens, 1 N. J. Eq. (Saxt.) 369, 385, 22 Am. Dec. 526.

SURVEYOR OF HIGHWAYS.

A "surveyor of highways" is merely a ministerial officer of the town council, subject to their direction and control, with no authority to incur any indebtedness against the town, except, perhaps, in case of emergency, such as the removal of snow or other obstruction from the highways, and is clothed with very limited and well-defined powers and duties. Sweet v. Conley, 39 Atl. 826, 327, 20 R. I. 381.

SURVIVE—SURVIVING — SURVIVOR.

"Survivor" is usually applied to the longest liver of two or more partners or trustees, and has been applied in some cases to the longest liver of joint tenants and legatees, and to others having a joint interest in anything; but it has no application to persons related as principal and agent, and an assured, in an action against the company, is not prohibited from testifying as to conversations with defendant's agent, since deceased. Reynolds v. Iowa & Nebraska Ins. Co., 46 N. W. 659, 660, 80 Iowa, 563.

In an action against a partnership, evidence of a conversation between plaintiff and a deceased partner is inadmissible, under Code 1873, § 3639, enacting that no party to an action shall be examined in regard to any personal transactions between him and the deceased person against the survivor of such deceased person. Salysers v. Munroe, 73 N. W. 606, 607, 104 Iowa, 74.

By the word "survivor," as used in Acts 1882, c. 160, prohibiting an interested person from testifying as to certain transactions, is meant any person who, by reason of his surviving the deceased, would become, as such survivor, interested in the subject of the controversy, as, for instance, a widow who claimed a share of her husband's estate, when the question was whether her husband in his lifetime had given away such property, or whether it was her husband's at the time of his death. Seabright v. Seabright, 28 W. Va. 412, 459.

Where a trust deed conveys certain property to certain trustees, and to the survivor of them, or the assigns of such survivor, the term "the survivor or his assigns" necessarily imports the power to transfer by the survivor. Peck v. Ingraham, 28 Miss. (6 Cushm.) 246, 262.

The description of plaintiffs in the complaint and in the judgment as the "survivors" of a firm is mere description and nothing more. Calling them "survivors" does not make them any the less plaintiffs in their individual right and capacity. Describing a person as the "survivor" is merely describing, not the capacity in which he sues, but the mode in which his title is derived. As a description it is immaterial and surplusage. In re Lawrence (U. S.) 5 Fed. 349, 352.

The word "survivor," in a devise, must be taken in its plain, literal sense, and includes descendants of the immediate devisee contemplated by the testator. Bayless v. Prescott, 2 Ky. Law Rep. 262, 265, 266, 79 Ky. 252.

Where testator devised certain property to his daughter, the same to be equally divided after her death among her children and their heirs, and, if she should die without issue, it was to be divided among the survivors of his children, the word "survivor" was held to include children of a sister not surviving. Appeal of Naglee, 33 Pa. (9 Casey) 89, 91.

As referring to death of testator.

"Surviving," as used by a testator in directing that his real estate be divided into as many shares as there may be surviving children, refers to the death of the testator. Appeal of Barker (Pa.) 3 Atl. 377.

A testator, as to certain lands, declared that, should they not be sold by himself, "then I wish my executors to dispose of them to the best advantage, and, when in funds for the same I wish for them to divide the money among the whole of my surviving children, share and share alike, to them and their lawful heirs, forever." Held, that the testator, by the term "surviving," meant the children who survived him, and not those who were living when the funds arising from the sales were in the hands of the executors. Ballard v. Connors (S. C.) 10 Rich. Eq. 389, 392.

A will devising property to testator's wife for life, remainder to his "surviving brothers and sisters," is to be construed as meaning the brothers and sisters surviving testator. Stone v. Lewis, 5 S. E. 282, 283, 84 Va. 474.

"Surviving," as used by a testator in a devise of real estate to a certain party for and during the term of her natural life, and at the time of her decease to her surviving children, equally, share and share alike, to hold to them, their heirs and assigns, forever, must be regarded as relating to the time of the testator's death, so that the children of such party living at that time took a vested remainder in fee. In re Twaddell (U. S.) 110 Fed. 145, 150.

"Surviving," as used in a will devising property to A. for life, remainder to the surviving children of W. and J., and their heirs, forever, the rents and profits to be divided among them in equal proportion, share and share alike, refers to the testator's death, and not to that of the tenant for life. Long v. Prigg, 8 Barn. & C. 231.

A will devising certain lands to the "surviving children" of certain brothers named meant only those who were surviving at the death of the testator. Eberts v. Eberts, 4 N. W. 172, 173, 42 Mich. 404.

"Survivor," as used in a will empowering the executors to sell all and any part of testator's land and pay his debts, the net residue after the payment of all such debts being given to such executors and to the survivor of them as joint tenants, means one who should survive the death of the testator. Forster v. Winfield, 23 N. Y. Supp. 169, 170, 8 Misc. Rep. 435.

The words "survivors or survivor," in a limitation following a prior gift, are understood in Pennsylvania as referring to the death of the testator (Johnston v. Morton, 10 Pa. 245), unless the intent to refer them to some other period is plain and manifest. In re Martin's Estate, 39 Atl. 841, 842, 185 Pa. 51 (citing Woelpper's Appeal, 126 Pa. 562, 17 Atl. 870).

The word "survivors," in a will whereby a testator devised his lands to his wife for her life, and then to his children and some grandchildren named, to be equally divided between them at the death of the wife, and declared that it was his will that the farm and improvements should be sold after the death of his wife, so that the proceeds should be equally divided among the survivors named in the will, refers to the time of the testator's death. Nicoll v. Scott, 99 Ill. 529, 540.

The phrase "surviving children and their heirs," in a will in which testator gives a life estate to his wife, and directs that the remainder shall be divided equally among his surviving children and their heirs, indicates that the testator intends the estate in remainder shall vest in interest at his death.

If it was his intent that only such children should take as survived his widow, why should he say that his estate is to be divided among "my surviving children and their heirs"? This expression indicates that the testator had in mind that, in case any of his children should die after his death before coming into the beneficial enjoyment of the estate, the heirs of such children should not be cut off. Grimmer v. Friedrich, 45 N. E. 498, 499, 164 Ill. 245.

The word "surviving," as used in a will whereby the testatrix bequeathed certain pecuniary legacies to relations, and decreed that her furniture be given to her sister, and all her wearing apparel, books, and pictures to the surviving families in equal portions, naming four families, and further gave the residue of her estate to the surviving members of her brothers' and sisters' families above named in equal parts, refers to those surviving the testatrix. Hoadly v. Wood, 71 Conn. 452, 456, 42 Atl. 263.

As referring to happening of other event.

The word "surviving," as used in a will devising real estate to testator's daughter, and directing that if the daughter died before the testator's grandchildren, or either of them, the property should go to the surviving grandchildren, has reference to the death of the daughter. Pulse v. Osborn, 64 N. E. 59, 30 Ind. App. 631.

Testator devised land to his wife, on her death to be equally divided between his children then surviving in equal shares. It was held that the word "surviving" means surviving the last tenant for life. Acree v. Dabney, 32 South. 127, 128, 133 Ala. 437.

Testator devised an estate for life to his three daughters, "and from and immediately after the decease of my said daughters, respectively, and as that event happens, I give and bequeath the estate and property of the daughters dying, which shall then be held by the said trustee, under this, my will, to be equally divided among the surviving brothers and sisters and the lawful issue of such as may be dead; provided, however, that if my said daughters, or either of them, should die leaving lawful issue, the share of such daughter so dying shall go and be equally divided among such issue and the lawful issue of such as may be dead." Held, that the clause "surviving brothers and sisters" referred, not to the death of the testator, but to the death of the daughters without leaving issue. Woelpper's Appeal, 17 Atl. 870, 873, 126 Pa. 562.

Testatrix devised "to my sister N.'s surviving children £30 each," and subsequently added: "I give to my sister N. interest of my funded property for her life, and after her decease such property to be equally divided between her surviving children." Held, that in the first gift "surviving children" meant surviving the testatrix, but in the second gift meant children surviving the sister N. When a testator gives property to a person for life, after his death to his "surviving children," the meaning of that must be the children that survived when the interest that was given to the tenant for life becomes exhausted by the death of that party. Neathway v. Reed, 17 Eng. Law & Eq. 150, 152.

A will by which the testator devised his dwelling house to his wife for life, and added, "but on her decease I give and devise the same to my surviving children, to be divided equally between them," meant the children who survived the wife, and not those who survived the testator, who were designated as the remaindermen, since the word "surviving" would have been unnecessary, if the testator meant to give the remainder of the estate to all of his children. Coveny v. McLaughlin, 20 N. E. 165, 166, 148 Mass. 576, 2 L. R. A. 448.

Testator gave the income of a certain sum to his daughter for life, and after her decease, in case she should leave issue, the principal to go to such issue, but, if she should die without issue, to his "surviving children" and their legal personal representatives. Held, that the words "surviving children" meant the children surviving the daughter. Taylor v. Beverley, 1 Colly. 108, 114.

A will devising property to one of testator's children, and providing, if such beneficiary die before he reaches the age of 21, or without issue, the property so devised shall be equally divided among testator's surviving children, is to be construed as meaning testator's children who survive the death of such beneficiary. Holcomb v. Lake, 24 N. J. Law (4 Zab.) 686, 689.

A will devising to each of testator's daughters a certain tract of land in fee, and providing, "if either of my daughters before mentioned shall die without lawful issue, it is my will that the lands devised to such daughter or son shall be equally divided among my surviving sons and daughters," is to be construed as meaning testator's sons and daughters who should survive the one dying without issue, and not the ones who were living when he made the will, or who should survive him. Seddel v. Wills, 20 N. J. Law (Spencer) 223, 228.

Where a devise is made to testator's sons with the contingent remainder to the testator's "surviving children," in the event that neither of such sons marries, the remainder is to the children surviving at the time of the death of the first devisees unmarried. Terril v. Sayre, 3 N. J. Law (2 Penning.) 598, 604.

"Surviving children," in a will providing that on the death of either of his two sons unmarried, to whom he had given the remaining part of his homestead farm, the part so given should be equally divided among all the testator's surviving children, should be construed to mean the children living at the time of the contingency happening, that is, the death of a son, and not those living at the death of the testator. Terril v. Sayre, 3 N. J. Law (2 Penning.) 598, 604.

A will giving a life estate to testator's wife, remainder to testator's "surviving children," is to be construed as meaning the children surviving at the death of the wife. Roundtree v. Roundtree, 2 S. E. 474, 477, 26 S. E. 450.

A will by which testator gave a share of his estate to each of his daughters to be held in trust, and at her death to her children or to their issue, and in default of issue to the testator's "surviving children," means children surviving at the death of the daughter, and not at the death of the testator. Appeal of Reiff, 16 Atl. 636, 637, 124 Pa. 145.

Testator directed that, after the death of his widow, his residuary estate is "to be divided and devised as follows," and then said: "I give" $1,200 to 3 persons named, "to be equally divided between them," and "I give and bequeath" to 8 other persons named "the sum of $300, to be equally divided between them, and the survivors and survivor of them," and "the residue of my estate . . . I give and devise to" 24 persons named, "to be equally divided between them, and the survivors and survivor of them, it being one of the conditions of the devise, if any of the devisees named should be indebted to me, the principal amount of said debt to be deducted from his or her share, and said deduction to be made without regard to the date thereof"; he having previously, in his will, given legacies to be paid to survivors "at the time of distribution." Held that, in the disposition of the residuary estate, wherever the term "survivors or survivor" is used, it refers to survivors at the time of the distribution of that residuary estate; that is, at the death of the testator's widow. Dutton v. Pugh, 18 Atl. 207, 209, 45 N. J. Eq. (18 Stew.) 426.

Testator made certain specific devises and bequests to several of his children. He then gave a life estate to his wife in his real and personal property not specifically disposed of. He then declared that his real and personal estate, after the death of his wife, unless she chose to give up the estate before her decease, should be sold and divided among certain of his children, and then declared that, if any of his children should die without lawful issue, then his, her, or their share should be equally divided among the survivors. Held, that the word "survivors" referred to the period when the estate should be divided after the happening of the event mentioned in the will, to wit, the death of the wife. Williamson v. Chamberlain, 10 N. J. Eq. (2 Stockt.) 373, 375.

The rule is that where there is a devise or bequest for life, followed by a devise or bequest to survivors, at the termination of the life estate, the word "survivors" in its natural and ordinary meaning refers to the survivors at the time of distribution; and unless, upon taking the whole will into consideration, the word is plainly used in some other sense, this ordinary and natural construction must prevail. Ashhurst v. Potter, 32 Atl. 698, 699, 53 N. J. Eq. 608.

A limitation over in a will to "my surviving legatees" after the termination of a fee conditional estate means the legatees surviving the first taker, on whose death without issue the survivors were to take, and not the legatees who survive the testator. Selman v. Robertson, 24 S. E. 187, 191, 46 S. C. 262.

While the word "survivor," when used in a will containing a devise to two persons or the survivor, is usually restricted to death of one of the beneficiaries occurring before that of the testator, the rule is not a fast one, and yields, like all arbitrary tests, to the intention of the testator. Thus in a will by a testatrix, 85 years of age, giving all the property to two grandchildren, who were sisters aged 11 and 9 years, and providing that, in case of the death of either without heir or heirs, such one's share should go to the survivor, the term "survivor" was construed to apply to the death of one of the beneficiaries occurring after testatrix's death, and therefore the estate of such beneficiary passed to the other beneficiary. In re Cramer, 69 N. Y. Supp. 299, 300, 59 App. Div. 541.

A will directing the trustees, on the happening of a certain event, to dispose of the property and divide the proceeds equally among the "surviving children" of certain persons, meant those surviving at the time of the distribution, and not at the time of the testator's death. Slack v. Bird, 23 N. J. Eq. (8 C. E. Green) 238, 239.

It is a settled rule of construction that the word "surviving," occurring in a settlement in a will, should be referred to the period appointed by that settlement for the payment or distribution of the subject-matter of the gift, and, in the event of such a gift, the survivors are to be ascertained in like manner by reference to the period of the payment or distribution. So, where a gift to survivors is preceded by a life or other prior interest, it takes effect in those who survive the period of distribution and possession, unless a special contrary intent is found in the will. Blatchford v. Newberry, 99 Ill. 11, 14, 45.

The word "survivor," used in a will by which a testator devised all his estate to two persons, in trust to take care of and manage the same, and declared that the trust should continue for 10 years after his death and no longer, and which then provided that at the end of the 10 years all of the estate then remaining and the income thereof should be distributed and vest in his three sons, naming them, and their heirs, and, in case either of the said three sons should die leaving no issue of their bodies, then the devise should go to the survivor of them, refers to the period when the trust ceases, and not to the time of the death of the testator. Blanchard v. Maynard, 103 Ill. 60, 66.

Where an estate is granted to persons described as "survivors," it does not vest until the time designated for the enjoyment of the estate, and the word "survivors" has in such case reference to that period. Cheney v. Teese, 108 Ill. 473, 482.

In a will by which testator gave to each of his daughters £5,000, the interest to be paid to such daughters for life, and if they had children the principal to be divided among them if they should attain 21, and if a daughter did not have children it was to be divided among her "surviving sisters," the quoted phrase meant such sisters as should survive children of another sister who died under 21, and not merely those who survived the mother of such children. Carver v. Burgess, 31 Eng. Law & Eq. 529.

The word "survivor," where an estate is by will conveyed to executors as executors, and the trust to them is in their official capacity, with a power surviving to the sole executor, means those who have accepted the trust. Herrick v. Carpenter, 52 N. W. 747, 749, 92 Mich. 440.

By his will testator gave his widow certain property for life, and three unmarried daughters were given a certain sum each; it being provided that if either of the daughters should die before marriage her portion should go to the survivors, and that if there should be any increase in the property it should be divided among testator's children and grandchildren. Other specific devises were made. Held, that the word "survivors" did not mean all of the children of testator surviving at the death of one of the daughters, but referred only to the unmarried daughters. Dodge v. Sherwood, 75 S. W. 417, 419, 176 Mo. 33.

The term "survivor," as used in a will whereby a testator devised to each of his two daughters, and to the heirs of their body, forever, certain personal chattels, and provided that, if the daughters should die without having a lawful heir of their body to live, then he devised the said chattels to be equally divided "to the survivors," imports the idea of the longest liver, provided the other daughter should leave no children behind her, that is, none living at the time of her death; for, if she had left a child, that child or those claiming under it must have taken, but, as there was none living at her death, then she who should survive was the person to take. This, then, is not a limitation depending on a remote, but a very limited, contingency. One which was to happen in a very short period, during the life of a person then living, cannot be called a limitation after an indefinite failure of issue to a person not then in being. Keating v. Reynolds (S. C.) 1 Bay, 80, 87.

"Survivors" is a flexible term, and when used in a will, as applied to testator's children, does not necessarily mean surviving children only, but may, when molded by the context and spirit of the will, consistently with the literal import, comprehend all his surviving descendants who were intended to be beneficiaries. Harris v. Berry, 70 Ky. (7 Bush) 113. When a bequest is made to one of several children dying without issue, the testator should be understood to mean by "survivor" his other children, unless they also had died without issue, because his presumed object was that all who should have issue should be entitled to an equal interest, and that nothing but death without issue should disturb that equality. Graves v. Spurr, 17 Ky. Law Rep. 411, 413, 31 S. W. 483, 484, 485, 97 Ky. 651 (citing Binney v. Richardson, 35 Ky. [5 Dana] 429).

Where a testator directed his residuary estate to be equally divided among his brothers and sisters by name, or their "survivors," and he knew they had families, the intent was to give to the survivors of each—not to the survivors of the brothers and sisters, but to each individual and their survivors; and it was intended that each one named should take a part, and that that part, when the devisee was dead, should go to his or her family. Appeal of Stoner, 2 Pa. (2 Barr) 428, 431, 45 Am. Dec. 608.

As importing definite failure of issue.

A testator by his will gave to his two sons all his lands, live stock, bonds, etc., to be equally divided between them, and provided that, if either of his said sons should die without any lawful heirs of their own, then the share of him who may first die shall accrue to the survivor and his heirs. The will created an estate in fee simple in the sons, and by reason of the word "survivor" the share of the one who first died without issue passed over to the other son by way of devise, since the term "survivor" imports a definite failure of issue. Abbott v. Essex Co., 59 U. S. (18 How.) 202, 216, 15 L. Ed. 352.

As creating executory devise.

Under a will whereby the testator bequeathed to two sons, to them and their heirs and assigns, certain property, to be equally divided between them when they should arrive at the age of 21 years, and provided that, if either of them should die before arriving at that age, then the part or share of the one dying should go to the "survivor" of them, an estate in fee simple was created in the devisees, but by the clause providing for the passing of the property to the survivor the estate by reason of the word "survivor" was reduced to an executory devise. Howell v. Howell, 20 N. J. Law (Spencer) 411, 420.

As live after.

The primary meaning of the phrase "who shall survive me," as used in a will, taken by itself, is, of course, perfectly obvious, signifying the person or persons mentioned who shall be living at the time of the death of the testator. The primary meaning of the word "survive" is to live beyond the life or extent of, or to outlive; but it also has a secondary meaning, namely, to live after, and as used in the phrase, "if either of my said sons should die without leaving a child which shall survive him," the testator could not have used the word "survive" in its ordinary acceptation, but in the sense of "who shall live after him." There has been much discussion in the books as to the proper construction of the words "survive" and "survivor," when used in wills; but it is now settled by numerous decisions that the same rule of construction will be applied to these words as to any others, namely, that they shall be taken in their literal and ordinary import, unless there is something in the context or attending circumstances which shows that they were used in a different sense. Bailey v. Brown, 36 Atl. 581, 586, 19 R. I. 669.

The word "survive," in its popular signification, may mean "overliving a specified individual," or "living beyond a specified event," or it may mean "still living," or "living at some designated period of time." As used in a devise to the testator's daughter and her heirs generally, but if she should die without issue living at her death, "or if her child or children surviving her should die before arriving at the age of 21 years, then over" to the testator's other children, the words "surviving her" mean simply what would otherwise have been implied from the limitation itself, "if she died leaving issue." Jordan v. Roach, 32 Miss. 481, 613.

The word "surviving," as used in a devise to children in trust for their children, the share of any child dying without children to go to the surviving heirs, meant the then surviving heirs, not those who should be afterwards born and who survive a future contingency. In re Malseed's Estate, 15 Wkly. Notes Cas. 368.

"Survive," as used in a will declaring that, in case B. and C. should die leaving no heirs of either of their bodies, then all the lands, etc., "before given to them shall be and remain to the children of my brethren and sister who shall then survive," should not be construed to confine the dying without issue to the time of the death, on the ground that the word "survive" intends that the person who is to take should be living with the testator and outlive the rest of the children. Hawley v. Inhabitants of Northampton, 8 Mass. 3, 31, 5 Am. Dec. 66.

The word "survivor," as used in a will by which the testator gave the residue, after payment of all debts, to his executors and to the survivor of them, means one who should survive the death of the testator. Forster v. Winfield, 23 N. Y. Supp. 169, 170, 3 Misc. Rep. 435.

"Surviving sons," as used in the clause of a will providing that on the decease of either of testator's three sons, leaving lawful issue, the issue should take, and in default of issue the portion of a deceased son should be paid over to "my surviving sons," requires an actual survival. Hendricks v. Hendricks, 79 N. Y. Supp. 516, 518, 78 App. Div. 212.

Where a devise or bequest is made to several persons absolutely, the words "survivor or survivors" do not refer often to the date of the testator's death, and, of course, indicate that the property devised or bequeathed is to go to the person or persons who survive the testator. In re Foley, 10 N. Y. Supp. 12, 13, 2 Con. Sur. 298.

In its ordinary, as well as legal signification the word "survivor" means one who outlives another; one of two or more persons who lives after the others have deceased. By will a testator bequeathed to three persons, and the survivor of them, all his estate upon certain trusts, which were specified. Only one of the parties named qualified; the other two having declined the trust. The three to whom the bequest was made in trust were named as executors of the will, which provided that no further action should be had in the district court, or other court having jurisdiction of probate matters, than the registration and probating of the will. Under such circumstances the executor who qualified, the others being still alive, must administer the estate as in other cases under the orders of the probate court. Blanton v. Mayes, 58 Tex. 422, 423, 425.

There has been much discussion as to the effect of provisions in wills in favor of "survivors." The controversy has been whether the word should have its literal and natural meaning, or whether it should prima facie be construed as equivalent to the word "others," in the absence of circumstances or something in the context showing that it was used in a strictly literal sense. There is a line of older cases, as in Wilmot v. Wilmot, 8 Ves. Jr. 10, holding to the latter view. Some eminent judges have also held that the words were convertible terms; but where the word "survivor" has been given the force of "other," thus letting in the issues of a deceased member of a class by inheritance from the parent, it has been usually done, as was the case in Harris v. Berry, 70 Ky. (7 Bush) 114, to avoid some consequences which it was quite certain the testator did not intend. It was necessary, in order to effect an intention appearing upon the entire will. The later cases, however, hold that the word "survivor," when unexplained by the context, is to be given its natural meaning, and interpreted according to its literal import. As this rule may often defeat the unexpressed intention of the testator, courts readily listen to any argument, drawn from the context or other provisions of the will, showing that "survivor" was used by him as synonymous with "other"; but, unless this appear, it may now be regarded as the settled rule that its literal meaning is to be given to it. Gorham v. Betts, 5 S. W. 465, 466, 86 Ky. 164.

"Survivors," as used in a will providing that on a certain contingency property was to be divided equally among the survivors of my children, was to be taken in its ordinary sense, and not construed to mean "others." The word in a will is to be construed in its natural sense, unless the will itself shows that it was used by the testator in a different sense. Leeming v. Sherratt, 2 Hare, 14, 24.

While it is true that, in order to properly carry out the intention of the testator, the word "survivors" in a will has sometimes been regarded as synonymous with "others," yet it is now established that the same rule of construction will be applied to the word "survivors" as to any other. It will be received in its natural and literal import, unless there is something in the context or attending circumstances tending to a different conclusion. To construe it as an equivalent to "other" is a construction which the court will sometimes be compelled to adopt, in order to accomplish the intention which appears on the whole of the will. Anderson v. Brown, 35 Atl. 937, 939, 84 Md. 261.

The word "survivor," in a will, when unexplained by the context, will be construed in its natural sense; but if, when interpreted according to its literal sense, the tendency is to defeat the actual intention of the testator, courts will readily listen to the arguments drawn from the context for reading the word "survivor" as synonymous with the word "other." Duryea v. Duryea, 85 Ill. 41.

The word "survivors" held to be the equivalent of "others" in a will. In re Devine's Estate, 48 Atl. 1072, 1075, 199 Pa. 250; Appeal of Nichols (Pa.) 48 Atl. 1072, 1075; Appeal of Bruner, Id.; Appeal of Williams, Id.

It is said in Lapsley v. Lapsley, 9 Pa. (9 Barr) 130, where testator gave certain realty to his four sons for life, but provided that, if any of "my sons shall die without issue, their portions shall be divided equally between the surviving brothers," that the word "survivors" in such cases means "others." In re Bacon's Estate, 52 Atl. 135, 139, 202 Pa. 535.

"Survivors," as used by a testatrix in giving all her real and personal estate to her daughter and "her heirs, and half the navigation money for her natural life, and, in case she dies without issue, all to be divided between" four of the nephews and nieces, who are named, the part of one only for life, and to be divided between the survivors, means "others." Barlow v. Salter, 17 Ves. 478, 482.

Testator devised to each of his five children certain land for life, remainder to the children of each in tail, the share of any child dying without issue that could take as his immediate devisees to go to "the survivor or survivors" of his children during their natural lives, and after their decease to the children of such "survivor or survivors, . . . forever (and) of any of my children who may be dead, leaving children claiming their parent's share, to be equally divided between (the child or children of) my surviving child or children as aforesaid, and the child or children" of "any that may be dead, claiming the right of their parent or parents, share and share alike"; and then followed a devise over in case all his children should die without descendants. The next item declared an intention to create cross-remainders among his children, so that they and their children should continually inherit, and that no other person should take any part of the estate while any of his children or their lawful issue should remain. Held, that the parenthetical words should be inserted to elucidate testator's meaning, and that the words "survivor" and "survivors" should be construed to mean "other" and "others," so that, on the death of the sole surviving child, the share of a child previously deceased without issue should be equally divided among all of testator's grandchildren then living per stirpes. Cooper v. Cooper (Del.) 31 Atl. 1043, 1046, 7 Houst. 488.

"Survivors," as used in a deed conveying property to trustees for the benefit of the grantor's wife for her life, and providing that after her death the property should be held in trust for the benefit and behoof of her children by the grantor, or the survivors of them which shall be living at the time of her decease, includes both the children of the grantor and their issue, and is not confined to children alone, and all the children of the grantor, as well as all the children of any deceased child, stand on the same footing. Kemp v. Bradford, 61 Md. 330, 333.

"Surviving children," as used in a will providing for the payment of the income and interest from the residue of his estate to his daughters and son, naming them, in equal proportion during their natural lives, and at the death of either of them without lawful issue his or her share to continue to be a part of the residuary estate, the income of which should be equally divided among the "surviving children," should be construed to mean "the others"—that is, the testator's own children living, and the children of his deceased children—and that he intended by his residuary bequest to put each branch of his family on a footing of exact equality, giving life interests to his children and the capital to their respective issue, per stirpes. "Where property is given to a plurality of persons, with a devise or bequest over, in certain events, of the shares of dying objects to the survivors, the word 'survivors' is construed 'others,' so that as well those who die before as those who survive the objects in question are entitled, provided, of course, that their death did not happen under circumstances which subjected their shares to the operation of the limitation over." Carter v. Bloodgood's Ex'rs (N. Y.) 3 Sandf. Ch. 193, 299.

The word "survivors," in a devise, "if either of the aforesaid legatees die without issue, the portion which she or they were entitled to is to go to the survivors equally," means the surviving devisees, to the exclusion of the children of a deceased devisee. Best v. Conn, 73 Ky. (10 Bush) 36.

The word "survivor," in the absence of any explanation by a testator in any part of his will, must be interpreted according to its literal meaning, and points to those who outlive the first devisee. Bayless v. Prescott, 79 Ky. 252, 256.

The word "survivors," in a statute for the settlement and distribution of estates which provides that, if any of the children happen to die before he or she becomes of age, the portion of such child deceased shall be equally divided among the survivors, means the surviving children, as the distribution among children is the subject-matter of the whole proviso. Runey v. Edmands, 15 Mass. 291, 292.

Where testator gave property to trustees, to be divided, after the death of persons who had life interests in it, among A., B., C., D., and E., in equal shares, and directed that, if any of them should die without issue before their respective shares should become payable, the share of the one so dying should be equally divided among the survivor and survivors of them, the words "survivor and survivors" were to be construed in their natural sense, and not as equivalent to "other and others"; so that, A. having died leaving issue who were living at the time fixed for the distribution of the fund, and B. having died leaving a son, who died without issue before the period of distribution, and C. having died without issue before the period of distribution, no part of the shares of B. and C. went over to A.'s personal representative. Crowder v. Stone, 8 Russ. Ch. 217, 224.

"Survivors," as used in a will devising testator's residuary estate to his children equally, and providing that, in case of death, the share of the deceased child should go to his or her children, if any, and, in case of failure of issue, be divided among the survivors of the testator's children, equally, means the "survivors" absolutely and literally, and should not be construed as meaning "others." Leeming v. Sherratt, 2 Hare, 14, 15.

The phrase "children or survivors of them," in a will in which testator gave all his estate to his wife for life, and directed that all remaining after her death should be divided by his executors equally among his children or the survivors of them, was construed not to include a child of one of testator's children who had died prior to the death of testator's wife. Sinton v. Boyd, 19 Ohio St. 30, 36, 2 Am. Rep. 369.

The word "survivor," as used in a will providing that the above devises "to my children, being to them, their heirs and assigns, and, if any die without issue, then to the survivor or survivors of them in equal shares," did not include an heir of one of the children dying, but, on the death of one of the three without heirs, confines the survivorship to such children. Guernsey v. Guernsey, 36 N. Y. 267.

Testator left a remainder to be divided in equal shares, the income to be applied to the use of his children surviving him during the life of each severally, and on the death of each child to pay over the capital of the share of such child to his or her descendants, and, if any should die without leaving descendants, then to pay over the capital of such child's share to his or her surviving brothers and sisters. Held, that the words "surviving brothers and sisters" did not and could not include the children of the deceased child. Mullarky v. Sullivan, 32 N. H. 762, 763, 132 N. Y. 408.

A testatrix bequeathed a sum upon trust for her daughter A. for life, and after her death for her children, with a gift over, in default of children, to "the other or others of them, the said B., C., D., and E., equally to be divided between them." Held, that the words "other or others" could not mean surviving children at the death of the life tenant, since that construction would entirely include the children of a daughter who died during the lifetime of a tenant for life, and hence the share which belonged to A. during her life should be divided into fourths and given to B., C., D., and E. In re Hagen's Trusts, 46 Law J. Ch. 665.

SURVIVABILITY.

"Assignability" and "survivability" of things in action are convertible terms. Tanas v. Municipal Gas Co., 84 N. Y. Supp. 1053, 1058, 88 App. Div. 251.

SURVIVING HUSBAND.

"Surviving husband," as used in statutes and legal phraseology, has the same force and meaning and the same legal effect as "widower." In re Ray's Estate, 35 N. Y. Supp. 481, 482, 13 Misc. Rep. 480.

SURVIVING MEMBER.

"Surviving members," as used in Act May 18, 1887, providing that insurance companies on the assessment plan shall deposit with the Auditor a copy of its constitution and by-laws, which must show that all indemnities to beneficiaries are in the main provided for by assessments on all "surviving members," are the antithesis of deceased, and not of lapsed, members. A surviving member is one who has always paid up his assessments and is still a member of the company. Surviving members are those who have continued to be members of the company by keeping up their policies and paying their assessments. Mutual Ben. Life Ins. Co. v. Marye, 8 S. E. 481, 482, 85 Va. 643.

SURVIVING PARTNER.

As personal representative, see "Personal Representative."

SURVIVING WIFE.

A woman who has been divorced cannot be deemed a "surviving wife"; but, unless there has been a judicial decree dissolving the marriage relation, a wife who outlives her husband is a surviving wife, no matter how bad her conduct may have been. Wiseman v. Wiseman, 73 Ind. 112, 116, 38 Am. Rep. 115.

"Surviving wife," as used in Rev. St. 1894, § 2652 (Rev. St. 1881, § 2491), providing that a surviving wife is entitled to one-third of all the real estate of which her husband may have been seised in fee simple at any time during the marriage, and in the conveyance of which she may not have joined in due form of law, etc., does not include a wife who has been divorced for the fault of the husband, who died without remarrying. Fletcher v. Monroe, 43 N. E. 1053, 1054, 145 Ind. 56.

SURVIVORSHIP.

See "With Benefit of Survivorship."

"Title by survivorship" exists only when the estate is held in joint ownership. Denigan v. San Francisco Sav. Union, 59 Pac. 390, 392, 127 Cal. 142, 78 Am. St. Rep. 35.

SUSPECT.

"Suspect," as used in a complaint on oath stating that the complainant had reasonable cause to suspect, and did suspect, that certain property was concealed in a certain place, and praying for a warrant to search for the same, cannot be construed to have the same meaning as "believe," as used in Rev. St. c. 142, § 1, providing that when complaint shall be made on oath that personal property has been stolen or embezzled, or obtained by false tokens or pretenses, and that the complainant believes that it is concealed in any particular place, the magistrate, if he be satisfied that there is reasonable cause for such belief, shall issue a warrant to search for the property. "The words 'suspect' and 'believe' are not technical words, and have not by the approved use of the language the same meaning. Suspecting is not believing. That may be a ground for suspicion which will not induce belief." Commonwealth v. Certain Lottery Tickets, 59 Mass. (5 Cush.) 369, 371.

The use of the word "suspect," in a complaint for search warrant, that the complainant has cause to suspect and does suspect, etc., is not a sufficient compliance with the statute, requiring the complainant to make oath or affirmation that he believes the stolen goods are concealed in some house or place described in the complaint. "Suspicion may be upon very slight grounds, and imports a less degree of certainty than belief." Humes v. Tabor, 1 R. I. 464, 470.

SUSPEND—SUSPENSION.

"Suspend" is defined to mean to interrupt; to cause to cease for a time; to stay and delay; to hinder the proceedings for a time. Virginia Fire & Marine Ins. Co. v. Aiken, 82 Va. 424, 428.

The word "suspension" means the temporary intervention or cessation of labor. Lethbridge v. City of New York, 15 N. Y. Supp. 562, 59 N. Y. Super. Ct. 486.

A corporation has "suspended business," as that term was employed in Gen. St. 1899, § 1268, when it commences to wind up its affairs, ceases to hold meetings of stockholders and board of directors, and fails to transact the business for which it was incorporated. Jones v. Slonecker, 71 Pac. 573, 66 Kan. 286.

The word "suspended," in the books of a subordinate lodge of an insurance order, is not sufficient to show the suspension of a member of the order, as such member can only be suspended by some affirmative action of the lodge. Scheu v. Grand Lodge I. O. O. F. (U. S.) 17 Fed. 214, 215.

"Suspension," as used when speaking of the suspension of a priest of the Catholic church, is a judicial act imposing a sentence forbidding such priest to exercise the functions of a priest. A sentence of suspension follows a trial for an offense, from which the priest may appeal. Stack v. O'Hara, 98 Pa. 213, 232.

As discharge.

The word "suspend" ordinarily means a temporary cessation, but the connection in which it is used may give it a stronger meaning; and hence, as used in a notice to an inspector of masonry, etc., appointed by the commission for the construction of aqueducts, pursuant to Laws 1883, c. 490, that, "owing to lack of work, you are hereby suspended without pay until such time as your services may be required," given after notice that all inspectors were only to be paid for the time they were on duty on the work, will be construed to amount to a discharge. Me-Namara v. City of New York, 46 N. E. 507, 509, 152 N. Y. 228.

As discontinuance.

Under Act Feb. 28, 1861, which authorizes the postmaster under certain circumstances specified to discontinue the postal service on any route, a suspension during the late Rebellion, at the Postmaster General's discretion, of the route in certain rebel states, with notice to the contractor that he would be held responsible for a renewal when the Postmaster General should deem it safe to renew the service there, was held to be a discontinuance, so that under a mail carrier's contract with a government calling for a month's pay if the postmaster discontinued the service it was adjudged that he was entitled to the month's pay. Reeside v. United States, 75 U. S. (8 Wall.) 38, 42, 19 L. Ed. 318.

As dispense with rules.

Under Code, § 489, providing that a municipal ordinance shall be read on three different days, unless three-fourths of the council vote to dispense with the rules, an ordinance is valid, if passed by three-fourths vote upon a motion to "suspend" the rules; there being no substantial difference in the terms. Town of Baird v. Baker, 40 N. W. 818, 819, 76 Iowa, 220.

Dissolution of partnership distinguished.

The suspension and dissolution of a partnership are not synonymous; "suspension" meaning a mere cessation of its business operations for a period of time, while "dissolution" is the entire termination of the relation. Partnership results from contract, and its dissolution, when not brought about by death, bankruptcy, or some operation of law, rests in the same source—the will or action of the partners themselves. Thus, Story, in his work on Partnership (section 101), declaring that the general assignment of a partnership for the benefit of creditors would amount of itself to a suspension or dissolution of a partnership, did not mean that such an assignment would absolutely terminate the partnership, but that it would suspend its operations and perhaps ultimately result in its dissolution. Williston v. Camp, 22 Pac. 501, 503, 9 Mont. 88.

The "suspension" of a right in an estate is a partial extinguishment thereof, or an extinguishment for a time. It differs from an extinguishment in this: A suspended right may be revived, while one extinguished is absolutely dead. Dyer v. Dyer, 23 Atl. 910, 911, 17 R. I. 547.

An agreement between the holder and payee of promissory notes, by which it was mutually agreed that the payee should pay £25 per annum by quarterly payments, and as long as he so paid the right of action on the notes should be "suspended," did not mean that the agreement should have the effect, from the moment of its being signed, of forever extinguishing the plaintiff's claim on the notes, or of ever maintaining an action for the recovery; but the agreement merely gave the payee a right of action for a breach thereof, if the holder sued while the payments were continued. Ford v. Beech, 11 Q. B. 852, 867.

A provision, in a contract for the sale of coke, that deliveries under the contract may be suspended in case of strikes, accidents, or other causes causing a stoppage in the works of the seller, relieves the seller from the obligation of his guaranty, when such causes have prevented him from furnishing the guaranteed amount within the specified time, as the word "suspended" does not mean postponed only, and therefore the purchaser cannot demand delivery of coke after the expiration of the fixed period. The two words are not synonymous. Hull Coal & Coke Co. v. Empire Coal & Coke Co. (U. S.) 113 Fed. 256, 259, 51 C. C. A. 213.

As quash.

"Suspend" means to cause to cease for a time; to interrupt; to delay. Under Rev. St. 1889, § 2522, providing that, if there be pending against the same defendant two indictments for the same offense, the indictment first found shall be deemed to be suspended by the second indictment and shall be quashed, the second indictment does not ipso facto quash the first; but the operation of the section seems to leave the first indictment endowed with life, so that, if the second indictment is quashed, the first one revives. State v. Melvin, 66 S. W. 534, 536, 166 Mo. 565.

As remove.

"Suspended," as used in Comp. St. c. 18, art. 2, § 9, providing for the removal of county officers from office, and authorizing the court to supply the place of such an officer by an appointment for the term, when the accused is an officer of the court and is suspended, is not synonymous with "removed," as used in section 7 of the act, providing that, if the accused is found guilty, judgment shall be entered removing him from office. State v. Meeker, 27 N. W. 427, 429, 19 Neb. 444.

An order issued to a public officer, stating that his services are no longer needed, and that he is "suspended" from further duty after that date, amounts to an absolute removal from the position, and not a mere suspension from duty. Donnell v. City of New York, 22 N. Y. Supp. 661, 663, 68 Hun, 55.

"Suspension," as contemplated in Act Feb. 28, 1887 (Acts 1886-87, p. 1), authorizing the Governor to suspend assessors and appoint tax commissioners to perform the duties of assessors so suspended, and provided that such suspension shall continue indefinitely until the General Assembly restore such assessors to office, is the same in legal contemplation as a removal from office. Nolen v. State, 24 South. 251, 253, 118 Ala. 154.

"Suspension" from office is in no proper sense the same thing as a removal, and it cannot be held, by construction or otherwise, that the provisions of a constitution with regard to removals from office apply equally to suspensions therefrom, and a constitutional provision authorizing removal after written charges have been made, and a trial thereof had, and a finding of the jury on the truth of the charges, does not deprive the Legislature of the power to provide that, where charges are made, the court may temporarily suspend the officer until the determination of such charges. Poe v. State, 10 S. W. 732, 739, 740, 72 Tex. 625.

Repeal distinguished.

See "Repeal."

SUSPENSION OF PAYMENT.

"Suspension of payment," as applied to commercial paper, means something more than a failure of the maker of such paper to seek the holder thereof and pay him. Business men understand very well what the term means. There is the idea in it of a failure to pay from an inability to do so. In re Wolf (U. S.) 30 Fed. Cas. 406.

SUSPENSION OF POWER OF ALIENATION.

The suspension of all power to alienate the subject of a trust, other than a power to exchange it for other property to be held upon the same trust, or to sell it and reinvest the proceeds to be held upon the same trust, is a "suspension of the power of alienation." Civ. Code Mont. 1895, § 1220.

SUSPENSION OF SENTENCE.

"Suspension of sentence" means an interregnum of the period between conviction and final judgment. People v. Webster, 38 N. Y. Supp. 745, 746, 14 Misc. Rep. 617.

The distinction between a "reprieve" and a "suspension of sentence" is that a reprieve postpones the execution of the sentence to a day certain, whereas a suspension is for an indefinite time. Carnal v. People (N. Y.) 1 Parker, Cr. R. 262. Therefore, where a reprieve is granted by a Governor, it is the duty of the sheriff on the expiration of the time to execute the sentence without further orders by the court. In re Buchanan, 40 N. E. 883, 886, 146 N. Y. 264.

SUSPENSIVE CONDITION.

A suspensive condition is one in which the obligation depends on an uncertain event, and which is not to take effect until the event happens. Moss v. Smoker, 2 La. Ann. 989, 991.

The obligation contracted on a suspensive condition is that which depends either on a future and uncertain event, or on an event which has actually taken place, without it being yet known to the parties. Civ. Code La. 1900, art. 2043. The effect of a suspensive condition is, as its name necessarily implies, to suspend the obligation until the condition is accomplished, or considered as accomplished. The "suspensive condition" under the Louisiana Civil Code is the equivalent of the "condition precedent" at common law. City of New Orleans v. Texas & P. R. Co., 18 Sup. Ct. 875, 171 U. S. 312, 43 L. Ed. 178.

SUSPICION.

Discovery distinguished, see "Discovery."

The word "suspicion" is defined as being "imagination of the existence of something without proof, or upon very slight evidence, or upon no evidence at all," and to hold that, when plaintiff's own case exposes him to suspicion of negligence, the burden is on the plaintiff, would place the burden of proof on plaintiff in all cases, on the question of contributory negligence, for an accident could rarely occur but that there would be some slight evidence of plaintiff's negligence. Gulf, C. & S. F. Ry. Co. v. Shieder, 30 S. W. 902, 905, 88 Tex. 152, 28 L. R. A. 538.

The trial court, in charging on the subject of corroboration of the testimony of an accomplice, stated that, if the facts outside of his testimony were sufficient to cast on him a grave suspicion of guilty knowledge, it was sufficient. The court, in reversing the case, said that "suspicion" is defined by standard lexicographers to be the "act of suspecting or the state of being suspected; imagination, generally of something ill; distrust; mistrust; doubt;" that the evidence ought to tend to show the guilt, and not a mere suspicion, whether grave or light; that the human mind is so constituted that where one is indicted for a grave offense the mere charge itself will excite a suspicion. Involuntarily it springs into action, and we look upon such a one with distrust and doubt. McCalla v. State, 66 Ga. 346, 348.

"Knowledge" and "suspicion" are not synonymous terms. Thus, where an employé's indemnity policy provided for notice of any act of dishonesty as soon as it came to the knowledge of the employer, notice was not required when the employer merely entertained suspicions as to the employé. American Surety Co. v. Pauly (U. S.) 72 Fed. 470, 477, 18 C. C. A. 644.

Where, in an action for libel, the words used were that the defendant had a suspicion that plaintiff and another had robbed his house, and therefore arrested them, the word "suspicion" was legally susceptible of involving a positive charge of felony. Royce v. Maloney, 5 Atl. 395, 400, 58 Vt. 437.

"Suspicion" is weaker than "belief," and "opinion" no stronger. The expression of a suspicion that another has committed a crime is actionable. Giddens v. Mirk, 4 Ga. 364, 370.

SUSPICIOUS CHARACTER.

An ordinance of the city of San Antonio declares that all persons who entice any other person or persons to commit any irreputable act or deed, all persons found loitering about the city under suspicious circumstances or places and who are unable to give a proper account of themselves, all persons in the act of committing theft not amounting to a felony or misdemeanor, and all persons following any business by soliciting orders whereby the person or persons giving such orders are defrauded, shall be considered "suspicious characters." McFaddin v. City of San Antonio, 54 S. W. 48, 49, 22 Tex. Civ. App. 140.

SUSPICIOUS PERSON.

The words "suspicious person" are used to designate one against whom there is reasonable cause to believe that he has committed a felony, and whose arrest without warrant is authorized by Code Cr. Proc. § 177. The belief necessary to authorize such arrest is generally nothing more than a well-grounded suspicion. People v. Russell, 72 N. Y. Supp. 1, 2, 35 Misc. Rep. 765.

SUSTAIN.

A bond of a bank teller, conditioned to make good to said bank all damages "sustained" by it through his unfaithfulness or want of care, means any damages caused by his want of care, if by any degree of care on his part such damages could have been avoided. Union Bank of Georgetown v. Forrest (U. S.) 24 Fed. Cas. 559.

"Maintaining and sustaining" a railroad means keeping it in repair, supplying it with machinery, and such like acts; and thus a grant of a power to a corporation of "maintaining and sustaining" a railroad does not apply to projects for maintaining its business by schemes and enterprises not contemplated and expressed in clear, unambiguous terms by the charter itself. A power of maintaining and sustaining a railroad is included within a corporate grant of the power of laying, building, and making the road. Central R. Co. v. Collins, 40 Ga. 582, 624.

SUSTENANCE.

"Sustenance" is that which supports life; food; victuals; provisions; and, as used in a statute declaring that whoever shall deprive of necessary sustenance shall be guilty of misdemeanor, it means that necessary food and drink which is sufficient to support life and maintain health; and where it appears that the defendant did furnish such food and drink, but merely refused to permit them to take medicine, a conviction cannot be sustained. Justice v. State, 42 S. E. 1013, 1014, 116 Ga. 605, 59 L. R. A. 601.

SWAMP.

In larger streams, such as the Santee and the Edisto, the "swamp" is spoken of distinct from the river; but in creeks with a margin of swamp the usage is universal in the state of South Carolina to speak of the creek and swamp as one, and in a call in a survey for "Dean swamp" the name is appropriate to the run, and not to the swamp. Felder v. Bonnett (S. C.) 2 McMul. 44, 47, 37 Am. Dec. 545.

The word "swamp," as contained in Act Cong. 1849, granting to the state of Louisiana certain lands to aid in reclaiming the swamp lands therein, without the addition of the word "overflowed," would have conveyed the lands so lacking in drainage as to be temporarily covered by water in the rainy seasons. McDade v. Bossier Levee Board, 83 South. 628, 631, 109 La. 625.

SWAMP AND OVERFLOWED LANDS.

"Swamp and overflowed lands," as used in a complaint to compel conveyance of certain land which the plaintiff claimed as swamp and overflowed lands purchased from the state, and which the defendant claimed as a pre-emption, should be construed as merely equivalent to the phrase "wet and unfit for cultivation." Land which is too wet for cultivation is "swamp and overflowed lands," whether the water flows over or stands upon it. In this sense the adjectives "swamp" and "overflowed," taken together, qualify the noun "land" in but one particular, and express but one fact concerning it; that is, it is too wet for cultivation. Hence a traverse of the allegations of the complaint that the land was "swamp and overflowed land" is sufficient, in alleging that the land is not too wet for cultivation. Miller v. Tobin (U. S.) 18 Fed. 609, 614.

"Swamp lands," as used in Act Cong. Sept. 20, 1850, granting swamp and overflowed lands to the states, as distinguished from "overflowed lands," may be considered to be such as require drainage to fit them for cultivation. San Francisco Sav. Union v. Irwin (U. S.) 28 Fed. 708, 712.

The "swamp and overflowed lands" granted to the state of Iowa by Act Cong. 1850, mean lands which by reason of swamp or overflow become unfit for cultivation. Merrill v. Tobin (U. S.) 30 Fed. 738-739.

"Swamp and overflowed lands," within Act Cong. March 7, 1857, confirming to the several states the swamp and overflowed lands, are lands on which, after the subsidence of the waters, grain or other staple crops cannot be raised. Keeran v. Allen, 33 Cal. 542, 546.

Land which is not susceptible of cultivation in grain or other staple products, by reason of overflow, is "swamp and overflowed land," within the meaning of Act Cong. Sept. 28, 1850, relating to the granting of swamp and overflowed lands; and the fact that a crop of grass may spring up after the overflow subsides does not prevent it from being swamp and overflowed. Keeran v. Griffith, 31 Cal. 461, 462, 466.

"Swamp and overflowed lands" are lands rendered unfit for successful cultivation by reason of the overflow. If lands by reason of the overflow were generally rendered unfit for the successful cultivation of the staple crops, they are swamp and overflowed lands, within the meaning of the act. The fact that staple productions, such as potatoes, corn, barley, or buckwheat, may be cultivated and raised on the land, is not all that is required; but such productions, or some of them, must be usually cultivated successfully. Thompson v. Thornton, 50 Cal. 142, 144.

"Swamp and overflowed lands," as used in an act of Congress granting to the state of California swamp and overflowed lands made thereby unfit for cultivation, includes only such legal subdivisions according to the congressional system of surveys the greater part of which was swamp and overflowed lands, and unless a tract constitutes the greater part of the legal subdivision according to such systems of surveys they do not come within the provisions of the statute. Hogaboom v. Ehrhardt, 58 Cal. 231, 233.

As overflowed annually.

It is not necessary that land should be overflowed annually to make it "swamp lands," under the act of Congress donating swamp and overflowed land to Arkansas and other states. Keller v. Brickey (Ill.) 3 Cent. Law J. 457.

Periodically overflowed land.

"Swamp and overflowed land," as used in Act Cong. July 23, 1866, § 4 (14 Stat. 219), which provides that in all cases where township surveys have been or shall hereafter be made under authority of the United States, and the plats thereof approved, it shall be the duty of the Commissioner of the General Land Office to certify over to the state of California as swamp and overflowed land represented as such on such approved plats, etc., does not include land subject to periodical overflow, so as to include within the meaning of the section above referred to lands which are described in the plats as land subject to periodical overflow. Heath v. Wallace, 11 Pac. 842, 846, 71 Cal. 50.

SWAMP LAND ASSESSMENT.

A "swamp land assessment" is a charge imposed on property by authority of the Legislature, and hence is a liability created by statute, the enforcement of which is barred by the lapse of three years, under Code Civ. Proc. § 338, subd. 1. People v. Hulbert, 12 Pac. 43, 71 Cal. 72.

SWEAR—SWORN.

See "Duly Sworn."

The word "sworn" legally means "sworn to." Commonwealth v. Bennett, 89 Mass. (7 Allen) 533, 534.

"Swear," as used in an indictment for perjury, charging that the defendant did depose and swear, is not equivalent to an allegation that, being duly sworn, he did depose and say. "Swear" does not imply that defendant was duly sworn, for he may swear without being duly sworn. In one case the oath, so to speak, is self-imposed, and the swearer incurs no legal liability thereby; while in the other the oath is administered by a person having authority so to do, and the affiant takes it subject to the pains and penalties for perjury. United States v. McConaughy (U. S.) 83 Fed. 168, 169.

An indictment for perjury which charged that, defendant being lawfully required by the magistrate to make out in fact a written statement of his circumstances and being then and there duly sworn, "he did then and there swear in and by such written statement," meant that he made a written statement under oath, and the indictment was not insufficient, as not charging the making of a false oath. Commonwealth v. Carel, 105 Mass. 582, 585.

The words "or swear" may be rejected as surplusage, where the rest of the affirmation is correct. State v. Shreve, 4 N. J. Law (1 Southard) 297.

A charge that another "will swear, lie, cheat, or steal" may import that he lies, swears, cheats, and steals; and, if used in the latter sense, it is to be determined by the jury whether the language is actionable. Dottarier v. Bushey, 16 Pa. (4 Harris) 204, 209.

The term "swear" includes every mode authorized by law for administering an oath. Laws N. Y. 1892, c. 677, § 14.

When applied to public officers, who are required by the Constitution to take the oaths therein prescribed, the word "sworn" shall refer to those oaths; and, when applied to any other officer, it shall, unless otherwise expressly provided, mean sworn to the faithful performance of his official duties. Rev. Laws Mass. 1902, p. 89, c. 8, § 5, subd. 22.

The word "sworn," when applied to public officials required by the Constitution to take the oaths therein prescribed, shall refer to those oaths; when applied to other officers, it shall mean sworn to the faithful discharge of the duties of their offices before a justice of the peace or other person authorized to administer oaths in such cases. Pub. St. N. H. 1901, p. 64, c. 2, §§ 24, 25.

The word "sworn," when applied to public officers required by the Constitution to take certain oaths, shall refer to those oaths; when applied to other officers, it shall mean to the faithful discharge of the duties of their offices before a person authorized to administer oaths. V. S. 1894, 14.

The words "sworn," "duly sworn," or "sworn according to law," used in a statute, record, or certificate of administration of an oath, refer to the oath required by the Constitution or laws in the cases specified, and include every necessary subscription to such oath. Rev. St. Me. 1883, p. 59, c. 1, § 6, subd. 20.

Affirm or affirmed.

By statute in many states it is provided that the words "swear" or "sworn" shall include the words "affirm" or "affirmed." Code Miss. 1892, § 1516; V. S. 1894, 13; Gen. St. N. J. 1895, p. 3195, § 35; Rev. St. Tex. 1895, art. 3270; Ky. St. 1903, § 451; Rev. St. Wis. 1898, § 4971; Comp. Laws Mich. 1897, § 50, subd. 11; Sand. & H. Dig. Ark. 1893, § 7218; Code W. Va. 1899, p. 132, c. 13, § 11; Pub. St. R. I. 1882, p. 77, c. 24, § 10; Gen. St. Conn. 1902, § 1; Mills' Ann. St. Colo. 1891, § 4185, cl. 7; Gen. St. Minn. 1894, § 255, subd. 10; Gen. St. Minn. 1894, § 1511; Code Va. 1887, § 5; Hurd's Rev. St. Ill. 1901, p. 1720, c. 131, § 1, subd. 12; Horner's Rev. St. Ind. 1901, § 1285; Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 1176; Comp. Laws N. Laws Mass. 1902, p. 89, c. 8, § 5, subd. 22; Pub. St. N. H. 1901, p. 64, c. 2, §§ 24, 25; Code N. C. 1883, § 3765, subd. 5; Rev. St. Tex. 1895, art. 3270; Rev. St. Tex. 1895, art. 5064.

SWEARING.

See "False Swearing"; "Public Swearing."

Any words importing an imprecation of divine vengeance, or implying divine condemnation, are sufficient to constitute "swearing." The use of the word "damned" is profanity, without being used in connection with the name of the Deity. State v. Wiley, 24 South. 194, 76 Miss. 282, 71 Am. St. Rep. 531 (citing Holcomb v. Cornish, 8 Conn. 375).

SWORN ACCORDING TO LAW.

Rev. St. c. 1, § 3, provides that "whenever the expression 'duly sworn,' or 'sworn according to law,' is used or applied to any officer who is required to take and subscribe the oath prescribed in the Constitution, it shall be construed to mean that such officer has taken and subscribed the same, as well as the oath faithfully and impartially to perform the duties of the office to which he has been elected and appointed, and when applied to any person other than such officer it shall be construed to mean that such person has taken an oath faithfully and impartially to perform the duties assigned to him in the case specified." In the case of an assessor, where the records of the town recite that he was duly sworn, it is not necessary that the oath administered should have been set out in full; but such record is sufficient to show that he had taken the oath which qualified him to act. Bennett v. Treat, 41 Me. 226, 227.

The words "sworn," "duly sworn," or "sworn according to law," used in a statute, record, or certificate of administration of an oath, refer to the oath required by the Constitution or laws in the cases specified, and include every necessary subscription to such oath. Rev. St. Me. 1883, p. 59, c. 1, § 6, subd. 20.

SWORN COMPLAINT.

"Sworn complaint," as used in Rev. St. c. 27, § 40, requiring a sworn complaint for the search and seizure of intoxicating liquors, includes a complaint made on affirmation by one conscientiously scrupulous of taking an oath. State v. Welch, 8 Atl. 348, 349, 79 Me. 99.

SWORN FALSELY.

The words, "she swore a false oath, and I can prove it," spoken concerning a person, do not import a false swearing in a court of justice, so as to constitute the crime of perjury; and hence they are not actionable per se. Packer v. Spangler (Pa.) 2 Bin. 60.

The words, "he swore a false oath, and I can prove it," as addressed to a person, do not import perjury, or that the swearing was in some judicial proceeding. They might have been spoken in relation to some private and extrajudicial transaction. Hence the words are not actionable as slander, where they were not spoken in a conversation concerning a particular judicial procedure. Martin v. Melton, 7 Ky. (4 Bibb) 99.

The words "sworn falsely," as used in Insolvent Act, § 49, which provides that no discharge shall be granted if the debtor shall have sworn falsely in relation to any material fact concerning his estate or debts, necessarily import a willful act done with a fraudulent intent, from which the element of fraud cannot be eliminated. A mistake in his verified schedule of liabilities, which is made in good faith, does not constitute such false swearing. De Martin v. De Martin, 24 Pac. 596, 85 Cal. 76.

To charge one with having "sworn falsely" does not of itself import a charge of perjury, and to render such words actionable it must be averred that they were spoken in reference to a judicial oath and to have been meant as a charge of perjury. Barger v. Barger, 18 Pa. (6 Harris) 489, 492.

The words "he has sworn falsely" are held not to be actionable per se, inasmuch as they alone do not necessarily include the idea of willful intention. "They may mean," says the court, "perfidiously, or merely not truly." "Swearing to that which is false," says Chancellor Kent, "does not imply that the party has in judgment of law perjured himself. It may mean that he has sworn to a falsehood, without being conscious at the time that it was false." Schmidt v. Witherick, 29 Minn. 156, 157, 12 N. W. 448.

SWORN TO A LIE.

The words "swore a lie," contained in an alleged libel, do not of themselves impute a charge of perjury, and hence are not actionable per se. Knight v. Sharp, 24 Ark. 603, 608.

A statement that a person "swore false and swore to a lie" does not imply that the person spoken of was guilty of perjury, and is not actionable. Sheely v. Biggs, 2 Har. & J. (Md.) 363, 364, 3 Am. Dec. 552.

The words "sworn to a lie," as used in an allegation that a person has sworn to a lie, are not actionable; for they do not necessarily imply that the party has in judgment of law perjured himself. They may mean that he has sworn to a falsehood, without being conscious at the time that it was a falsehood. It does not imply that it was sworn to before any court or competent officer. It may mean extrajudicial swearing. Hopkins v. Beedle (N. Y.) 1 Caines, 347, 348, 2 Am. Dec. 191.

SWEET CORDIAL

A sweet cordial is a plain spirit, flavored by an essential oil or other aromatic substance, and sweetened by some saccharine matter. United States v. Three Hundred Casks of Juniper Cordial (U. S.) 28 Fed. Cas. 141.

SWELLS.

"Swells," as used in a contract for the sale of canned corn containing the clause "usual guaranty against swells," primarily refers to cans whose ends are forced outward by the gases engendered by fermentation, and it includes all cans whose contents are sour. Sleeper v. Word (U. S.) 60 Fed. 888, 889, 9 O. C. A. 289.

SWINDLE—SWINDLING.

"Swindling" is defined to be cheating and defrauding with deliberate artifice. Wyatt v. Ayres (Ala.) 2 Port. 157, 161.

Pen. Code 1895, art. 790, defines "swindling" to be the acquisition of any personal or movable property, money, or instrument in writing conveying or securing a valuable right by means of some false or deceitful pretense or device, or fraudulent representation, with intent to appropriate the same to the use of the party so acquiring, or of destroying or impairing the rights of the party justly entitled to the same. May v. State, 15 Tex. App. 430, 436; Blum v. State, 20 Tex. App. 578, 591, 54 Am. Rep. 530; Cline v. State, 43 Tex. 494, 497. See, also, Pen. Code Tex. 1895, art. 943.

A fraudulent sale of goods, for the purpose of preventing them from being attached by the creditors, by the vendor, is a fraud in law, which in an action of slander will justify the application of the epithets "cheating" and "swindling." Odiorne v. Bacon, 60 Mass. (6 Cush.) 185, 191.

As actionable per se.

"Swindled," as used in a statement that a certain person had swindled the county and a person, out of certain sums of money, cannot be construed to imply that the money was obtained under false pretenses, and is not actionable per se, for it did not charge an indictable offense. Well v. Altenhofen, 26 Wis. 708, 709.

The term "swindling" does not import a crime known to the law, and hence words charging one with being a swindler are not actionable per se. Chase v. Whitlock (N. Y.) 3 Hill, 139, 140.

The term "swindling" does not import a crime. Imprisonment on a charge of swindling, by making false representations as to the solvency of another, is false imprisonment; the conduct described as swindling not being a punishable offense, but only the ground of a civil action. Hall v. Rogers (Ind.) 2 Blackf. 429, 430.

In J'Anson v. Stuart, 1 Term R. 753, it is said to be formerly held that the word

"swindling" was in general use, and that the court could not say they were ignorant of it. In the same case, Ashhurst, J., held it to imply crimes for which the person might be indicted, and Buller, J., said it contained as libelous a charge as can well be imagined. In Berryman v. Wise, 4 Term R. 366, there was no question but the word was actionable when applied to an attorney in his official character; and in the argument of the present case, it seemed to be agreed that it was a word which had come into use since St. 30 Geo. II, c. 24, and was generally understood to imply a charge of the crimes, or some of them, mentioned in that statute. One of the principal offenses mentioned in that statute, and the one to which the term "swindling" seems to be most appropriately applied, is that of "knowingly and designedly, by false pretenses, obtaining from any person money, goods," etc., "with intent to cheat or defraud any person of the same." This offense is substantially and accurately the common-law offense of cheating, which is described in 1 Hawk. P. C. 343, to be "deceitful practices, in defrauding or endeavoring to defraud another of his known right, by means of some artful device, contrary to the plain rules of common honesty." To charge a man with swindling seems, therefore, to be substantially to charge him with an offense for which he may be liable to a prosecution at common law. Forrest v. Hanson (U. S.) 9 Fed. Cas. 456.

Theft distinguished.

"Swindling" may be committed in either of two ways under Pen. Code 1895, art. 790: First, where the unlawful acquisition is accomplished by the means named, and the intent is to appropriate the property so acquired to the use of the party so acquiring; and, second, where the unlawful acquisition is accomplished by the means named, with the intent of destroying or impairing the rights of the party justly entitled thereto. In the one case the intent of the party is to benefit himself; in the other, to injure the right of some one else. It is true that the two intents and the two modes of accomplishing the crime may combine and occur in the perpetration of a single act. That they should, however, is not necessary to the completeness of either of the two modes. It follows, then, that the crime may be committed without destroying or impairing the rights of the party justly entitled to the property, and the swindle may be perpetrated in fact upon one who is not even justly entitled to the property; and this is a distinction between swindling and theft. May v. State, 15 Tex. App. 430, 436.

As authorizing arrest.

"Swindling" has no legal or technical meaning, and commonly implies a recourse to petty and mean artifices for obtaining money, which may or may not be strictly illegal.

No offense against the laws is charged by the term, and a notification to a police officer to keep track of certain parties "swindling" commission merchants does not authorize the arrest of the persons. Cunningham v. Baker, 16 South. 68, 71, 104 Ala. 160, 53 Am. St. Rep. 27.

As requiring intent to appropriate.

One of the essential elements of the crime of "swindling," as defined by Pen. Code 1895, art. 790, and the most important, is the intent with which the property is acquired. It must be with the intent to appropriate the same to the use of the party so acquiring it. Without an allegation to that effect an indictment for swindling does not charge the offense. Stringer v. State, 13 Tex. App. 520, 522.

As requiring actual deception.

In order to constitute "swindling," there must be an intent to defraud, an actual act of fraud committed, false pretenses, and the fraud must be committed or accomplished by means of the false pretenses made use of for the purpose; that is, they must be the cause which induced the owner to part with his property. An essential element of the offense of swindling is that the party injured must have relied upon, believed as true, and been deceived by the fraudulent representations or devices of the party accused. Prosecutor was applied to by defendant for a loan of $5; the latter stating that he would give prosecutor a check on a certain bank to cover the $5 and a previous loan. Prosecutor told defendant that he did not believe he had a cent in the bank, but that he would give defendant $5 to catch him, and, if defendant had no money in the bank, he would prosecute him. Defendant had no money in the bank. Held not to constitute swindling, since the false pretense was not the inducement for the loan. Thorpe v. State, 50 S. W. 383, 40 Tex. Cr. R. 346.

As requiring false representation.

In order to constitute a swindle, there must be a representation of a past or present condition of things knowingly made by the party engaged in the swindling operation, which was false, calculated to deceive, and doing so in fact, and in reliance upon which property which is the subject-matter of the swindle is parted with. Where defendant was given $5 to get changed, to take out the sum of 80 cents due her, and offered 20 cents back, claiming that only a $1 bill had been given her, she was not guilty of swindling; there being no false representation. De Young v. State (Tex.) 41 S. W. 598.

SWINDLER.

The word "swindler" means no more than "cheat." Therefore, to charge one with being a swindler, or with swindling, is not actionable. Stevenson v. Hayden, 2 Mass. 406, 408.

A swindler is one who obtains money or goods under false pretenses. Well v. Altenhofen, 26 Wis. 708, 711.

To charge a man with being a swindler or a cheat does not impute a crime, and is not slanderous. Pollock v. Hastings, 88 Ind. 248, 250.

The word "swindler" is an exotic, which came from Germany, and has but recently become naturalized in our language. In Todd's Johnson "swindler" is defined to be a sharper, or a cheat; and "to swindle" is to cheat, to impose upon the credulity of mankind, and thereby to defraud the unwary by false pretenses. Webster defines "swindler" as a cheat, a rogue, one who defrauds grossly, or one who makes a practice of defrauding others by imposition or deliberate artifice. In Tomlins' Law Dictionary (edition of 1836) the word is defined as a cheat, or one who lives by cheating. Swindling is not a crime known to our law. To call one a swindler is about equivalent to saying he is a cheat, which has never been held actionable. Either of these charges may, under certain circumstances, imply that the accused is guilty of the crime of obtaining goods by false pretenses. But they do not necessarily mean so much. There are many ways in which a man may wrong another, in such a manner as to earn the title of "swindler" or "cheat," without subjecting himself to an indictment for a criminal offense. This question has been considered as settled ever since the decision in Savile v. Jardine, 2 H. Bl. 531. It was there held that the words charging the plaintiff with being a swindler were not actionable. Eyre, C. J., said: "The word is only equivalent to 'cheat.' It cannot be carried further, and that is not actionable." He added: "Thief always implies felony, but cheat not always." Buller, J., said: "Swindler means no more than cheat. When a man is said to be swindled, it means tricked or outwitted." That case was followed by the Supreme Court of Massachusetts in Stevenson v. Hayden, 2 Mass. 406. Chase v. Whitlock (N. Y.) 3 Hill, 139, 140.

The words "swindler," "swindling," etc., have been very lately adopted into the English language, and are as yet of indefinite meaning, and do not with certainty import an indictable offense. These terms were imported into this country from England, and into that from Germany. In their passage hither, when first used in the English language, and before they became naturalized here, they obtained a meaning, and what that meaning was we learn from the report of the case of Savile v. Jardine, by which it appears that the word "swindle" means no more than "cheat." "Cheat" has always been held not to be actionable, and "swindler" means no more. Stevenson v. Hayden, 2 Mass. 406, 408.

The word "swindler," as applied to a person, does not charge a crime, so as to be actionable per se in slander. Odiorne v. Bacon, 60 Mass. (6 Cush.) 185, 191.

The term "swindling," or "swindler," does not charge an infraction of the criminal law, so as to be actionable per se in slander. Pollock v. Hastings, 88 Ind. 248, 250.

SWINE.

"Swine" is the original generic term for "hog" or "shoat." State v. Godet, 29 N. C. 210, 211.

Pen. Code 1895, art. 679, makes it an offense to kill, etc., any horse, mule, cattle, swine, or other domesticated animal, etc. Held, that the term "swine" includes and is synonymous with the word "hog," and hence an information under the statute alleging the killing of a hog was sufficient as a description of the animal. Rivers v. State, 10 Tex. App. 177, 179.

"Swine," as used in St. 1805, c. 100, exempting from the liability of attachment one swine, includes a swine butchered, but not cut up. Gibson v. Jenney, 15 Mass. 205, 206.

SWIPE.

"Swipe" means to pluck, to snatch, to steal, or to steal by snatching; and hence, where a defendant admitted that he "swiped" a watch, he was not entitled to an instruction that "swiped" did not mean "stole." State v. Lee, 70 N. W. 594, 595, 101 Iowa, 389.

SWISS MUSLINS.

"Swiss muslins" are bleached cotton goods which are woven upon a loom. The warp, or threads which run longitudinally, extend from one end of the piece to the other, and the filling, or threads that extend from side to side, run from edge to edge through the width of the piece. In addition to the plain loom, there is an attachment which produces the spots, dots, or other figures which ornament the goods, and which are woven at the same time with the rest of the cloth. United States v. Albert (U. S.) 60 Fed. 1012, 1013, 9 C. C. A. 832.

SWITCH.

See "Flying Switch."

See, also, "Side Track"; "Siding."

In electrical appliances.

A "switch," as the term is used in speaking of an electrical switch, is any device by which one line may be electrically connected with another. The form in common use on switchboards in the telephone exchanges consists of a socket set in the switchboard containing the terminals of the two sides of the subscribers' circuit, and this is used by means of a plug which contains the terminals of the two wires that are attached to it in a cord. The insertion of the plug in the socket makes the electrical connection between the subscriber's line and the wires attached to the plug, and these wires usually lead to another similar plug, or to the telephone of the operator. Kinloch Telephone Co. v. Western Electric Co. (U. S.) 113 Fed. 659, 660, 51 C. C. A. 362.

An "electric switch," in general terms, is a device for opening and closing a single circuit in some regular and systematic manner. The switch which is in ordinary commercial use involves two stationary terminals connected to the opposite branches of a circuit, and a removable bridging piece inserted between such two terminals to complete the continuity of the circuit, or withdrawn therefrom to interrupt the circuit. Thomson-Houston Electric Co. v. Nassau El. R. Co. (U. S.) 107 Fed. 277, 278, 46 C. C. A. 263.

A "switch," as the term is used in railroading, is defined as a "device for moving a small section of track, so that rolling stock may be run or shunted from one line to another," and "in railroads, in its simplest form, two parallel lengths of rail, joined together by rods, pivoted at one end, and free to move at the other end, forming a part of the track at its junction with a branch or siding." Standard Dict., Cent. Dict. As used in Railroad Law, § 7, subd. 3, authorizing a railroad to take lands for the construction of switches, etc., the term does not include a parallel line of track, to be used as another main line, parallel to the constructed road. Erie R. Co. v. Steward, 70 N. Y. Supp. 698, 700, 61 App. Div. 480.

A switch is but a mechanical contrivance or movable opening to pass the cars from one track to another. A power to construct side tracks implies a power to connect the side tracks with the main track by switches. Georgia R. & Banking Co. v. Maddox, 42 S. E. 315, 322, 116 Ga. 64 (citing Cleveland & P. R. Co. v. Speer, 56 Pa. [6 P. F. Smith] 325, 334, 94 Am. Dec. 84).

Freight yards containing 450 acres, operated as one yard, are not "turnouts" or "switches," as those terms are understood by railroad men in railway parlance. People v. New York Cent. & H. R. R. Co., 51 N. E. 312, 314, 156 N. Y. 570.

SWITCH ROAD.

In construing an act granting a right of way for a switch road, and reserving to the grantor "the right to make or cause to be made and built on his own lands such 'switch road' connection with the said line of switch, provided such connection shall in no manner obstruct or interfere with the use of said switch," the courts say that the words "connection" and "switch road" are used as synonymous terms. Palfrey v. Foster, 17 South. 425, 426, 47 La. Ann. 963.

SWITCH YARD.

The words "switch yard," as employed in connection with and descriptive of railway service, consists of side tracks upon either side of the main track, and adjacent to some principal station or depot grounds where cars are placed for deposit, and where arriving trains are separated and departing trains made up. It is the place where such switching is done as is essential to the proper placing of cars, either for deposit or for departure. Baltimore & O. S. W. Ry. Co. v. Little, 48 N. E. 862, 863, 149 Ind. 167.

SWITCHING.

The test of distinction between transportation service, relatively to loaded freight cars, for which a railway company can lawfully charge tonnage rates and switching or transfer service, for which it is restricted to a fixed charge per car, is not whether the movement of the cars involves the use of a portion of the company's main line, or that of another; for there may be a transportation service over one or more spur tracks of the same company, if the contract of freightment requires no movement over other tracks or lines of railway, whereas a switching or transfer service is one which precedes or follows a transportation service, and applies only to a shipment on which legal freight charges have already been earned or are to be earned. Dixon v. Central of Georgia Ry. Co., 35 S. E. 369, 372, 110 Ga. 173.

SWIVEL

A "swivel" is defined by Ainsworth in his Dictionary as something used in or on another body so as to turn round in or upon it. Denise v. Swett, 22 N. Y. Supp. 950, 953, 68 Hun. 188.

SYCOPHANT.

The word "sycophant" comes from the Greek words meaning "fig informer," but it would scarcely be contended to-day that a man could not properly be called a sycophant unless he had dealings in figs. In short, words by use are sometimes degraded, sometimes ennobled; sometimes narrowed in meaning, sometimes broadened. People v. Cogswell, 113 Cal. 129, 137, 45 Pac. 270, 271, 35 L. R. A. 269.

SYLLABUS.

The "syllabus" is never made up of findings of fact, but is limited to points of law determined. Sometimes the findings of fact are referred to for the purpose of explaining the point of law adjudicated, and only for such purpose. The opinion, and not the syllabus, shows the findings of fact necessary to the adjudication, for the information of the circuit court; and this court only makes the more important points of law a part of the syllabus, for the general information of the legal profession and public, and not for the government of the circuit court in the further progress of the case. The opinion furnishes it the rule for its further action. If it be doubtful, and the syllabus does not clear away the doubt, he is justified in independent action; otherwise, it must be obeyed. Koonce v. Doolittle, 37 S. E. 644, 645, 48 W. Va. 592.

SYMBOLICAL DELIVERY.

"Symbolical delivery" is a substitute for actual delivery, when the latter is impracticable, and leaves the real delivery to be made afterwards. As between the parties, the whole title passes by such delivery, when that is their intention; but when the transaction is a mere pledge, placing the title at the control of the pledgee for the mere purpose of securing the debt without actually transferring the title, no title passes, for the reason that that is not what the parties intended. Winslow v. Fletcher, 4 Atl. 250, 255, 53 Conn. 390, 55 Am. Rep. 122.

A stock of goods in a store is "symbolically delivered" by giving to the purchaser the key of the door of the house in which they are kept or stored. Miller v. Lacey (Del.) 30 Atl. 640, 641, 7 Houst. 8.

SYMPATHETIC STRIKE.

The term "sympathetic strike" is otherwise known in this country as a boycott. Booth v. Brown (U. S.) 62 Fed. 794, 795.

SYMPATHY.

In a statute disqualifying any person who had manifested his adherence or sympathy with those engaged in carrying on the Rebellion was not used in its most general sense, but as meaning something more than feeling, and must be understood to import some conduct of a treasonable nature. State ex rel. Wingate v. Woodson, 41 Mo. 227, 234.

SYMPHONY.

A "syphony" is a work of an operatic character, intended or designed to be interpreted by musical instruments alone. It cannot be considered a dramatic work, or a dramatic composition, within the meaning of the copyright law. Daly v. Palmer (U. S.) 6 Fed. Cas. 1132, 1135 (cited and approved The Mikado Case [U. S.] 25 Fed. 183).

8 Wds. & P.—4

SYNDIC.

At common law in England an agent appointed by a corporation for the purpose of obtaining letters of guardianship and the like was called a syndic, to whom such letters were issued. Minnesota Loan & Trust Co. v. Beebe, 41 N. W. 232, 233, 40 Minn. 7, 2 L. R. A. 418.

The word "syndic" in the civil law corresponds very nearly with that of assignee under the common law. Mobile & O. R. Co. v. Whitney, 39 Ala. 468, 471.

SYNOD.

A "synod" is a "convention of bishops and elders within a district including at least three presbyteries. The synod have a supervisory power over presbyteries, but, unlike presbyteries, are not essential to the existence of the general assembly; the only connection between the general assembly and the synod being that the former has a supervisory power over the latter." Commonwealth v. Green (Pa.) 4 Whart. 531, 560.

The word "synod" signifies simply a meeting of the few adjoining presbyteries. A synod is in no sense an ecumenical council, which is a council of all, and not of a part. Groesbeeck v. Dunscomb (N. Y.) 41 How. Prac. 302, 344.

SYNONYMOUS.

The word "synonymous" means conveying the same or approximately the same meaning. Hoffine v. Ewing, 84 N. W. 93, 95, 60 Neb. 729.

"Synonymous words" are words expressing the same thing, conveying the same or approximately the same idea. Fritz v. Williams (Miss.) 16 South. 359, 360 (citing Webst. Dict.)

SYNOPSIS.

"Synopsis" means to cut short, diminish, reduce; a brief or partial statement, less than the whole; an epitome. Barker v. Barker, 22 Pac. 1000, 1001, 43 Kan. 91.

SYRINGE.

A syringe is a kind of pump, so that the application of the principles and appliances already used in pumps to a syringe does not constitute prior invention. Tagliabue v. Sondermann (U. S.) 67 Fed. 551, 552.

SYRUP.

"Syrup" is defined by Webster as "a thick and viscid liquid, made from the juice of fruits, herbs, etc., boiled with sugar." The Standard Dictionary defines the term generally as "a thick, sweet liquid," and specifically as "a saturated solution of sugar and water, often combined with some medicinal substance, or flavored, as with the juice of fruits, for use in confections, cookery, or the preparation of beverages," and adds: "Syrups are commonly named from their source of flavoring." The word "syrup" is necessarily qualified by that of the substance, or one or more of the substances, which distinguish it to the taste, or in its medicinal property. The words "Syrup of Figs" or "Fig Syrup," being descriptive, cannot be sustained as a valid trade-mark or trade-name, as applied to a syrup, one of the characteristic ingredients of which is the juice of the fig. California Fig Syrup Co. v. Stearns (U. S.) 67 Fed. 1008, 1011.

The Century Dictionary describes "syrup" to be "a solution of sugar in water, made according to an official formula, whether simple, flavored, or medicated with some special therapeutic or compound." It is defined by Webster as "a thick and viscid liquid, made from the juice of fruits, herbs, etc., boiled with sugar." The Standard Dictionary defines syrup generally "as a thick, sweet liquid," and specifically as "a saturated solution of sugar in water, often combined with some medicinal substance, or flavored, as with the juice of fruits, for use in confections, cookery, or the preparation of beverages." This authority further states that "syrups are commonly named from their source of flavoring." California Fig Syrup Co. v. Frederick Stearns & Co. (U. S.) 73 Fed. 812, 815, 20 C. C. A. 22, 33 L. R. A. 56.

SYSTEM.

Of common schools.

"System," as used in Const. art. 9, § 4, which provides that the Legislature shall establish a uniform system of public free schools throughout the state, means an organized plan, an institution, something established for the use and benefit of the people, so long as the want of public education will continue. Peay v. Talbot, 39 Tex. 335, 346.

"The word 'system' is defined by the Encyclopædic Dictionary as a plan or scheme according to which things are connected or combined into a whole; an assemblage of facts or of principles and conclusions, scientifically arranged or disposed according to certain mutual relations, so as to form a complete whole, as a system of philosophy, a system of government," etc. It is so used in Const. art. 8, § 1, authorizing the General Assembly to provide for the organization of the common schools, and directing that body to devise a system of common schools. State v. Ogan, 63 N. E. 227, 228, 159 Ind. 119.

Of electric lighting.

Where a municipal ordinance provided that a system of electric conductors and poles provided with street lamps be built in the streets of a village, located upon such streets as hereinafter specified, the use of the word "system" implies that the wires are connected with the power house. Ewart v. Village of Western Springs, 54 N. E. 478, 481, 180 Ill. 318.

Of government.

Const. § 171, declares that in any county that shall have adopted a system of government by the chairman of the several township boards, the question of continuing the same may be submitted to the electors of such county at a general election in such a manner as may be provided by law, and, if a majority of all the votes cast on such question shall be against such system of government, then such system shall cease, and the affairs of said county shall be transacted by the board of county commissioners, as is now provided by the laws of the territory of Dakota. Held, that the words "system of government," as used in such section, were synonymous with the words "fiscal concerns and affairs," as used in the preceding sections 170 and 171, and as so used meant the transaction of all the business of the county and the performance of such duties as by law has been placed on county commissioners. Martin v. Tyler, 60 N. W. 392, 396, 4 N. D. 278, 25 L. R. A. 838.

"System," as used in Const. art. 4, § 21, authorizing the Legislature to establish a uniform system of municipal governments, means plan, arrangement, method—simply rules and regulations for the organization and government of municipal corporation. Ex parte Wells, 21 Fla. 280, 305; McConihe v. McMurray, 17 Fla. 238, 269; Town of Enterprise v. State, 10 South. 740, 746, 29 Fla. 128.

Const. art. 11, § 4, which directs that the Legislature shall establish a "system of county and town governments," which shall be as nearly uniform as practicable throughout the state, refers to town organizations, which in their general features are like those of other states where the town government had been established when the Constitution was adopted. Ex parte Wall, 48 Cal. 279, 318, 17 Am. Rep. 425.

"System," as used in Const. art. 4, § 23, declaring that the Legislature shall establish but one system of town and county government, which shall be as nearly uniform as possible, is not synonymous with "plan," in the sense to mean a mere mode in which powers conferred upon counties are distributed among the various offices established by law for county government, without relation to the number of persons composing county boards, etc., but means that the number of persons composing county boards, etc., shall be the same in each county. State v. Riordan, 24 Wis. 484, 488.

Of numbering.

The fact that a single block has been subdivided into lots does not constitute a system of numbering. Davis v. Pacific Imp. Co., 70 Pac. 15, 16, 137 Cal. 245.

The provision in the act of 1840 regulating proceedings in civil suits, declaring that the adoption of the common law shall not be so construed as to adopt the common-law system of pleading, but the proceedings in all civil suits, shall, as heretofore, be conducted by petition and answer, the clause "petition and answer" is used in opposition to the common-law system of pleading, not to signify the stages of pleading to which these words give name, but to designate the system to which they belong. These words, then, were not intended as a restriction or limitation of the pleadings to the answer, but as the designation of a system of pleadings, and used not to denote a prescribed formulary, but as indicative of their intention to retain the then existing system, in opposition to the common-law and chancery systems of pleading in England. Underwood v. Parrott, 2 Tex. 168, 179.

See "Billiard Table"; "Gambling Table."

TACIT.

"Tacit" is said of that which, although not expressed, is understood from the nature of the thing, or from the provision of the law. Civ. Code La. 1900, art. 3556, subd. 30.

TACIT ACCEPTANCE.

Acceptance is tacit, when some act is done by the heir which necessarily supposes his intention to accept, and which he would have no right to do but in his quality of heir. Civ. Code La. 1900, art. 988.

TACIT HYPOTHECATION.

The term "tacit hypothecation" is often applied to a maritime lien, which is not, strictly speaking, a Roman hypothecation, though it resembles it. It somewhat resembles what is called a "privilege" in that law; that is, a right of priority or satisfaction growing out of the proceeds of a thing in a concurrence of creditors. The Nestor (U. S.) 18 Fed. Cas. 9, 13.

TACIT MORTGAGE.

The law alone in certain cases gives to the creditor a mortgage on the property of his debtor, without it being requisite that the parties should stipulate it. This is called "legal mortgage." It is called "tacit mortgage," because it is established by the law without the aid of any agreement. Civ. Code La. 1900, art. 3311.

TACKING.

The entire scope of the doctrine of "tacking" is not to determine whether the occupant of the land has been in possession thereof for any fixed period of time, but is to determine whether the claimant out of possession has in fact or in law been in possession within the statutory period, so as to entitle him to maintain his action. In other words, it is merely a uniform rule adopted by the court to determine whether the claimant, out of possession when his action was commenced, has been in possession at any time within the 20-year period. If no privity has been found to exist between the successive disseisors, and the last occupant has not held adversely for the full statutory period, the bar is not complete, as the law presumes that the land returns to the true owner at each change of possession, when there is no privity between the several occupants. When, however, there is privity of possession, and it has continued for the full statutory period, the bar is complete, for the very plain reason that the claimant out of possession has not in that event been in possession within the statutory period. J. B. Streeter, Jr., Co. v. Fredrickson, 91 N. W. 692, 694, 11 N. D. 300.

"Tacking it on as a rider" is a legislative phrase, designating the practice of putting a measure of doubtful strength on its own merits into the general appropriation bill, in order to compel members to vote for it, or bring the wheels of government to a stop. Commonwealth v. Gregg, 29 Atl. 297, 161 Pa. 582.

TACKLE.

See "Ship's Tackle, Apparel, and Furniture."

See "To Be Taken."

"Take," according to Webster's Dictionary, is used as the synonym of "require" or "be necessary." King v. Kent's Heirs, 29 Ala. 542, 555.

One of the definitions of the word "take," as defined by Webster, is to move or direct the course; to proceed; to go. State v. Johnson, 22 S. W. 463, 466, 115 Mo. 480.

To take an article signifies merely to lay hold of, grab, or seize it, with the hands or otherwise. Gettinger v. State, 14 N. W. 403, 404, 13 Neb. 308; State v. Chambers, 22 W. Va. 779, 790, 46 Am. Rep. 550.

The word "take" is broad enough to include "seize"; but that is not its ordinary sense, and it has no such technical meaning. Butts v. Woods, 16 Pac. 617, 620, 4 N. M. (Johns.) 187.

To "take" signifies to lay hold of, and, when applied to land, implies to gain or receive into possession; to seize; to deprive one of the possession; to assume ownership. Wulzen v. City and County of San Francisco, 35 Pac. 353, 356, 101 Cal. 15, 40 Am. St. Rep. 17.

The words "taking" and "converting" are not appropriate in speaking of real property. One may readily be understood when he says that an action may be sustained for "taking" personal property, or for "converting" it, or for "taking and converting" it; but the words would convey no legal idea when applied to real estate. There is a broad sense in which the word "detaining" might be applied to real estate, of which the expression "forcible entry and detainer" is an illustration. The words "taking, injuring, detaining, and converting," all used in the same sentence in an action, providing that an action for the taking, injuring, detaining, and converting of property must be brought within a certain time, apply to personal property only. Merritt v. Carpenter (N. Y.) 3 Abb. Dec. 285, 289.

Arrest synonymous.

"Take," as contained in a warrant issued by a Governor, authorizing the agent of another state to take and receive into custody a fugitive from justice, is synonymous with "arrest," and authorizes such arrest. Commonwealth v. Hall, 75 Mass (9 Gray) 262, 267, 69 Am. Dec. 285.

As change of possession.

"Taken," as used in the charter providing that the owner or occupier of any house, lot, or tenement where water shall be taken, shall each be liable for the payment of the price fixed by the board of public works for the use of water, means at the place where it is delivered for use, and not at the place where it is measured. In its usual signification the word "taken" implies a transfer of possession, dominion, or control. A thing is not taken unless such a change of status is effected. In trespass, trover, or replevin, the taking is not accomplished until the goods are within the power or control of the defendant. A devisee takes under a will only when the possession and control of the deviser has ceased. Where the city placed a meter for measuring water on a person's land, but after being so measured it flowed through the main and was delivered for use at other places than on such land, the water was not taken where the meter was located, but where it was delivered for use. Jersey City v. Morris Canal & Banking Co., 41 N. J. Law (12 Vroom) 66, 67.

Control and management implied.

"Takes a vessel on shares," as used in a statement that a master takes a vessel on shares, implies that he fully controls the management of the vessel for the time being. Marshall v. Boardman, 35 Atl. 1024, 1025, 89 Me. 87, 56 Am. St. Rep. 392.

Detention or delay.

Act Cong. July 8, 1886, authorizing the presentation of claims for "property taken and impressed into the service of the United States," construed not to mean the mere detention and delay of property; and hence the statute does not authorize damages therefor. United States v. Irwin, 8 Sup. Ct. 1033, 1035, 127 U. S. 125, 32 L. Ed. 99.

As eat or swallow.

The word "take," in a provision in an accident policy that its insurance does not cover injuries resulting from poison or anything accidentally taken, means to eat as food, to swallow. Maryland Casualty Co. v. Hudgins (Tex.) 76 S. W. 745, 747, 64 L. R. A. 349.

Felony imported.

"Taken," as used in an instruction in a prosecution for larceny in which the court stated that the only testimony in the case touching the time when the watch was taken was that tending to show that it was taken near the door, and that of the defendant that he picked it up in front of a counter, does not imply an opinion of the judge that there had been a felonious taking. People v. Perry, 4 Pac. 572, 573, 65 Cal. 568.

The words "take," in a statement that another has taken things, does not, standing alone and by the mere force of the expression, import that he has fraudulently taken goods, and therefore is not per se slanderous. Harris v. Burley, 8 N. H. 256, 258; Brown v. Brown, 14 Me. (2 Shep.) 317, 318; Hinesley v. Sheets, 48 N. E. 802, 803, 18 Ind. App. 612, 63 Am. St. Rep. 356.

The word "take," in a charge that another has taken tea, etc., does not necessarily import a crime, and therefore an allegation in a slander suit that defendant charged the plaintiff with having stolen tea, etc., is not supported by proof that defendant only charged the plaintiff with having taken it. Coleman v. Playsted (N. Y.) 36 Barb. 26, 28.

The use of the word "take," in connection with the other language in a charge that another person did take defendant's straw to feed the cattle of the former, etc., were construed to imply a taking in a secret and blamable manner, and to convey an imputation of theft, which would render the language slanderous. McKennon v. Greer (Pa.) 2 Watts, 352, 353.

The word "take," in a charge that "you did take it," does not of itself import a felony, and is not actionable per se; but, if spoken and understood to refer to a recent stealing of bank notes, it is slanderous. McGowan v. Manifee, 23 Ky. (7 T. B. Mon.) 314, 18 Am. Dec. 178.

The words "take and steal," in a complaint charging that the defendant did feloniously take and steal certain articles, was construed to be sufficient designation of the crime of larceny, though the words "steal, take, and carry away" are the proper technical words to be used. Green v. Commonwealth, 111 Mass. 417, 418.

Force and violence implied.

Under a statute making it a felony to take and carry away a negro by force and violence, an indictment charging that defendant did take and carry away is insufficient, as such words do not of themselves imply force and violence. Hamilton v. Commonwealth (Pa.) 3 Pen. & W. 142, 146.

Promise to pay imported.

"Take," as used in a subscription to take so many shares of corporation stock, is but an agreement "to receive the shares and get them into the subscriber's possession, which could only be effected by paying for them. One who agrees to take a thing which is the subject of price or compensation ex vi termini agrees to pay for such thing the price attached, or whatever it is worth." Sagory v. Dubois (N. Y.) 8 Sandf. Ch. 466, 493.

As receive.

As used in St. Geo. IV, c. 95, § 30, enacting that, if any collector of tolls shall demand and take a greater or less toll from any person than he shall be authorized to do by virtue of the powers of any act, he shall be liable to a penalty, the word "take" denotes no more than "receive," without any notion of force or compulsion. Stamp v. Sweetland, 8 Q. B. 13, 21.

The word "take" has very many shades of meaning. The precise meaning which it is to bear in any case depends upon the subject in respect to which it is used. In Gen. St. §§ 3003, 3005, providing that a pawnbroker shall not take more than 25 per cent. per annum for loans on chattels, means that the pawnbroker, in order to be liable to the penalty, must take the unlawful interest in such a manner that he gets it into his possession. He must take it in the sense of receiving it. The pawnbroker must have parted with it. "To take" means, in its general sense, to get into one's possession or power; to acquire; to obtain; to procure. Hallenbeck v. Getz, 28 Atl. 519, 520, 63 Conn. 385.

"Taken," as used in a verdict finding the defendant guilty of larceny, and stating that "we find the value of the ore taken to be" a certain amount, must be understood to have been used in its ordinary English significance, and clearly refers to the ore stolen. Bergdahl v. People, 61 Pac. 228, 231, 27 Colo. 302.

The word "take," as used in St. 22 & 23 Car. II, c. 25, giving to a justice of the peace jurisdiction over offenders who "steal, take, or kill fish," means stealing; and an indictment for taking and killing fish which does not allege that the same belonged to another is insufficient. Rex v. Mallinson, 2 Burrows, 679, 682.

To constitute probable cause for a prosecution for theft, it is not sufficient that such circumstances existed as would cause such suspicion and belief that the party prosecuted had taken the articles alleged to be stolen; the "taking" of an article not being necessarily synonymous with the stealing of it. Stone v. Stevens, 12 Conn. 219, 229, 30 Am. Dec. 611.

As take by descent.

"Take," as used in Civ. Code, § 671, providing that any person, whether citizen or alien, may take, hold, or dispose of property within the state, is broad enough to include the taking by descent, as well as by purchase, and is used to indicate the taking or acquisition of property in either of the modes mentioned. There is no reason for confining the meaning of "take" to acquisition by purchase. Billings v. Hauver, 4 Pac. 639, 640, 65 Cal. 593.

As take by process in invitum.

"Taken," as used in Rev. St. p. 136, § 1, providing that the estate to which it relates should not be liable to be attached or in any way "taken" for the debts of the husband, means taken in invitum. A taking of property by mechanic's lien is not a taking within the meaning of the statute; for a mechanic's lien essentially resembles a mortgage, rather than an attachment, which is not a process in invitum. Briggs v. Titus, 13 R. I. 136, 138.

As wrongful taking.

Rev. St. § 5469 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3692], which provides for the punishment of any person who shall "take the mail or any letter or packet therefrom or from any postoffice," etc., "with or without the consent of the person having the custody thereof" and open, embezzle, or destroy any such mail, means a wrongful and unlawful taking; hence, a taking of mail by virtue of the authority of the rightful owner and a subsequent embezzlement of the contents would not constitute an offense against the United States under this section. The taking, to constitute an offense under this act, must be with a criminal intent. In re Burkhardt (U. S.) 33 Fed. 25, 27.

TAKE CARE.

"Take care," within the meaning of an instruction, in an action by a servant against his master for personal injuries, that the employer must take care that the machinery is safe and suitable, involves the idea of an act of duty imposed, the failure to perform which, when an injury occurs, is such negligence as raises a liability for the damages resulting. Such an instruction is not erroneous. Guthrie v. Louisville & N. R. Co., 79 Tenn. (11 Lea) 372, 379, 47 Am. Rep. 286.

TAKE CARE OF.Debts.

In an agreement whereby a party agrees to take care of indebtedness existing on the property, the use of the words "take care" does not import an obligation to pay off and discharge the liens, but to take care of them. McBride v. Wakefield, 78 N. W. 713, 714, 58 Neb. 442.

The phrase "take care of matured paper," as applied to matured negotiable paper, means to take up by a payment or renewal, or to secure an extension of the time of payment. Yale v. Watson, 55 N. W. 957, 958, 54 Minn. 173.

Person.

"Take care of," as used in an undertaking whereby one agrees to support and take care of another, is to be construed according to the various circumstances of the party, and does not necessarily imply that the person to be supported is not to use any exertions to support himself. Bull v. McCrea, 47 Ky. (8 B. Mon.) 422, 425.

In St. 1808, p. 382, authorizing the county court to appoint some person a conservator to "take care of and oversee" idiots and their estate, the words "to oversee" authorize the conservator to superintend, and the expression "to take care of" makes it his duty to assume the requisite charge in order to the preservation and profit of the estate. Treat v. Peck, 5 Conn. 280, 284.

The words "to take care of," in a will bequeathing a mulatto girl to testator's daughter Betsy, and providing, "I allow my daughter Mary to take care of my said daughter Betsy, and at her decease I allow my daughter Mary to have the said mulatto girl," etc., are equivalent to support and maintenance, as well as personal attention. All are included under the direction to take care of; for one cannot be said to be taken care of who is waited on with great care, but who is neither fed nor clothed, nor can one be taken care of, who is unable to feed herself or put on her clothes, by placing before her food and raiment. The direction in the will to take care of the complainant enjoins on the legatee both personal attention to and support of her. Cabeen v. Gordon (S. C.) 1 Hill, Eq. 51, 56.

TAKE CHARGE OF.

See "Charge."

TAKE EFFECT.

"Take effect," as used in the provision of a will as follows: "It is my wish, and I hereby so direct, that none of the legacies, bequests, and devises in any of the clauses of this, my will, shall be executed or take effect until," etc., is used synonymously with, and as an equivalent to, the word "executed." Jones v. Habersham, 2 Sup. Ct. 336, 339, 107 U. S. 174, 27 L. Ed. 401.

The term "take effect," in Const. art. 1, § 25, providing that no law shall be passed, the taking effect of which shall be made to depend on any authority, except as provided in the Constitution, is used synonymously with "be in force," or "go into operation." Malze v. State, 4 Ind. 342, 348.

TAKE EFFECT AT MY DEATH.

The words "take effect at my death," when used in an instrument attested as a deed, and in all respects in the form of a deed, are to be treated as merely designed to postpone the possession or enjoyment by the grantee until after the death of the grantor, and do not render the instrument a will. West v. Wright, 41 S. E. 602, 115 Ga. 277.

TAKE HIS OWN LIFE.

A life policy, exempting the company from liability if the insured "takes his own life," is limited to the deliberate act of the insured in ending his own existence, or committing any unlawful malicious act, the consequence of which is his own death. The insured must be of years of discretion and in his senses when committing such act, as "it would be unreasonable to interpret it as including death by accident or by mistake, though the direct or immediate act of the insured may have contributed to it." Knights of Golden Rule v. Ainsworth, 71 Ala. 436, 448, 46 Am. Rep. 332.

TAKE INTO CONSIDERATION.

A notice by town supervisors that they will meet at a certain time and place to "take into consideration" an application to lay out a highway is not a compliance with the statute which requires them to "give notice of the time and place at which they will meet to decide on an application." State v. Castle, 44 Wis. 670, 675. The notice did not mean that they would there "decide" on the petition, but that they would take it into consideration, or deliberate on it, which they might do without deciding anything. Babb v. Carver, 7 Wis. 124, 126.

TAKE MEASURES FOR.

A contract in which one of the parties agrees to "take measures for" the formation of a company with a certain capital to use certain patents and to deliver to the patentee a certain amount of the paid-up stock thereof cannot be construed to mean take effectual measures for the formation of a company, but only to make reasonable efforts for the formation thereof. Cooke v. Barr, 39 Conn. 296, 304.

TAKE ON BOARD.

The term "take on board," in Rev. St. § 4253, providing that if the master of any vessel at a foreign port shall take on board any greater number of passengers, etc., means a coming on board openly in the usual way, and "all passengers who do so, not clandestinely and without the master's consent, express or implied, are taken on board by him. It is not necessary that he should see them come, and he may, and usually does, commit that duty to his subordinates; but, as no one has a right to come on board without his consent, a passenger found there is presumed to have been taken on board by him, until the contrary is shown." United States v. Thomson (U. S.) 12 Fed. 245, 248.

Where, by a contract for the conveyance of goods from Liverpool to Australia, the goods were to be "taken on board" at the ship's expense, the term implied that whatever care was required to be taken to ship the goods safely and securely was understood and intended to be taken by and at the expense of the ship. Cooke v. Wilson, 1 C. B. (N. S.) 153, 163.

TAKE PROPER MEANS.

See "Proper Means."

TAKE REFUGE.

See "Refuge."

TAKE UP.

A "take up" is a device used on knitting machines for taking up or rolling the completed fabric. Holmes v. Plainville Mfg. Co. (U. S.) 9 Fed. 757, 758.

Animals.

"Take up," as used in a city ordinance that the city marshal shall "take up any cow or cattle running at large," means to pen or confine, and hence vests the marshal with complete authority to inclose cows so taken in a pen or pound for violation of the ordinance. Jaquith v. Royce, 42 Iowa, 406, 411.

"Taking up" an animal, such as a horse, etc., in Texas, among stockmen, has a well defined meaning, and apprehends that the animal is running loose on the range. Willson's Cr. St. art. 680a, making it an offense to "take up" and use any horse, etc., without the consent of the owner, relates to animals running at large; so that one who takes a horse which is saddled and hitched to a tree, and uses it without the consent of the owner, cannot be prosecuted under such statute. Cochran v. State, 35 S. W. 968, 969, 36 Tex. Cr. R. 115.

Note.

"Take up," in an allegation in a pleading that plaintiffs, who were indorsers, were compelled to take up said note, means that, the note not being paid when due, in compliance with the contract of indorsement they paid the amount to the holder, and that he surrendered the note to them, and does not mean that the note was absolutely paid. Hartzell v. McClurg, 74 N. W. 626, 54 Neb. 316.

TAKEN.

"Taken," as used in Gen. St. c. 234, § 5, declaring that every person who shall be guilty of playing faro, etc., shall be taken and held to be a common gambler, does not mean that the offender is a common gambler, so as to require the offense to be thrice repeated, on the ground that a man cannot be a common offender until he has offended at least three times, but only means that he shall rank as a common gambler in point of criminality. State v. Melville, 11 R. I. 417, 418.

"Taken," though properly the past tense of the verb "take" should not always be regarded in its strict grammatical sense, but, as used in a stipulation that any and all testimony taken in another case involving the same questions could be used, should not be construed to mean that testimony only which was taken prior to the stipulation, but all the testimony taken in such case. Saffold v. Horne, 18 South. 433, 437, 72 Miss. 470.

An appeal is "taken" when notice of intention to appeal is served, or, in other words, whenever a legal condition is performed which terminates the running of the statute limiting the time for taking it. Saverrance v. Lockhart, 45 S. E. 83, 84, 66 S. C. 539.

As used in Acts 1885, p. 159, § 4, declaring that, if an appeal from the county court to the district court be not taken on the same day on which the judgment is rendered, a party appealing shall serve on the appellee within five days after the appeal is taken a notice in writing stating that such appeal has been taken, means the filing and approval of an appeal bond; and an appeal is not taken merely because one is prayed and allowed. Law v. Nelson, 24

Pac. 2, 14 Colo. 409; Straat v. Blanchard, 24 Pac. 561, 562, 14 Colo. 445.

As used in Rev. St. § 1008 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 715], providing that no judgment, decree, or order of a Circuit or District Court in any civil action at law or 'in equity should be reviewed in the Supreme Court on writ of error or appeal, unless the writ of error is brought or the appeal is taken within two years after the entry of such judgment, decree, or order, "taken" means when the appeal is in some way presented to the court which made the decree appealed from, thereby putting an end to its jurisdiction over the cause, and making it its duty to send it to the appellate court, which is done by filing the papers, viz., the petition and allowance of appeal (where there is such a petition and allowance), the appeal bond, and the citation. Credit Co. v. Arkansas Cent. R. Co., 9 Sup. Ct. 107, 128 U. S. 258, 32 L. Ed. 448.

Unlawful interest taken.

Rev. St. c. 35, § 4, providing that, when it shall appear that "unlawful interest has been taken or reserved," it shall be lawful for the debtor to become a witness, etc., refers to a usurious contract for the loan of money, whereby there has been reserved or taken a greater rate of interest than is allowed by law at the inception of the contract, and not to the payment of unlawful and usurious interest on a lawful contract. Brickett v. Minot, 48 Mass. (7 Metc.) 291, 294.

TAKEN AS ORDERED.

The phrase "to be taken as ordered," in a contract to furnish paper at a certain price, to be taken as ordered, amounted to an undertaking on the part of the buyer to take at the price named the quantity specified. Excelsior Wrapper Co. v. Messinger, 93 N. W. 459, 461, 116 Wis. 549.

TAKEN AS TRUE.

"Taken as true," as used in an instruction that what defendant has testified to against his interest is to be taken as true, is saying no more than that they are presumed to be true, or are conclusive, for the purposes of the case in hand. State v. Brooks, 12 S. W. 633, 634, 99 Mo. 137.

TAKEN IN THE ACT.

As used in Pen. Code, art. 567, providing that homicide is justifiable when committed by the husband on the person of any one taken in the act of adultery with the wife, provided the killing take place before the parties to the act of adultery have separated, does not mean that the husband must discover or see the wife and the adulterer in the very act of adulterous intercourse in order to fulfill the term "taken in the act of adultery," as such positive proofs of the commission of the crime are not required and are rarely attainable; and, as the crime of adultery itself may be established and proven by circumstantial evidence, the law does not hold the husband to a greater or higher degree of proof than required to establish the fact of adultery, and the law always estimates a man's right to act on reasonable appearances, and where the acts of the parties, and their words, coupled with their acts, presented appearances of a character such as would have created the reasonable apprehension and conviction in a person of ordinary mind that the parties taken were in the act of adultery, and the circumstances were such that any reasonable and sensible man would have concluded that they were in an act of adultery, or were about to commit or just had committed the act, it would be sufficient to justify the homicide. The adultery referred to in the statute does not mean the adultery which is defined as a specific offense by the Code, but means ecclesiastical adultery, or adultery as it is known in common parlance—that is, a violation of the marriage bed—no matter whether the adultery consist of but one or more acts, or whether the parties lived in habitual carnal intercourse or not. Price v. State, 18 Tex. App. 474, 480, 51 Am. Rep. 322.

TAKEN OUT OF THE STATE.

An agreement in the sale of a negro that he should be "taken out of the state" meant that he should be domiciliated out of the state, and the words were not satisfied by merely taking the slave out with the intention of bringing him back, or with the knowledge that he would be returned. Nowell v. O'Hara (S. C.) 1 Hill, 150, 152.

TAKEN TOGETHER.

As used in Rev. Codes, § 3900, providing that in construction of several contracts relating to the same matters, between the same parties, and made as parts of substantially one transaction, they are to be "taken together," this phrase does not mean that they are to be joined, and thereby to become a single contract, but they are to be taken together for the purpose of interpreting, either the transaction to which they relate, or the several contracts themselves. First Nat. Bank v. Flath, 86 N. W. 867, 870, 10 N. D. 281.

TAKING (In Abduction).

2 Rev. St. p. 664, § 12, providing that any person who shall take away any female under the age of 14 years without the consent of her father, mother, or guardian, for the purpose of concubinage or marriage, shall be punished, etc., means some positive act by which the female is taken away from her home, or from the person having the legal charge of her, sufficient to amount to an abduction. People v. Parshall (N. Y.) 6 Parker, Cr. R. 129, 132.

"Taking," as used in a statute prohibiting abduction and providing that any person who shall be guilty of taking away any unmarried female for improper or indecent purposes, without the consent of and against the wishes of her parent or guardian, shall be guilty, etc., does not mean necessarily a taking by force or against the will of the female abducted, but the statute was satisfied and the offense complete if the taking was accomplished by improper solicitations and inducements. People v. Marshall, 59 Cal. 386, 388. It may be accomplished by persuasion, enticement, or device. State v. Jamison, 35 N. W. 712, 713, 88 Minn. 21.

A girl under the age of 16 was persuaded by the prisoner to leave her father's house and proceed to an appointed place, on the understanding that he would meet her there and take her with him to America. This she accordingly did, was joined by the prisoner, and proceeded with him to London, where he was apprehended. Held, that this was a "taking" out of the possession of the father, within St. 9 Geo. IV, c. 31, § 20, providing that any person who shall unlawfully take or cause to be taken any unmarried girl under the age of 16 years out of the possession and against the will of her father or mother shall be guilty of a misdemeanor. Reg. v. Manktelow, 20 Eng. Law & Eq. 601, 602.

Where defendant went to the house of B., and placed a ladder against the window, and held it for B.'s daughter to descend, which she did and then eloped with defendant, it was a "taking from the possession" of her father, within the meaning of St. 9 Geo. IV, c. 31, § 20, relating to the taking of girls under 16 years of age, though the girl herself proposed to defendant that he should bring the ladder and that she would elope with him. Reg. v. Robins, 1 Car. & K. 456, 457.

Under a statute providing that the "taking away" of any female under the age of 18 years from her father for the purpose of concubinage shall be a felony, that the female was induced to leave home, and the furnishing of money to defray her expenses, and the direction of her course in different trips, which she made at the defendant's solicitations, constituted a taking away within the meaning of the statute. State v. Johnson, 22 S. W. 463, 466, 115 Mo. 480.

TAKING (In Eminent Domain).

The word "taking," in the constitutional provision relative to the taking of private property for public use, applies only to an active taking, and is to be construed in its natural significance. West Branch & S. Canal Co. v. Mulliner, 68 Pa. (18 P. F. Smith) 357, 360.

Constitutions which provide that private property shall not be taken for public use without just compensation are but declaratory of the common law, and contemplate the physical taking of property only. Less v. City of Butte, 72 Pac. 140, 141, 28 Mont. 27, 61 L. R. A. 601, 98 Am. St. Rep. 545.

"Taken," as used in Const. art. 1, § 17, providing that no person's property shall be taken or damaged for public use without adequate compensation, etc., is held to mean an actual taking in the physical sense of the word. This construction seems to be favored largely from the fact that anything other than an actual taking is fully provided for in another part of the section. Rische v. Texas Transp. Co., 66 S. W. 324, 327, 27 Tex. Civ. App. 33.

As used in the fifth amendment of the federal Constitution, declaring that private property shall not be taken for public use without just compensation, "taken" means "the appropriation by any method." People v. Daniels, 22 Pac. 159, 162, 6 Utah, 288, 5 L. R. A. 444.

The phrase "taking for public use" is defined to be the actual seizing or direct taking of specific property for public use. In re Dorrance St., 4 R. L. 230, 245.

A taking of property for a public use "means a taking altogether; an entire change of ownership." In re Opinion of Justices, 13 Fla. 699, 701.

By the "taking" of property, within the scope of the constitutional provision, is meant such an appropriation of it as deprives the owner of his title, or of a part of his title. Cushman v. Smith, 34 Me. 247, 265.

"Taking," as used in the Constitution, providing that "private property shall not be taken or damaged for public purposes without just and adequate compensation first being paid," means a physical, tangible appropriation of the property of another. Hurt v. City of Atlanta, 28 S. E. 65, 67, 100 Ga. 274.

Private property is "taken for public use" when it is appropriated to the common use of the public at large. Craighill v. Lambert, 18 Sup. Ct. 217, 218, 168 U. S. 611, 42 L. Ed. 599.

Under constitutions which provide that property shall not be "taken or damaged" without compensation, it is universally held that it is not necessary that there be any physical invasion of the individual's property for public use to entitle him to compensation. Less v. City of Butte, 72 Pac. 140, 141, 28 Mont. 27, 61 L. R. A. 601, 98 Am. St. Rep. 545 (citing Root v. Butte, A. & P. Ry. Co., 20 Mont. 354, 51 Pac. 155).

A statute authorizing the taking of private property for public use, which makes such provision for reasonable compensation as will be certain and adequate, though such compensation is not required to be paid before the taking of the property, fully satisfies the requirements of the Constitution of Massachusetts that no part of the property of any individual can with justice be taken from him without his own consent or that of the representative body of the people. Sweet v. Rechel, 16 Sup. Ct. 43, 45, 159 U. S. 380, 40 L. Ed. 188.

Property is "taken," within the provision of the Constitution prohibiting the taking of private property for public use without due compensation, when it passes from the possession and control of the owner, and not when the title ultimately passes to the corporation. Martin v. Tyler, 60 N. W. 392, 397, 4 N. D. 278, 25 L. R. A. 838 (citing Davis v. San Lorenzo R. Co., 47 Cal. 517, which overrules Fox v. Western Pac. R. Co., 31 Cal. 538).

The word "taken," as used in Bill of Rights, art. 1, declaring that no person's property shall be taken for a public use without adequate compensation being made, means a final transfer of title to property or its permanent subjection to an easement. A taking, in contemplation of the Constitution, can only be legally had or accomplished by paying the award or depositing the amount of damages and costs adjudged. Until that is done, the land being the land of the owner, any enhancement of its value is his, and of right should belong to him, just as he would also suffer any loss from a depreciation in value since the commencement of condemnation proceedings. Gulf, C. & S. F. Ry. Co. v. Lyons, 2 Willson, Civ. Cas. Ct. App. § 139.

Where there was no proceeding in condemnation instituted by government, no attempt in terms to take and appropriate the title, and no adjudication that the fee had passed from the landowner to the government, there was no taking of land within the meaning of the fifth amendment of the federal Constitution, requiring compensation on the taking of land for public use. United States v. Lynah, 23 Sup. Ct. 349, 356, 188 U. S. 445, 47 L. Ed. 539.

Acts done in the proper exercise of governmental powers, and not directly encroaching on private property, though their consequence may impair its use, are universally held not to be a taking within the meaning of the constitutional provision prohibiting the taking of private property for public use without just compensation. Such acts do not entitle the owner of such property to compensation from the state, or its agents, or give him any right of action. This is supported by an immense weight of authority. Those who are curious to find the decisions, will find them collected in Cooley, Const. Lim. p. 542, and notes. Northern Transp. Co. of Ohio v. City of Chicago, 99 U. S. 635, 644, 25 L. Ed. 336; Green v. State, 14 Pac. 610, 612, 73 Cal. 29; Holyoke Water Power Co. v. Connecticut River Co. (U. S.) 20 Fed. 71, 79.

"Taking," as used in the Constitution in the clause requiring compensation to be made for the taking of land for public use, means taking the property altogether, and not a consequential injury to it, which is no taking at all. In re Philadelphia & T. R. Co. (Pa.) 6 Whart. 25, 26, 38 Am. Dec. 202; Selden v. City of Jacksonville, 10 South. 457, 458, 28 Fla. 558, 14 L. R. A. 370, 29 Am. St. Rep. 278.

The proper construction of the word "taken," as used in Const. art. 1, § 21, enacting that no man's property shall be taken by law without just compensation, makes it synonymous with "seize, injure, destroy, or deprive of." It is evident that the Legislature had no power to authorize in any case either direct or consequential injury to private property without compensation to the owner. Evansville & C. R. Co. v. Dick, 9 Ind. 433, 436.

A taking or deprivation of property, which is prohibited by the Constitution, unless due compensation is made, includes anything that affects or limits the free use and enjoyment of one's property, or of the easements or appurtenances thereto. Myer v. Adam, 71 N. Y. Supp. 707, 710, 63 App. Div. 540.

"Taking," as used in the Constitution relating to the taking of private property for public use, is not limited to the absolute conversion of property and applied to land only, but includes cases where the value is destroyed by the action of the government, or serious injury is inflicted to the property itself, or exclusion of the owner from its enjoyment, or from any of the appurtenances thereto. Pearsall v. Eaton County Sup'rs, 42 N. W. 77, 74 Mich. 558, 4 L. R. A. 193.

"Taking," as used in Gen. St. 1878, c. 34, relating to the taking of land for railway purposes, should be construed in a comprehensive sense, and implies, not merely the appropriation of the particular strip of land denominated the "right of way," considered by itself and alone, but also the facts, circumstances, and direct effects accompanying or flowing from such appropriation. Wilmes v. Minneapolis & N. W. Ry. Co., 13 N. W. 39, 40, 29 Minn. 242.

Where a city did not actually take possession of property, but made a great public improvement in the vicinity, which incidentally produced injury, such act was not a "taking for public use," within the meaning of the Constitution requiring compensation therefor. Alexander v. City of Milwaukee, 16 Wis. 247, 253.

The impairment of the utility of a person's property by the direct invasion of the bounds of his private dominion is a taking of his property, in the sense of the Constitution, prohibiting the taking of private property without recompense, though the owner has not less of material things than he had before. Whether the farmer's fields be flooded, so that they cannot be cultivated, or the bleacher's stream polluted, so that his fabrics are stained, or one's dwelling filled with smells or noise, so that it cannot be occupied with comfort, is equally the taking away of one's property. Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Angel, 7 Atl. 432, 434, 41 N. J. Eq. (14 Stew.) 316 (cited in Bloom v. Koch, 50 Atl. 621, 626, 63 N. J. Eq. 10).

Property is "taken," within the constitutional meaning, where it is destroyed or materially impaired by rendering it impossible for the owner of it to enjoy it to the full extent that he is entitled to. Adams v. Chicago, B. & N. R. Co., 39 N. W. 629, 631, 39 Minn. 286, 1 L. R. A. 493, 12 Am. St. Rep. 644.

Under the old Constitution of Illinois, the words "taken for public use," in the provision requiring compensation for property so taken, meant any physical injury to private property by reason of the erection, construction, or operation of the public improvement, whereby the appropriate use or enjoyment of the property was materially interrupted. Rigney v. City of Chicago, 102 Ill. 64, 74.

A franchise is "taken," within the meaning of the Constitution, providing that private property shall not be taken for public use without just compensation, where the party to whom such franchise belonged is deprived of the power or means of exercising it; but it is not taken when its emoluments are diminished by an improvement which does not destroy or impair such power or means. Such a diminution is, of course, a damage, and may or may not constitute a valid cause of action, but does not bring the case within the constitutional prohibition. In re Hamilton Ave. (N. Y.) 14 Barb. 405, 411.

Same—Additional use of streets.

The authority to use a public highway for the purpose of a railroad, retaining the use of such highway for all ordinary purposes, subject only to the inconvenience of the railroad, is not such a "taking" of private property from the owner of the fee of the adjacent lands as is contemplated by the Constitution, prohibiting the taking of private property without compensation. The easement of the highway is in the public, although the fee is technically in the adjacent owner. It is the easement only which is appropriated, and no right or title of the owner interfered with. If the Legislature authorizes the company to take the highway and appropriate it to its own use, by destroying the ordinary and legal right of the public to use it as a highway, then compensation must be provided, because then the rights of the public in it cease, and the use of it reverts to the person who holds the fee in the land, and the Legislature authorizes to be taken something which belongs to the landowner, to wit, the use of the land. Morris & E. R. Co. v. City of Newark, 10 N. J. Eq. (2 Stockt.) 352, 358.

The building and operation of a street railroad is not a taking of private property for public use. Eichels v. Evansville St. Ry. Co., 78 Ind. 261, 269, 41 Am. Rep. 561; West Jersey R. Co. v. Cape May & S. L. R. Co., 34 N. J. Eq. (7 Stew.) 164, 166; Jersey City & B. R. Co. v. Jersey City & H. H. R. Co., 20 N. J. Eq. (5 O. E. Green) 61, 78; Hinchman v. Paterson Horse R. Co., 17 N. J. Salt Lake Rapid Transit Co.*, 33 Pac. 229, 9 Utah, 31, 24 L. R. A. 610; Randall v. Jacksonville St. R. Co., 19 Fla. 409, 428.

The use of a city street for a railroad is not a taking of private property without compensation, within the meaning of the Constitution. New Albany & S. R. Co. v. O'Dally, 12 Ind. 551, 552; Faust v. Passenger Ry. Co. (Pa.) 3 Phila. 164, 170; New Mexican R. Co. v. Hendricks, 30 Pac. 901, 6 N. M. 611; *Houston & T. O. R. Co. v. The erection of telephone poles along the streets of an incorporated city, town, or village, with the consent of the council thereof, is not such a "taking" of private property for public use as will authorize the abutting owner to enjoin the prosecution of such work until his damages are paid or secured. Maxwell v. Central District & Printing Telephone Co., 41 S. E. 125, 126, 51 W. Va. 121.

The construction of a viaduct to carry the street at a higher level, for the benefit of the public, is a street use, and not a taking of public property. Sauer v. City of New York, 83 N. Y. Supp. 27, 28, 40 Misc. Rep. 585.

Same—Easements of light, access, and support.

In the elevated railway cases in New York it has been determined that there is a "taking," within the meaning of the constitutional provision prohibiting the taking of private property without compensation, by the act of the railroad in obstructing the easements of light and air to an adjoining property owner, though no part of his land is actually taken in the construction of the road; such decisions being based on the theory that the owner has a kind of property in such easement. Bohm v. Metropolitan El. Ry. Co., 29 N. E. 802, 805, 129 N. Y. 576, 14 L. R. A. 344.

An injury to and a "taking" of private property are distinct things. Every taking in law is an injury of some kind, though every injury does not include a taking. Property is taken by an entry upon and occupation of it, as in the ordinary case of location. It is injured by obstructing access, as in Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Duncan, 5 Atl. 742, 111 Pa. 352, or drainage, as in Pennsylvania S. V. R. Co. v. Ziemer, 17 Atl. 187, 124 Pa. 560. Garrett v. Lake Roland El. Ry. Co., 29 Atl. 830, 832, 79 Md. 277, 24 L. R. A. 396 (citing Jones v. Erie & W. V. R. Co., 25 Atl. 134, 137, 151 Pa. 30, 17 L. R. A. 758, 31 Am. St. Rep. 722).

The word "taking," in the clause of the state Constitution forbidding the taking of property except for compensation, and in the charter of a railroad company, does not apply to its act in making a large excavation for the bed of its railroad in the land adjoining the plaintiffs, and so near his building and so deep as to weaken his foundation and render it unsafe to use, or the raising in the street opposite to and near the front of said building an embankment of much greater height than the street was, and thereby obstructing the passage to and from plaintiffs' building, darkening the windows, obstructing the air, and rendering the building unfit for occupation. Bradley v. New York & N. H. R. Co., 21 Conn. 294, 308.

There may be such a direct obstruction or injury to private property as would, within the spirit of the Constitution, prohibiting the taking of private property without just compensation, amount to a "taking," although the corpus of the property itself was not touched or disturbed, as, for example, where all access to the property is destroyed, or where a part of the street abutting on the property is taken, although the part actually appropriated is beyond the center line of the street. Rochette v. Chicago, M. & St. P. Ry. Co., 20 N. W. 140, 141, 32 Minn. 201.

Where the result of the order of railroad commissioners closing a highway was to leave a house and lot which adjoined the crossing without any mode of ingress or egress, except by the permission of the owner's neighbors, or by trespassing on the railroad location, the property of the owner of such house and lot was "taken" in the strictest sense. Cullen v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co., 33 Atl. 910, 912, 66 Conn. 211.

It has been uniformly held, since the Story Case, 90 N. Y. 122, 43 Am. Rep. 146, that a partial destruction of easements by an elevated railroad is a taking of property within the meaning of the Constitution. Sadler v. City of New York, 81 N. Y. Supp. 308, 315, 40 Misc. Rep. 78.

Same—Flowing land.

The constitutional provisions, where only the "taking" of private property is to be compensated, have frequently been held to include any direct physical obstruction or injury to the abutting premises, even if there be no actual appropriation of the land itself, as where by excavation or embankment water was caused to overflow the same; a kind or class of injuries for which, in the absence of constitutional and statutory enactment, a remedy existed at common law. City of Denver v. Bayer, 2 Pac. 6, 10, 7 Colo. 113 (citing Toledo W. & W. Ry. Co. v. Morrison, 71 Ill. 616; Hooker v. New Haven & N. R. Co., 14 Conn. 146, 36 Am. Dec. 477).

The flowing of land against the owner's consent and without compensation is a "taking" of his property in violation of that provision of the Constitution which prohibits the taking of property without compensation. Grand Rapids Booming Co. v. Jarvis, 30 Mich. 308, 321; Hooker v. New Haven & N. Co., 15 Conn. 312; Nevins v. City of Peoria, 41 Ill. 502, 510, 89 Am. Dec. 392; Pettigrew v. Village of Evansville, 25 Wis. 223, 231, 236, 3 Am. Rep. 50; Arimond v. Green Bay & M. Canal Co., 31 Wis. 316; Eaton v. Boston, C. & M. R. R., 51 N. H. 504, 535, 12 Am. Rep. 147; City of Cumberland v. Willison, 50 Md. 138, 33 Am. Rep. 304; Pumpelly v. Green Bay & M. Canal Co., 80 U. S. (13 Wall.) 166, 180, 20 L. Ed. 557; Jones v. United States, 4 N. W. 519, 48 Wis. 385; King v. United States (U. S.) 59 Fed. 9; Winn v. Village of Rutland, 52 Vt. 481; Miller v. City of Morristown, 47 N. J. Eq. (2 Dick.) 62, 20 Atl. 61; Id., 48 N. J. Eq. (3 Dick.) 645, 25 Atl. 20; Weaver v. Mississippi & R. R. Boom Co., 28 Minn. 534, 11 N. W. 114; Conniff v. City and County of San Francisco, 7 Pac. 41, 44, 67 Cal. 45. But, in order for such flooding to be a taking, it is necessary that there be an actual, physical invasion amounting to a practical ouster. High Bridge Lumber Co. v. United States, 69 Fed. 320, 326, 16 C. C. A. 460.

When real-estate is actually invaded by superinduced additions of water, earth, sand, or other material, or by having any artificial structure placed on it, so as to effectually destroy or impair its usefulness, it is a "taking," within the meaning of the Constitution, prohibiting the taking of property for public use without just compensation. City of Baltimore v. Merryman, 39 Atl. 98, 99, 86 Md. 584; Weaver v. Mississippi & R. R. Boom Co., 11 N. W. 114, 115, 28 Minn. 534; Memphis & C. R. Co. v. Birmingham, S. & T. R. R. Co., 11 South. 642, 643, 96 Ala. 571, 18 L. R. A. 166; Vanderlip v. City of Grand Rapids, 41 N. W. 677, 681, 73 Mich. 522, 3 L. R. A. 247, 16 Am. St. Rep. 597.

The injury to land by water flowing through the waste weirs of a canal over the land of the intervening landowners, and on plaintiff's land, is so equivalent to a taking within the meaning of constitutional provisions requiring compensation for land taken for public purposes, that plaintiff will be entitled to recover damages for such injuries; and the fact that the company acted as authorized and without negligence is no defense. Hooker v. New Haven & N. Co., 14 Conn. 146, 174, 36 Am. Dec. 477.

To maintain a boom, which, in the usual course of things, will have the effect of working more or less damage to a person's lands and the crops thereon growing, once or twice in the course of seven or eight years, is just as much a "taking" or appropriation of such person's property as it would be if the like effect occurred every year, or every two years, or during those months each year when the boom is in use. McKenzie v. Mississippi & R. R. Boom Co., 13 N. W. 123, 124, 29 Minn. 288.

Same—Grading streets.

The consequential injury occasioned by the grading of a street is not a "taking" of private property for public use, within the prohibition of the Constitution. Macy v. City of Indianapolis, 17 Ind. 267, 269; Weis v. City of Madison, 75 Ind. 241, 250, 39 Am. Rep. 135; Smith v. City of Eau Claire, 47 N. W. 830, 78 Wis. 457; Smith v. Village of White Plains, 22 N. Y. Supp. 450, 67 Hun. 81; Selden v. City of Jacksonville, 10 South. 457, 458, 28 Fla. 558, 14 L. R. A. 370, 29 Am. St. Rep. 278; Bradley v. New York & N. H. R. Co., 21 Conn. 294, 309.

Under the constitutional provision that private property shall not be taken for public use without just compensation, a city is liable for damages to abutting property occasioned by a change in the grade of a street. Moore v. City of Atlanta, 70 Ga. 611, 613; City of Elgin v. Eaton, 83 Ill. 535, 536, 25 Am. Rep. 412. Contra, see Dickerman v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co., 44 Atl. 228, 229, 72 Conn. 271; Garraux v. City Council of Greenville, 31 S. E. 597, 53 S. C. 575; Methodist Episcopal Church v. City of Wyandotte, 3 Pac. 527, 530, 31 Kan. 721.

Where an abutting owner is deprived of the practical use of his buildings by reason of a change of grade there is a taking of the property of the individual. In re Comesky, 81 N. Y. Supp. 1049, 1051, 83 App. Div. 137.

"Taken," as used in Bill of Rights, § 12, providing that private property shall not be taken without just compensation, means a trespass on or a physical invasion of the property. Property which is merely injured by consequential damages resulting from a change of grade of an adjacent street or other improvement thereof, not constituting a diversion of the street from street purposes, is not taken or appropriated. Selden v. City of Jacksonville, 10 South. 457, 458, 28 Fla. 558, 14 L. R. A. 370, 29 Am. St. Rep. 278.

Deprivation of possession.

A "taking" under the right of eminent domain means the exclusion of the owner from use and possession of the property taken, and the actual assumption of the possession by the party authorized to take, and there would naturally be some proceeding in its nature judicial for the finding of the damages thereby occasioned. Nolan v. City of New Britain, 38 Atl. 703, 707, 69 Conn. 668 (citing Woodruff v. Catlin, 54 Conn. 277, 297, 6 Atl. 849).

Land is not "taken" for a public use, within the meaning of a statutory provision requiring compensation to be paid for all land so taken, unless the land is taken into the actual possession of the state or the grantee of its power of eminent domain. Richardson v. Vermont Cent. R. Co., 25 Vt. 465, 474, 60 Am. Dec. 283.

When, and so far, as the owner of land is prevented from exercising practical dominion over and the right to use his land at his own free will and pleasure, it is "taken" from him. Where a person takes exclusive possession and occupation of land, by covering it with a solid wall of masonry many feet high, he takes it from the owner in the most thorough and effective manner, although the legal title remains in the owner. The legal title is not at all involved in an unlawful taking of land, but the question is rather of practical dominion over and the right to use it at the owner's free will and pleasure, so long as he does not injure his neighbor or the public. Traute v. White, 19 Atl. 196, 197, 46 N. J. Eq. (1 Dick.) 437.

Const. art. 1, § 14, declares that private property shall not be taken or damaged for public use without just compensation. Held, that the word "taken," as used in such section, meant the change of possession from the owner to the public, and that the property was taken, within such provision, when the possession passed from the control of the owner, and not when the title ultimately passed to the public or corporation entitled to exercise the right of eminent domain. Martin v. Tyler, 60 N. W. 392, 397, 4 N. D. 278, 25 L. R. A. 838.

The "taking" of property for public use means, in Act N. J. 1893, that taking in the large and more comprehensive sense, whereby the owner is deprived of the beneficial ownership and possession of his land, and such possession passes by the condemnation proceedings to the condemned party. Nicoll v. New York & N. J. Tel. Co., 40 Atl. 627, 628, 62 N. J. Law, 156.

As used in a mortgage excepting from its terms all that part of a lot already taken and graded, the word "taken" will not be construed as meaning only that fully taken by completed condemnation proceedings, but, in connection with the word "graded," will be held to mean such part as had been taken possession of and graded; and hence, where a part of the lot had been graded, but not fully taken by condemnation proceedings, it was excepted from the mortgage. Lawrence v. London & Northwest American Mortg. Co., 74 N. W. 892, 71 Minn. 535.

In Pumpelly v. Green Bay & M. Canal Co., 80 U. S. (18 Wall.) 166, 20 L. Ed. 557, it is said that a serious interruption to the common and necessary use of property may amount to a "taking," within the meaning of constitutional provisions. Memphis & C. R. Co. v. Birmingham, S. & T. R. R. Co., 11 South. 642, 643, 96 Ala. 571, 18 L. R. A. 166.

A statute imposing a penalty on any person who shall take, carry away, or remove any stones, gravel, or sand from any of the beaches in a certain town, passed for the purpose of protecting the harbor, and extending as well to the owners of the soil as to strangers, is not a "taking" of private property and appropriating it to public use, within the meaning of Declaration of Rights, art. 10, so as to render it unconstitutional and void, although no compensation is therein provided for the owners. Commonwealth v. Tewksbury, 52 Mass. (11 Metc.) 55, 56.

The destruction of the use of a private right of way across land adjoining the highway, by the location of a culvert and guard rails on such public highway, is a "taking" of private property for public uses. De Lauder v. Baltimore County Com'rs, 50 Atl. 427, 429, 94 Md. 1.

The term "taking," as used in a constitutional provision prohibiting the taking or damaging of private property for public use without compensation, does not include the legal vacation of city streets and alleys. City of East St. Louis v. O'Flynn, 10 N. E. 395, 396, 119 Ill. 200, 59 Am. Rep. 795.

Diminution of value.

A partial destruction or diminution of value is a "taking" of private property. Glover v. Powell, 10 N. J. Eq. (2 Stockt.) 211, 229; Rigney v. City of Chicago, 102 Ill. 64, 74.

The mere injury to the value of land occasioned by the placing of a railroad embankment so near it as to impair its market value is not a "taking" within the meaning of the statute. Richardson v. Vermont Cent. R. Co., 25 Vt. 465, 474, 60 Am. Dec. 283.

The word "take," as used in the Constitution relating to the taking of private property for public use, has been interpreted to mean a taking altogether, a seizure, a direct appropriation; and therefore property is not taken when it is merely depreciated in value, or incumbered, or incidentally injured. Sharpless v. City of Philadelphia, 21 Pa. (9 Harris) 147, 166, 59 Am. Dec. 759.

Easement.

A statute requiring a canal company, before ceasing work, to proceed along the line and procure releases for necessary lands and materials, which releases shall operate so as to vest in said state a full and complete right "to enter upon, use, and take" the same at any and all times, and authorizing the board, in consideration of any privileges granted by individuals to the state of right of way, to contract with said individuals on behalf of the state to erect across said canal any bridge or bridges for the benefit of such individuals and the public, indicates an easement, and not a fee simple absolute, and therefore the board has power to contract for an easement. Indianapolis Water Co. v. Kingan & Co., 58 N. E. 715, 718, 155 Ind. 476.

The act incorporating a canal company, and providing that, whenever lands, waters, and materials should not be attained by voluntary donation or fair purchase, it should be lawful for the corporation, by any of their officers, and each and every agent, superintendent, or engineer by them employed, to "enter upon, take possession of, and use" all such lands, real estate, and streams as might be necessary for the purpose of constructing and maintaining the canal and works connected therewith, does not confer a right to take the fee in land thus occupied, but that right is confined to use and occupation only, unless it be enlarged by the deed or gift of the owner. There was in the company but a possession and use, in other words, a right of way, and that for a single purpose, the construction and maintenance of a canal; and, when the canal was abandoned, the use and occupation of the land reverted to the owner of the land. Pittsburgh & L. E. R. Co. v. Bruce, 102 Pa. 23, 33.

Exclusive appropriation.

"Taken," as used in Const. Bill of Rights, art. 12, providing that no man's property shall be taken without compensation, does not necessarily mean an exclusive appropriation, a total assumption of possession, a complete ouster, or an absolute or total conversion of the entire property; but a physical interference with the land, which substantially abridges the right of the user, including the corresponding right of excluding others from the use, takes the owner's property to so great an extent as he is deprived of this right. Eaton v. Boston, C. & M. R. R., 51 N. H. 504, 512, 12 Am. Rep. 147.

The word "taken," in Const. art. 1, § 11, providing that the property of no person shall be taken for public use without just compensation therefor, in its application to the condemnation of land for railway use, means the exclusion of the owner from the use and possession, and the actual assumption of exclusive possession by the railroad corporation, at the termination and as the result of judicial proceeding. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. v. Long, 37 Atl. 1070, 1072, 69 Conn. 424 (citing Woodruff v. Catlin, 54 Conn. 277, 279, 6 Atl. 849, 854).

In relation to the right of eminent domain, it has been held necessary to the idea of a "taking" that there must be an exclusive appropriation; a physical, tangible appropriation of the property of another; a taking the property altogether. This is the doctrine announced in Hurt v. City of Atlanta, 100 Ga. 274, 28 S. E. 65, and some other cases. But the rule more frequently held, and we think the more enlightened rule; is that this limitation of the term "taking" to the actual physical appropriation of the corpus is too narrow a construction to meet the demands of justice, and that, from the very nature of the right of user and exclusion, it is evident that they cannot be materially abridged without necessarily taking the owner's property. So that an attempt by a private corporation to invade the right of an abutting owner in the street, by placing in the street in front of the lot permanent erections which will in any appreciable degree impair the owner's access to the lot, or otherwise interfere with the full enjoyment of the lot for all purposes to which it is adapted, or of the street itself, such an invasion is an attempted taking. Callen v. Columbus Edison Electric Light Co., 64 N. E. 141, 144, 66 Ohio St. 166, 58 L.

R. A. 782. See, also, In re Opinion of Justices, 13 Fla. 699, 701.

Where the construction of a railroad is authorized by competent authority, and there is no invasion of or physical interference with the property of an abutting owner, there is no "taking," within the meaning of the Constitution, forbidding the taking of property for public use without just compensation. Poole v. Falls Road Electric Ry. Co., 41 Atl. 1069, 1071, 88 Md. 533.

Filing of award in condemnation.

For the purpose of fixing the value of the property, land is to be deemed "taken" for a public use as of the date of the filing of the award by the commissioners in condemnation proceedings. City of Minneapolis v. Wilkin, 15 N. W. 668, 669, 30 Minn. 145.

Injury distinguished.

See "Injury to Property."

Occupation preliminary to condemnation.

The word "taking," within the meaning of Const. art. 1, § 21, declaring that private property shall not be taken for public use without just compensation, does not include a temporary exclusive occupation of the land of an individual as an incipient proceeding to the acquisition of a title to it, or an easement in or for a public use, although such occupation may be more or less injurious to the owner. Such temporary occupation, however, will become unlawful, unless the parties authorized to make it acquire within a reasonable time from its commencement a title to the land, or at least an easement in it. Nichols v. Somerset & K. R. Co., 43 Me. 356, 361; Cushman v. Smith, 34 Me. 247, 265.

The occupation of land by a corporation for its own purpose, pending proceedings for condemnation, is a "taking" of the property, within the meaning of the Constitution, prohibiting the taking of private property for public use without compensation. Callahan v. Dunn, 20 Pac. 737, 739, 78 Cal. 366 (citing Davis v. San Lorenzo R. Co., 47 Cal. 517, 523; San Mateo Waterworks v. Sharpstein, 50 Cal. 284; Sanborn v. Belden, 51 Cal. 266; Vilhac v. Stockton & I. R. Co., 53 Cal. 208).

The entering on land, and making the necessary surveys and examinations thereof, for the purpose of determining the most advantageous route, place, or places for a proper line, course, road, and way whereon to construct a single or double railroad or way is not in ordinary acceptance or legal contemplation the "taking of land," within the Constitution, requiring compensation to be made for the taking of land for public use; for there is no exercise of exclusive control or authority over the soil. A mere passing over for the purpose of examining and surveying the most feasible route for the road, and for the lands necessary to be taken on which to construct a road, cannot be said to be taking the land thus examined and surveyed; but when the examinations and surveys are completed, and the defendants in pursuance thereof have selected the lands intended for the objects of the incorporation, or when they enter into the possession of and use the lands thus selected in the construction of their road, regardless of and in defiance of the rights and possession of the owner in fee, then it may be said in common parlance and in legal sense that the defendants have taken the plaintiff's land. They are using it as their own, in exclusion of the plaintiff's right to use it. Although the legal fee may not be in them, yet they are exercising all the attributes of absolute ownership. They tear down houses and outhouses, they cut up gardens, meadows, fields, and farms, they reduce hills and fill up valleys, they tear down fences, cut up and use the soil, as best answers their purposes, and do every act in relation thereto which the absolute owner of the fee could do. The taking of land does not mean the taking of the fee of the land. Bloodgood v. Mohawk & H. R. R. Co. (N. Y.) 18 Wend. 9, 34, 31 Am. Dec. 313.

Police regulations.

A regulation adopted for public safety under the police power of the state is not a "taking" of private property without just compensation, although conformity to such regulations involves expense. Morris & E. R. Co. v. City of Orange, 43 Atl. 730, 732, 63 N. J. Law, 252 (citing Chicago & N. W. Ry. Co. v. City of Chicago, 140 Ill. 309, 29 N. E. 1109).

The term "taking," within the meaning of the federal Constitution, does not apply to an appropriate regulation of the use of property. Thus, in the absence of any contract rights, before municipal ordinances, prohibiting a railroad from using steam on a portion of the railroad track on a certain street is not a taking within the prohibition of the Constitution. Richmond, F. & P. R. Co. v. Richmond, 96 U. S. 521, 528, 24 L. Ed. 734.

Tiedeman's Limitation of Police Power, § 122, says: "Arbitrary interference, by government or by its authority, with the reasonable enjoyment of private lands, is a taking of private property without due process of law, which is inhibited by the Constitution." First Nat. Bank v. Sarilla, 28 N. E. 434, 437, 129 Ind. 201, 13 L. R. A. 481, 28 Am. St. Rep. 185.

The taking by the city of Boston, under St. 1872, c. 177, § 1, of "all the water of Sudbury river, * * * for the purpose of furnishing a supply of pure water for the city," above a dam erected by it or in process of erection, and the filing in the registry of deeds of a description of the stream taken, within 60 days from the time of such taking, as provided by St. 1846, c. 167, § 1, is not such a taking as will enable a riparian owner above the dam to claim damages against the city, in the absence of any actual injury to his water rights. Dwight Printing Co. v. City of Boston, 122 Mass. 583, 585.

The grant to a telephone company to place its poles in the highway does not constitute the taking of land within the statute. Nicoll v. New York & N. J. Tel. Co., 40 Atl. 627, 628, 62 N. J. Law, 156.

An order of a city council laying out a section of a stream as a sewer, followed by the construction of sewers, through which the water is afterwards discharged, is a "taking" of the waters of the stream, within St. 1867, c. 106, and St. 1871, c. 304, requiring that actions for damages shall be commenced within two years from the time of the taking of the water. Worcester Gaslight Co. v. County Com'rs, 138 Mass. 289, 291.

Same—Location of road.

"The taking and appropriation of land by a railway company means the location of a railway by survey. Though actual construction has not commenced for a long period of time thereafter, there is a 'taking and appropriation' at the time of the location by survey." Pittsburgh, V. & C. Ry. Co. v. Commonwealth, 101 Pa. 192, 196.

When a road is located, the land is not "taken," in the technical sense of that term. No authority is given any person or corporation to take land for a highway. The highway is located or laid out over the land directly by public authority. Wright v. Woodcock, 29 Atl. 953, 954, 86 Me. 113, 25 L. R. A. 499.

Land is not "taken," within the meaning of Pennsylvania Constitution, requiring that compensation shall be made for land taken for public use, by the mere location of a street on the plans of a city. Bush v. City of McKeesport, 30 Atl. 1023, 1024, 166 Pa. 57.

"Taking," as used in Rev. St. c. 39, § 60, providing that, if any railroad corporation shall by virtue of its charter have taken any lands or other property for the purpose of their railroad, the owner of any such land or other property may, at any time within three years from the time of taking the same, demand in writing of the treasurer or principal agent of the corporation a plan or description in writing of the land or other property so taken, means the filing of the location of the road as required by the statute, and not the making of the road; for, if the latter had been intended, no plan or description of the road would be necessary or usual. The commencement of making the road would be a sufficient notice of its location. Charlestown Branch R. Co. v. Middlesex County Com'rs, 48 Mass. (7 Metc.) 78, 83.

Seizure under attachment.

A seizure of property under attachment is not a "taking of property," in the sense of the rule of justice which forbids the taking of property, except according to the law of the land; but it is a divestiture of possession, one of the elements of a complete title. First Nat. Bank v. Swan, 23 Pac. 743, 745, 3 Wyo. 356.

Taking for fence.

There is a "taking" of private property, within the meaning of the Constitution, prohibiting the taking of private property for public purposes without compensation, where the Legislature proposes to exercise the right of eminent domain by making a public pasture on the lands of freeholders living within a proposed inclosure, and in order to accomplish that purpose authorizes the occupation of so much land as might be necessary to the building of the inclosure fence. Fort v. Goodwin, 15 S. E. 723, 726, 86 S. O. 445.

Taking for highway.

The "taking" of land under the right of eminent domain occurs when the land within the highway is condemned for that public use. Gilpin v. City of Ansonia, 35 Atl. 777, 778, 68 Conn. 72.

An appropriation of land for a street is a "taking," within the meaning of Const. art. 1, § 16, providing that no private property shall be taken or damaged for public or private use without just compensation having been first made or paid into court for the owner. Lewis v. City of Seattle, 32 Pac. 794, 798, 5 Wash. 741.

Taxation.

The phrase "taking for public use," in the constitutional provision prohibiting a taking of property for public use without just compensation, "is defined to be the actual seizing or direct taking of specific property for public use, as distinguished from incidental injury to it when not taken on the one hand, or the levying of taxes in the form of money or labor, or even of specific goods, on the other, for the public service. It is not the thing required, whether money or service, or a specific article of land or personalty, which constitutes the difference; but the manner of taking it." An assessment of benefits against property for public improvements is not a "taking," within the meaning of such provision. In re Dorrance St., 4 R. I. 230, 245.

The levying and collection of taxes is not the "taking" of private property for public use, within the meaning of Const. art. 1, § 6, providing that no private property shall be taken for public use without just compensation; but that provision applies to the taking of property under the exercise of the right of eminent domain. Howell v. City of Buffalo, 37 N. Y. 267, 270; In re Opinion of Justices, 13 Fla. 699, 701.

Using or enlarging irrigation ditch.

The using or enlarging of an irrigating ditch without the owner's consent is as much a "taking or damaging" of private property within the meaning of the Constitution, prohibiting the taking or damaging of private property for public use without compensation, as would be the appropriating the right of way therefor in the first instance. Tripp v. Overocker, 1 Pac. 695, 697, 7 Colo. 72.

Construction of wharf.

The building by the state, or its grantees, of wharves upon shores of navigable waters, does not constitute either a "taking or damaging of private property for public use," within the Constitution. Eisenbach v. Hatfield, 26 Pac. 539, 544, 2 Wash. St. 236, 12 L. R. A. 632.

TAKING (In Larceny).

See "Fraudulent Taking."

Asportation.

To take an article signifies merely to lay hold of, grab, or seize it, with the hands or otherwise. Thus, where the defendants laid hold of and with a sledge broke in pieces a cast iron balance wheel, animo furandi, there was a taking of it within the contemplation of the criminal law. Gettinger v. State, 14 N. W. 403, 404, 13 Neb. 308.

The term "taking," as used in the rule that in every larceny there must be an actual taking, means a felonious severance of the goods from the possession of the owner. To take an article signifies to lay hold of, or to grasp it, either with the hands or otherwise. The man who laid his hand upon the horse in the close, or grasped a package in the bed of a wagon, or seized the sack in the boot of the coach, or laid hold of the article fastened to the counter by the string, with intent to steal these several articles, was guilty of a felonious taking thereof, although neither of them were wholly removed from the places where they were respectively laid hold of, grasped, or seized. But this felonious taking does not constitute the offense of larceny, but the property so taken must also be carried away. State v. Chambers, 22 W. Va. 779, 790, 46 Am. Rep. 550.

"Taking," as the term is used in the law of larceny, under Pen. Code, art. 726, providing that, to constitute a taking, it is not necessary that the property be removed any distance from the place of taking, nor is it necessary that any time shall elapse between the taking and the discovery thereof, applies to the act of accused in unlocking a bureau drawer and taking only $6 of $51 contained therein, and renders him guilty of taking the entire amount, if he is caught with his hand in the drawer. Harris v. State, 14 S. W. 390, 391, 29 Tex. App. 101, 25 Am. St. Rep. 717. See, also, Hardman v. State, 12 Tex. App. 207.

At common law a carrying away, or asportation, was necessary, in connection with the fraudulent taking; but under the Code it is not necessary that the property be removed any distance from the place of taking, but it is sufficient that it has been in the possession of the thief, though it may not be moved out of the presence of the person deprived of it. Nor is it necessary that any definite length of time should elapse between the taking and the discovery thereof; but, if a moment elapses, the offense is complete. Madison v. State, 16 Tex. App. 435, 440.

A "taking," within the meaning of the rule that there must be a taking of property to constitute larceny, is shown by the fact of shooting a cow in the woods, and in taking possession and handling the carcass, so as to progress half way in skinning it, and leaving the carcass only when frightened by the bark of a dog and the approach of men. Lundy v. State, 60 Ga. 143.

"Taking and carrying away," as used in reference to a charge of larceny, does not mean that the property must be taken and carried away, in order to constitute larceny; but any removal, however slight, of an article which is not attached either to the soil, or any other thing not removed, is sufficient. Therefore, if a thief has the absolute control of the thing but for an instant, and he removes it ever so little space, the larceny is complete; and hence, if a person thrust his hand into the pocket of another with intent to steal, his pocketbook, and seizes such pocketbook and lifts it to the top of the pocket, and, on being detected, releases his grasp thereon and leaves the pocketbook hanging partly out of the pocket, such taking and removal was sufficient to constitute larceny. The guilt of the party does not depend on the length of the time he held absolute possession and control of the property, nor on the distance to which he may have removed the same, nor whether he released his grasp because he repented of his act, or was interrupted or prevented by any cause whatever from carrying the property away; for the crime was completed by the very first act of felonious removal of the pocketbook, and the severance of the property from the possession of the owner and the thief's control of it for an instant of time was sufficient.

State v. Chambers, 22 W. Va. 779, 797, 46 Am. Rep. 550.

Felonious taking.

"Taking," as the term is understood in the law of larceny, means a felonious taking; and thus the taking up of an animal as an estray, without an intention to steal it, is not such a taking, though the finder afterwards wrongfully appropriates the animal to his own use. Beatty v. State, 61 Miss. 18, 21.

"Taking," within the meaning of the term as used in the law of larceny, means wrongful taking. If the property comes into the possession of the person accused of theft by lawful means, his subsequent appropriation of it is not theft, as there is no felonious taking. Pitts v. State, 3 Tex. App. 210, 211.

"Taking," as used in 4 Stat. 107, § 22, making it criminal for any person to steal or take away from any mail or post office a letter, etc., means "a clandestine taking, not a taking through mistake or with an innocent intent. It must be a taking with a criminal intent." United States v. Pearce (U. S.) 27 Fed. Cas. 480, 481 (citing United States v. Marsells [U. S.] 28 Fed. Cas. 1168; In re Burkhardt [U. S.] 33 Fed. 27).

"Taking," as used in defining larceny, means "a taking without a consent of the owner and with the intention to deprive him of his property. Such taking need not necessarily be by force, or without the knowledge of the owner; but where the owner's consent is obtained to a surrender of possession for some temporary and legitimate purpose, and the taker intends to permanently deprive the owner of his property and convert the same to his own use, the consent is a nullity, out of which no legal possession nor right of possession against the owner can arise, and is a taking and carrying away within the meaning of the definition." State v. Woodruff, 27 Pac. 842, 47 Kan. 151, 27 Am. St. Rep. 285.

"Taking," as the term is used in the law of larceny, means a taking without right and with an intention of converting the property to a use other than that of the owner and without his consent. State v. Campbell, 18 S. W. 1109, 108 Mo. 611.

The taking necessary to constitute larceny means a fraudulent and secret taking, so as not only to deprive the owner of his property, but also to leave him without knowledge of the taker. State v. Ledford, 67 N. C. 60, 62.

"Taking," within the meaning of the term as used in the law of larceny, means a taking against the will of the owner. Dodge v. Brittain, 19 Tenn. (Meigs) 84, 86; Hite v. State, 17 Tenn. (9 Yerg.) 198, 205. Therefore there is no larceny if the thing alleged to have been stolen be sent by the owner for the purpose of entrapping the taker. Dodd v. Hamilton, 4 N. C. 471, 473.

"Taking," within the meaning of the term as used in the law of larceny, is a taking in such a manner as to constitute a trespass, and therefore, to constitute the larceny of a slave, it must appear that the accused obtained possession of the slave without the consent of the owner. Kemp v. State, 30 Tenn. (11 Humph.) 320, 321.

"Taking," within the rule that there must be a taking of property to constitute a theft, even though it is provided by statute that asportation of the property is not essential to complete the crime, means a fraudulent taking. Lott v. State, 20 Tex. App. 230, 231; Madison v. State, 16 Tex. App. 435, 440. See, also, Tanner v. Commonwealth (Va.) 14 Grat. 635, 640.

"Taking," within the meaning of the term as used in the law of larceny, is shown by the act of a passenger on a railway train in throwing from a car a bale of cotton belonging to another with intent to convert the same. Price v. State, 41 Tex. 215, 216.

Possession by accused.

To constitute a taking, the property must in some manner come into the possession of the party accused of the theft, either actually or constructively. Minter v. State, 9 S. W. 561, 28 Tex. App. 217.

Possession by owner.

A taking of property, such as to constitute larceny, must be from the actual or constructive possession of the owner. Hite v. State, 17 Tenn. (9 Yerg.) 198, 205; People v. McDonald, 43 N. Y. 61, 63.

The term "taking," within the meaning of the rule that there must be a taking to constitute the crime of larceny, means a taking involving a trespass; and to constitute such a trespass the subject-matter must at the time of the taking be in the possession of the persons rightfully entitled thereto. Morehead v. State, 28 Tenn. (9 Humph.) 635, 636.

The term "taking," in the law of larceny, necessarily imports that the property taken is in the possession of another; but in this connection it is necessary to discriminate between what constitutes in law a possession of property and what amounts only to its care and charge. Thus a servant has charge of the property of his master, but not the possession thereof, and if he appropriates the property it is a taking from the possession of the master and larceny. People v. Call (N. Y.) 1 Denio, 120, 123, 43 Am. Dec. 655.

Take under claim of ownership.

The term "taking," within the meaning of the rule that there must be a taking to constitute larceny, includes the act of a person claiming ownership and possession of an animal owned by another and selling it to a third person. State v. Hunt, 45 Iowa, 673, 675.

"Taking," within the meaning of the rule that there must be a taking of property in order to constitute larceny, is not shown by the fact that defendant falsely claimed an animal which was running on the range as his property, and sold it to a third person. Hardeman v. State, 12 Tex. App. 207; Madison v. State, 16 Tex. App. 435, 440.

The term "taking," as used in the law of larceny in Texas, which by statute has provided that asportation of the stolen goods is not a necessary element of the crime of theft, includes the act of defendant in pointing out certain animals on the range and falsely claiming that he owns them, and selling them to the witness. Doss v. State, 2 S. W. 814, 21 Tex. App. 506, 57 Am. Rep. 618.

"Taking," within the meaning of the term as used in the law of larceny, imports a trespass in connection therewith. One who states to a pound keeper that a certain animal in the pound is his, and sells it to the pound keeper, is not guilty of such a taking, though the pound keeper removes the animal from the pound in reliance on such a purchase, and therefore the seller cannot be convicted of larceny. People v. Gillis, 21 Pac. 404, 405, 6 Utah, 84.

Taking by third person.

"Taking," within the meaning of the law of larceny, is not necessarily a taking by the hands of the thief himself; but it is sufficient if the thief procured an innocent person to take the property for him. Cummins v. Commonwealth, 5 Ky. Law Rep. 176.

There is a taking of property, within the meaning of the law of larceny, when the property is taken by a third person upon defendant's advice and procurement, and delivered it to the defendant. Sanderson v. Commonwealth (Ky.) 12 S. W. 136.

Trespass imported.

"Taking," within the meaning of the term as used in the law of larceny, imports a taking in the nature of a trespass. State v. Braden, 2 Tenn. (2 Overt.) 68; Lawrence v. State, 20 Tenn. (1 Humph.) 228, 234, 34 Am. Dec. 644; Hite v. State, 17 Tenn. (9 Yerg.) 198, 205; Robinson v. State, 41 Tenn. (1 Cold.) 120, 121, 78 Am. Dec. 487; Morehead v. State, 28 Tenn. (9 Humph.) 635, 636; Porter v. State (Tenn.) Mart. & Y. 226; Kemp v. State, 30 Tenn. (11 Humph.) 320, 321; People v. Gillis, 21 Pac. 404, 405, 6 Utah, 84; People v. McDonald, 43 N. Y. 61, 63; State v. Friend, 50 N. W. 692, 693, 47 Minn. 449.

The term "taking," in the law of larceny, imports a trespass, and there is no such a taking when a bailee converts the particular article bailed; but where a trunk is left in possession of a bailee, and the latter opens it and extracts money therefrom, there is a taking which renders him guilty of larceny. Robinson v. State, 41 Tenn. (1 Cold.) 120, 121, 78 Am. Dec. 487.

Same—Lost property.

The act of the finder of bank notes in converting them to his own use with the full knowledge of who is the owner thereof does not constitute a taking, as there is no trespass in obtaining possession of the notes. Porter v. State (Tenn.) Mart. & Y. 226.

Taking possession of lost property is not such a taking, though it is with felonious intent; but taking a package from a place where it has been inadvertently left by the owner constitutes such a taking. Lawrence v. State, 20 Tenn. (1 Humph.) 228, 234, 84 Am. Dec. 644.

The term "taking," as used in the law of larceny, includes a taking of lost property with the present intention to appropriate it. Tanner v. Commonwealth (Va.) 14 Grat. 635, 637.

TAKING BAIL.

See "Bail."

TAKING BY FORCE.

"Taking by force," in the sense of the law as applied to the action of trespass, is taking without right or permission, in violation of the lawful possession of another. North Bridgewater v. Howard, 33 Mass. (16 Pick.) 206, 208.

TAKING DOWN TESTIMONY.

The phrase "taking down testimony," as used in section 4696b of the Code, and in Act Oct. 12, 1885, providing for the compensation of official stenographic reporters, embraces the whole process of reproducing the testimony of a witness in ordinary and intelligent writing, when necessary to comply with the law, including both the stenographic notes taken by the reporter and the translation of these notes and writing out the same in ordinary language. Where there is no conviction, so as to make it legally necessary to record the evidence, the process of taking down is complete without writing out the stenographic notes, and hence in such cases the compensation of the reporter should be limited to the time occupied in making his notes. Henderson v. Parry, 21 S. E. 144, 93 Ga. 775.

TAKING POISON.

"Taking poison," as used in a life insurance policy insuring against death from injuries through external violence and accidental means, unless it is caused from taking poison, suicide, etc., means the voluntary, intentional taking of poison, and does not include cases of accidental poisoning. Travelers' Ins. Co. v. Dunlap, 43 N. E. 765, 160 Ill. 642, 52 Am. St. Rep. 355.

"Taking of poison," as used in an accident policy, providing that the insurer shall not be liable for death caused by the taking of poison, will be construed to include the accidental taking of poison. Hill v. Hartford Acc. Ins. Co. (N. Y.) 22 Hun, 187, 189.

TALC.

"Talc" is defined as a mineral, and it is composed chiefly of silica, magnesia, and water. Jenkins v. Johnson (U. S.) 13 Fed. Cas. 525, 527.

TALES.

A "tales" is a supply of such men as are summoned on the first panel in order to make up a deficiency. Boyer v. Teague, 106 N. C. 576, 11 S. E. 665, 678, 19 Am. St. Rep. 547 (quoting Black. Com.).

TALES JUROR.

"Tales jurors" are persons called for no other purpose than to serve on a petit jury. They may also be designated by the term "petit jurors." State v. McCrystol, 9 South. 922, 924, 43 La. Ann. 907.

A "tales juror" is one added to a deficient panel, so as to supply the deficiency. Louisville, N. O. & T. R. Co. v. Mask, 2 South. 360, 361, 64 Miss. 738.

TALESMAN.

A "talesman" is a juror summoned to fill up a panel for the trial of a particular cause. The provision of 2 Rev. St. p. 437, § 54, only authorizes the summoning of talesmen for the single case ready and moved for trial. Talesmen can, therefore, only be summoned for a single trial, and not for a circuit. Shields v. Niagara County Sav. Bank (N. Y.) 5 Thomp. & C. 585, 587.

When, by reason of challenges or any other cause, it is rendered necessary to supply any deficiency on a regular jury, or to form one or more juries, as the occasion may require, such jurors are made "talesmen." Talesmen must not be compelled to serve longer than the day for which they were respectively summoned, unless detained longer on the trial of an issue or the execution of a writ of inquiry submitted to the jury of which they are respectively members, or unless they are resummoned as talesmen. Linehan v. State, 21 South. 497, 501, 113 Ala. 70.

TALLAGIUM.

"Tallagium," or "tallagium," coming of the French word "tailler," to share or cut out a part, metaphorically is taken when the king or any other hath a share or part of the value of a man's goods or chattels, or a share or part of the annual revenues of his lands, or puts any charge or burden upon another; so that "tallagium" is a general word, and doth include all subsidies, taxes, tenths, fifteenths, impositions, or other burdens or charges put or set upon any man. People v. City of Brooklyn (N. Y.) 9 Barb. 535, 551 (citing 2 Co. Inst. 532).

Sir Edward Coke, in his comment on the statute de tallagio non concedendo says that "the word 'tallagium' is a general word, and doth include all subsidies, taxes, tenths, fifteenths, impositions, and other burdens or charges put or set on any man." Inhabitants of Bernards Tp. v. Allen, 39 Atl. 716, 718, 61 N. J. Law, 228 (citing 2 Co. Inst. 533).

TALLIAGE.

Lord Coke defined the word "talliage" to mean burdens, charges, or impositions put or set upon persons or property for public uses. State ex rel. Garth v. Switzler, 45 S. W. 245, 248, 143 Mo. 287, 40 L. R. A. 280, 65 Am. St. Rep. 653 (citing 2 Co. Inst. 532); Lake Shore & M. S. Ry. Co. v. City of Grand Rapids, 60 N. W. 767, 769, 102 Mich. 374, 29 L. R. A. 195.

TALLIES OF LOAN.

The words "tallies of loan" was originally used in England to describe exchequer bills, which were issued by the officers of the exchequer when a temporary loan was necessary to meet the exigencies of the government, and charged on the credit of the exchequer in general, and made assignable from one person to another. Briscoe v. Bank of Kentucky, 36 U. S. (11 Pet.) 257, 328, 9 L. Ed. 709, 928.

TALLOW.

The word "tallow," as used in the revenue act, does not include "stearin"; the latter being a manufacture of "tallow," and not tallow in its natural condition. Fairbanks v. Spaulding (U. S.) 19 Fed. 416.

TAMPER.

"Tamper," as used in Acts 1891, c. 102, § 25, as amended by Acts 1893, c. 267, providing that after an election is over, when the ballots have been sorted and counted and the result declared and recorded, all the ballots shall in open meeting be sealed in a package, which package shall be forthwith delivered to the city, town, or plantation clerk, to be preserved by him as a public record for six months, and forbidding him to extract from or in any manner tamper with such package, does not mean open, though the word "tamper," in a criminal statute, at least, has the limited meaning of improper interference, as for the purpose of alteration and to make objectionable or unauthorized changes. Keefe v. Donnell, 42 Atl. 845, 848, 92 Me. 151 (citing Cent. Dict.).

TANNING.

The art of "tanning" is to change a raw skin into leather. The Century Dictionary defines tanning as "the art or process of converting hides and skins into leather." Tannage Patent Co. v. Donallan (U. S.) 93 Fed. 811, 817.

TANTAN.

The game of "tantan" is one of pure chance, and when played for anything of value comes within the inhibition of the statute against gambling. In re Lee Tong (U. S.) 18 Fed. 253, 257.

TAPERING BRUSH.

A brush differing from a common one in no other respect than in the circumstance that the hair or bristles were purposely made of unequal lengths is improperly described in a patent as a "tapering brush," there being no converging to a point. Rex v. Metcalf, 2 Starkie, 249.

TAPERING SOCKET.

A "tapering socket" is one which is adapted to receive a tapering screw. Allison v. New York & Brooklyn Bridge (U. S.) 29 Fed. 517, 521.

TAPIOCA.

"Tapioca," as a commercial term, includes tapioca flour, which is used to a slight extent in the thickening of soups, but mostly by calico printers and carpet manufacturers to thicken colors and in the manufacture of a substitute for gum arabic or other gum. In re Townsend (U. S.) 56 Fed. 222, 223, 5 C. C. A. 488.

TARE.

"Tare," as used in Act March 2, 1799, § 58 (1 Stat. 671), providing that a certain allowance should be made for "tare" on articles subject to duty by weight, is the amount allowed for the outside or covering of the article imported, whether it be box, barrel, bag, bale, mat, etc., and in a commercial sense and usage has a separate and distinct meaning and application from "draft," which is an allowance to the merchant, when the duty is ascertained by weight, to insure good weight to him. Napier v. Barney (U. S.) 17 Fed. Cas. 1149.

TARIFF.

"As defined by the law dictionaries, the word 'tariff' is a cartel of commerce; a book of rates; a table or catalogue. drawn usually in alphabetical order, containing the names of several kind of merchandise, with the duties or customs to be paid for the same as settled by authority or agreed on between the several princes and states that hold commerce together." This definition is practically the same as that given by Webster, Worcester, and the Standard Dictionaries. Ft. Worth & D. C. Ry. Co. v. Cushman, 50 S. W. 1009, 1010, 92 Tex. 623.

TARIFF RATE.

Rev. St. art. 4560d, provides that if no part of a railroad passenger ticket be used the holder shall be entitled to receive the full amount thereof, and if only a part is used he shall be entitled to the remainder of the price after deducting the tariff rate between the points for which the ticket was actually used. Held, that the words "tariff rate" referred to the rate per mile which the law authorized railroad companies to charge for transportation of passengers within the state, and, where an excursion ticket sold at reduced rates was only partially used, the sum to be deducted was the regular rate, and not the excursion rate, per mile. Ft. Worth & D. C. Ry. Co. v. Cushman, 50 S. W. 1009, 1010, 92 Tex. 623.

TAVERN.

The word "tavern" is defined, in the statute prohibiting gambling at taverns, as including every house of public resort. A tavern is a public, as well as an ordinary, place, within the meaning of the statute, which prohibits playing in an ordinary race field or any other public place. Worthan v. Commonwealth (Va.) 5 Rand. 669, 675; Linkons v. Commonwealth (Va.) 9 Leigh, 608, 611.

A "tavern," under the act of 1849 (11 St. at Large, p. 557), relative to licensed taverns, is not only a place where wine is sold and drinkers are entertained, but where a provision is made also for the lodging of wayfaring people. State v. Heise (S. O.) 7 Rich. Law, 518, 520.

Barroom synonymous.

The word "tavern" has been judicially defined in the case of State v. Chamblyss (S. C.) Cheves, 220, 34 Am. Dec. 593, to be a house in which a license to sell liquors in small quantities to be drunk on the spot had been granted. The word "tavern" is practically synonymous with "barroom" or "drinking shop." In re Schneider, 8 Pac. 289, 290, 11 Or. 288.

House of entertainment synonymous.

"Tavern," as used in Act Ga. 1791, requiring a license for keeping a tavern or house of entertainment, is synonymous with "house of entertainment," and means the common inns of the common law. Bonner v. Welborn, 7 Ga. 296, 306.

A tavern is a place for the general entertainment of all travelers and strangers who apply, paying suitable compensation. Comer v. State, 10 S. W. 106, 107, 28 Tex. App. 509.

Inn or hotel synonymous.

"Tavern" is synonymous with "inn." They are both houses of public entertainment. Town of Crown Point v. Warner (N. Y.) 8 Hill, 150, 156.

"Tavern," as defined by Webster, "is a house licensed to sell liquor to be drunk on the spot. In some of the United States 'tavern' is synonymous with 'inn' and 'hotel,' and denotes a house for the entertainment of travelers as well as the sale of liquors, licensed for that purpose." Rafferty v. New Brunswick Fire Ins. Co., 18 N. J. Law (3 Har.) 480, 484, 38 Am. Dec. 525; People v. Jones (N. Y.) 54 Barb. 311, 316 (citing Webster Dict.); Hall v. State (Del.) 4 Har. 132, 140; Bonner v. Welborn, 7 Ga. 296, 334, 337; People v. Jones (N. Y.) 1 Cow. Cr. R. 381, 384; Werner v. Washington (U. S.) 29 Fed. Cas. 705, 707.

"Tavern," as used in Sess. Acts 1867, p. 63 (St. Louis City Charter) § 18, authorizing the city to "license, tax, and regulate auctioneers, grocers, retailers, and taverns," applies to all hotels and houses that entertain and accommodate the public for compensation. Webster defines a tavern to mean a public house where entertainment and accommodation for travelers and other guests are provided, an inn, or a hotel, usually licensed to sell liquors in small quantities. At common law any person was an inn or tavern keeper who made it his business to entertain travelers and passengers and provide lodging and necessities for them and their horses, and when they were licensed they usually had the privilege of selling liquors. In this country, "hotel" and "public house" are used synonymously with "tavern," and while they entertain the traveling public and keep guests and receive compensation therefor they do not lose their character, though they may not have the privilege of selling liquors. The words "hotel" and "house" are usually and commonly used to denote a higher order of public houses than the ordinary tavern or inn. City of St. Louis v. Siegrist, 46 Mo. 593, 595.

The terms "inn" and "tavern," as used in the statute regulating taverns, are synonymous. The legal definition of an inn is the same as what is understood in this country by a hotel. An inn or hotel is a house where all who conduct themselves properly and who are able and ready to pay for their entertainment are received, if there is accommodation for them, or who, without any stipulated engagement as to the duration of their stay or as to the rate of compensation, are, while there, supplied at a reasonable charge with their meals, their lodging, and such services and attention as are necessarily incident to the use of the house as a temporary abode. Cromwell v. Stephens (N. Y.) 3 Abb. Prac. N. S. 26. This is the same definition applied to the term "hotel" by the liquor tax law. In re Brewster, 80 N. Y. Supp. 666, 667, 39 Misc. Rep. 689.

In the construction of statutes, the word "tavern" includes "inn." Rev. Code Del. 1893, c. 5, § 1, subd. 11.

Licensed grocery.

"Tavern," as used in 1 N. R. L. p. 178, § 8, prohibiting the keeping of a shuffle board, etc., in an inn or tavern, includes a grocery licensed in the city of New York. Cuscadden's Case (N. Y.) 2 City Hall Rec. 53.

Licensed house for sale of liquor.

A license to keep a "tavern" in the licensee's brick house applied to a frame room adjoining it, which was used as the barroom. Gray v. Commonwealth, 39 Ky. (9 Dana) 300, 35 Am. Dec. 136.

"Tavern," in Kentucky, means a licensed house of entertainment, and only such may retail spirits. Braswell v. Commonwealth, 68 Ky. (5 Bush) 544.

"Tavern" means "a house licensed to sell liquor in small quantities, to be drunk on the spot," and "denotes a house for the entertainment of travelers, as well as for the sale of liquors." This is the American sense in which the word is used, according to Webster; so that a license to keep a tavern is a license to retail liquor. State v. Chamblyss (S. C.) Cheves, 220, 226, 34 Am. Dec. 593.

A license in general terms to keep a "tavern" authorizes the tavern keeper to vend spirituous liquors in his barroom or tavern to his guests or others in small quantities, to be drunk in the tavern or elsewhere. Commonwealth v. Kamp, 53 Ky. (14 B. Mon.) 385.

A license to "keep a tavern" under authority of Act June 1, 1831, should be construed to include a license to retail liquors, as well as to keep a tavern. Hirn v. State, 1 Ohio St. 15, 19.

Lodging house.

The term "inn," "tavern," or "hotel," does not properly designate a mere lodging house, although the keeper thereof may send out and procure cooked food for his guests. A house which does not contain the means of preparing food for the table in the ordinary way has not the necessary accommodation to entertain travelers, and is not an inn within the meaning of Act 1857 in reference to the licensing of innkeepers. Kelly v. City of New York (N. Y.) 54 How. Prac. 327, 331.

Private room.

In construing a statute which prohibits playing cards in a public place, and expressly named taverns and inns as public houses, but declares that a private room in an inn or tavern is not within the meaning of a public place, unless such rooms are commonly used for gaming, the court said: "Mr. Bishop says an inn, tavern, or hotel is a place for the general entertainment of all travelers and strangers who apply, paying suitable compensation. Bish. St. Cr. (2d Ed.) § 297. Mr. Webster defines 'inn' as a place of shelter, habitation, residence, abode; a house for the lodging and entertainment of travelers, as a tavern. He defines 'tavern' as a public house where entertainment and accommodation for travelers and other guests are provided. To make a guest room in a hotel (that is, one appropriated to public use as such) a private room, it must have been taken by a guest or lodger seeking rest for a day or night, or a residence for a time, or one desiring to use it for a temporary habitation; that is, a place of abode. Unless so appropriated by a guest, it is a part of the public house, known as 'tavern' or 'inn.' The term 'public house,' as used in the gaming statute, does not mean a place solely devoted to the public, as distinguished from private. A house may be said to be a public house either in respect to its proprietorship or its occupancy and uses; and so a guest room in a hotel is a part of the public hotel or tavern, in that it is for the use of the public business of the house in the entertainment of its guests, and only becomes private after it is appropriated by a guest"—and held that a room in an inn provided for the accommodation of guests, which was engaged temporarily for the purpose of private gaming, and not for a guest's habitation or abode, was not a private room, but a part of the public place. Comer v. State, 10 S. W. 108, 107, 26 Tex. App. 509.

Restaurant.

A restaurant, where meals are furnished, is not an inn or tavern. People v. Jones (N. Y.) 1 Cow. Cr. R. 381, 384.

TAVERN KEEPER.

As an innkeeper.

"Tavern keeper" is synonymous with "innkeeper." It means a person who makes it his business to entertain travelers and passengers, and provide lodging and necessities for them and their horses and attendants. Commonwealth v. Shortridge, 28 Ky. (3 J. J. Marsh.) 638, 640.

"Tavern-keeper" and "innkeeper" are synonymous. "Inns" and "taverns" are both houses of public entertainment. A person who makes it his business to entertain travelers and passengers, and provide lodging and necessities for them, their horses, and attendants, is a common "innkeeper"; and it is no way material whether he have any sign before his door or not. Though it be the entertainment of passengers that makes a man an "innkeeper," yet, if a person, having put up a sign before his door, afterwards pull it down, he thereby discharges himself of the burden of an "innkeeper"; but if, after he takes it down, he continues to entertain travelers, it is as much a common "inn" as before. At common law any person may erect an inn for the public accommodation without a license, as the keeping of it is not a franchise, but a lawful trade, open to every citizen. The Town of Crown Point v. Warner (N. Y.) 3 Hill, 150, 156.

As keeper of boarding or lodging house.

At common law any person might be a tavern keeper; but, as every tavern keeper must be licensed, the words have a special meaning, and do not include one who keeps a mere boarding house or lodging house, or even one who keeps a house for lodging strangers for the season. Southwood v. Myers, 66 Ky. (3 Bush) 681, 685.

As keeper of house of entertainment.

A person who makes it a business to keep a house of entertainment for travelers is a "tavern keeper," though he keeps no liquor in his house for any purpose. Curtis v. State, 5 Ohio (5 Ham.) 324.

Keeper of restaurant.

A tavern keeper is a person who receives and entertains as guests those who choose to visit his house, and it would not include one who merely keeps a restaurant where meals are furnished. People v. Jones (N. Y.) 54 Barb. 311, 316.

As person selling intoxicating liquor.

The word "tavern keeper," as used in Rev. St. § 1564, providing that "if any tavern keeper or other person shall sell, give away, or barter any intoxicating liquors on Sunday, or on the day of the annual town meeting, or the annual fall election, such tavern keeper or other person so offending shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor," clearly means a person a part at least of whose business is to sell intoxicating liquors. Jensen v. State, 19 N. W. 374, 375, 60 Wis. 577.

As person obtaining license.

A tavern keeper is one who obtains a license to keep a tavern and for whom it is kept, though another person as his agent may actually keep it. Commonwealth v. Burns, 27 Ky. (4 J. J. Marsh.) 177, 181.

"Taxes" are defined as being the enforced proportional contribution of persons and property, levied by authority of the state for the support of the government and for all public needs. Yeatman v. Foster County, 51 N. W. 721, 723, 2 N. D. 421, 33 Am. St. Rep. 797; State v. Montague, 15 South. 589, 590, 34 Fla. 32; Taylor v. Boyd, 63 Tex. 533, 541; Languille v. State, 4 Tex. In return for such contribution the state affords protection to life, liberty, and property, and this is essential to civilization and the very existence of the state. Union Refrigerator Transit Co. v. Lynch, 55 Pac. 639, 640, 18 Utah, 378, 48 L. R. A. 790. The citizen pays from his property the portion demanded, in order that by means thereof he may be secure in the enjoyment of the benefits of organized society. The power is unlimited in its reach as to subjects. In its very nature it acknowledges no limit. It is not an arbitrary power, nor can it be exercised capriciously. It is hedged about and restricted by constitutional limitations and fixed general rules. Gay v. Thomas, 46 Pac. 578, 581, 5 Okl. 1.

Taxes are the enforced proportional contributions from persons and property levied by the states for the support of government and of public improvements. McRae v. Cochise County (Ariz.) 44 Pac. 299, 300, 33 L. R. A. 851, 56 Am. St. Rep. 579 (citing Perry v. Washburn, 20 Cal. 318).

A tax is understood to be a charge, a pecuniary burden, for the support of the government. Michigan Cent. R. Co. v. Slack (U. S.) 17 Fed. Cas. 263, 265 (citing United States v. Baltimore & O. R. Co., 84 U. S. [17 Wall.] 326, 21 L. Ed. 597).

A "tax" is defined to be a rate or sum of money assessed on the person or property of a citizen by government for the use of the nation or state. Hamilton v. Dillin (U. S.) 11 Fed. Cas. 832, 835.

A "tax" is a charge or burden imposed by authority, as a levy of any kind made on property for the support of the government. King v. Fountain County, 49 Ind. 13, 20.

A "tax" is an impost levied by authority of government upon its citizens or subjects for the purpose of the state. McClelland v. State, 138 Ind. 321, 332, 333, 37 N. E. 1089, 1092 (citing City of Camden v. Allen, 26 N. J. Law [2 Dutch.] 398).

A "tax" is a contribution which the law requires individuals to make for the support of the government. Dunn v. Winston, 31 Miss. 185, 187.

A "tax" is generally understood to mean the imposition of a duty or impost for the support of the government. Brewer Brick Co. v. Inhabitants of Brewer, 62 Me. 62, 70, 16 Am. Rep. 395.

Taxes are the regular, uniform, and equal contribution which all citizens are required to make for the support of the government. City of New London v. Miller, 22 Atl. 499, 501, 60 Conn. 112.

A "tax" is a rate or sum of money assessed on the person, property, etc., of a citizen. State v. Hipp, 38 Ohio St. 199, 226; Pullman Southern Car Co. v. Nolan (U. S.) 22 Fed. 276, 279. By the government for the use of a nation or state. City of Baltimore v. Green Mount Cemetery, 7 Md. 517, 535 (citing Webst. Dict.); Citizens' Savings & Loan Ass'n v. City of Topeka, 87 U. S. (20 Wall.) 653, 664, 22 L. Ed. 455.

A tax is an exaction made for the purpose of carrying on the government, directly or through the medium of municipal corporations, which are but parts of the machinery employed in the operation of the government. Trustees of Illinois & M. Canal v. City of Chicago, 12 Ill. (2 Peck) 403, 406; City of Chicago v. Baptist Theological Union, 2 N. E. 254, 256, 115 Ill. 245.

The term "taxes," it is said, includes all contributions imposed by the government upon individuals for the service of the state. The individual, and not his property, pays the tax. Green v. Craft, 28 Miss. (6 Oushm.) 70, 75 (cited in State v. Camp Sing, 18 Mont. 128, 150, 44 Pac. 516, 521, 32 L. R. A. 635, 56 Am. St. Rep. 551).

The word "taxes" in its most extended sense includes all contributions imposed by the government on individuals for the services of the government; but the word "taxes" as used in the federal Constitution, authorizing Congress to impose taxes, imposts, duties, and excises, is used in its more confined or restricted sense, and means taxes which are neither duties, imposts, or excises. Union Bank v. Hill, 43 Tenn. (3 Cold.) 325, 328.

"A tax is a portion of the property of the citizen required by the government for its support in the discharge of its various functions and duties, and may be imposed when either person or property is found within its jurisdiction." Graham v. St. Joseph Tp., 35 N. W. 808, 810, 67 Mich. 652.

A tax is a forced contribution, and can only be sustained on the theory of good government. Atchison, T. & S. F. Ry. Co. v. Territory (N. M.) 72 Pac. 14, 15; Rio Grande, M. & P. R. Co. v. Same, Id.; Silver City, D. & P. R. Co. v. Same, Id.

The word "taxes," in its ordinary sense, embraces all those regulations and impositions or burdens laid by the government upon property and persons for the purpose of raising revenue for its general needs. District of Columbia v. Sisters of Visitation (U. S.) 15 App. Cas. 300, 306.

The characteristics of a tax are a public burden imposed by law, a description of the property and persons by whom it is to be borne, the contingency on the happening of which it is to be imposed, and the apportionment of it in pursuance of law. Woodbridge v. City of Detroit, 8 Mich. 274, 282.

The term "taxes" includes all contributions imposed by the government on individuals for the support of the state. The individual, and not his property, pays the tax. The property is resorted to for the purpose of ascertaining the amount of the tax with which the owner must be charged, and for the purpose of enforcing payment when the owner shall be legally in default in paying at the time stipulated by law. No person is a taxpayer until he has been so declared by the proper authorities. An assessment must be as certain in designating the person chargeable with the tax at the commencement of the fiscal year as it must be in designating the amount of the charge on the property to which reference is made for the purpose of ascertaining such amount. An assessment must thus be made in order to create a liability on the part of an individual to pay the tax, and if no such assessment is made no liability is created. Green v. Craft, 28 Miss. (6 Cushm.) 70, 75.

Taxes are public burdens, of which every individual may be compelled to bear his part, and that in proportion to the extent of protection he receives or the amount of property held by him, as the will of the Legislature may direct. The power of taxation is said to be an incident of sovereignty, and coextensive with that of which it is incident. In the several states of the Union it extends to all subjects over which their sovereign power extends, and the sovereignty of the state extends to everything which exists by its own authority or is introduced by its permission. Hanna v. Allen County, 8 Blackf. 352, 355.

"Taxes," says Judge Cooley, "differ from subsidies, being orderly and regular, and they differ from the forced contributions, loans, and benevolences of arbitrary and tyrannical periods, in that they are levied by authority of law and by some rule of proportion." Boston, C. & M. R. Co. v. State, 60 N. H. 87, 88.

The clause of the Constitutions of 1860 and 1867 exempting homesteads from all debts, except taxes, etc., are used in the broadest sense, without limitation or restriction, and any execution for taxes in the hands of anybody, due by anybody, so that it be for taxes, money due the state from that source and not paid over, may be collected out of the person so owing that money, though it override that homestead and exemptions of his family taken and set apart out of his property. Cahn v. Wright, 66 Ga. 119, 120.

"Taxes," as used in the federal Constitution, must be confined to the idea which they commonly and ordinarily present to the mind as exactions to fill the public coffers for the payments of the debts and promotion of the general welfare of a country. Worsley v. City of New Orleans (La.) 9 Rob. 324, 333, 41 Am. Dec. 333.

A "tax" has been defined to be a word of general import, including almost every species of imposition on persons or property, for supplying the public treasury, as tolls, tribute, subsidy, excise, impost, or customs. In a more limited sense it is a sum laid for the same purpose upon polls, lands, houses, property, provisions, and occupations. Mays v. City of Cincinnati, 1 Ohio St. 268, 273.

A tax is imposed for a general or public purpose. It is levied for the purpose of carrying on the government. It is a charge on lands and other property which lessens its value, and in the proportion in which the owner is required to pay is his pecuniary ability diminished. This is the sense in which the term "taxation" is used and understood. De Clercq v. Barber Asphalt Pav. Co., 47 N. E. 367, 167 Ill. 215; Trustees of Illinois & M. Canal v. City of Chicago, 12 Ill. (2 Peck) 403, 406.

A tax is the means by which a burden primarily borne by the state is transferred to the citizen. The obligation may have relation to debt already incurred, or it may be in anticipation, dependent on future contingencies. Three things are essential to a tax, as that term is understood by our Constitution: First, the ascertainment of a sum certain, or that can be rendered certain, to be imposed on the collective body of taxpayers; second, the legal imposition of that sum as an obligation on the collective body of taxpayers; third, an apportionment of such sum among individual taxpayers, so as to ascertain the part or share that each should bear. Morton v. Comptroller General, 4 S. C. (4 Rich.) 430, 453; Southern Ry. Co. v. Kay, 39 S. E. 785, 787, 62 S. C. 28.

The word "tax," as a verb, when used in respect to fees or costs, is defined to mean to assess, fix, or determine judicially the amount of, as to tax the cost of an action in court. Anderson's Law Dictionary defines the word to mean to assess, adjust, fix, or determine, as to tax the items and the amount of costs in a case. Where a county auditor has charged and taxed the fees on the books of his office, as prescribed by law, he may be said to have assessed and determined the amount of fees allowed by law in the particular matter in which he has rendered services. Seller v. State, 65 N. E. 922, 927, 160 Ind. 605.

"Tax," as used in Act Ark. July 21, 1868, § 7, providing that the Legislature should from time to time impose upon each railroad company to which bonds shall have been issued a tax equal to the amount of the annual interest upon such bonds, is not used in the sense of a tax that is to be assessed and levied for the support of the state or any of its subdivisions. A tax, in the legal signification of the term, has to be levied on all property by a uniform rule, not as to the rate, but in the mode of its assessment. The word "tax," as used in the act, is not in reference to a tax in its strict legal signification. Among the meanings of the word "tax," are a requisition; a demand; a burden. It is here used in the sense of a charge or burden. Tompkins v. Little Rock & Ft. S. R. Co. (U. S.) 15 Fed. 6, 13 (citing Worcester Dict.).

"Taxes" are generally classified as specific, ad valorem, and for public benefit. The last two classes are necessarily based upon an assessment of actual values, whereas in the first class the valuation is either fixed by statute, or the tax is intended to subserve some supposed public interest or policy. Commonwealth v. Lehigh Val. R. Co., 18 Atl. 406, 411, 129 Pa. 429.

Cooley on Taxation says: "Taxes are not demands against which a set-off is admissible. Their assessment does not constitute a technical judgment, nor are they contracts between party and party, either express or implied; but they are positive acts of the government through its various agents, binding on the inhabitants, and to the making and enforcing of which their personal consent individually is not required." A taxpayer, therefore, cannot set off against his taxes an indebtedness of the municipality to him, unless expressly authorized to do so by statute. Anderson v. City of Mayfield, 14 Ky. Law Rep. 370, 372, 93 Ky. 230, 19 S. W. 598.

The word "tax," or "taxes," when used in the revenue act, shall be construed to include any tax, special assessment, or cost, interest, or penalty imposed upon property. Hurd's Rev. St. Ill. 1901, p. 1494, c. 120, § 292, subd. 14; Blake v. People, 109 Ill. 504, 525.

The word "tax," whenever used in the general revenue laws, is defined by section 118 of such laws to mean "any tax, special assessment, or cost, interest, or penalty imposed upon property." State v. Irey, 60 N. W. 601, 608, 42 Neb. 186.

The word "taxes," as used in an act relating to municipal liens, means any county, city, borough, township, school, bridge, road, or poor taxes. 4 P. & L. Dig. Laws Pa. 1897, col. 1269, § 55.

The words "tax," "taxes," "taxable" and "taxation," as used in the chapter relating to the assessment of taxes, shall be deemed to include county, district, and municipal corporation levies in all cases not inconsistent with the context. Code W. Va. 1899, p. 219, c. 29, § 99.

"Taxation" is a mode of raising revenue for public purposes. Sharpless v. City of Philadelphia, 21 Pa. (9 Harris) 147, 169, 59 Am. Dec. 759; United States v. Wright, 3 Pittsb. Rep. 192, 194, 28 Fed. Cas. 789; Reelfoot Lake Levee Dist. v. Dawson, 36 S. W. 1041, 1044, 1045, 97 Tenn. 151, 34 L. R. A. 725.

"Taxation" is the absolute conversion of private property to public use. Attorney General v. City of Eau Claire, 37 Wis. 400, 438.

Taxation is a proportionable and reasonable assessment, which may be imposed from time to time upon persons or property. In re Meador (U. S.) 16 Fed. Cas. 1294, 1297.

"Taxation" is a charge levied by the sovereign power upon the property of its subjects. It is not a charge upon its own property, nor upon property over which it has dominion. This excludes from taxation the property of the state, whether lands, revenues, or other property, and the property of the United States. Van Brocklin v. Anderson, 6 Sup. Ct. 670, 678, 117 U. S. 151, 29 L. Ed. 845; People v. McCreery, 84 Cal. 432, 456.

"Taxation" is said to be an absolute power, which acknowledges no other limits than those expressly prescribed in the Constitution, and, like sovereign power of every description, is intrusted to the discretion of those who use it. North Missouri R. Co. v. Maguire, 49 Mo. 490, 500, 8 Am. Rep. 141 (citing McCulloch v. Maryland, 17 U. S. [4 Wheat.] 316, 429, 4 L. Ed. 579).

"Taxation" is the contribution of each one's proportion to the support of his government, only to serve public ends, and must from its very nature be imposed upon the public. This is fundamental in the idea of a tax. Baldwin v. Fuller, 39 N. J. Law (10 Vroom) 576, 584.

By "taxation" is meant a certain mode of raising revenue for a public purpose, in which the community that pays it has an interest. Manistee Lumber Co. v. Springfield Tp., 92 Mich. 277, 280, 52 N. W. 468, 469 (citing Sharpless v. City of Philadelphia, 21 Pa. [9 Harris] 147, 59 Am. Dec. 759).

A "power of taxation" is a power to enforce contribution from persons and property for the maintenance of the government. Shurtleff v. City of Chicago, 60 N. E. 870, 871, 190 Ill. 473.

By "taxation," as used in Comp. St. c. 12a, relating to cities of the metropolitan class, and providing for a system of taxation, is meant the providing of revenue for the ordinary expenses. Littlefield v. State, 60 N. W. 724, 725, 42 Neb. 223, 28 L. R. A. 588, 47 Am. St. Rep. 697.

"Taxation" was defined by the court in Knowlton v. Rock County Sup'rs, 9 Wis. 410, 418, as the act of laying a tax or imposing impositions, burdens, or charges upon persons or property within the state. It is the process or means by which the taxing power is exercised. The power of taxation is one of the essential attributes of sovereignty, and is inherent in and necessary to the very existence of every government. State v. Thorne, 87 N. W. 797, 798, 112 Wis. 81, 55 L. R. A. 956.

"Tax," as used in Little Rock City Charter, § 29, providing that the inhabitants of Little Rock are exempted from working on any road beyond the limits of the city and from paying any tax to procure laborers to work on the same, means a tax on the individual, not on property. Fletcher v. Oliver, 25 Ark. 289, 295.

"It is not taxation that the government should take from one the profits and gain of another. That is taxation which compels one to pay for the support of the government from his own gain and his own property." United States v. Baltimore & O. R. Co., 84 U. S. (17 Wall.) 322, 326, 21 L. Ed. 597.

"Taxation is the simple operation of taking small portions from a perpetually accumulating mass, susceptible of almost infinite division; and a power in one to take what is necessary for certain purposes is not in its nature incompatible with the power in another to take what is necessary for other purposes. Congress is authorized to lay and collect taxes, etc., to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States. This does not interfere with the power of the states to tax for the support of their own government; nor is the exercise of that power by the states an exercise of any portion of the power granted to the United States." Gibbons v. Ogden, 22 U. S. (9 Wheat.) 1, 199, 6 L. Ed. 23.

The word "tax" in its ordinary acceptance means a sum imposed or levied by government or other authority. It is a general term, applied to whatever is required by the government or legal authority thereof to be paid by the people, and presupposes that the burden is imposed by some authority other than that of the individual taxed; else it would not be a tax, but a voluntary contribution. Morgan v. Cree, 46 Vt. 773, 783, 14 Am. Rep. 640.

A tax that cannot be exacted by any remedy is no tax at all. Herriott v. Potter, 89 N. W. 91, 92, 115 Iowa, 648.

Must be local.

"Taxation," in order to be valid, must be of a public nature or for a public purpose, and must also be local. It is the essence of taxation that it should compel the discharge of a burden by those on whom it rests. An attempt to compel one county or municipality to pay a charge properly resting on the inhabitants of another separate and distinct district or community would be an arbitrary and unauthorized exercise of power. It would be taking private property for private use, and in no proper sense could it be regarded as taxation, but rather in the nature of confiscation. It is true that it is not necessary that the money raised by taxation should always be expended within the district where it is levied and collected, but it may be expended for objects outside of the district, in which the residents of the district have in a legal sense an interest. District interest is the test whether an object is or is not a proper subject for taxation. A law providing that property in an unorganized county should be subject to taxation in the nearest organized county is an attempt on the part of the Legislature to tax one community for the benefit of another, and is void from the fact that all taxation must be public and local, and for objects in which those who pay the taxes have, in a legal sense, some interest, and from which they may receive some benefit. Farris v. Vannier, 42 N. W. 31, 33, 6 Dak. 186, 3 L. R. A. 713.

Must be uniform.

"Taxation" is an act of sovereignty, to be performed, so far as it conveniently can be, with justice and equality to all. United Railways & Electric Co. v. City of Baltimore, 49 Atl. 655, 656, 93 Md. 630, 52 L. R. A. 772; Herrman v. Town of Guttenberg, 43 Atl. 703, 706, 62 N. J. Law, 605; People v. Daniels, 22 Pac. 159-161, 6 Utah, 288, 5 L. R. A. 444; Turner v. Althaus, 6 Neb. 54, 77; Exchange Bank v. Hines, 3 Ohio St. 1, 10; And exemptions, however meritorious, are acts of grace, and must be strictly construed, and every reasonable intentment must be made that it was not the design to surrender the power of taxation. Benedict v. City of New Orleans, 11 South. 41, 42, 44 La. Ann. 793 (citing Desty, Tax'n, p. 80).

"Taxes" are contributions imposed by the government for the support of the state. In all just governments it should be a cardinal principal that such imposition should be equal, and that all the property within the state should contribute its equal share of the burden imposed. This is on the principle that, as all the property within the state is equally protected by its laws and institutions, so all property within its boundaries should alike equally contribute to their maintenance and enforcement. International Life Assur. Soc. of London v. Commissioners of Taxes (N. Y.) 28 Barb. 318, 319.

Must be for public purposes.

A tax is an imposition for the supply of the public treasury, and not for the supply of individuals or private corporations. People v. McAdams, 82 Ill. 356, 361.

The term "taxes" in Const. art. 10, § 3, which provides that taxes may be levied and collected for public purposes only, is used in its generic sense, as expounded by lexicographers, judges, and lawyers long before its use in our organic law. In the sense that taxes can only be levied for a public purpose, that word includes every character and kind of a tax, general or special. The term as there used includes an excise upon the right of a person or corporation to receive property by devise or inheritance from another. Act April 1, 1895, as amended by Act March 17, 1897, imposing a collateral succession tax to create a fund for maintaining free scholarships in the university, distributed on competitive examinations to applicants without means, is a tax for purely private purposes, in violation of the Constitution. State ex rel. Garth v. Switzler, 45 S. W. 245, 248, 143 Mo. 287, 40 L. R. A. 280, 65 Am. St. Rep. 653.

A tax is an imposition for the supply of the public treasury, and not for the supply of individuals or private corporations, however beneficial they may be. Imposing on agents of foreign insurance companies the duty of paying 2 per cent. on the premiums received by them to the Philadelphia Association for the Relief of Disabled Firemen is not a tax. Philadelphia Ass'n for Relief of Disabled Firemen v. Wood, 39 Pa. (3 Wright) 73, 82.

The object or purpose to which a tax is applied is to some extent public; that is, its use is not confined exclusively to the benefit of the particular individual taxpayer, but extends to some common object in which more or less individuals have an interest. Yet, it is obvious that a tax may be so levied and so limited in its character and object as not to be a public tax. Morgan v. Cree, 46 Vt. 773, 783, 14 Am. Rep. 640.

A tax, says Webster's Dictionary, "is a rate or sum of money assessed on the person or property of a citizen by the government for the use of the nation or state." "Taxes are burdens or charges imposed by the Legislature upon persons or property to raise money for public purposes. To lay with one hand the power of the government on the property of the citizen, and with the other to bestow it upon favorite individuals, aid private enterprises, and build up private fortunes, is none the less a robbery, because it is done under the forms of law and is called 'taxation.' This is not legislation. It is a decree under legislative forms." Thus a state cannot pass a law authorizing cities to issue bonds in the aid of private manufacturing enterprises. Citizens' Saving & Loan Ass'n v. Topeka, 87 U. S. (20 Wall.) 655, 664, 22 L. Ed. 455.

The word "taxation," as used in Const. art. 8, § 1, declaring that the rule of taxation shall be uniform, does not prohibit the enactment of a statute requiring fire insurance agents to pay a percentage on premiums collected for the benefit of the fire department of the city in which the property insured is located, since the percentage required to be paid is not a tax on the agent or his occupation, but the effect of the act is to go back and reach the company which the agent represents. Fire Department of Milwaukee v. Helfenstein, 16 Wis. 136, 139.

The theory of taxation is that it is levied for public purposes, that it is an attribute essential to the exercise of government, without which it would be powerless to discharge its functions, and for that reason it is held to be inherent. It is the public use for it which marks it as a tax. Where no public end is subserved, the power cannot be called into action. Elizabethtown Water Co. v. Wade, 35 Atl. 4, 5, 59 N. J. Law, 78.

Taxes are pecuniary charges imposed by the legislative power of the state on property to raise money for public purposes, and are not confined exclusively to support of the government. The term "tax" includes money raised for public purposes in general, whether governmental or not, and may be properly levied for the purpose of making a donation to a railroad company to insure the resumption of work on and the completion of the railroad, for the purpose of constructing a railroad is public in its nature. Davidson v. Ramsey County Com'rs, 18 Minn. 482, 486 (Gil. 432, 434).

Taxation is a mode of raising revenue for public purposes. The taxing power of the state extends no further than to raise money for public use. The Legislature cannot legally and constitutionally exercise the right of taxation in such manner as to coerce the citizen to aid in establishing a purely private enterprise or projects for the payment of municipal bonds issued in aid of such private enterprise, and statutes enacted for such a purpose are unconstitutional and void. National Bank of Cleveland v. City of Iola, 9 Kan. 689, 700.

Taxation is a mode of raising revenue for public purposes only, and when it is prostituted to objects in no way connected with the public interests it ceases to be taxation and becomes plunder. People v. Town Board of Salem, 20 Mich. 452, 474, 4 Am. Rep. 400.

As due and subject to levy.

"Taxation," as used in Act Jan. 4, 1860, exempting certain property from taxation by the city and county for a certain period, referred to taxes which were due and subject to levy during such time and not merely those which should be assessed during said period. Southern Hotel Co. v. St. Louis County Court, 62 Mo. 134, 136.

As judicial act.

See "Judicial Act."

As either legal or illegal.

Under Rev. St. § 3224 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 2088], declaring that no suit for the purpose of restraining the assessment or collection of any tax shall be maintained in any court, it is held that the word "tax" includes taxes which had been illegally and wrongfully levied, as well as those which are regular and valid. Miles v. Johnson (U. S.) 59 Fed. 38, 40.

Under 14 Stat. 152, § 19, declaring that no suit shall be maintained to restrain the collection of a tax alleged to have been erroneously or illegally assessed or collected until appeal shall have been duly made to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue according to the provisions of law in that regard, it is held that the word "tax" means a tax which is in a condition to be collected as a tax and is claimed by the proper public officers to be a tax, although on the other side it is alleged to have been erroneously or illegally assessed; and a contention that the word "tax" meant only a legal tax, and that an illegal tax was not a tax, and so did not fall within the inhibition, was not tenable. Snyder v. Marks, 3 Sup. Ct. 157, 159, 109 U. S. 189, 27 L. Ed. 901.

Construed in plural.

The word "tax," as used in R. L. §§ 407, 408, giving a right of action to a collector against the taxpayer to recover a tax, will be considered to mean "taxes," under the rule of construction of statutes contained in R. L. § 2, providing that words importing the singular number may extend and be applied to more than one person or thing. Wheeler v. Wilson, 57 Vt. 157, 158.

As a taking.

See "Taking (In Eminent Domain)."

As tax levy.

The word "taxes" is oftentimes used interchangeably for tax levies, and is so used in Code, c. 45, § 46, requiring the sheriff of a county to give a bond as collector of state and county taxes. State v. Poling, 28 S. E. 930, 44 W. Va. 312.

Assessment for improvements.

Taxes are impositions for purposes of general revenue, while assessments are special and local impositions upon property in the immediate vicinity of an improvement, for the public welfare, which are necessary to pay for the improvement and made with reference to the special benefit which such property derives from the expenditure. Palmer v. Stumph, 29 Ind. 329, 333, 335; Winoona & St. P. R. Co. v. City of Watertown, 44 N. W. 1072, 1073, 1 S. D. 46; Holley v. Orange County, 39 Pac. 790, 792, 106 Cal. 420; Howes v. City of Racine, 21 Wis. 514, 516; Hale v. City of Kenosha, 29 Wis. 599, 605; Lima v. Lima Cemetery Ass'n, 42 Ohio St. 128, 130, 51 Am. Rep. 509; Ridenour v. Saffin, 12 Ohio Dec. 238, 243; Sharpe v. Speir (N. Y.) 4 Hill, 76, 82.

The word "tax" or "taxes" does not include local assessments, unless there be something in the statute in which it is found to indicate such an intention. Kilgus v. Trustees of Orphanage of Good Shepherd, 94 Ky. 439, 444, 22 S. W. 750, 757; Ittner v. Robinson, 52 N. W. 846, 847, 85 Neb. 133; First Division of St. Paul & P. R. Co. v. City of St. Paul, 21 Minn. 526, 529; In re Ford (N. Y.) 6 Lans. 92, 95; Taylor v. Boyd, 63 Tex. 533, 541; Pettibone v. Smith, 30 Wkly. Notes Cas. 325, 329, 24 Atl. 693, 150 Pa. 118, 17 L. R. A. 423; City of Denver v. Knowles, 30 Pac. 1041, 1042, 17 Colo. 204, 17 L. R. A. 135 (citing Farrar v. City of St. Louis, 80 Mo. 379; Adams v. Lindell, 5 Mo. App. 197; Hammett v. City of Philadelphia, 65 Pa. [15 P. F. Smith] 146, 3 Am. Rep. 615; Emery v. San Francisco Gas Co., 23 Cal. 345; Speer v. City of Athens, 85 Ga. 49, 11 S. E. 802, 9 L. R. A. 402; Hale v. City of Kenosha, 29 Wis. 599).

The words "taxation" and "assessment," as used in the state Constitution, do not have the same signification. The power of taxation is a power which the Legislature takes, from the law of its creation, to impose taxes upon the property of the citizens for the support of the government. The word "assessment" is employed to represent those local burdens imposed by municipal corporations upon property bordering upon an improved street, for the purpose of paying the cost of the improvement, and laid with reference to the benefit the property is supposed to receive from the expenditure of the money. Property not benefited by the improvement cannot be subject to an assessment for it. The power of assessment cannot be exercised as an independent or principal power, like that of taxation, but must be used as an incident to the power of organizing municipal corporations. Taylor v. Palmer, 31 Cal. 240, 250.

A local assessment can only be levied on land. It cannot, as a tax can, be made a personal liability of the taxpayer. It is an assessment on the thing supposed to be benefited. A tax is levied on the whole state, or a known political subdivision, as a county or town. A local assessment is levied on property situated in a district created for the express purpose of the levy, and possessing no other function or even existence, than to be the thing on which the levy is made. A tax is a continuing burden, and must be collected at stated short intervals for all time, and without it government cannot exist. A local assessment is exceptional, both as to time and locality. It is brought into being for a particular occasion and to accomplish a particular purpose, and dies with the passing of the occasion and the accomplishment of the purpose. Town of Macon v. Patty, 57 Miss. 378, 386, 34 Am. Rep. 451.

While, in a general sense, it may be said that a betterment assessment is a kind of tax, still there is a well-understood difference in the meaning of the two terms as generally used in the statutes. The word "tax" is used when one is speaking of the annual tax, or any other tax which forms a part of the general burden for public purposes; while the word "assessment" is used to designate the amount to be paid into the public treasury as a part of the benefit specially received by reason of some local improvement, and it cannot be assessed unless there be such benefit, and even then not beyond that. The value of the estate is always diminished by the first, but never by the second. This distinction between the usual legal signification of the words seems to be quite generally recognized. Boston Asylum and Farm School for Indigent Boys v. Street Com'rs of City of Boston, 62 N. E. 961, 962, 180 Mass. 485.

The word "assessment" is frequently applied to the special tax imposed upon real estate which is but a small part of some political division for some improvement specially adding to the value and by which the public is also benefited, as when the expense of making streets in front of certain lots is assessed on such lots; but if the same improvement is made at the expense of the entire city or ward in which it is, then the imposition upon the property of the entire city or ward to pay the expense of such improvement is a "tax," in the ordinary sense in which that word is used. Howes v. City of Racine, 21 Wis. 514, 516.

"Taxes proper, or general taxes," says Mr. Justice Brewer, "proceed upon the theory that the existence of government is a necessity, that it cannot continue without means to pay its expenses, that for those means it has the right to compel all citizens and property within its limits to contribute, and that for such contribution it renders no return of special benefit to any property, but only secures to the citizen that general benefit which results from protection to his person and property, and the promotion of those various schemes which have for their object the welfare of all. * * * On the other hand, special assessments or special taxes proceed upon the theory that, when a local improvement enhances the value of neighboring property, that property should pay for the improvement." After citing several authorities in support of these propositions, among which is Cooley, Tax'n, p. 416, c. 20, he further says: "These distinctions have been recognized and stated by the courts of almost every state in the Union, and a collection of the cases may be found in any of the leading text-books on Taxation. Founded on this distinction is a rule of very general acceptance—that an exemption from taxation is to be taken as an exemption simply from the burden of ordinary taxes, taxes proper, and does not relieve from the obligation to pay special assessments." Appeal of Sewickley M. E. Church, 30 Atl. 1007, 1008, 165 Pa. 475.

Assessments for sewers and curbing are not "taxes," within the meaning of a devise for life requiring the life tenant to pay all taxes on the property. Chambers v. Chambers, 39 Atl. 243, 20 R. I. 370.

The word "taxes," as used in a will providing that testator's widow should pay all taxes assessed against the house during her lifetime, did not include assessments for permanent improvements. Chamberlin v. Gleason, 57 N. E. 487, 489, 163 N. Y. 214.

Under Bankr. Act July 1, 1898, c. 541, § 64a, 30 Stat. 563 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3447], providing that all taxes legally due and owing by the bankrupt shall be entitled to a preferred payment, a city is entitled to preference in the payment of assessments levied for local improvements. In re Stalker (U. S.) 123 Fed. 961, 964.

An assessment is a tax, though ordinarily understood to apply to specific impositions for supposed benefits for a particular work or improvement. In re Van Antwerp, 56 N. Y. 261, 265.

The distinction which has sometimes been attempted to be made between assessments for local improvements of this character (street pavements) and taxes does not rest upon any sound foundation, and seems to have led to much confusion. An assessment for the paving of an avenue constitutes a tax. Lefevre v. City of Detroit, 2 Mich. 586, 596.

An "assessment for betterment," under the statutes upon the laying out of a highway, is a tax. But it is not an ordinary tax. It is an extraordinary assessment laid on the premises, in view of the permanently increased value of the estate by reason of the public improvement in the vicinity. Plymton v. Boston Dispensary, 106 Mass. 544, 547 (citing Harvard College v. Aldermen of City of Boston, 104 Mass. 470).

An ordinance requiring lot owners to construct a pavement in front of their lots, and empowering the constable, in case of their failing so to do, to construct the same and collect the cost from the owner of the particular lot, does not levy a tax. City of Franklin v. Maberry, 25 Tenn. (8 Humph.) 368, 372, 44 Am. Dec. 315.

The word "taxes," as used in an offer to sell property for a certain sum, net, free of all commissions, taxes, etc., includes special assessments. Gibbs v. People's Nat. Bank of Claremont, 64 N. E. 1060, 1062, 198 Ill. 307.

A special assessment for street improvements is a "tax," within Rev. St. § 1114, providing that the town treasurer shall be credited by the county treasurer with the amount of unpaid taxes returned by him, and that from thenceforth the same shall belong to the county. Sheboygan Co. v. City of Sheboygan, 11 N. W. 598, 599, 54 Wis. 415.

The word "taxes," as used in a resolution of a city council, fixing the tax collector's commission at a certain per cent. on all taxes collected by him, embraces not only the tax levied for state or municipal purposes only, but also embraces taxes levied for the payment of local improvements. City of Hagerstown v. Startzman, 49 Atl. 838, 839, 93 Md. 606.

Under Const. art. 7, § 13, requiring every law imposing a tax to state the tax and its object, etc., a local assessment for street improvements is not a tax. In re Ford (N. Y.) 6 Lans. 92, 96.

"Taxes," as used in Laws 1879, c. 107, §§ 85, 86, providing that all taxes shall be due on a certain date, and fixing a time of the year after which the grantee of real estate is required to pay the taxes, in the absence of an agreement to the contrary, is to be construed as including special assessments. Tull v. Royston, 2 Pac. 866, 868, 30 Kan. 617.

Under Act April 21, 1858, providing that the real property of a railroad company, except the superstructure of the road and water station, shall be subject to taxation by ordinance for city purposes, such property is subject to assessments for street improvements. City of Philadelphia v. Philadelphia & R. R. Co., 35 Atl. 610, 611, 177 Pa. 292.

The word "tax," in Amendatory Revenue Law Wash. 1899, p. 302, § 20, declaring that the holder of a general tax certificate, before bringing an action to foreclose the lien, shall pay the "taxes" that have accrued on the property, does not include assessments for street improvements. McMillan v. City of Tacoma, 67 Pac. 68, 26 Wash. 358.

As "assessment" is taxation, it is said that the word "taxes," as used in a statute providing that "the executor shall pay the debts of the decedent in the following order: * * * (2) Taxes assessed upon the estate of the deceased prior to his death"—must be held to include "assessment"; but it was held that as assessments, such as street assessments, were not a personal debt of the decedent, and merely a charge on the land, it would not be included. In re Hun, 28 N. Y. Supp. 253, 254, 7 Misc. Rep. 409.

Same—Ad valorem assessment.

"Taxation" and "assessments" are not in all respects identical. An assessment implies a tax of a particular kind, predicated upon the principle of equivalents or benefits which are peculiar to the persons or property charged therewith, and which are said to be assessed or appraised according to the measure or proportion of such equivalents, whereas a simple tax is imposed for the purpose of supporting the government generally, without reference to any special advantage which may be supposed to accrue to the persons taxed. Therefore Const. art. 12, § 2, providing that "laws shall be passed taxing all real and personal property according to its true value in money," does not apply to assessments for street improvements. Ridenour v. Saffin (Ohio) 1 Handy, 464, 473.

The terms "taxes" and "taxation" have, respectively, the same meaning wherever found in article 11 of the Constitution, which requires that all taxes shall be assessed in exact proportion to the value of such property. The taxes which must be laid on a basis of value in section 1 constitute the taxation referred to for state purposes in section 4, for county purposes in section 5, and for municipal purposes in section 11, and therefore the only municipal taxation which the Constitution requires to be assessed in exact proportion to the value of the property is that embraced in the terms of section 7, so that assessments for paving streets are not taxes within such section, limiting the rate in cities for each year. City of Birmingham v. Klein, 7 South. 386, 387, 89 Ala. 461, 8 L. R. A. 369.

That provision of the Constitution of Missouri which requires all property subject to taxation to be taxed in proportion to its value is applicable only to taxation in its usual, ordinary, and received sense, and taxation for general state, county, city, and town purposes, and not to local assessments. Egyptian Levee Co. v. Hardin, 27 Mo. 495, 497, 72 Am. Dec. 276.

While the authority of a city council to make improvements within the municipality, and to levy assessments therefor upon the property especially benefited, is derived from the general power of taxation, yet such assessments are not "taxes," under that provision of the organic act which provides that "all property subject to taxation shall be taxed in proportion to its value." Such assessments are no part of those general taxes which are imposed for the purpose of carrying on the ordinary expenses of government, and do not fall within the prohibition of the organic act. Jones v. Holzapfel, 68 Pac. 511, 514, 11 Okl. 405.

Same—Collection, interest, and penalties.

"Tax," as used in Rev. St. 1889, c. 120, § 129, which provides that, when land has been forfeited for nonpayment of taxes, the back taxes, together with the penalty of 25 per cent. thereof, shall be added to the tax for the current year, is employed strictly, and is not synonymous with "assessment," and hence the statute does not authorize the imposition of such penalty on back special assessments. Hosmer v. Hunt Drainage Dist., 25 N. E. 747, 748, 134 Ill. 317.

"Taxes," as used in Acts 1861, c. 94, providing that all taxes which may be levied in the city of Baltimore shall be collected within four years from the levying of the same, and the collection of taxes shall not be enforced by law after the lapse of that time, means general taxes imposed on all persons for state and city purposes within the territorial limits, according to the value of their property, in consideration of the protection which the government affords alike to all, and does not include a local assessment, which is a tax levied occasionally, which may be required upon a limited class of persons interested in a local improvement, and who are presumed to be benefited by the improvement over and above the ordinary benefit which the community in general derive from the expenditure of the money. Gould v. City of Baltimore, 59 Md. 378, 379.

The term "taxes" includes special assessments by municipal corporations for public improvements, and therefore such assessments do not bear interest unless so provided by statute. Sargent v. Tuttle, 34 Atl. 1028, 1029, 67 Conn. 162, 32 L. R. A. 822.

An assessment for the benefit of a local public improvement is in its nature a tax, and as such carries no interest by way of penalty for nonpayment, unless the law expressly so provides. Vicksburg, S. & P. R. Co. v. Traylor, 29 South. 141, 145, 104 La. 284.

Under an act providing that all real estate upon which taxes remain due and unpaid on the 10th day of March annually shall be deemed delinquent, and all such due and unpaid taxes shall bear interest after the 1st day of May, etc., it is held that the word "taxes" was not intended by the Legislature to include special assessments, but related to ordinary taxes levied for state, county, and municipal purposes. Murphy v. People, 11 N. E. 202, 205, 120 Ill. 234.

The provisions of article 1, tit. 6, of the Galveston city charter of 1876, and Act Aug. 19, 1876, § 10, to enforce the collection of delinquent taxes on lands assessed since 1870, refers to ordinary taxation, and not to assessments for local improvements, such assessments are not within the meaning of the word "taxation," as employed by the Constitution and statutes. Allen v. City of Galveston, 51 Tex. 302, 320.

A statute which imposes damages for wrongfully enjoining the collection of taxes does not apply to an assessment made under an order of court to pay a judgment against a parish, as such an assessment is not a tax. Wilson v. Anderson, 28 La. Ann. 261.

The word "taxes," as used in the General Statutes of Kansas relating to the sale by the county treasurer for delinquent taxes, and providing that all taxes collected by the county treasurers shall be paid over to the city treasurer as fast as collected, etc., is used in its general sense, and includes assessments assessed for local improvements. Smith v. City of Frankfort, 42 Pac. 1003, 1005, 2 Kan. App. 411.

Street assessments are taxes, within Ky. St. § 3412, making it the duty of tax collectors of a city of the third class to collect all taxes. Delker v. City of Owensboro (Ky.) 61 S. W. 362.

Comp. St. 1893, c. 12a, § 91, declares that the city treasurer, on or before the first Monday of September of each year, shall make out and deliver to the county treasurer a full and complete list of all lots, lands, or real estate, against which at that time any taxes and assessments for the preceding year remained uncollected, together with the amount of such taxes or assessments chargeable against each lot or parcel of real estate set opposite the same, and it shall be the duty of the county treasurer to advertise and sell the lots and real estate in such delinquent list described for the purpose of paying all such taxes or assessments. Held, that the word "taxes," as used in such section, was not to be construed as synonymous with "assessments," since, if it had been intended that the two words were used synonymously, they would not have been separated by the disjunctive conjunction "or," and that the word "assessments," as there used, meant special taxes or local assessments, and that the word "taxes" was used to mean those yearly impositions levied by the corporation for general purposes. State v. Irely, 60 N. W. 601, 606, 42 Neb. 186.

Same—Covenants.

The word "taxes," as used in a lease by which defendant agrees to pay all taxes assessed on the lot and the improvements erected on it during the continuance of the lease, includes special assessments for local improvements. Cassady v. Hammer, 17 N. W. 583, 62 Iowa, 359; Blake v. Baker, 115 Mass. 188; Pettibone v. Smith, 24 Atl. 693, 150 Pa. 118, 17 L. R. A. 423.

The word "taxes," as used in a covenant of a tenant whereby he covenants "to pay all the taxes that may be assessed and levied within his term," must be presumed to be used in its common and ordinary acceptance and meaning, and therefore the tenant is not liable for grading and paving assessments. Longmore v. Tiernan (Pa.) 3 Pittsb. R. 62, 64.

A covenant in a lease that the lessee shall pay the taxes of every name and kind that shall be assessed on the premises during the term does not include an assessment for benefit, imposed by authorities of the city in which the lands lie to provide for the expenses of a local improvement. Beals v. Providence Rubber Co., 11 R. I. 381, 382, 23 Am. Rep. 472.

The power to levy special assessments is derived from the taxing power of the government; but the word "taxes," without more, is not generally understood to include assessments, and hence a tenant agreeing to pay taxes on the leased premises is not required to pay special assessments thereon. Ittner v. Robinson, 52 N. W. 846, 847, 35 Neb. 133.

The word "assessment," as used in a lease, obligating the lessee to pay all assessments whatsoever levied, did not bind him to the payment of state, city, and county taxes for general purposes; for, though the word "assessment" is often used to signify a proceeding which includes taxes in the above connection, it was used as a proper specific designation of the charges on the property, in which sense it does not include general taxes. The popular understanding and use of the word makes it refer specifically to those charges imposed on real property by the city to defray the expense of local improvements in proportion to the benefits received, and this distinction between "assessments" and "taxes" is observed in the enactments of the Legislature, in all of which the word "assessments" is used as meaning an entirely different proceeding or thing from "taxes." Stephani v. Catholic Bishop of Chicago, 2 Ill. App. (2 Bradw.) 249, 252.

A special assessment for paving is not a "tax," or public due of any kind, within the meaning of a lease requiring a certain annual rent, besides "all taxes and public dues of any kind"; the court stating that the phrase in question extended only to ordinary and usual taxes and public dues, and could not be regarded as including an expense which, like the one in question, was unknown to the parties, incalculable as to amount, uncertain as to time, and in which the lessee could have no certain interest. Bolling v. Stokes (Va.) 2 Leigh, 178, 181, 21 Am. Dec. 606.

The exception of the taxes for 1893 from the covenant in a deed against incumbrances did not include an assessment for the construction of a sewer. Smith v. Abington Sav. Bank, 42 N. E. 1133, 165 Mass. 235.

Special assessments for improving the streets of the city are not taxes, and hence do not come within the exceptions of a covenant against incumbrances in a warranty deed, except taxes. Cleveland Park Land & Improvement Co. v. Campbell, 65 Mo. App. 109, 113.

There is no doubt that the word "taxes," in a deed conveying land clear from taxes, may be used in such a way as to include or exclude an assessment for a sewer. In Smith v. Abington Sav. Bank, 165 Mass. 285, 42 N. E. 1133, an exception of "the taxes assessed for the year 1893" from a covenant against incumbrances in a deed was held to refer only to the ordinary annual taxes, and not to embrace such a lien; and where a deed conveyed a good title, free of taxes, it included the special assessment. Williams v. Monk, 60 N. E. 394, 179 Mass. 22.

Assessments for street and sidewalk improvements are not within the covenant of a lessee to pay the water tax and half of all other taxes levied on the property. De Clercq v. Barber Asphalt Paving Co., 47 N. E. 367, 167 Ill. 215.

Where a covenant in a deed is to the effect that the premises were free from incumbrances, except taxes, it is possible for the grantee to establish a construction of the term "taxes" which would exclude local assessments. Sullivan v. Hamilton, 43 N. Y. Supp. 302, 13 App. Div. 140.

The word "assessments," as used in a deed of lots sold under ordinance of 1790, providing that the lots shall be held forever on payment of the ground rent, but shall be subject to all such assessments and burdens as might be in common with other lot holders in the city, will not be construed in its more modern meaning of a peculiar kind of tax levied upon land specially benefited by improvements which are to be paid for by such assessments. The fact is notorious that a century ago special assessments of this kind on the lands benefited were not usual in this country, and at that time the word "assessment" was used as synonymous with rates or taxes generally. Hence such lands are not exempt from taxation. Wells v. City of Savannah, 21 Sup. Ct. 697, 701, 181 U. S. 531, 45 L. Ed. 986; Id., 32 S. E. 669, 670, 107 Ga. 1.

Same—Equality and uniformity.

Constitutional provisions that all "taxes" or "taxation" shall be equal and uniform apply only to general taxation, and have no application to local assessments. Missouri, K. & T. Trust Co. v. Smart, 25 South. 443, 446, 51 La. Ann. 416; Motz v. City of Detroit, 18 Mich. 495, 514; Woodbridge v. City of Detroit, 8 Mich. 274, 280; Chambers v. Satterlee, 40 Cal. 497; Emery v. San Francisco Gas Co., 28 Cal. 345, 356; Taylor v. Boyd, 63 Tex. 533, 541; Beaumont v. City of Wilkes-Barre, 21 Atl. 888, 891, 142 Pa.

198; Speer v. City of Athens, 11 S. E. 802, 805, 85 Ga. 49, 9 L. R. A. 402; Gosnell v. City of Louisville, 46 S. W. 722, 725, 104 Ky. 201; Bond v. City of Kenosha, 17 Wis. 284, 288.

In the ordinary use of the words "tax" and "assessments," there is a recognized difference between their meaning. The one does not in any sense include the other. Thus a constitutional provision that taxation shall be equal and uniform throughout the state does not apply to local assessments on private property to pay for local improvements. So a provision of the Constitution of a state which requires "the rule of taxation to be uniform," in connection with another provision that "it shall be the duty of the Legislature to provide for the organization of cities and to restrain their power of taxation, assessment," etc., "so as to prevent abuses in assessments and taxation," is also construed not to apply to special assessments by municipal corporations made by authority of the Legislature for local improvements. Lake Shore & M. S. Ry. Co. v. City of Grand Rapids, 60 N. W. 767, 770, 102 Mich. 374, 29 L. R. A. 195 (quoting Dill. Mun. Corp. § 778).

An assessment for improving a street in a city is a tax, and hence must be levied with uniformity. Whiting v. Quackenbush, 54 Cal. 306, 310.

"Taxing," as used in the Constitution, providing that laws shall be passed taxing by uniform rule, etc., all property according to its true value, etc., should not be construed as distinguished from the word "assessing," as meaning that the term "tax" is applicable to a general tax, while an assessment relates merely to a levy under a local ordinance, but should be construed to apply to local improvement assessments of a city. Peay v. City of Little Rock, 32 Ark. 31, 35.

A tax for lawful improvements, levied on the property within a district created by an act of the Legislature, authorizing the imposition of the tax, is a tax within the meaning of Const. art. 11, § 13, providing that "taxation" shall be equal and uniform through the state, and that all property shall be taxed in proportion to its value, to be ascertained as directed by law. Smith v. Farrelly, 52 Cal. 77, 81.

The term "taxation," as used in Const. art. 1, § 32, declaring that no tax or duty shall be imposed without the consent of the people, or their representatives in the legislative assembly, and that all taxation shall be equal and uniform, can be limited alone to the meeting of such expenses as are necessary for the maintenance of the general government of state, county, city, etc., and that the full power resides in the legislative assembly to provide for other expenses belonging to any other branch of taxation, in their discretion, which discretion is final. The granting by the Legislature to a city of the right to apportion expenses for improving a street on the adjacent lots was, therefore, a rightful exercise of legislative authority. King v. City of Portland, 2 Or. 146, 157.

Same—Exemptions.

Property exempt from taxation is still liable for assessments for a public improvement. Yates v. City of Milwaukee, 68 N. W. 248, 249, 92 Wis. 352.

A statute exempting from all taxation property granted a railroad company did not exempt it from a "special assessment" for municipal improvements. Winona & St. P. R. Co. v. City of Watertown, 44 N. W. 1072, 1073, 1 S. D. 46.

A special tax on a railroad, in lieu of all other taxes, does not confer an exemption from special assessments for local improvements. Lake Shore & M. S. Ry. Co. v. City of Grand Rapids, 60 N. W. 767, 770, 102 Mich. 374, 29 L. R. A. 195. The word "tax," as used in Connecticut statutes imposing a tax upon a railroad company and providing that the tax so imposed shall take the place and be in lieu of all other taxes on the railroad, does not include a local assessment imposed for a local improvement. City of Bridgeport v. New York & N. H. R. Co., 36 Conn. 255, 262, 4 Am. Rep. 63.

A railroad company, which by its charter is exempt from all "taxation" of every kind, is nevertheless liable to a special tax levied on its right of way for street paving; special taxation for local improvements not being in the nature of taxation, but being based on the doctrine of compensation for the benefit received from the improvement. Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. City of Decatur, 18 N. E. 315, 316, 126 Ill. 92, 1 L. R. A. 613.

The provision of the act "to provide for raising taxes for the use of the state upon certain corporations," etc., exempting from assessment and taxation, save as provided for in the act, the capital stock and personal property of the corporations specified, applies only to state taxation, and does not affect the right of municipal authorities to assess and tax such property for local purposes. People v. Davenport, 91 N. Y. 574, 575.

A gross earnings tax on a railroad, "in lieu of all taxes and assessments whatever," relieves it from any charge or special tax imposed on the property for local improvements. First Division of St. Paul & P. R. Co. v. City of St. Paul, 21 Minn. 526, 529; City of St. Paul v. St. Paul & S. C. R. Co., 23 Minn. 469, 471.

Under the charter of a railroad authorizing the taxation of its capital stock, and providing that "no other or further tax or imposition" should be levied, it was not liable for an assessment for a portion of the damages and expenses of altering and widening a street used by its tracks. New Jersey R. & Transp. Co. v. City of Newark, 27 N. J. Law (3 Dutch.) 185, 193.

The phrase "exempt from taxation," as used in the statutes of Illinois, providing that the property of the Illinois & Michigan Canal shall be exempt from taxation of every description, etc., does not include assessments for improvements. Trustees of Illinois & M. Canal v. City of Chicago, 12 Ill. (2 Peck) 403, 406.

An exemption of the lands of a manufacturing corporation from "taxes, charges, and impositions" does not relieve it from assessments for street improvements. City of Paterson v. Society for Establishing Useful Manufactures, 24 N. J. Law (4 Zab.) 385, 400.

The exemption of the property of a religious or charitable institution from "taxation" does not exempt it from assessments for local improvements. Boston Asylum & Farm School for Indigent Boys v. Street Com'rs of City of Boston, 62 N. E. 961, 962, 180 Mass. 485; Boston Seamen's Friend Soc. v. City of Boston, 116 Mass. 181, 183, 17 Am. Rep. 153; First Presbyterian Church v. City of Ft. Wayne, 36 Ind. 338, 339, 10 Am. Rep. 35; In re College St., 8 R. I. 474, 483; Lake Shore & M. S. Ry. Co. v. City of Grand Rapids, 60 N. W. 767, 769, 102 Mich. 374, 29 L. R. A. 195; In re City of New York (N. Y.) 11 Johns. 77, 80, 81; Roosevelt Hospital v. City of New York, 84 N. Y. 108, 112; Sheehan v. Good Samaritan Hospital, 50 Mo. 155, 157, 11 Am. Rep. 412; City of Chicago v. Baptist Theological Union, 2 N. E. 254, 256, 115 Ill. 245; City of Louisville v. McNaughten (Ky.) 44 S. W. 880. Nor does an exemption from "taxation for governmental purposes." Kilgus v. Trustees of Orphanage of the Good Shepherd, 22 S. W. 750, 751, 94 Ky. 439, 15 Ky. Law Rep. 318. Nor an exemption from "all taxation by state or local laws for any purpose whatever." Zable v. Louisville Baptist Orphans' Home, 17 S. W. 212, 213, 92 Ky. 89, 13 L. R. A. 668. But an exemption from "all taxes and assessments" relieves it from assessments for local improvements. Proprietors of Swan Point Cemetery v. Tripp, 14 R. I. 199, 203; Hudson County Catholic Protectory v. Board of Township Committee of Kearney Tp., 28 Atl. 1043, 1044, 56 N. J. Law (27 Vroom) 385. Contra, see Protestant Foster Home Soc. v. City of Newark, 35 N. J. Law (6 Vroom) 157, 162, 10 Am. Rep. 223; Id., 36 N. J. Law (7 Vroom) 478, 13 Am. Rep. 464. Likewise an exemption from "taxation, excepting for state purposes." Olive Ceme-

Within Act May 11, 1874, exempting churches and schoolhouses belonging to any county and certain other public buildings from all and every county, city, borough, bounty, road, school, and poor tax, an assessment for the purpose of building a school is a "tax." That such assessment is a tax is definitely settled in the case of Olive Cemetery Co. v. City of Philadelphia, 93 Pa. 129, 39 Am. Rep. 732, where it is said: "It is conceded, however, that the authority to make and collect such assessments is delegated by the commonwealth. If it does not emanate from the inherent powers of the government to levy and collect taxes, it is difficult to understand whence it comes. The only warrant for delegating such authority must be either in the right of eminent domain or in the taxing power. It cannot be found in the former; hence it must be in the latter." City of Erie v. First Universalist Church, 105 Pa. 278, 279.

An exemption of public buildings from "taxation" does not include special assessments. Adams County v. City of Quincy, 22 N. E. 624, 626, 130 Ill. 566, 6 L. R. A. 155.

An assessment for purposes of irrigation against the pueblo lands of a city, which are vacant, unoccupied, and, when irrigated, susceptible of cultivation, by an irrigation district, is not a tax, within the consideration exempting municipal property from taxation. City of San Diego v. Linda Vista Irr. Dist., 41 Pac. 291, 292, 108 Cal. 189.

The exemption of real estate of incorporated agricultural societies from taxation by Gen. St. c. 11, § 5, is only from taxation imposed for the general public purposes of the government, and does not apply to taxation for local improvements. Worcester Agricultural Soc. v. City of Worcester, 118 Mass. 189, 191.

Same—Forced sale.

Within Const. art. 16, § 50, subjecting homesteads to forced sale for taxes due thereon, does not include a special assessment against a homestead for street paving. Lovenberg v. City of Galveston, 42 S. W. 1024, 17 Tex. Civ. App. 162.

A power given to a municipal corporation to sell land for taxes will not authorize a sale for a mere assessment for benefit. Sharp v. Johnson (N. Y.) 4 Hill, 92, 102, 40 Am. Dec. 259.

The statutes have made a plain distinction between taxes which are burdens or charges imposed on persons or property to raise money for public purposes and assessments for city or village improvements, which are not regarded as burdens; and hence a city has no authority to sell lands for taxes imposed on owners and occupants merely, and not on their lands. Sharpe v. Speir (N. Y.) 4 Hill, 76, 82.

Same—Jurisdiction.

Assessments against the property owner for the cost of the banquettes or paving laid in front of his property under the provisions of a city charter are not "taxes" in the meaning of the article of the Louisiana Constitution defining the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court. Fayssoux v. Denis, 19 South. 760, 761, 48 La. Ann. 850.

The words "tax, toll, and impost," in Const. 1898, art. 85, declaring that the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court shall extend to all cases in which the constitutionality of any tax, toll, or impost whatever shall be in contestation, include any and every exaction, charge, contribution, burden, or tribute levied on the citizen or his property, whenever money or funds are demanded by the law from the citizen or assessed against his property, no matter what the form or method of taxation, whether for general purposes or for local benefits; the language of the Constitution being intentionally made broad enough to cover it. A controversy as to the validity of a city ordinance imposing an assessment on abutting property for the improvement of the street is, therefore, appealable to the Supreme Court, because the cost of the local assessment involved is a tax within the meaning of the constitutional provision. City of Shreveport v. Prescott, 26 South. 664, 667, 51 La. Ann. 1895, 46 L. R. A. 193.

"Taxes," as used in Const. art. 6, § 9, providing that the county court shall have jurisdiction in all matters relating to county taxes, has reference to taxation for general county purposes, and does not include special local assessments, which are raised to be expended for the improvement of the property taxed, and not for the common welfare. McGehee v. Mathis, 21 Ark. 40, 51.

Same—Limitation of amount of taxation.

An assessment for the grading and paving of a street is not a tax, so as to affect the limit fixed on city authorities as to the extent of a tax they may lay in any one year. Borough of Greensburg v. Young, 53 Pa. (3 P. F. Smith) 280, 284.

A local assessment for public works, levied, not on the taxable property generally for mere common public benefit, but only on particular property severally benefited by the works as an equivalent for the direct benefit conferred, are not taxes within the meaning of constitutional restrictions on the power of taxation. Charnock v. Fordoche & Grosse-Tête Special Levee Dist. Co., 38 La. Ann. 323, 325.

Same—Payment in state bonds.

"Taxes," as used in Act March 30, 1871, providing that coupons on state bonds should be receivable for all taxes, debts, dues, and demands due the state, includes the "charges or assessments made by law as a condition precedent to obtaining license for pursuing a business or profession." Royall v. Virginia, 6 Sup. Ct. 510, 513, 118 U. S. 572, 29 L. Ed. 735.

Assessment of road labor.

The assessment and performance of labor on a highway is not the payment of a tax within the poor laws. Overseers of Poor of Town of Amenia v. Overseers of Stanford (N. Y.) 6 Johns. 92, 93 (cited in Town of Starksborough v. Town of Hinesburgh, 13 Vt. 215, 221).

The word "taxes," in the absence of a clear indication to the contrary, must be considered to refer exclusively to the ordinary public taxes, and to be used in the sense of money, and not labor or imposts. The intent is to be deduced from the instrument in which the terms are used. The assessment of road labor or payment of commutation in lieu thereof is not a tax. The ordinance of a town in Florida providing that all able-bodied male residents thereof should be subject to work upon the streets and highways of said town for six days in each year does not impose a tax. Galloway v. Town of Tavares, 19 South. 170, 171, 37 Fla. 58.

Assessment to pay judgment against parish.

A statute which imposes damages for wrongfully enjoining the collection of taxes does not apply to an assessment made under an order of court to pay a judgment against a parish, as such an assessment is not a tax. Wilson v. Anderson, 28 La. Ann. 261.

Bonus distinguished.

See "Bonus."

Commutation tax.

The provisions of Const. art. 7, § 14, requiring three-fifths to form a quorum on the passage of bills to impose taxes, has no reference to the passage of a military law, by which a commutation tax is imposed on the un-uniformed militia in lieu of militia service. People v. Supervisors of Chenango, 8 N. Y. (4 Seld.) 317, 325.

Costs, interest, and penalties.

The word "taxes," as used in Revenue Act 1872, § 253, by which taxes are made a lien on the land, is declared by the act to embrace taxes, costs, interest, or penalties. Therefore the act of 1881, amending section 253, in terms making the taxes, penalties, interest, and costs a lien upon the property assessed, creates no new lien. Biggins v. People, 106 Ill. 270, 276.

Debt distinguished.

See "Debt."

Eminent domain distinguished.

"Taxation" exacts money or services from individuals as and for their respective shares of contribution to any public burden. Private property taken for public use by right of eminent domain is taken, not as the owner's share of contribution to a public burden, but as so much beyond his share. Special compensation is therefore made in the latter case, because the government is the debtor for the property so taken, but not in the former, because the payment of taxes is a duty, and creates no obligation to repay otherwise than in the proper application of the tax. Taxation operates on a community, or a class of persons in a community, and by some rule of apportionment. The exercise of the right of eminent domain operates on an individual, without reference to the amount or value exacted from any other individual or class of individuals. Keeping these distinctions in mind, it will never be difficult to determine which of the two powers is exerted in any given case. People v. City of Brooklyn, 4 N. Y. (4 Comst.) 419, 424, 55 Am. Dec. 268.

Fees of officers.

The word "tax" in its broadest significance includes fees, costs, and all of the pecuniary burdens imposed upon the people under authority of law. But it does not follow that, because taxes might in certain cases include fees, it was necessarily intended that it should have such meaning in Const. § 20, forbidding the passage of local laws for the assessment and collection of taxes; and hence a local law regulating the fees of county officers was not unconstitutional. State v. Fogus, 9 Pac. 123, 124, 19 Nev. 247.

A statute requiring, in all counties of more than 50,000 inhabitants, the sheriff and certain other officers to exact in all civil actions, suits, or proceedings certain fees and charges for the benefit of the counties, is not in conflict with the provisions of the Constitution that "the legislative assembly shall not pass special or local laws in any of the following enumerated cases, that is to say, * * * regulating the practice in courts of justice, * * * and for the assessment and collection of taxes for state, county, township, or road purposes." The terms "assessment" and "taxation" are often used in the sense coextensive with the sovereign power under which the right is exercised, as, for instance, when applied to the raising of a special fund to defray the expenses of a public local improvement. But the long and well-established meaning of the terms, as ordinarily used in the Constitution and statutes, and as generally understood, imports a burden imposed for general revenue, for the ordinary expenses of the state, county, or township government. The term "taxation," both in common parlance and in the laws of the several states, has been ordinarily used, not to express the idea of sovereign power which is exercised, but the exercise of that power for a particular purpose, viz., to raise a revenue for the general and ordinary expenses of the government, whether it be the state, county, town, or city government. It is in this sense the word is used in the section of the Constitution under consideration. A law providing a salary for the sheriffs and other court officers in certain counties, and fees to be paid to the county by litigants for the services of such officers and the court, are in no sense an exercise of the taxing power, and do not constitute the levy of a tax. State v. Frazier, 59 Pac. 5, 7, 8, 36 Or. 178.

The "tax" provided for in Rev. Code, c. 28, § 4, providing that on every indictment or civil suit the parties convicted or cast shall pay a tax of one dollar, and in every suit in equity a tax of two dollars, is not repealed by the general revenue act of 1858-59, repealing all taxes not therein imposed, because the tax is not the kind of taxes embraced in that revenue act. Indeed, it is not a tax at all, in the sense public taxes are understood. It is a part of the bill of costs taxed by the clerk, to be paid by the unsuccessful party in every suit, to pay the expenses of the court, the aid of which he has wrongfully invoked at the public expense. The fact that it is called a "tax" makes no difference. "Tax" is a familiar and appropriate term in judicial proceedings. The fees of clerks, sheriffs, witnesses, referees, and lawyers are all taxes upon the losing party, and are taxed by the clerk as costs. One of the definitions of tax in Webster is "to assess, fix, or determine judicially as to the amount of costs on actions in court, as 'the court taxes bills of cost.'" Hewlett v. Nutt, 79 N. C. 263, 264.

Whether the sum required by Rev. St. § 148a, as amended February 12, 1889, requiring a payment to the Secretary of State for filing articles of incorporation and also of consolidation, be termed a "fee" or "tax" or "assessment," is immaterial; for it is clearly not a tax on property. The filing and record of such articles is simply an authority or license to the persons filing them to form a corporation, and the sum paid therefor is the consideration demanded and paid the state for the grant of the right to be a corporation. Ashley v. Ryan, 31 N. E. 721, 724, 49 Ohio St. 504.

The word "taxed," as used in Sess. Laws 1895, c. 189, § 6, requiring the stenographer's fee to be taxed as costs in each case in the district court, is here used in the sense of assessing, fixing, or determining the amount to be paid by the unsuccessful party in an action in court, and such fee is not a tax within section 1, art. 11, of the Constitution. Beebe v. Wells, 15 Pac. 565, 567, 37 Kan. 472.

Fee on trackage of railroad.

A fee of $1 per mile for each mile of track operated within a state by a railroad, to be paid to the commissioner of railroads and telegraphs, is a tax; its nature not being affected by the name assigned to it. Pittsburgh, C. & St. L. Ry. Co. v. State, 16 L. R. A. 380, 383, 49 Ohio St. 189, 30 N. E. 435.

Fines and forfeitures.

"Taxes," as used in Act March 18, 1879, limiting the appropriation of taxes by the county court to "90 per cent. of the taxes for that year," means all the taxes levied upon the assessments of property and to be extended upon the tax books. The term does not comprehend or embrace the revenue accruing to the county from fines, forfeitures, and licenses, and does not prevent the court from appropriating that also, in addition to the appropriation of 90 per cent. of the taxes levied on the assessments of property, since the revenues to arise from fines, forfeitures, penalties, or licenses are wholly independent, and have no connection with nor relation to the amounts levied on property. Allis v. Jefferson County, 34 Ark. 307, 311.

Import duties.

Under Rev. St. § 3369 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 2204], providing that, when forfeited cigars offered for sale will not bring a price equal to the tax due and payable thereon, such goods shall not be sold for consumption in the United States, it is held that the term "tax" is not intended to include import duties, but refers merely to the internal revenue tax. United States v. Fifty-Nine Demijohns Aguadiente and Four Barrels of Cigarettes (D. C.) 39 Fed. 401.

As incumbrance.

See "Incumbrance (On Title)."

Judgment distinguished.

Judgments are the judicial sentences of courts, rendered in cases within their jurisdiction and coming legally before them, and are conclusive in all cases where no appeal or writ of error lies, and cannot be inquired into or controverted. Taxes, on the other hand, are those proportional and reasonable assessments or duties which may, by reason of the Constitution, be imposed from time to time by the general court upon the inhabitants of the commonwealth, for the necessary defense and support of the government, and for the protection and the preservation of the rights and to promote the interests of the people. They do not partake of the nature of judgments. Neither are they contracts between party and party, either express or implied. They are acts of the government, binding upon the inhabitants, to the making or enforcing of which their personal consent individually is not required. Therefore taxes are not the subject of set-off, under Rev. St. Mass. c. 96, § 2, providing that no demand shall be a set-off unless it is founded upon a judgment or upon a contract. Peirce v. City of Boston, 44 Mass. (3 Metc.) 520, 521. See, also, Bonaparte v. State, 63 Md. 465, 470.

As Liability.

See "Liability."

License or license fee.

A license is not a "tax" in the constitutional sense of that word. City of East St. Louis v. Wehrung, 46 Ill. 392, 393 (citing People v. Thurber, 13 Ill. [3 Peck] 554); United States Distilling Co. v. City of Chicago, 112 Ill. 19, 21; Braun v. City of Chicago, 110 Ill. 183, 186; City of Santa Barbara v. Stearns, 51 Cal. 499, 501; People v. Naglee, 1 Cal. 232, 252, 52 Am. Dec. 312.

The term "taxation," as used in the doctrine that the Legislature cannot authorize the power of taxation under the pretense of sanitary regulations, or other exercise of the police power of the state, in the interests of the public health and safety, means the providing of revenue for the ordinary expenses of state or municipal government. But it does not follow, therefore, that any ordinance will be held void simply because it provides for a fund to be derived from license fees, and such a measure will not be held to come within the doctrine above mentioned, and will be upheld by the courts whenever it appears to have been designed to promote the welfare of the public, and the revenue derived therefrom is not disproportionate to the cost of its enforcement and the regulation of the business to which it applies. Littlefield v. State, 60 N. W. 724, 725, 42 Neb. 223, 28 L. R. A. 588, 47 Am. St. Rep. 697.

The word "taxation," in its ordinary sense, means a charge for the support of the state, or some of its subordinate municipal agencies, and does not refer to a charge merely incidental to the exercise of the police power. City of Oil City v. Oil City Trust Co., 25 Atl. 124, 125, 151 Pa. 454.

Any pecuniary charge imposed by the government for the privilege of residence or holding property, or of exercising a calling or engaging in a profession or business, is a tax; and hence, where a state contracted that the coupons attached to its bonds shall be receivable for all taxes, the contract embraces license taxes. Harvey v. Virginia (U. S.) 20 Fed. 411, 413.

"Taxation," as used in Const. art. 9, § 8, authorizing municipalities to assess and collect taxes for corporate purposes, includes the power of a municipality to impose by way of license fees a tax on business and avocations, though strictly speaking the imposition of a license for a trade or calling by a municipality is referable to the police power possessed by such bodies. State v. City of Columbia, 6 S. C. (6 Rich.) 1, 4.

"License" and "tax" are frequently and properly employed as convertible terms, though not precisely synonymous; for a license fee or exaction, whatever name or designation is given it, when plainly imposed for the sole or main purpose of revenue, is in effect a tax. Parish of East Felicinia v. Levy, 4 South. 309, 40 La. Ann. 332.

The charter of a corporation provided that it should be exempt from any state, county, or municipal tax or license for transacting business. Held, that the words "tax or license" were not used synonymously, and the company was exempt from payment of all taxes, and not merely from paying a license for carrying on its business. City of Bowling Green v. Kentucky Masonic Mut. Life Ins. Co., 5 Ky. Law Rep. 697.

The "power to tax" means the power to take from the citizen a sum for the support of the government, whether that be national, state, or municipal. A power to license is not a power to tax. Hoeftling v. City of San Antonio, 20 S. W. 85, 87, 85 Tex. 228, 16 L. R. A. 608.

The tax imposed by Act March 24, 1881, imposing on every firm, person, or association of persons owning or running any palaces, sleeping, or dining room cars not owned by the railroad company, an annual tax, is not a tax upon persons, which under the Constitution of Texas must be uniform; nor is it a tax upon property, which under the Constitution of Texas must be taxed in proportion to its value. Pullman Palace Car Co. v. State, 64 Tex. 274, 275, 53 Am. Rep. 758.

As used in a contract by the owner with the pledgee of a stallion to refund to him the taxes paid by him upon the stallion upon its return to the owner, "taxes" does not include a license paid to keep the horse; the word "taxes" referring to taxes on the horse itself, and not upon the use of the horse. Anderson v. Doll, 27 Cal. 607, 611. See, also, Allis v. Jefferson County, 34 Ark. 307.

The word "tax," in Const. 1849, art. 6, § 6, providing that the district courts shall have original jurisdiction in all cases at law involving the illegality of any tax, and in Code Civ. Proc. 1872, § 838, providing that parties to an action in a justice's court cannot give evidence upon any question which involves the legality of any tax, is used in its large sense, as being a charge or burden imposed upon persons, property, or business to raise money for public purposes, and therefore includes a license fee or charge for the transaction of any business. City of Santa Barbara v. Stearns, 51 Cal. 499, 501.

The word "taxes," as used in Const. art. 11, § 12, providing that the Legislature shall have no power to impose taxes on counties, cities, towns, etc., for county, city, town, or municipal purposes, includes license fees imposed mainly, if not solely, for the purpose of revenue. It is clear that the section is not limited to taxes upon property; for by its language the Legislature is prohibited from imposing taxes upon the inhabitants of municipal corporations, as well as upon other property, for municipal purposes, and a license tax imposed and required to be paid into the county treasury for the use of the county general fund is outside of the power of the Legislature to impose. People v. Martin, 60 Cal. 153, 155.

"Tax," within the meaning of the statute requiring that all taxes imposed by the city of New Orleans shall bear 10 per cent. interest, etc., is generic, and includes a license tax levied for revenue. City of New Orleans v. Rhenish Westphalian Lloyds, 81 La. Ann. 781, 785.

A tax carries with it the idea of imposition and compulsion. A statute imposing a duty on goods sold at public outcry by licensed auctioneers, and which duty is to be paid by the vendor of the goods, is not a tax, because it is purely optional with the vendor whether he will or will not avail himself of the advantages offered by the state upon the terms it proposes. If he do avail himself thereof, he thereby agrees to pay the charges imposed. Wintz v. Girardey, 31 La. Ann. 381, 383.

The charter of a corporation exempting its stock from taxation did not exempt it from the payment of a license "tax." City of New Orleans v. New Orleans Canal & Banking Co., 32 La. Ann. 104, 105.

A license imposed by a city ordinance on all persons keeping a meat shop or stand outside the city market is not a "tax," but compensation which the city demands from such dealers for the additional labor of officers and expense thereby imposed. Ash v. People, 11 Mich. 347, 352, 83 Am. Dec. 740.

The word "tax," in Const. art. 10, § 3, providing that taxes shall be uniform on the same class of subjects within the territorial limits of the authority levying the tax, includes a license fee imposed on the keepers of meat shops. City of St. Louis v. Spiegel, 75 Mo. 145, 146.

The imposition of a license fee, by an ordinance exacting a charge for a license to give theatrical exhibitions for a specified time, together with a fee of one dollar for the officer issuing the license, is not a tax, within the meaning of Const. art. 12, § 5, requiring the taxing of all property by a uniform rule. Baker v. City of Cincinnati, 11 Ohio St. 534, 540.

Same—Corporation fee.

The annual license fee imposed in New Jersey on corporations is not a tax, and therefore is not provable as such under Bankr. Act July 1, 1898, c. 541, 30 Stat. 544 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3418]. In re Danville Rolling Mill Co. (U. S.) 121 Fed. 432.

Rev. St. c. 24, §§ 22, 23, requiring an agent of a foreign insurance company to take out a license, is not a tax on property, but is a burden imposed on the agent for the right of exercising a franchise or privilege, and which the Legislature would have the right to withhold or inhibit altogether; and the amount of premiums charged is merely used as a mode of computing the amount to be paid for the exercise of the privilege. People v. Thurber, 13 Ill. (3 Peck) 554, 557.

Same—Dog tax.

The tax laid on dogs is not ascertained by value, but specifically, and therefore is to be regarded as a license, rather than a tax, and hence does not come within the provision of a statute exempting personal property of a railway company from taxation. Hendrie v. Kalthoff, 12 N. W. 191, 48 Mich. 306.

The word "tax," means a burden, charge, or imposition placed or set on persons or property for public use; and hence, since dogs cannot be said to be property, a statute imposing a tax of $1 per annum on dogs does not use the term in its common acceptation, but rather in the sense of license, and is therefore not within Const. 1876, art. 8, § 1, providing that all property shall be taxed in proportion to its value—the word "tax," as used in the Constitution, being used according to its usual acceptation as defined. Ex parte Cooper, 3 Tex. App. 489, 493, 30 Am. Rep. 152; Cole v. Hall, 103 Ill. 30, 31.

In Van Horn v. People, 46 Mich. 183, 9 N. W. 246, 41 Am. Rep. 159, the question was considered as to whether a per capita tax on dogs is a tax. Graves, J., in delivering the opinion says: "The fundamental proposition is that the exaction attempted by the statute is a tax, and, not being laid according to any mode of uniformity, nor assessed according to the cash value of the property, the imposition is unconstitutional. It is also suggested that dogs are included in the actual mass of property taxed under the general law, and that it is not competent to select one species of property and subject it to double taxation. It is unnecessary to point out the inaccuracies of this reasoning. The foundation on which it rests is fallacious. The supposition that the statute is an emanation from the taxing power is a mistake. The act is an execution of the police power, and no reason is perceived for denying its validity." The same general doctrine has been declared in Blair v. Forehand, 100 Mass. 136, 97 Am. Dec. 82, 1 Am. Rep. 94; Tenney v. Lenz, 16 Wis. 566; Mitchell v. Williams, 27 Ind. 62; Holst v. Roe, 39 Ohio St. 340, 342, 345, 48 Am. Rep. 459.

Same—Liquor license.

The word "tax" in its proper sense does not include a license issued for retailing liquor. Burch v. City of Savannah, 42 Ga. 596, 598 (cited in State v. Hardy, 7 Neb. 377, 380).

While the burden imposed by the Dow law (Act March 3, 1888) upon the traffic in intoxicating liquors is in some of the sections of the law termed an "assessment," the word is used as synonymous with "tax." State v. Rouch, 25 N. E. 59, 63, 47 Ohio St. 478.

A payment of $100, or any other amount of money, for a license to sell spirituous liquors, is not a "tax," within Const. art. 10, § 5, providing that no tax shall be levied, except in pursuance of law, etc. Henry v. State, 28 Ark. 523, 525.

The imposition of a state tax upon such privileges, pursuits, and occupations as are of no real use to society, such as the occupation of a wholesale dealer in spirituous liquors, is not a tax upon property, within the meaning of the Constitution of Arkansas, providing for the taxation of property according to its true value in money. Straub v. Gordon, 27 Ark. 625, 628.

"Taxation" is a legislative power, specially mentioned in the Constitution, but always in connection with the subject of revenue for the support of the government generally, or some particular department or branch of it; and it is in such connection that we find the requirement of uniformity. This being so, we are led to conclude that this constitutional injunction has reference solely to taxation pure and simple, according to the commonly accepted meaning of the term, for the purpose of revenue only, and not those impositions made incidentally under the police power of the state, exerted either directly or by delegation as a means of constraining and regulating what may be regarded as a pernicious or offensive act or business; so that the exaction of license fees under the act regulating the taxation of intoxicating liquors is not "taxation" in either the ordinary or constitutional signification of such word. Pleuler v. State, 10 N. W. 481, 486, 11 Neb. 547.

The power to tax or restrain the sale of liquor, when given to a municipal corporation, includes the power to license the sale thereof. Town of Mt. Carmel v. Wabash County, 50 Ill. 69, 73.

Licenses to keep saloons are issued under the police power, while licenses to conduct other classes of business do not need police regulation. Such licensing is used simply as a means of obtaining revenue; and, whether granted under the police power or the taxing power, the sums paid for them are a source of revenue, and in equity constitute a tax on the particular business. Fritsch v. Salt Lake County, 47 Pac. 1023, 1029, 15 Utah, 83.

"Taxes," as used in a statute providing that all land and other taxable property situated within the limits of a corporation shall be exempt from the payment of parish taxes, etc., does not include parish licenses, such as saloon keepers' licenses, etc. The word "taxes," as used in the statute, means property taxes. Parish of Morehouse v. Brigham, 6 South. 257, 258, 41 La. Ann. 665.

Tax on gross receipts of railroad.

An ordinance adopted as a part of the state Constitution by the people of Missouri July 4, 1865, imposing a tax on the gross receipts of a certain railroad company, imposes a tax, notwithstanding the fact that the ordinance provides that the same shall be appropriated by the General Assembly in payment of the principal and interest due and to become due upon the bonds issued by the state to the company. Pacific R. Co. v. Maguire, 87 U. S. (20 Wall.) 86, 44, 22 L. Ed. 232.

Tolls.

A "tax" is a demand of sovereignty, while a "toll" is a demand of proprietorship. City of St. Louis v. Western Union Tel. Co., 13 Sup. Ct. 485, 487, 148 U. S. 92, 37 L. Ed. 380.

Tolls for the actual use of passage over land or water highways cannot be treated as taxes. They are not levied on the property or on persons as their share of any public burden laid on the people, but they are a fixed compensation in lieu of a quantum valebat for the use of that which has value and which is actually used to advantage. Thus taxes levied on those who used a stream, which had been improved for logging purposes by the state, is not a tax. It is collected for the same purpose as turnpike tolls, or railway and wharfage charges, which no one ever has supposed were public taxes, or a tax at all. Manistee River Imp. Co. v. Sands, 19 N. W. 199, 200, 53 Mich. 593.

By the terms "tax," "impost," and "duty," as used in the ordinance of 1787, is meant a charge for the use of the government, not compensation for improvements. The fact that, if any surplus remained from the tolls over what is used to keep locks in the river in repair and for their collection, it is to be paid into the state treasury as a part of the revenue of the state, does not change the character of the charge or impost. Huse v. Glover, 7 Sup. Ct. 313, 316, 119 U. S. 543, 30 L. Ed. 487; Ouachita & M. R. Packet Co. v. Aikin, 7 Sup. Ct. 907, 909, 121 U. S. 444, 30 L. Ed. 976.

Town taxes.

The word "taxes," as used in 2 Rev. St. p. 50, imposing a tax of 25 cents on each share of stock owned by individuals of a bank, and declaring that the said bank should not be liable to any further tax, prohibits the imposition of all taxes, town as well as county or state. Bank of Cape Fear v. Deming, 29 N. C. 55, 59.

Water rents.

Water rents are not taxes, entitling one to notice as of the levy of a tax. Silkman v. Board of Water Com'rs, 24 N. Y. Supp. 806, 807, 71 Hun, 37.

Within the meaning of Starr & C. Ann. St. 1890, c. 24, conferring on cities and villages power to provide for water supply for use and protection from fire, and paragraph 445, authorizing the city council to tax, assess, and collect from the inhabitants such tax, rates, and rents for the use and benefits of water used or supplied to the inhabitants by such waterworks, the words, "tax, rents, and rates" refer to the mere operation of the plant and the collection of its revenues, and not to any mode of taxation, strictly speaking. The revenues and rates that are spoken of are the earnings of the plant from the use of the water by those persons who take the same, and hence the city is not authorized to levy a tax, not for the use of the water, but in addition thereto. Village of Lemont v. Jenks, 64 N. E. 362, 364, 197 Ill. 363, 90 Am. St. Rep. 172.

A tax is a demand of sovereignty. In the case of Wagner v. City of Rock Island, 34 N. E. 545, 140 Ill. 139, 21 L. R. A. 519, it is said: "Taxes are the enforced proportional contribution from persons and property, levied by the state, by virtue of its sovereignty, for the support of the government and for all public needs, and they are therefore justly and properly subjected to the rule of uniformity. Rates charged by the city for water supplied by it are not taxes, within Const. art. 10, § 3, requiring all taxes to be uniform. St. Louis Brewing Ass'n v. City of St. Louis, 37 S. W. 525, 528, 140 Mo. 419.

The term "taxes" does not include water rates paid by the consumers under the statute incorporating the water commission of Detroit. The lien, therefore, though enforced in the same way as a lien for taxes, is really a lien for indebtedness, like that in force on mechanics' contracts or against ships and vessels. Jones v. Water Com'rs of Detroit, 34 Mich. 273, 276.

TAX BOOK.

The term "tax book" or "tax list," in the statutes relating to the duty of the county auditor to correct the assessment, refers to the current list or book, and to none other. Jewett v. Foot, 93 N. W. 364, 366, 119 Iowa, 359.

TAX CERTIFICATE.

Any tax certificate, see "Any."

A "tax certificate" is a certificate of the sale of land on account of the nonpayment of taxes, in the consideration of the payment of such taxes by the purchaser, and entitles the holder, under certain conditions, to a legal conveyance of the land. It is in no sense a negotiable instrument, a chose in action, or a chattel interest. It is evidence of an equitable title to the land itself, and enables the purchaser, on certain conditions and in a certain time, to call in the legal title. It savors so strongly of realty that such title descends to the heir and is not assets in the hands of the executor. Eaton v. Manitowoc County, 44 Wis. 489, 492.

The term "tax certificate," as used in Laws 1877, c. 37, § 6, requiring notice of the expiration of the time of redemption to be served is only applicable to the certificate of a tax sale prescribed in Gen. St. 1878, c. 11, § 84, and the certificate of assignment provided for in section 89. Nelson v. Central Land Co., 29 N. W. 121, 122, 35 Minn. 408.

TAX CLAIM.

The term "tax claim," as used in an act relating to municipal liens, means the claim filed to recover taxes. 4 P. & L. Dig. Laws Pa. 1897, col. 1269, § 55.

TAX COLLECTOR.

A "tax collector" is a tax gatherer. He turns the money which he collects over to the treasurer, if he be not treasurer. Mutual Life Ins. Co. of New York v. Martien, 71 Pac. 470, 471, 27 Mont. 437.

The "tax collector" is the official representative of the public in the matter of the collection of taxes. He is empowered to enforce collection by resort to summary remedies, and upon sale he executes the papers evidencing the same. For the exercise of those remedies the tax list and warrant are his sufficient authority. Upon him alone devolves the duty of providing the taxpayer with the proper evidence of his payment of taxes and its application. Lobban v. State, 64 Pac. 82, 88, 9 Wyo. 377.

A collector of town taxes, though not named in any list of officers authorized by the charter of the town, is a public officer, within a statute punishing public officers for embezzlement. State v. Walton, 62 Me. 106, 111.

A collector of taxes is a public officer whose duty it is to collect the taxes and pay the same into the treasury of the state or to the parties entitled. State v. Nicholson, 8 Atl. 817, 818, 67 Md. 1.

A collector is an officer who collects or receives taxes, duties, or other public revenues. It is sufficient if he is authorized by law to receive the money for and on behalf of the public, and he need not possess the power to enforce payment by a legal process. State v. Moores, 73 N. W. 299, 303, 52 Neb. 770.

"Collector," as used in Pub. St. art. 16, c. 8, § 117, requiring county treasurers to pay over the state tax in like manner as heretofore required of the sheriff or collector, is synonymous with "sheriff." Bingham v. Winona County, 8 Minn. 441, 447 (Gil. 390, 395).

Gen. St. c. 92, art. 1, § 6, providing that the delinquent tax list shall be placed in the hands of the sheriff or collector for collection, means one who has been appointed in place of the sheriff to collect the taxes. Baldwin v. Hewitt, 11 S. W. 803, 88 Ky. 673.

A collector is the agent of the town or city in collecting a tax, and the town is really the only party interested. So an action to recover city taxes illegally assessed should be against the city, and not the collector. Fish v. Higbee, 47 Atl. 212, 22 R. I. 223.

The word "collector," or "collectors," when used in the revenue act, shall be construed to include county, town, district, and deputy collectors. Hurd's Rev. St. Ill. 1901, p. 1493, c. 120, § 292, subd. 4.

The term "collector," as used in the chapter relating to the collection of taxes, shall mean a person receiving a tax list and a warrant to collect the same. Rev. Laws Mass. 1902, p. 229, c. 13, § 1.

The word "collector" includes any person intrusted with the collection of public revenue. Shannon's Code Tenn. 1896, § 67.

Wherever the word "collector" is used in the chapter relating to the collection of taxes, it shall be construed to mean a collector appointed by the auditor of public accounts. Code Va. 1887, § 633 [1 Code Va. 1904, p. 310].

TAX DEED.

As color of title, see "Color of Title."

As lien, see "Lien."

A tax deed is a creature of statute, and must have that meaning and intentment only which the statute directs. Kepley v. Fouke, 58 N. E. 303, 187 Ill. 162.

TAX LEGISLATION.

"Tax legislation" means the making of laws that are to furnish the measure of every man's duty in support of the public burdens and the means of enforcing it. Imposing on agents of foreign insurance companies the duty of paying 2 per cent. on the premiums received by them to the Philadelphia Association for the Relief of Disabled Firemen is not, either in form or substance, tax legislation, but is a mere requisition that one class of men shall pay their money to another class, and is not legislation at all. Philadelphia Ass'n v. Wood, 39 Pa. (3 Wright) 73, 82.

TAX LIST.

The terms "list" and "grand list," as they are used in our statutes relative to taxation, mean a schedule of the polls and ratable estate of the inhabitants, upon which taxes are to be assessed. A list that only represents real estate answers the requirement of the statute as fully as would a list that represented the real and personal property. Such is the meaning of the term in Gen. St. p. 1036, providing that every male citizen of the age of 21 years, whose list shall have been taken in any town or city at the annual assessment next preceding any town or city meeting, shall be legal voters in town meetings, as it is obvious that the intention of the law was to allow such persons as are subject to taxation in towns and are residents therein to vote in the annual meetings of such towns. Wilson v. Wheeler, 55 Vt. 446, 452.

The personal list required to be lodged in the town clerk's office as a basis for taxation is an assessment judicially fixed by the listers, of which all taxpayers may and must take notice. The written notice required by the statute to be given to persons assessed for money, etc., is a mere notice, not an assessment. The personal list is the judicial determination of the listers of the amount of the taxpayers' personal estate that should enter into the annual grand list to be completed in May, and the giving of such notice is not equivalent to or a compliance with the statute requiring the making and filing of such list. Bartlett v. Wilson, 8 Atl. 321, 329, 59 Vt. 23.

"Tax list," as used in St. July 4, 1829, providing for the collection of taxes on the unimproved lands of nonresidents, and requiring every collector of taxes, within a certain time after the assessment of such taxes, to deliver to the deputy secretary a copy of his list of all such taxes, made out and signed by the selectmen, ordinarily signifies a roll or catalogue; but a roll does not always contain a number of names or several particulars. Though the warrant of the treasurer contains a tax against one place only, his warrant is a list of taxes. Homer v. Cilley, 14 N. H. 85, 100.

The term "tax list" includes the treasurer's warrant for the collection of a single sum assessed against an unincorporated place, which is returned and filed in the office of the Secretary of State. "The tax is comprised in a single item, and thus in one sense it may be said that there is no list; but there is, and in the nature of things can be, no better list." Wells v. Burbank, 17 N. H. 393, 407.

The term "list of taxable property" in the statute which allows the assessor fifteen cents for every person's list of taxable property includes a list returned by the assessor whether it embraces property or not, and, therefore, he is entitled to fifteen cents for such list. Harrison v. Commonwealth, 83 Ky. 162, 168.

The term "tax book," or "tax list," in the statutes relating to the duty of the county auditor to correct the assessment, refer to the current list or book, and to none other. Jewett v. Foot, 93 N. W. 364, 366, 119 Iowa, 359.

TAX ON TONNAGE

A "tax on tonnage" bears directly on the owners of the goods who are having them transported, and is an attempt to regulate commerce, and is not the same as a tax on gross receipts, which is a tax on the money of a carrier after it has reached the treasurer of the corporation. Philadelphia & S.

Mail S. S. Co. v. Commonwealth, 104 Pa. 109, 115.

TAX RECORD.

Act 1869, authorizing the sale of land for taxes, provides that the petition filed by the Auditor General shall be in a record book, which shall contain a description of the land and the taxes thereon in appropriate columns; that such record shall be ruled with columns for the description, the amount of taxes, the interest, charges, etc.; and that it shall also contain blank columns for other specified entries, to be made at the time of the decree and on the sale. Held, that it was not contemplated by the act that either the petition or decree should contain any description of the land, or statement of the amount decreed to be due, but that both the decree and the petition should refer to the record book, which constitutes the "tax record." Millard v. Truax, 58 N. W. 70, 71, 99 Mich. 157.

TAX ROLL.

A "tax roll" means the roll in proper form to warrant the treasurer in enforcing the tax. Babcock v. Beaver Creek Tp., 31 N. W. 423, 424, 64 Mich. 601.

The "tax rolls" are the original extensions of the levies made by the proper authorities, and include state, county, township, and school taxes. Smith v. Scully, 71 Pac. 249, 250, 66 Kan. 139.

Comp. Laws, § 3196, relating to assessments for municipal improvements, provides that in no case shall the whole amount to be levied by special assessments upon any lot for any one improvement exceed 25 per cent. of the value of such lot as valued and assessed for state and county taxes in the last preceding ward tax roll, and any cost exceeding such per cent. shall be paid from the general fund of the city. Held, that the "last preceding ward tax roll," referred to, was the last completed roll on which state, county, and school taxes had been spread. Nowlen v. City of Benton Harbor (Mich.) 96 N. W. 450, 452.

TAX SALE.

A "tax sale" is a sale made of property proceeded against by the state as belonging to some one other than itself, in enforcement of taxes due by that property and its owners. Gulf States Land & Improvement Co. v. Wade, 25 South. 105, 108, 51 La. Ann. 251.

A "tax sale," or, what is the same thing, a sale for nonpayment of taxes, means a sale made in a proceeding in rem; and hence that part of a statute relating to exemptions which provides that no property shall be exempt from sale for nonpayment of taxes has application only to proceedings in rem against the property, and not for judgments in personam, except where based on a liability for the purchase money or improvements. Douthett v. Winter, 108 Ill. 330, 334.

TAX TITLE.

As an interest in land, see "Interest (In Property)."

"Tax title" is the title by which one holds lands purchased at a tax sale. A "tax title" is not a derivative title. If valid, it is a breaking of all other title, and is antagonistic to all other claims to the land. Willcuts v. Rollins, 52 N. W. 199, 201, 85 Iowa, 247.

A "tax title" is different from an ordinary title. It is prima facie valid, and protects the purchaser at tax sale from imputation of bad faith. Cooper v. Falk, 33 South. 567, 569, 109 La. 474.

A tax title is purely technical, as distinguished from a meritorious title, and depends for its validity on a strict compliance with the statute. Kern v. Clarke, 59 Minn. 70, 73, 60 N. W. 809 (quoting Black, Tax Titles, § 409).

Under Code, § 1753, declaring that "any person holding or claiming under a tax title land heretofore or hereafter sold for taxes, when the period for redemption has expired without redemption of the same, may proceed by bill" to have such title confirmed and quieted, and Act 1858, providing "that any person claiming to hold lands under and by virtue of any tax deed or certificate of sale for taxes, either for state, county, district, or other purposes, heretofore or hereafter to be made," etc., a tax title is such, whether the same is acquired on sale for taxes of state, county, district, or other purposes. Beirne v. Burdett, 52 Miss. 795, 797.

TAXABLE COSTS.

"Taxable costs," as used in a stipulation by which plaintiff agreed that, if an action of tort were changed into a suit in equity, he would pay the defendant's taxable costs, includes separate costs to each defendant, and not one bill of costs merely for all. George v. Reed, 104 Mass. 366, 367.

A direction in an order to pay "the taxable costs of the witnesses" is sufficiently certain. It means such costs or fees as the witnesses are entitled to by law. Nichols v. Besselaer County Mut. Ins. Co. (N. Y.) 22 Wend. 125, 128.

"Taxable costs" are in contemplation of law full indemnity for the expenses of a party who is successful in a suit between party and party, whether at law or in equity. Rowland v. Maddock, 67 N. E. 347, 349, 183 Mass. 360 (citing Newton Rubber Works v. De Las Casas, 182 Mass. 436, 65 N. E. 816).

Where an award provided that one of the parties should pay the taxable costs of a suit which had been pending in court, the phrase "taxable costs" meant such as the party was entitled to have taxed by law. Wright v. Smith, 19 Vt. 110, 111.

The word "taxable," as applied to costs and disbursements, is sufficiently synonymous with the word "necessary," so that the use of one in place of the other in an order does not change the meaning; either word relating, not to the allowance of disbursements, but wholly to the quality or character of the items. Wilson v. Lange, 84 N. Y. Supp. 519, 520.

TAXABLE INHABITANT.

A "taxable inhabitant" is one who is or may lawfully be taxed; one who possesses all the qualifications necessary to authorize the proper taxing authorities to assess him with a tax. In re Annexation of Chester Tp., 34 Atl. 457, 174 Pa. 177.

The words "taxable inhabitants," in a statute forbidding the abolition or alteration of school districts without the consent of a majority of the taxable inhabitants, cannot have their full, unrestrained meaning, so as to include every resident liable to be taxed, or they must be held to include, not only females, but infants of the most tender age, but are limited to legal voters who are taxable and live within the district. Elkin v. Deshler, 25 N. J. Law (1 Dutch.) 177, 179.

TAXABLE PROPERTY.

In answering the question, "what is taxable property?" it is obvious that we should consider all laws of a general character upon the subject of assessments and collection of taxes; for the rule of construction is that all statutes in pari materia must be so construed as that proper effect may be given to the provisions of each enactment. In relation to the assessment of property and collection of taxes, the amount of taxable property is that which a person owns in excess of his indebtedness; for it is "the duty of the assessor to deduct the amount of indebtedness within this state of any person assessed from the amount of his or her taxable property." Misc. Laws, c. 57, § 16. Stephens v. Multnomah County, 6 Or. 353, 355.

The term "taxable property" is sometimes used in a sense to indicate that which a person owns exclusive of his indebtedness. Stephens v. Multnomah County, 6 Or. 353. But it is not so used in Hill's Ann. Laws, §

2383, providing that when the assessor by mistake returns as taxable property a greater amount than should be assessed to any person, etc., but it means the property liable to taxation. Steel v. Fell, 45 Pac. 794, 795, 29 Or. 272.

The power granted to the city authorities by the charter of Buffalo (Laws 1843, c. 132) to assess all "taxable property" includes, not only such as is then taxable by the general law of the state, but whatever should be made subject to taxation by any general statute after it is passed. City of Buffalo v. Le Couteulx, 15 N. Y. 451, 453.

"Taxable property," as used in Act Feb. 26, 1883, § 2, erecting certain portions of old counties into a new county, providing that a certain portion of certain indebtedness should be divided between the counties in proportion to the taxable property of one of the counties, a portion of which had been taken, signifies liable to taxation, something of value, subject to assessment and to be levied on and sold for taxes. The mere assessment of property does not make it taxable. In order to render property taxable, there must be the fundamental right to assess. Custer County v. Yellowstone County, 9 Pac. 586, 587, 6 Mont. 89.

The words "taxable property," as used in the charter of Charleston, granted in 1783, authorizing the city council to make such assessments on the inhabitants of the city or those who hold taxable property within the same as shall appear to them expedient, embrace all property not exempt by the law of the state from taxation. Hence the lands belonging to St. Philip's Church in the city are exempt from city taxation, since property of churches is exempted from taxation by various acts of the Legislature. Vestry of St. Philip's Church v. City of Charleston (S. C.) McMull. Eq. 139, 144, 150.

The words "taxable property," when used in the title relating to taxation, shall include taxable estates, both real and personal, including choses in action. V. S. 1894, 356.

TAXABLE VALUE.

"Taxable value" is the sum at which property is appraised for taxation. Amoskeag Mfg. Co. v. City of Manchester, 46 Atl. 470, 472, 70 N. H. 200.

The "taxable value" of a corporation is its bonded indebtedness, together with its stock. Simpson v. Hopkins, 33 Atl. 714, 715, 82 Md. 478.

TAXED.

Under the Iowa statute declaring that, before a deed can be executed by a county commissioner for lands sold by him for delinquent taxes, a notice that a deed will be applied for must be served by the party entitled thereto on the person in whose name the land is "taxed," a notice must be served on the person in whose name the land is listed for assessment. Heaton v. Knight, 16 N. W. 532, 63 Iowa, 686.

After lands are listed and assessed to a person named, and the assessment is returned to the auditor, they are to be regarded as taxed, within the meaning of Code 1873, § 894, providing that notice of the expiration of the time for redemption from a tax sale shall be given to the person in whose name the land is taxed, etc. Adams v. Snow, 21 N. W. 765, 766, 65 Iowa, 435.

TAXING BY UNIFORM RULE.

See "Uniform Rule of Taxation."

TAXING MASTER.

The officer of the court whose duty it is to tax the costs of actions is known as a "taxing master." Hersey v. Hutchins, 52 Atl. 862, 71 N. H. 458.

TAXING POWER.

The "taxing power" is one of the attributes or incidents of sovereignty. It is and must be inherent in every form of government, and it could be exercised even with us, although the Constitution was entirely silent on the subject. The necessity for the exercise of the power rests wholly in the discretion of the Legislature, and that discretion extends to the selection of the subjects of taxation or the things to be taxed, whether it be persons or property, business, or vocation. Scott v. Pitt, 62 N. E. 662, 664, 169 N. Y. 521, 58 L. R. A. 372.

TAXPAYER.

See "Delinquent Taxpayer"; "Property Taxpayer."

Under the vote of a town to divide that portion of the surplus revenue which belongs to the town among the resident taxpayers in such town at the time of passing the vote, a resident in the town, liable to taxation, but who has never been taxed therein, is not entitled to a share of such surplus. Thompson v. Town of Newtown, 21 N. H. (1 Forst.) 595, 599.

Act Feb. 27, 1857, § 2, gave the council of the city of Hannibal power to borrow money on the credit of the city, but provided that the interest should not exceed a certain amount, unless two-thirds of the qualified voters of the said city should vote for the payment of a greater rate. Section 3 provided that the council should have power to subscribe for railroad stock, but that before such subscription would be valid it should be ratified by a majority of the taxpayers at a poll to be opened for that purpose. Section 10, prescribing the qualification of voters in said city, required, among other things, that the voters should have paid a tax or city license. In considering the validity of the bonds issued pursuant to such sections, the court said: "It is argued that the Legislature used the word 'taxpayers' in the third section of Act 1857 in a sense designedly differing from that of 'qualified voters' in the second section, who are to decide upon the question of the rate of interest on money borrowed in excess of 10 per cent. per annum. We see no evidence, however, of any such intention. On the contrary, that supposition would necessitate the conclusion that the word 'taxpayers' was meant to include persons not otherwise qualified to vote, for example, any free white male citizen, minors, women, married and unmarried, and nonresidents. The reasonable interpretation is that the question of ratifying the subscription should be submitted to a vote of the taxpayers of the city having the qualification otherwise of lawful voters. Hannibal v. Fauntleroy, 105 U. S. 408, 412, 26 L. Ed. 1103.

The term "taxpayers," in Pub. Laws 1884, c. 447, permitting the abolition of school districts in favor of towns, and requiring the school property taken to be appraised, and the taxpayers of each district to have returned to them their proportionate share of the appraised value of the property in the district, should be construed to mean the individual taxpayers, and therefore such rebate should be to them, and not to the school treasurer. In re Town Council of Cranston, 28 Atl. 608, 610, 18 R. I. 417.

A "taxpayer" is a person owning property in the state subject to taxation and on which he regularly pays taxes. State ex rel. Sutton v. Fasse (Mo.) 71 S. W. 745.

"Taxpayer" as used in Rev. St. art. 3942, providing that all persons who are legally qualified voters of the state and of the county of their residence, and who are resident taxpayers in said district, as shown in the last assessment rolls of the county, shall be entitled to vote in any such school district, does not mean only those whose names appear on the last assessment rolls of the county, but means one owning property within the territory subject to taxation. To constitute a taxpayer in the meaning of the statute, it is not necessary that the taxes due on his property should have been assessed. Hillsman v. Faison, 57 S. W. 920, 922, 23 Tex. Civ. App. 398.

Act N. Y. May 18, 1869 (Laws 1869, c. 907), as amended by Act May 12, 1871 (Laws 1871, c. 925), provides for a petition of taxpayers for the issuance of bonds by a municipal corporation, and provides that the word "taxpayers" means the owners of non-resident lands taxed as such. Held that, where a petition under the statute uses the word "taxpayers," it would be deemed to include owners of nonresident lands taxed as such. Whiting v. Town of Potter (U. S.) 2 Fed. 517, 520.

Laws 1871, c. 925, § 1, provides that "the word 'taxpayer' shall mean any corporation or person assessed or taxed for property, either individually or as agent, trustee, guardian, executor, or administrator, or who shall have been intended to have been thus taxed, and shall have paid or is liable to pay the tax as hereinbefore provided, or the owner of any nonresident lands taxed as such, not including those taxed for dogs or highway tax only." Strang v. Cook (N. Y.) 47 Hun, 46, 48.

Where a statute authorizing the issuing of certain bonds upon the verified petition of a majority of the taxpayers defines "taxpayers" to be "taxpayers, exclusive of those taxed for dogs and highways only," the definition is confined to the use of the word "taxpayers" in the act; and a petition which fails to aver that the petitioners are a majority of the taxpayers, "exclusive of those taxed for dogs or highways only," is fatally defective, and bonds issued upon such petition are invalid. Town of Mentz v. Cook, 15 N. E. 541, 543, 108 N. Y. 504.

Where a statute provided for the issuance of bonds and stated that certain persons should be deemed "taxpayers," not including those taxed for dogs or highways only, a petition alleging that the signers were a majority of the taxpayers was not invalidated by an omission to state the words "not including those taxed for dogs or highways only," as the word "taxpayers" did not include those not taxed for dogs. Rich v. Town of Mentz (U. S.) 18 Fed. 52, 53.

The word "taxpayer," as used in the title relating to intoxicating liquors, shall not include any person who does not pay a tax for real or personal property assessed on the grand list of the town in which he resides. Gen. St. Conn. 1902, § 2637.

"Taxpayers," as used in Ky. St. § 4464, requiring that the petition to take the sense of voters upon a proposition to vote a tax for a graded school must be signed by at least 10 legal voters who are taxpayers, means persons who pay taxes in their own name on property in their own name, and does not include persons whose wives pay taxes. Tate v. Earlander School Dist No. 32 (Ky.) 49 S. W. 337.

TEACHER.

See "Religious Teacher"; "School Teacher."

"Teachers," as used in Act April 1, 1872, giving the board of education of the city and county of San Francisco authority to employ teachers and fix, allow, and order paid their salaries, cannot be construed to include inspecting teachers, to perform duties imposed by the act on the board itself and on the superintendent, consisting of visiting the schools, ascertaining their conditions by oral examinations, observing the methods of the teachers, and giving them advice and instruction in the methods of teaching. Barry v. Goad, 26 Pac. 785, 786, 89 Cal. 215.

The term "teacher," as used in the act relating to schools in city districts of the first class, shall include all teachers regularly employed by boards of education in the day schools, including the superintendent of schools, all superintendents of instruction, principals, and special teachers. Bates' Ann. St. Ohio, 1904, § 3897d.

TEACHER'S CERTIFICATE.

A certificate granted to a teacher is a license to him to pursue a certain avocation and to seek a certain public employment, which, without it, he cannot pursue or seek. A right during the period for which the certificate is granted to him is a valuable property in his hands, just as a right to practice as an attorney of a court is property in the hands of him who has been admitted to it. The annulment of the teacher's certificate is the destruction of his property. Scheibner v. Baer, 84 Atl. 193, 194, 174 Pa. 482.

TEAM.

See "Working Team."

One horse, harness, and cart are within the meaning of the word "team," as used in and exempted from execution by Laws 1842, c. 157. Harthouse v. Rikers, 8 N. Y. Super. Ct. (1 Duer) 606, 607, 11 N. Y. Leg. Obs. 223, 224.

"Team," as used in exemption laws exempting the team of the debtor, etc., consists of one or two horses, with their harness and the vehicle to which they are customarily attached for use. Brown v. Davis (N. Y.) 9 Hun, 43, 44.

The "team" which the exemption laws exempt from sale on execution, to the value of a certain sum, may be composed of one or more animals, and whatever number may compose it, if within the limit as to value fixed by statute, it will be exempt. Wilcox v. Hauley, 31 N. Y. 648, 655.

As one for carrying loads.

"Team," as used in Gen. St. art. 14, § 3, providing for the mode of passing when any wagon, carriage, etc., should meet or overtake a team on the highway, means vehicle, with the animals drawing it, used for carrying loads, as distinguished from one used for the carrying of persons. Hotchkiss v. Hoy, 41 Conn. 568, 577.

In an action to recover for injuries caused by a collision between teams, it was alleged that the plaintiff was driving in a wagon, and that defendant was driving in another wagon, on the same side of the same highway, so that the team of said defendant was approaching that of the plaintiff from the opposite direction, and that the teams of defendant and plaintiff would have to meet, and treble damages were sought to be recovered under a statute which provides that the drivers of vehicles for the conveyance of persons, meeting each other on the highway, who shall fail to turn to the right and slacken speed, shall pay to the party injured treble damages for driving against the other vehicle. It was held that the word "wagon" and "team" might as properly be used to designate a vehicle for the carriage of goods as one for the conveyance of persons. Neither of them nor both of them constitute a sufficiently specific description of the vehicle named in the statute to entitle the recovery of treble damages. Rowell v. Crothers, 52 Atl. 818, 75 Conn. 124.

Driver.

"Team," as used in Rev. St. c. 80, § 3, prohibiting a person from recovery of damages for injuries sustained because of the breaking down of a toll bridge, if the weight of the load which he was transporting exceeded a certain amount exclusive of the "team and carriage," should be construed as not including the weight of the driver, seated upon the load. Dexter v. Canton Toll Bridge Co., 12 Atl. 547, 548, 79 Me. 563.

As live stock.

The word "team" means two or more horses, oxen, or other beasts harnessed together to the same vehicle for drawing. It may be admitted that the term "stock" does not embrace the idea of a team; but it cannot be denied that the term "team" embraces the idea of live stock. A team, therefore, is composed of live stock, and cannot exist without it, and is embraced within the meaning of the term "live stock" as used in Code, § 1289, making a railroad corporation liable for injuries to live stock running at large by reason of the railroad's failure to fence at all points where the right to fence exists. Inman v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co., 15 N. W. 286, 287, 60 Iowa, 459.

Load.

As used in Gen. St. c. 60, § 1, making towns liable for damages happening to any person or his team or carriage by reason of defects in the highways, the words "team or carriage" are meant to include whatever animal or animals drew or carried the load and their harness, and also the load itself. Woodman v. Town of Nottingham, 49 N. H. 387, 393, 6 Am. Rep. 526.

One horse.

A single horse is a "team," and exempt from execution as such under the New York exemption laws, when it is kept and used with another horse, which the debtor hires to work with it. Lockwood v. Younglove (N. Y.) 27 Barb. 505, 507.

A single horse, kept and used for drawing loads, etc., is within the exemption from execution of a "team," under the provisions of Laws 1842, c. 157; it not being necessary, to constitute a team within the purview of the act, that there should be two or more horses. Hutchinson v. Chamberlin, 11 N. Y. Leg. Obs. 248, 250; Hoyt v. Van Alstyne (N. Y.) 15 Barb. 568, 571.

"Team," as used in the statute providing for the recovery of damages against a town for injuries done to the plaintiff's person, team, or carriage by the insufficiency of a highway, means the animal or animals drawing or carrying a load, whether one or many, or that are driven over the highway, whether in harness or otherwise. Conway v. Town of Jefferson, 46 N. H. 521, 526.

The word "team," when applied to horses, imports the use of horses together. Corp v. Griswold, 27 Iowa, 379, 380.

The term "team," in a statute exempting from execution a team, etc., includes one horse, if necessary to the support of the debtor's family. Knapp v. O'Neill (N. Y.) 43 Hun, 317, 318.

"The word 'team,' as used in our language and in this country, has a broader and more extensive meaning than that given in our dictionaries, or in any of the cases that I find which have dwelt upon its interpretation. A horse or other animal, trained and used for labor and service, when it constitutes the motive power to accomplish such labor and service, is, in my opinion, a 'team,' according to the popular and statutory meaning of the word." Finnin v. Malloy, 33 N. Y. Super. Ct. (1 Jones & S.) 882, 891.

As one or more pairs of draught horses.

"Team," as used in a guaranty that a certain harvest machine may be operated by one good team, may mean either one or more pairs of any kind of draught animals; and hence parol evidence is admissible to show declarations of the seller as to the amount of power required to operate the machine. Ganson v. Madigan, 15 Wis. 144, 153, 82 Am. Dec. 659.

Unbroken colt.

Though a statute exempts in terms a "team of horses," the courts will not construe the term so literally as to deny the exemption of an unbroken colt, of which the debtor became possessed in his efforts to obtain a horse. Nelson v. Fightmaster, 44 Pac. 218, 214, 4 Okl. 38.

An unbroken colt, that had never been used, and which there was no evidence the execution debtor intended to use, he having two other horses for the purpose of his business, is not a team, or part of a team, exempt from execution. Hogan v. Neumeister, 76 N. W. 65, 117 Mich. 498.

The term "team," in a statute providing that in case of any special damage to any person or his team or carriage, by reason of obstruction, insufficiency, or want of repair of any highway or bridge of any town, the person injured shall recover his damage in an action against the town, includes a two year old colt, driven with two other colts, loose in the highway, as the statute is to be read in connection with another statute, that no damages shall be allowed for injury to droves of cattle by reason of deficiency of a bridge, or if, when the accident happened, the number of cattle on the bridge exceeded 25. Elliott v. Town of Lisbon, 57 N. H. 27, 29.

Wagon.

A wagon, customarily used in connection with a horse or horses and harness, constitutes a part of a team, within the meaning of the exemption laws, providing that one team of a debtor shall be exempt from execution. Dains v. Prosser (N. Y.) 32 Barb. 290, 291.

A wagon is not included within the word "team," within the statutes providing for the exemption of a team from execution. Morse v. Keyes (N. Y.) 6 How. Prac. 18, 21.

As used in Laws 1842, exempting a team from execution, "team" includes a one-horse wagon belonging to a practicing physician. Eastman v. Caswell (N. Y.) 8 How. Prac. 75, 76.

A one-horse wagon belonging to a practicing physician is exempt from execution under an act exempting "working tools and team." Eastman v. Caswell (N. Y.) 8 How. Prac. 75, 76.

TEAM WORK.

"Team work," as used in a statute exempting from execution two horses kept and used for team work, means work done by a team as a substantial part of a man's business, as in farming, staging, express carrying, drawing of freight, peddling, or transportation of material used or dealt in as a business. This is clearly distinguishable from what is circumstantial to one's business, as a matter of convenience in getting to and from it, or as a means of going from place to place to solicit patronage, or to settle or make collections, or to see persons for business purposes. It is plainly distinguishable from family use and convenience, pleasure, exercise, or recreation. None of these uses of a horse are suggested by the expression "kept and used for team work." Hickok v. Thayer, 49 Vt. 372, 374.

"Team work," as used in the statute exempting to a debtor two horses, kept and used for team work, does not include a horse kept and used as a racer, and not otherwise, although he had been casually used on a few occasions for work, and also in carrying members of the bankrupt's family to and from work or school. In re Libby (U. S.) 103 Fed. 776, 777.

TEAMSTER.

"Teamster," as used in Prac. Act, § 219, subd. 6, exempting from execution or attachment the team by the use of which a huckster, peddler, teamster, or other laborer habitually earns his living, means a person who is engaged with his own team or teams in the business of teaming; that is, in the business of hauling freight for others for a consideration, by which he habitually supports himself and family, if he has one. The fact that a carpenter or other mechanic, who occupies his time in labor at his trade, purchases a team and also carries on the business of teaming by the employment of others, does not constitute him a teamster in the sense of the statute, although it is not necessary that a teamster should drive his team in person to be entitled to the exemption. In order to entitle a party to the exemption as a teamster, he must show that he habitually earns his living by the use of such horses, etc. A clerk in a store at a stated salary, who had purchased a team mainly to furnish employment for his son, 17 years old, and by whom exclusively the team was used habitually in hauling freights for the store and for other parties, and in delivering goods from the store to customers, was not a teamster within the meaning of the statute. Brusie v. Griffith, 34 Cal. 302, 306, 91 Am. Dec. 695.

"Teamster," as used in Comp. Laws, § 1282, exempting from execution the team by the use of which a teamster or other laborer habitually earns his living, means one who is engaged with his own team or teams in the business of teaming; that is to say, in the business of hauling freight for other parties for a consideration, by which he habitually supports himself and family, if he has one. While he need not, perhaps, drive his team in person, yet he must be personally engaged in the business, habitually and for the purpose of making a living by that business. Elder v. Williams, 16 Nev. 416, 420.

As laborer or workman.

A "teamster," using his own team and engaged in hauling slate for a slate company for a compensation based on the amount hauled, is not, strictly speaking, either a laborer or workman, and thus is not protected by a statute making the stockholders of the slate company personally liable for the wages of its workmen and laborers. Moyer v. Pennsylvania Slate Co., 7 Pa. (21 P. F. Smith) 293, 298.

As livery stable keeper.

"Teamster," as used in the exemption statute, cannot be construed to include a livery stable keeper, simply because he drives his own team in carrying persons around town. In common speech a teamster is one who drives a team; but in the sense of the statute every one who drives a team is not necessarily a teamster, nor is he necessarily not a teamster when he does not drive a team continually. In the sense of the statute one is a teamster who is engaged with his own team or teams in the business of teaming; that is to say, in the business of hauling freight for other parties for a consideration, by which he habitually supports himself and family, if he has one. While he need not, perhaps, drive his team in person, yet he must be personally engaged in the business of teaming habitually and for the purpose of making a living by that business. Edgecomb v. His Creditors, 7 Pac. 533, 534, 19 Nev. 149.

TEASER.

"Teaser" is the name given to a machine used for cleaning cotton. Whitney v. Carter (U. S.) 29 Fed. Cas. 1070, 1071.

TECHNICAL

The "technical import" of words is that which is suggested by their use in reference to a science or profession, that which particular use has affixed to them; and when the natural and technical import unite upon a word, both their rules combine to control its construction, and no other signification than that which they suggest can be affixed to it, unless upon the most positive declaration that a different one was designed. People v. Hallett, 1 Colo. 352, 359; People v. May, 3 Mich. 598, 605.

TECHNICAL ERROR.

"Technical errors," as used in Rev. St. 1881, § 1891, providing that, in consideration of questions presented on an appeal, the Supreme Court shall not regard technical errors, etc., means "merely abstract and practically harmless errors." Epps v. State, 1 N. E. 491, 502, 102 Ind. 539.

TECHNICALLY PURE.

"Technically pure," as used in reference to substances employed in chemical process, means pure in the ordinary acceptation of the terms of the art. Matheson v. Campbell (U. S.) 69 Fed. 597, 608.

TELEGRAPH.

The word "telegraph" is derived from the Greek, and signifies to write afar off or at a distance. It is a word which has been applied to various contrivances or devices to communicate intelligence by means of signals or semaphores which speak to the eye for a moment. But, in its primary and literal signification of writing, printing, or recording at a distance, it never was invented, perfected, or put into practical operation till it was done by Morse. He preceded Steinhell, Cook, Wheatstone, and Davy in the successful application of this mysterious power or element of electro-magnetism to this property, and his invention has naturally superseded every contrivance. It is not only a "new and useful art," if that term means anything, but a most wonderful and astonishing invention, requiring tenfold more ingenuity and patient experiment to perfect it than the art of printing with types and presses as originally invented. O'Reilly v. Morse, 56 U. S. (15 How.) 62, 134, 14 L. Ed. 601.

"Telegraph," as now usually accepted and in common parlance, is generally understood as referring to the entire system of appliances used in the transmission of telegraphic messages by electricity, consisting of, first, a battery or other source of electric power; secondly, of a line, wire, or conductor for conveying the electric current from one station to another; thirdly, of the apparatus for transmitting, interrupting, and, if necessary, reversing the electric current at pleasure; and, fourthly, of the indicator or signalling instrument. Hockett v. State, 105 Ind. 250, 261, 5 N. E. 178, 185, 55 Am. Rep. 201 (citing Imperial Dict.).

In Louisiana the court of appeal will take judicial notice that the "telegraph" of a railroad usually consists of wires strung on posts set upright in the ground alongside of the road. P. & H. H. Youree v. Vicksburg, S. & P. R. Co., 34 South. 779, 781, 110 La. 791.

As common carrier.

See "Common Carrier."

As an instrument of commerce.

The electric telegraph is an instrument of commerce, and thus subject to regulation by Congress under the commerce clause of the Constitution. "The electric telegraph marks an epoch in the progress of time. In little more than one-fourth of a century it has changed the habits of business and become one of the necessities of commerce. It is indispensable as a means of intercommunication, and especially is it so in commercial transactions. The statistics of the business before the recent reduction in rates show that more than 80 per cent. of all the messages sent by telegraph related to commerce. Goods are sold and money paid upon telegraphic orders, contracts are made by telegraphic correspondence, cargoes secured, and the movements of ships are directed. The telegraphic announcements of the market abroad regulate prices at home, and a prudent merchant rarely enters upon an important transaction without using the telegraph freely to secure important information." A state cannot exclude a telegraph company, which has accepted the restrictions and conditions imposed by Act Cong. April 14, 1866, from entering the state. Pensacola Telegraph Co. v. Western Union Telegraph Co., 96 U. S. 1, 9, 24 L. Ed. 708.

As public use.

See "Public Use."

Telephone included.

The term "telegraph" means any apparatus for transmitting messages by means of electric currents and signals, and embraces within its meaning the narrower word "telephone." Davis v. Pacific Telephone & Telegraph Co., 127 Cal. 312, 315, 316, 59 Pac. 698, 699.

"Telegraph," as used in Bates' Ann. St. § 3454, authorizing a magnetic telegraph company to construct telegraph lines from point to point along and upon a public road by the erection of the necessary fixtures, is a mode of transmitting messages or other communications sufficiently comprehensive to embrace the telephone. Cincinnati Inclined Plane Ry. Co. v. City & Suburban Telegraph Ass'n, 27 N. E. 890, 894, 48 Ohio St. 390, 12 L. R. A. 534, 29 Am. St. Rep. 559.

"Telegraph," as used in Acts 1868, c. 471, § 133, declaring that any person, etc., owning a telegraph line doing business within the state shall receive dispatches from other telegraph lines, etc., should be construed to embrace "telephone." Chesapeake & P. Telephone Co. v. Baltimore & O. Telegraph Co., 7 Atl. 809, 810, 66 Md. 399, 59 Am. Rep. 167.

"Telegraph," as used in an act incorporating a telegraph company, may be taken to mean and include any apparatus or adjustment of instruments for transmitting messages or other communications by means of electric currents and signals, and as sufficiently comprehensive to embrace the telephone; and a company organized as a telegraph company under the general corporation law is authorized to do a general telephone business. State v. Central New Jersey Telephone Co., 21 Atl. 460, 462, 53 N. J. Law 341, 11 L. R. A. 664.

Rev. St. §§ 5263, 5268 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, pp. 3579, 3581], authorizing telegraph companies to construct and operate their lines over and along post roads of the United States, includes telephone companies. The telephone and telegraph both communicate messages by means of electricity over wires. The telegraph communicates these messages by sound of instruments; the telephone by the human voice, usually. Both depend upon electricity for their action. Each is but a form of use, and the product and result of the same principle. The names are only used to distinguish the method of the communication. City of Richmond v. Southern Bell Telephone & Telegraph Co. (U. S.) 85 Fed. 19, 24, 28 C. C. A. 659.

The telephone is simply an improved telegraph, and was formerly called the speaking telegraph. The instruments used at the terminals are different; but the poles, the wires, the insulators, and the generation of the electric current are all the same. The slight technical difference was exceedingly well stated by one of the witnesses at the hearing in the following language: "In sending telegraph messages, the sender writes out into words what he wishes to transmit, and another party takes it and translates it into sounds that represent letters, which are sent over the wire by breaking the electric current, which reproduces the sounds at the other end, which are retranslated by the operator at the end into words and delivered to the customer; and in sending the message by telephone the person who desires to send a message speaks into the instrument, and, instead of breaking and interrupting the current, it is partially broken and varied by the air waves produced by speaking, and the spoken words of air waves pass over the wire by their effect on the electric current—that is, they are reproduced into sound waves, and give out the same sound at the other end as was spoken into the instrument at the transmitting end—and so comes within the provision of Rev. St. U. S. §§ 5263, 5268 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, pp. 3579, 3581], authorizing telegraph companies to maintain telegraph lines over the public domain of the United States. Northwestern Telephone Exch. Co. v. Chicago, M. & St. P. Ry. Co., 79 N. W. 315, 317, 78 Minn. 334.

It is held that the term "telegraph," in Rev. St. arts. 698, 699, providing that corporations created for the purpose of constructing and maintaining magnetic telegraph lines may set their poles upon public roads, etc., includes telephones. San Antonio & A. P. Ry. Co. v. Southwestern Telegraph & Telephone Co., 55 S. W. 117, 93 Tex. 313, 49 L. R. A. 459, 77 Am. St. Rep. 884.

The term "telegraph companies," in Code 1873, § 2882, providing that actions may be brought against telegraph companies in any county through which the line passes or is operating, is to be construed as including telephone companies. "In Iowa Union Telephone Co. v. Board of Equalization, 67 Iowa, 250, 25 N. W. 155, it was held that a telephone company was to be regarded, for the purposes of taxation, as coming within the denomination of 'telegraph company,' within the meaning of the statute." Franklin v. Northwestern Telephone Co., 28 N. W. 461, 462, 69 Iowa, 97.

The term "telegraph companies," in a statute authorizing a city to license telegraph companies, includes telephones. "Of course, there is a distinction between the two classes of business; but in almost every respect they are very similar, if not identical. One may require more lines of wire than the other; but we are not aware of any other distinction, outside of their office or places of operation, distinguishable to the naked eye. Wisconsin Telephone Co. v. City of Oshkosh, 21 N. W. 828, 830, 62 Wis. 32.

A "telephone company" is a "telegraph company," in the meaning of the latter term as used in a statute providing for assessing telegraph lines and property. "Both the telephone and telegraph are used for distant communication by means of wires stretched over different jurisdictions. The fundamental principle by which communication is secured is the same. It was held in Wisconsin Telephone Co. v. City of Oshkosh, 62 Wis. 32, 21 N. W. 828, that a statute authorizing the formation of corporations for building, owning, and operating telegraph lines was sufficient to authorize the formation of corporations for building, owning, and operating telephone lines; the decision being based upon the identity of the principle by which communication in each case is secured." Iowa Union Telephone Co. v. Board of Equalization, 25 N. W. 155, 67 Iowa, 250.

A "telegraph company," within the meaning of Revenue Act June 7, 1879, authorizing the taxation of telegraph companies, includes a telephone company. In so holding the court cites the English case of Attorney General v. Edison Telephone Co. of London, L. R. 6 Q. B. Div. 244, in which it was held that a telephone line operated under telephone patents was a telegraph line, and communications sent over it were telegrams, within the meaning of the act of 1869, conferring exclusive telegraph privileges upon the Postmaster General. In the opinion by Stephen, J., "It is said that in Mr. Edison's specification the words 'telegraph' and 'telegraphic' are frequently used in reference to his invention." And it is further stated in the same opinion that in Webster's Dictionary, published in 1856 (Am. Ed. 1854), an electro-magnetic telegraph is defined under the word "telegraph" as an instrument or apparatus for communicating words or language to a distance by the use of electricity, and under the head of "electro-magnetic telegraph" as an instrument or apparatus which, by means of iron wires conducting the electric fluid, conveys intelligence to any distance with the velocity of lightning. The last definition is that of Morse himself, and, as will be seen by the date, both were given many years before telephone transmitters or receivers were ever dreamed of. The same edition of Webster defines "telegraph" to be a machine for communicating intelligence from a distance by various signals or movements previously agreed upon, which signals represent letters, words, or ideas, which can be transmitted from one station to another as far as the signals can be seen. This definition shows that the word "telegraph" did not originally include the idea of transmission over a wire, by means of electricity or otherwise, but merely signals addressed to the eye, and, compared with the later definitions, illustrates the changes of meaning which words necessarily undergo in consequence of a never ceasing progress of discovery and invention. Commonwealth v. Pennsylvania Telephone Co. (Pa.) 42 Leg. Int. 180.

"Telegraphy" is the transaction of business over or through wires. The title of Act May 1, 1876, entitled "An act supplementary to 'An act to provide for the incorporation and regulation of certain corporations' relative to the incorporation and powers of telegraph companies for the use of individuals," etc., sufficiently expresses its purpose to authorize the incorporation of telephone companies, since a telephone company is virtually a telegraph company. The York Telephone Co. v. Keesey, 5 Pa. Dist. R. 366, 369.

TELEGRAPH COMPANY.

"Telegraph companies," like common carriers, are public servants, and held to a high degree of diligence and a strict discharge of duty; and, having violated their duty and been negligent in its discharge, such companies are liable in damages. Western Union Telegraph Co. v. Frith, 58 S. W. 118, 119, 105 Tenn. 167 (citing Marr v. Western Union Telegraph Co., 85 Tenn. [1 Pickle] 529, 3 S. W. 496; Wadsworth v. Same, 86 Tenn. [2 Pickle] 695, 8 S. W. 574, 6 Am. St. Rep. 864; Western Union Telegraph Co. v. Mellon, 96 Tenn. 66, 33 S. W. 725; Jones v. Western Union Telegraph Co., 101 Tenn. 442, 47 S. W. 699).

Any person or persons, joint-stock company, association, or corporation engaged in transmitting to, from, through, or in the state telegraph messages, shall be deemed and held to be a telegraph company. Ind. T. Ann. St. 1899, § 4954.

The term "telegraph company," as used in the chapter relating to the listing of personal property for taxation, includes any person or persons, joint-stock association, or corporation, wherever organized or incorporated, when engaged in the business of transmitting to, from, through, or in the state telegraphic messages. Bates' Ann. St. Ohio 1904, §§ 2777, 2780-17.

Telegraph companies are quasi public servants. Ayer v. Western Union Telegraph Co., 79 Me. 493, 497, 10 Atl. 495, 1 Am. St. Rep. 353.

Railroad company.

A railroad company, operating a telegraph line for its trains, and not for profit, is not a "telegraph company operating miles of wire," within Acts 1888, c. 3, and is not, therefore, subject to taxation as such. Adams v. Louisville, N. O. & T. Ry. Co. (Miss.) 18 South. 932.

Telephone company.

Telephone company as, see "Telegraph."

TELEGRAPH OPERATOR.

As a clerk, see "Clerk."

As laborer, see "Laborer."

TELEGRAPH STATIONS.

"Telegraph stations," as used in a contract between a railroad and telegraph company granting the telegraph company the privilege of putting up and maintaining a telegraph wire for general telegraphic correspondence on the line of telegraph posts along the line of the railroad, and liberty to establish and maintain telegraph stations at such points along the line of the road, means ordinary offices for the business of telegraphy at cities or villages along the line of the road. Railroad Co. v. Telegraph Co., 38 Ohio St. 24, 29.

TELEPHONE.

The prohibition against charging or receiving more than $50 per annum for the use of a telephone on a separate wire, which is made by District of Columbia Corporation Act June 30, 1898, does not require a telephone company to furnish at that rate such additional equipment as wall cabinet and desk, auxiliary bells, etc., if the separate charges had theretofore been made, since by the words "use of a telephone" the court cannot extend the statute beyond its terms, and hold it to include things which were not theretofore furnished by the company as a part of the telephone. Chesapeake & P. Telephone Co. v. Manning, 22 Sup. Ct. 881, 886, 186 U. S. 238, 46 L. Ed. 1144.

As instrument alone.

"Telephone," according to the course of business, refers only to the instrument itself, apart from wires, batteries, call bells, switchboards, and other appliances with which it is connected in its practical and commercial use. Western Union Telegraph Co. v. American Bell Telephone Co. (U. S.) 105 Fed. 684, 696.

As a public use.

See "Public Use."

As whole system.

The word "telephone," as used in Act April 13, 1858, regulating the rental allowed for the use of telephones, designates and refers to an entire system or apparatus, composed of all the usual and necessary instruments for the transmission and reception of telephonic messages, and not to a single instrument. Hockett v. State, 5 N. E. 178, 185, 105 Ind. 250, 55 Am. Rep. 201; Central Union Telephone Co. v. Bradbury, 5 N. E. 721, 725, 106 Ind. 1.

As public use.

See "Public Use."

Telegraph distinguished.

"Telephone" differs from "telegraph" very materially, in this: that the transmission of news, the sending and receiving of messages, by telegraph, can only be done by those having a knowledge of the business, and having a knowledge of the art and science of telegraphy. Webster defines "telephone" as an instrument for conveying sounds to a great distance. Central Union Telegraph Co. v. State, 118 Ind. 194, 206, 19 N. E. 604, 610, 10 Am. St. Rep. 114.

TELEPHONE COMPANY.

As telegraph company, see "Telegraph."

Telephone companies, like telegraph companies, are common carriers of information, and their lines are daily employed in the transaction of interstate commerce. Therefore neither a state nor an Indian nation has power to grant to one company the exclusive right to maintain telephone lines within its territory. Such a grant, being void ab initio, cannot be invoked to prevent the construction and maintenance of lines by other companies or persons, although they are not interstate, but merely local. Muskogee Nat. Telephone Co. v. Hall, 118 Fed. Rep. 382, 384, 55 C. C. A. 208.

A telephone company is a common carrier in the same sense as a telegraph company, and it has certain well-defined obligations of a public character. All the instruments and appliances used by a telephone company in the prosecution of its business are consequently in legal contemplation devoted to a public use. Hockett v. State, 5 N. E. 178, 185, 105 Ind. 250, 55 Am. Rep. 201.

A "telephone company" is a common carrier, in the sense that it is bound to furnish service to any one offering to comply with its reasonable requirements, not only in respect to its public stations system, but also in respect to the so-called private system of instruments installed in offices, residences, and places of business. State ex rel. Payne v. Kinloch Telephone Co., 67 S. W. 684, 635, 93 Mo. App. 349.

A telephone company is a common carrier, as was said by Justice Brewer in Missouri v. Bell Telephone Co. (U. S.) 23 Fed. 539. A telephone system is simply a system for the transmission of intelligence. It is, perhaps, in a limited sense and yet in a strict sense, a common carrier. The moment it establishes a telephonic system, it is bound to deal equally with all citizens in every department of business, and, the moment it opened its telephonic system to one telephone company, that moment it put itself in a position where it was bound to open this system to any other telephone company tendering equal pay for equal services. Being a common carrier, it has not the right to discriminate in granting licenses for the use of the telephone instruments. Delaware v. Delaware & A. Telegraph & Telephone Co. (U. S.) 47 Fed. 633, 638.

Telephone companies are the common carriers of news, and all persons are entitled to the enjoyment of the benefits to be derived from the use of the telephone, and the company is a public servant in the commerce of the country and is subject to the process of the court in compelling it to discharge its public duties by supplying telephones to all alike who demand them, without discrimination. State v. Nebraska Telephone Co., 22 N. W. 237, 239, 17 Neb. 126, 52 Am. Rep. 404.

The term "telephone company," as used in the chapter relating to the listing of personal property for taxation, includes any person or persons, joint-stock association, or corporation, wherever organized or incorporated, engaged in the business of transmitting to, from, through, or in the state telephonic messages. Bates' Ann. St. Ohio 1904, §§ 2777, 2780-17.

Any joint-stock association, company, copartnership, or corporation, whether incorporated under the laws of this state, or of any other state, or of any foreign nation, engaged in transmitting to, from, through, in, or across the state of South Carolina telegraphic messages, shall be deemed and held to be a telegraph company. Civ. Code S. C. 1902, § 288.

TELEPHONE EXCHANGE.

A "telephone exchange" is an arrangement for putting up and maintaining wires, poles, and switchboards within a given area, with a central office and the necessary operators to enable hirers of telephones within that area to converse with each other. Western Union Telegraph Co. v. American Bell Telephone Co. (U. S.) 105 Fed. 684, 696.

TELEPHONE LINE.

In its proper sense, "line" means wire connecting one telegraph or telephone station with another, or the whole of a system of telegraph or telephone wires under one management or name. Webst. Dict. A telegraph wire between stations, forming with them the circuit. Cent. Dict. As used in the telephone business, it means the line of poles and wires supported thereon, without regard to the number of those wires. Southern Bell Telephone & Telegraph Co. v. D'Alemberte, 21 So. 570, 571, 39 Fla. 25.

TELEPHONIC SYSTEM.

A telephonic system is simply a system for the transmission of intelligence and news. It is, perhaps, in a limited sense, and yet in a strict sense, a common carrier. It must be equal in its dealings with all. Commercial Union Telephone Co. v. New England Telephone & Telegraph Co., 61 Vt. 241, 250, 17 Atl. 1071, 1074, 5 L. R. A. 161, 15 Am. St. Rep. 893 (citing Missouri v. Bell Telephone Co. [U. S.] 23 Fed. 539).

TELLER.

See "Bank Teller."

TELLTALE.

A "telltale," or tickler, is a contrivance to warn railroad brakemen of the proximity of a bridge. It is constructed of an upright on each side of the road and a pole running across the road and resting upon the uprights, from which pole a number of strands of wire are suspended. Wallace v. Central Vt. R. Co., 18 N. Y. Supp. 280, 281, 63 Hun, 632.

TEMPER.

See "Violent Temper."

"Temper," in Pen. Code 1895, art. 7, defining adequate cause, as that term is used in article 698, defining manslaughter as voluntary homicide committed under the immediate influence of sudden passion, arising from an adequate cause, but neither justified nor excused by law, as that it would commonly produce a degree of anger in a person of "ordinary temper" sufficient to render the mind incapable of cool reflection, is not of the same meaning as the word "courage." "Temper" means disposition of mind, as inclination to give way to anger, resentment, or the like. "Courage" means that quality of mind which enables one to encounter dangers and difficulties with firmness, or without fear or depression of spirits; valor; boldness; bravery, etc. A man may be a person of mild and agreeable temper or disposition, capable of patience and forbearance, with coolness under great insults or provocation, and yet he may be a man of great courage; and vice versa. It is erroneous, in an instruction on adequate cause in a homicide case, to use the phrase "ordinary temper and courage," instead of the words "ordinary courage." Gardner v. State, 48 S. W. 170, 171, 40 Tex. Cr. R. 19.

TEMPERANCE.

"Temperance," as used in an information in the nature of a quo warranto for the forfeiture of the charter of a corporation alleged to have been formed to promote the cause of temperance, has no fixed, legal meaning, as contradistinguished from its usual import. Webster defines it as "habitual moderation in regard to the indulgence of the natural appetites and passions; restrained or moderate indulgence; moderation, as temperance in eating and drinking, temperance in the indulgence of joy or mirth." The term "temperance" is too vague and uncertain to enable it to be said therefrom that a fund in possession of such corporation is a public charity, which can be administered by a court of equity; and it follows that the perversion of the fund is not an injury to the public, and forfeiture therefor cannot be maintained. People v. Dashaway Ass'n, 24 Pac. 277, 279, 84 Cal. 114, 12 L. R. A. 117.

A gift for the promotion of temperance will be construed as a gift to a charity. Harrington v. Pier, 82 N. W. 845, 857, 105 Wis. 485, 50 L. R. A. 307, 76 Am. St. Rep. 924.

TEMPERANCE SALOON.

A "temperance saloon" is a place where nonintoxicating drinks and other refreshments are kept for sale. City of Clinton v. Grusendorf, 45 N. W. 407, 408, 80 Iowa, 117.

TEMPERATE.

Webster defines "temperate" as moderate, or not excessive. The use of the words "sober and temperate in the use of spirituous liquors," in insurance policies, does not imply that, in order for a man to be sober and temperate, he should abstain from the use of intoxicating liquors; and the fact that a man may have been drunk on some occasions does not of itself make him an intemperate man. Wolf v. Mutual Ben. Life Ins. Co. (U. S.) 30 Fed. Cas. 407, 409.

"Temperate," within the meaning of a question, in an application for life policy, whether the applicant has always been temperate, is to be construed as meaning abstinence from the excessive or injurious use of liquors, and not total abstinence. The word "temperate" suggests moderation and restraint from excessive or injurious use, and not total abstinence. Chambers v. Northwestern Mut. Life Ins. Co., 67 N. W. 367, 369, 64 Minn. 495, 53 Am. St. Rep. 549.

The words "sober and temperate," as used in an application for insurance, are to be taken in their ordinary sense. They do not imply total abstinence. The moderate, temperate use of intoxicating liquors is consistent with sobriety; but, if one use liquors to such an extent as to produce frequent intoxication, he is not "sober and temperate," within the meaning of the contract. Brockway v. Mutual Ben. Life Ins. Co. (U. S.) 9 Fed. 240, 253.

A warranty in an insurance policy that the insured was "temperate," etc., meant that his habit was to refrain from excessive indulgence in the use of intoxicants, and not that he abstained from all use. Meacham v. New York State Mut. Ben. Ass'n, 24 N. E. 283, 120 N. Y. 237.

TEMPERATE HABITS.

A statement by an applicant for life insurance that he was of "temperate habits" does not imply total abstinence, and is not falsified by proof of a single or incidental use. Supreme Lodge K. P. v. Foster, 59 N. E. 877, 881, 26 Ind. App. 333.

An occasional excess in the use of intoxicating liquors does not constitute a habit, or make a man intemperate, within the meaning of a policy insuring one as a person of "temperate habits"; but if the habit has been formed and is indulged in of drinking to excess and becoming intoxicated, whether daily and continuously, or periodically, with sober intervals of greater or less length, the person addicted to such habit cannot be said to be of temperate habits, within the meaning of the policy. Union Mut. Life Ins. Co. v. Relf, 38 Ohio St. 596, 599, 38 Am. Rep. 613.

"Temperate habits," as used in an application for a life insurance policy, in which the insured stated that he was a man of temperate habits, means customary conduct, to pursue which he has acquired a tendency from frequent repetition of the same acts. It would be incorrect to say that a man has a habit of anything from a single act. An occasional use of intoxicating liquors does not render the insured a man of intemperate habits, nor would an exceptional case of excess justify the application of such character to him. If the habits of the insured, in the usual, ordinary, and everyday routine of his life, were temperate, the representations made are not untrue, within the meaning of the policy, although he may have had an attack of delirium tremens from an exceptional overindulgence. "Intemperate habits cannot be imputed to one because his appearance and actions might indicate a night of excessive indulgence." Knickerbocker Life Ins. Co. v. Foley, 105 U. S. 350, 351, 28 L. Ed. 1055.

A life policy representing the insured to be a person of "temperate habits" should be construed to mean that the occasional use of intoxicating liquors did not render him a man of intemperate habits, nor would an occasional case of excess justify the application of this character to him. An attack of delirium tremens may sometimes follow a single excessive indulgence. When we speak of the habits of a person, we refer to his customary conduct. It would be incorrect to say that a man has a habit of anything from a single act. The court did not, therefore, in instructing the jury that if the habits of the insured, in the usual, ordinary, and everyday routine of his life, were temperate, the representations made are not untrue, within the meaning of the policy, although he may have an attack of delirium tremens from an exceptional overindulgence. It could not have been contemplated, from the language used in the policy, that it should become void for an occasional excess by the insured, but only when such excess had by frequent repetitions become a habit. Northwestern Mut. Life Ins. Co. v. Muskegon Nat. Bank, 7 Sup. Ct. 1221, 1228, 122 U. S. 501, 30 L. Ed. 1100.

"Habit," as generally understood and as defined by lexicographers, is a disposition or condition of the mind or body; the tendency or aptitude for the performance of certain actions acquired by custom, or a frequent repetition of the same acts. Habit is that which is held or retained; the effect of custom or frequent repetition. Hence we speak of good habits and bad habits. Frequent drinking of spirits leads to habits of intemperance, etc. If an applicant for insurance had an appetite for intoxicating drinks to such an extent that a single indulgence necessarily instigated him to a repetition of it, and led him into what have been called "sprees," and thesesprees were frequent, and rendered him incapable of controlling his appetite while they continued, then, although there were intervals during which he remained entirely sober, there was such a repetition of acts of drinking as amounted to a habit. Davey v. Etna Life Ins. Co. (U. S.) 20 Fed. 482, 492.

TEMPEST.

A "tempest" is a violent wind, storm, tumult, or commotion. In Webster's Dictionary it is defined as an extensive current of wind, rushing with great velocity and violence, and a storm of extreme violence, and as synonymous with "storm"; thus indicating that a freshet is not a storm, within such term, when used in an insurance policy. Stover v. Insurance Co. (Pa.) 3 Phila. 38, 39.

TEMPLATE.

"A template is a piece of sheet iron, the contour of which corresponds to the opening between the rolls." Johnson Steel Street Rail Co. v. North Branch Steel Co. (U. S.) 48 Fed. 191, 193.

TEMPORALITIES.

The "temporalities" of the Catholic Church are the revenues of the church derived from pew rents, Sunday and other collections, graveyard charges, school fees, and donations. Barabasz v. Kabat, 87 Atl. 720, 86 Md. 23.

TEMPORARILY.

The expressions "for the time" and "for the time being" are equivalent to the word "temporarily," and each constitutes a good definition of that word. State v. Cunningham, 55 Atl. 654, 75 Vt. 332.

"Temporarily," as used in Acts 1867, c. 367, authorizing and empowering the board of police commissioners, whenever in their judgment the public peace and tranquillity might require, to order the closing temporarily of all barrooms, bars, drinking houses, and liquor shops, and all other places where liquor is usually sold in the city of Baltimore, construed in its ordinary and accepted meaning and import, means that such orders should operate, not only for a short, but for a definite, interval or portion of time. State v. Strauss, 49 Md. 288, 296.

The word "temporarily," as used in the enacting clause of Act Feb. 20, 1875, entitled "An act to remove the seat of government temporarily to Wheeling," is used in its most familiar signification and import, or natural and ordinary meaning, and in contradistinction to permanent, or any definite period of time, and not in a technical sense. Therefore the removal of the seat of government temporarily to Wheeling means simply that the Legislature and others understood and contemplated that the removal of the seat of government to Wheeling should be for a time, perhaps of not long duration, and at any rate not permanently, but rather until otherwise provided by law. Slack v. Jacob, 8 W. Va. 612, 650.

The word "temporarily," as used in the Constitution, providing that the judges of circuit courts may temporarily exchange circuits or hold court for each other, under such regulations as may be made by law, means a local, and not a permanent or lasting, interchange of judges. Act Dec. 25, 1840, providing for the interchange of circuits, provides for a permanent, and not for a temporary, exchange, and is therefore unconstitutional. Knox v. Beirne, 4 Ark. (4 Pike) 460, 464.

TEMPORARY.

"Temporary" means lasting for a time only; existing or continuing for a limited time; not of long duration; not permanent; transitory; changing; but a short time. Moore v. Smead, 62 N. W. 426, 429, 89 Wis. 558.

2 Bouv. Law Dict. p. 573, defines "temporary" thus: "That which is to last for a limited time, as a temporary statute, or one which is limited in its operation for a particular period of time after its enactment; the opposite of perpetual." People v. Wright, 70 Ill. 388, 399.

TEMPORARY ALIMONY.

"Temporary alimony" is intended for the support of the wife pending an action for divorce; and hence the husband cannot set off against the support allowed the value of household goods and other property appropriated or used by the wife. Dayton v. Drake, 64 Iowa, 714, 716, 21 N. W. 158.

TEMPORARY INJUNCTION.

A temporary injunction merely prevents action until a hearing can be had. Calvert v. State, 34 Neb. 616, 631, 52 N. W. 687, 692.

A preliminary injunction is commonly spoken of as a "temporary injunction," and is granted pending a hearing on the merits, and only upon complainant's entering into bond, with surety, conditioned and payable as required by law. The writ is obtained upon an ex parte hearing, and the bond is required as a protection against the abuse of this extraordinary process and to prevent oppressions by its use. It is different from a permanent injunction, in that it is preliminary to a hearing on the merits, and by no means dependent on such hearing. Jesse French Piano & Organ Co. v. Porter, 32 South. 678, 679, 134 Ala. 302, 92 Am. St. Rep. 31.

In Palmer v. Foley (N. Y.) 45 How. Prac. 110-118, in discussing the office of a temporary injunction, the court uses this language: "The object of a process of injunction is both preventative and protective. It seeks to prevent a meditated wrong, and not to redress an injury, which can usually be done only at law, and then to protect the party against any unlawful invasion of his rights." Armitage v. Fisher, 24 N. Y. Supp. 650, 658, 4 Misc. Rep. 315.

A temporary order of injunction does not contemplate that an order on the application is to be had before the application is finally acted upon. It is to all intents and purposes a complete and final action on the application for a temporary order of injunction, subject only to the right of the opposite party to a modification or dissolution. State v. Baker, 88 N. W. 124, 126, 62 Neb. 840.

TEMPORARY INSANITY.

"Temporary insanity," as used in Pen. Code, art. 48, providing that neither intoxication nor temporary insanity produced by the voluntary recent use of ardent spirits shall constitute any excuse for the commission of crime, is that condition of the mind directly produced by the use of ardent spirits; and where a fit of intoxication is carried to such a degree that the person becomes incapable of knowing the act he is doing is wrong and criminal, he is in that condition known as "temporary insanity." So far as the mental status is concerned, there is no difference between temporary insanity and "settled insanity," which is the term applied to delirium tremens caused by the breaking down of the person's system by long-continued or habitual drunkenness, and brought on by abstinence from drink. But they differ widely in their causes and results. The latter is from drink as a remote result; the former, from drinking as a direct result. Settled insanity is an involuntary result, from which all shrink alike. Temporary insanity is voluntarily sought after. In the first there is no criminal responsibility, but in the second responsibility never ceases. Evers v. State, 20 S. W. 744, 748, 31 Tex. Cr. R. 318, 18 L. R. A. 421, 37 Am. St. Rep. 811.

TEMPORARY LOAN.

A "temporary loan," within the general municipal law, seems to be one which is to be paid with and by the taxes of a current fiscal year. People v. Carpenter, 52 N. Y. Supp. 781, 785, 31 App. Div. 603.

A loan is not temporary which is made for 11 months and then paid to answer a temporary purpose of the creditor, and as soon as that purpose is effected is renewed or made again for the same period. Una v. Dodd, 39 N. J. Eq. (12 Stew.) 173, 187.

TEMPORARY RECEIVER.

A "temporary receiver," whether he be the marshal or another, is not a trustee for the creditors of the bankrupt, but is a caretaker and custodian of the visible property pending adjudication, and until a selection of a trustee. If in any sense a trustee, he is a trustee for the bankrupt, in whom is the title to the property until it passes by operation of law, as of the day of the adjudication, to the trustee selected by the creditors. Boonville Nat. Bank v. Blakey (U. S.) 107 Fed. 891, 895, 47 C. C. A. 43.

TEMPORARY REMOVAL.

"Temporary removal," as applied to leaving a homestead, means a removal for a fixed and temporary purpose, or for a temporary reason. Moore v. Smead, 62 N. W. 426, 429, 89 Wis. 558.

"Temporary removal" means a removal for a fixed and temporary purpose, or for a temporary reason; and, in order to prevent the abandonment of the homestead by such removal, it must be made with a certain and abiding intention of returning to the homestead and abiding thereon as a homestead. Blackburn v. Lake Shore Traffic Co., 63 N. W. 289, 290, 90 Wis. 362.

TEMPORARY RESTRAINING ORDER.

A "temporary restraining order" contemplates a further hearing on the application for a temporary injunction upon notice, and a hearing by the adverse party on such application. State v. Baker, 88 N. W. 124, 126, 62 Neb. 840.

TEMPORARY STATUTE.

A temporary statute is a statute limited as to duration. People v. Wright, 70 Ill. 383, 399.

TEMPTATION.

"Temptation" is that which tempts to evil; an evil enticement or allurement. Suther v. State, 24 South. 43, 45, 48, 118 Ala. 88.

"Temptation," as the term is used in the statement that seduction must be accomplished by means of temptation, deception, etc., is that which tempts to evil; an evil enticement or allurements. The temptation may be by conduct or act, or by suggestions of confidence and secrecy. If they are believed by an unmarried woman, and she is induced thereby to surrender her chastity, it will constitute seduction. Hall v. State, 32 South. 750, 758, 134 Ala. 90.

"Temptation" is not always invitation. As the common law is understood by the most competent authorities, it does not excuse trespass because there is a temptation to commit it, or hold property owners bound to contemplate the infraction of property rights because the temptation to untrained minds to infringe them might have been foreseen. Paolino v. McKendall, 53 Atl. 268, 272, 24 R. I. 432, 60 L. R. A. 133, 96 Am. St. Rep. 736 (citing Holbrook v. Aldrich, 168 Mass. 15, 46 N. E. 115, 36 L. R. A. 493, 60 Am. St. Rep. 364); Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. v. Reich, 40 Atl. 682, 684, 61 N. J. Law, 635, 41 L. R. A. 831, 68 Am. St. Rep. 727.

TEN CENT PIECE.

The words "ten cent piece," in an indictment charging the taking by defendant of one ten cent piece in coin, means ten cent piece of the United States. Kirk v. State, 32 S. W. 1045, 35 Tex. Cr. R. 224.

TEN DAYS' ADVERTISING.

A decree for a sale of personalty of a decedent's estate after "ten days' advertising" in a newspaper at the place of sale, at which several dailies were published, meant that the notice should be published at least ten times and on ten distinct days. An advertisement on one day ten days prior to the sale would certainly not be ten days' advertising, nor would a publication three times within that time be ten days' advertising. An advertisement on one day, published ten days prior to the sale, might well be an advertising ten days before the sale, but it would not be ten days' advertisement, as prescribed by the decree. Maxwell v. Burns (Tenn.) 59 S. W. 1067, 1071.

TEN DAYS' NOTICE.

A subcontractor's notice of lien, given on the fifteenth of February, is given ten days before the filing of the lien, where the same was filed on the 25th of the same month, within Rev. Code 1885, p. 1027, § 22, requiring "ten days' notice" to be given before the filing of any lien; the first day being excluded and the last included in computing the time. Hahn v. Dierkes, 37 Mo. 574, 575.

As used in St. 55 Geo. III, c. 68, requiring "ten days' notice" on an appeal to the session against an order for stopping up a footway, meant ten days' notice, one inclusive and the other exclusive. Rex v. Justices of West Riding of Yorkshire, 4 Barn. & Adol. 685.

TEN DOLLAR BILL.

"Ten dollar bill" means a bank bill of the denomination of $10, or a treasury note of the same denomination. State v. Freeman, 89 N. C. 469, 472.

TEN DOLLARS IN MONEY.

An indictment charging the taking of "ten dollars in money" means that money of the value of $10 was taken. State v. Brown, 18 S. E. 51, 52, 113 N. C. 645.

TEN O'CLOCK.

An entry in a justice's docket that a case was adjourned to a certain day at "ten o'clock" will be understood to mean that it was adjourned to 10 o'clock a. m., and not 10 o'clock p. m. Taylor v. Wilkinson, 22 Wis. 40, 42.

TENANCY.

See "General Tenancy"; "Joint Tenancy."

"A tenancy exists where one has let real estate to another to hold of him as landlord. When duly created and the tenant put in possession, he is the owner of an estate for the time being, and has all the usual rights and remedies of an owner to defend his possession. But a tenancy does not necessarily imply a right to complete and exclusive possession. It might, on the other hand, be created with implied or express reservation of a right to possession on the part of the landlord, for all purposes not inconsistent with the privileges granted to the tenant." Morrill v. Mackman, 24 Mich. 279, 284, 9 Am. Rep. 124.

To constitute "tenancy," the occupant of premises must have some right to a tenancy thereof by contract, express or implied; in other words, he must have a landlord. There must be some privity between him and the landlord, or some agent of the owner, who is authorized to rent or lease the premises. Bates v. State, 76 S. W. 462, 463.

No particular form of words is necessary to create a tenancy. Any words that show an indication of the lessor to divest himself of the possession and confer it on another, subject to his own title, is sufficient. Lightbody v. Truelsen, 39 Minn. 310, 313, 40 N. W. 67, 68.

TENANCY OF THE PRESENT OCCUPANTS.

The phrase "tenancy of the present occupants," stated in a title insurance policy as a defect in or objection to the title against which the insurer does not insure, must be construed as the tenancy which arises through the occupation or temporary possession of the premises by those who are tenants in the popular sense in which the word "tenant" is used, and does not include the claim of a person who, asserting ownership in fee as against the title insured, is in actual adverse possession. The word "tenant" is generally used in a popular sense, and as mentioned in this sense, according to Webster, is "one who has the occupation or temporary possession of lands or tenements whose title is in another; correlative to landlord." Place v. St. Paul Title Ins. & Trust Co., 69 N. W. 706, 707, 67 Minn. 126, 64 Am. St. Rep. 404.

TENANT.

See "Joint Tenants"; "Subtenant"; "Terre-Tenant."

Tenants and others, see "Others."

The party to whom a lease is made is called the "tenant." Becker v. Becker, 43 N. Y. Supp. 17, 22, 18 App. Div. 342.

The term "tenant" is used to designate a person leasing property from the owner thereof. Jackson v. Harsen (N. Y.) 7 Cow. 323, 326, 17 Am. Dec. 517.

A tenant is a purchaser of an estate in the land or building hired. Bowe v. Hunking, 135 Mass. 380, 383, 46 Am. Rep. 471.

A tenant is one who holds or possesses lands or tenements by any kind of title, either in fee, for life, for years, or at will. Cliff v. White, 12 N. Y. (2 Kern.) 519, 527; Walker v. McCusker, 12 Pac. 723, 725, 71 Cal. 594.

One who holds land by any kind of title, whether for years, for life, or in fee, is a tenant. Hosford v. Ballard, 39 N. Y. 147, 151.

A tenant may be defined to be one who has possession of the premises of another, subject to the other's title and with his consent. Lightbody v. Truelson, 39 Minn. 310, 313, 40 N. W. 67, 68.

The common acceptance of the word "tenant" is "one who holds or possesses lands by any kind of right; one who has an occupation or temporary possession of lands or tenements whose title is in another; one who has possession of any place; a dweller; an occupant." And this is substantially the legal definition. Woolsey v. State, 30 Tex. App. 346, 347, 17 S. W. 546, 547 (citing Webst. Dict.; Bouv. Law Dict.).

A tenant is one who occupies lands or premises of another in subordination to that other's title and with his assent, express or implied; but, in order to create the relation, the two elements must concur. Dixon

v. Ahern, 14 Pac. 598, 600, 19 Nev. 422; Adams v. Gilchrist, 63 Mo. App. 639, 645. Any person who sustains such a relation to property and its owner is a tenant, within the meaning of Sayles' Civ. St. art. 3122, prohibiting a tenant from subleasing the premises without his landlord's consent, and his property is subject to a lien to secure the rent, whether such person is a lessee or an assignee, or only a subtenant. Forrest v. Durnell, 26 S. W. 481, 482, 86 Tex. 647.

The fact that one is in possession of the lands of another does not of itself establish a tenancy, because, if he is in possession under claim of title in himself, or under title of another, or even in recognition of the owner's title, but without his assent, he is a mere trespasser, and cannot be compelled to yield rent for his occupancy; nor is he estopped from attacking the owner's title. Dixon v. Ahern, 19 Nev. 422, 426, 19 Pac. 598.

To be a tenant a person must have some estate, be it ever so little, such as that of a tenant at will or on sufferance. A person may be in occupation of real property simply as a servant or licensee of his master, and in such case he cannot be considered a tenant of the master, so as to make the master guilty of a breach of covenant against reletting by placing him in possession of the property of which the master was a lessee. Presby v. Benjamin, 62 N. E. 430, 431, 169 N. Y. 377, 57 L. R. A. 317.

The word "tenant," as used in 2 Rev. St. p. 502, § 15, relating to distraint, does not extend beyond the original lessee and persons coming in under him as assignees, either in fact or in law. It is true that the word, when taken in its largest sense, includes every person who holds land, whatever be the nature or extent of his interest; but the word as used in the statute is in reference to the particular relation between landlord and tenant, lessor and lessee. Coles v. Marquand (N. Y.) 2 Hill, 447, 449.

Where an ordinance provided that snow should be removed from the sidewalk in front of a building by the tenant or occupant, and, in case there should be no tenant, by the owner, a building, part of which is leased to one tenant and the rest to another, cannot be regarded as having no tenant within the meaning of the ordinance. Commonwealth v. Watson, 97 Mass. 562, 564.

There is no doubt as to the general proposition that ordinarily, where a party in possession conveys to another and thereafter remains in possession, he does so in a general sense as a tenant of his grantee. Under such conditions the law declares the grantor the tenant at law of the grantee, and he may be ejected at any time. The official relation of landlord and tenant, however, does not exist between them. They become such merely by operation of law, and the meaning is that the grantor thereafter holds in subserviency to his grantee. Brooks v. Hyde, 37 Cal. 366, 374.

Cropper distinguished.

The difference between a tenant and a cropper is clear. The tenant has an estate in the land for the term, and consequently he has a right of property in the crop. If he pays a share of the crop for rent, it is he that divides off to the landlord his share, and until such division the right of property and of possession in the whole is his. The landlord has no lien on the crop for rent, whether such lien be stipulated for or not. A cropper has no estate in the land, but that remains in the landlord. Consequently, though he has, in some sense, the possession of the crop, it is only the possession of a servant, and is in law that of the landlord. The landlord must divide off to the cropper his share; in short, he is a laborer receiving a share of the crop. Harrison v. Ricks, 71 N. C. 7, 10, 11.

In Taylor v. Bradley, 39 N. Y. 129, 100 Am. Dec. 415, it is said the true test to be applied to cases in which the rent is to be paid in shares is as follows: "On the other hand, if A. should demise, lease, and let the farm to B., to have and to hold for the term of one or five years, to be cultivated in a husbandlike manner, B. rendering and paying to A. an annual rent for the use of the farm, to wit, one-half of the crop raised, I see no reason why the parties should not be deemed to intend an actual and technical lease." Thus an agreement whereby the party of the first part does hereby lease a farm, etc., one-third of the grain, roots, and hay to be delivered, and the tenant has all the buildings on the premises and is to keep them in repair, and the term is one year, from December to December, a longer time than a cropping season merely, and there is no possession reserved to the landlord during the term, or any control over the premises, and it is under seal and made to bind heirs, executors, and assigns, is a lease, and not a cropping contract. Strain v. Gardner, 21 N. W. 35, 39, 61 Wis. 174.

The term "cropper," and not "tenant," characterizes one who raises a crop upon the land of another under contract to raise the crop for a particular party, and therefore such person has a lien upon the crop for whatever is due him from the landlord. Burgie v. Davis, 34 Ark. 179.

Insufficient as description of interest.

"Tenant," as used in a petition in forcible entry and detainer, reciting that the applicant is the tenant of the premises pursuant to an agreement with the landlord, simply means one who holds or possesses lands or tenements by any kind of title, and does not indicate whether he is a tenant for years, or from year to year, or from month to month, or at will, or at sufferance, and is not, therefore, a description of the interest of the petitioner, as is required by Code Civ. Proc. § 2235. Fuchs v. Cohen, 19 N. Y. S. 236, 29 Abb. N. C. 56, 22 Civ. Proc. R. 269.

Lodger distinguished.

The opinions of eminent judges in cases under English statutes giving the elective franchise to the sole occupiers of houses of a certain value assume it as unquestionable that a mere lodger in the house of another is not a tenant. In Fludier v. Lombe, Hardw. Cas. 307, Lord Hardwicke held that a man who let room to lodgers was still the sole occupier of the house, and said: "A lodger was never considered by any one as an occupier of a house. It is not the common understanding of the word. Neither the house, nor even any part of it, can be properly said to be in the tenure or occupation of the lodger." See, also, opinion of Chief Justice Erie in Cook v. Humber, 11 C. B. (N. S.) 33, 46. In like manner under the English valuation and tax acts it has been held that a mere admission of a common lodger or inmate, the landlord retaining the legal possession of the whole house, did not constitute a tenancy. White v. Maynard, 111 Mass. 250, 253, 15 Am. Rep. 28 (citing Stamper v. Overseers of Sunderland, L. R. 3 C. P. 388; Reg. v. St. George's Union, L. R. 7 Q. B. 90).

The distinction between "lodgers" and "tenants" may in some cases be fairly drawn, and may depend on character of the hiring, with reference sometimes to the business of the lessor and the present intention of the parties, as gathered from all the other surrounding circumstances of the particular case. The tenant is put into the exclusive possession of his room, while the boarder or lodger has merely the use of them, without the actual or exclusive possession, which is in the lessor, subject to such use. Linwood Park Co. v. Van Dusen, 58 N. E. 576, 581, 63 Ohio St. 183 (citing 1 McAdam, Landl. & T. 621).

TENANT AT SUFFERANCE.

A "tenant at sufferance" is one who comes into the possession of land by lawful title, but who holds over by wrong after the termination of his term. Fielder v. Childs, 73 Ala. 567, 577; Godfrey v. Walker, 42 Ga. 562, 574; Hanson v. Johnson, 62 Md. 25, 29, 50 Am. Rep. 199; Kellogg v. Kellogg

(N. Y.) 6 Barb. 116, 130; Rowan v. Lytle (N. Y.) 11 Wend. 616, 618; Jackson v. Cairns (N. Y.) 20 Johns. 301, 305; Emerson v. Emerson (Tex.) 35 S. W. 425, 426. Provided, however, that he does not come in by act of law; for, if he comes in by act of law, and then holds over, he is regarded as an intruder or trespasser. Johnson v. Donaldson, 20 Atl. 242, 243, 17 R. I. 107.

Examples of this kind of tenure usually given are a lessee for a term of years or for the life of another person, who holds the possession of the lands or tenements after his term or estate has expired. It is in effect nothing more than the continuance of a possession lawfully taken after the title under which it was taken is ended. Pleasants v. Claghorn (Pa.) 2 Miles, 302, 304.

"When a tenant has come rightfully into possession of lands by permission of the owner, and continues to occupy the same after the time for which, by such permission, he has a right to hold the same, he is said to be a tenant by sufferance." In the language of the elementary writers, "he is one who comes in by right, and holds over without right." He holds without right, and yet is not a trespasser. Bright v. McOuat, 40 Ind. 521, 525 (quoting Washb. Real Prop.).

A tenant at sufferance is one who entered by a lawful demise or title, and, after that has ceased, wrongfully continues in possession without the assent or dissent of the person next entitled. Willis v. Harrell, 45 S. E. 794, 795, 118 Ga. 900.

"Tenancy by sufferance" is a tenancy of such a nature that there is by necessary implication an absence of any contractual relation between the owner and the tenant, and so if, during such a tenancy, there be any express permission or assent given by the owner, the tenancy becomes one at will. Willis v. Moore, 59 Tex. 628, 637, 46 Am. Rep. 284.

An estate at sufferance is an estate created, not by the consent, but by the laches, of the owner. Rowan v. Lytle (N. Y.) 11 Wend. 616, 618.

"Tenancy at sufferance" is created by holding over after the termination of a lease without the permission of a landlord, and the tenant is not entitled to notice to quit unless the landlord has permitted the tenancy to continue for such a length of time as to imply an assent on his part. Garner v. Hannah, 13 N. Y. Super. Ct. (6 Duer) 262, 270.

The term "tenant at sufferance" cannot be used, in the statute (Comp. Laws, § 2807) providing that "all estates at will and at sufferance may be determined by either party by three months' notice given to the other party," in a sense which would entitle any one holding over wrongfully to the statutory notice, since that would put it in the power of any occupant to prolong a wrongful possession indefinitely. Allen v. Carpenter, 15 Mich. 25, 34.

Anyone who continues in possession without agreement after a particular estate ended is a tenant at sufferance, and the purchaser of the estate of two tenants for life, remaining in possession after the death of the survivor, becomes a tenant at sufferance to the owner of the fee or person entitled to possession. Livingston v. Tanner (N. Y.) 12 Barb. 481, 484.

If the lessee of a tenant for life is in possession at the time of the life tenant's death, and continues to hold over, he becomes a tenant by sufferance; but if the lessee is not in possession, or does not hold over, a mere recognition of a lease previously made does not constitute such tenancy. Wright v. Graves, 80 Ala. 416, 418.

A husband holding over on his wife's land after her death is not a tenant at sufferance, but a mere trespasser, in whose favor the statute runs against his wife's heirs, under How. St. § 8700, providing that the right of an heir or one who died seised to recover land accrues at the time of the ancestor's death, if there be no estate intervening. Pattison v. Dryer, 57 N. W. 814, 816, 98 Mich. 504.

TENANT AT WILL.

A tenant at will is one who enters into possession of the land, etc., of another lawfully, but for no definite term or purpose, and whose possession is subject to the determination of the landlord at any time he sees fit to put an end to it. Emerson v. Emerson (Tex.) 35 S. W. 425, 426; Robb v. San Antonio St. Ry. Co., 18 S. W. 707, 708, 82 Tex. 392.

Where lands or tenements are let by one to another, to have and to hold to him, at the will of the lessor, by force of which lease the lessee is in possession, he is called "tenant at will," because he hath no certain or sure estate, for the lessor may put him out when he pleases. Post v. Post (N. Y.) 14 Barb. 253, 258 (quoting Co. Litt. § 68; 1 Cruise, 269; 4 Kent, Comm. 110); Barry v. Smith, 23 N. Y. Supp. 129, 131, 1 Misc. Rep. 240 (citing Reynolds v. Reynolds [N. Y.] 48 Hun, 142, 144).

A tenant at will is "one who holds lands or tenements let to him by another at the will of the lessor." 2 Bl. Comm. 145; 4 Kent, Comm. 110. This definition gives a very imperfect idea of the rights and obligations of a landlord and tenant between whom a tenancy at will subsists. A tenancy at will arose in every case where one man leased lands or tenements to another, and no fixed period of time was agreed upon at which the occupancy thereof should cease. The language of the books now is that tenancy at will cannot now arise without express grant or contract, and all general tenancies are constructively tenancies from year to year. Spalding v. Hall (U. S.) 6 D. C. 123, 125.

"Tenancy at will" is one that may be terminated at the will of either party. Davis v. Murphy, 128 Mass. 143, 145; Chandler v. Thurston, 27 Mass. (10 Pick.) 205, 209; Hilsendegen v. Scheich, 21 N. W. 894, 898, 55 Mich. 468; Brown v. Fowler, 63 N. E. 76, 78, 65 Ohio St. 507.

If one with the consent of the owner is let into or remains in possession under circumstances not showing an intention to create a freehold interest or a tenancy from year to year, he is a tenant at will. A vendee let in under an oral agreement of purchase is a tenant at will, and a parol gift of land creates a mere tenancy at will, which may be revoked or disaffirmed by the donor. Collins v. Johnson, 57 Ala. 304, 307.

"Tenancy at will" is an estate which simply confers a right to the possession of the leased premises for such indefinite period as both parties shall determine such possession shall continue. The estate may arise by implication, as well as by express words. The payment and acceptance of rent are facts from which the existence of such tenancy may be inferred. As a tenancy at will is determinable at any time, the tenant has no certain and indefeasible estate which he can assign or grant to any other person. Cunningham v. Holton, 55 Me. 33, 36.

A tenant at will includes one who is placed on land without any terms prescribed or land reserved, and has a mere occupancy. Stoltz v. Kretschmar, 24 Wis. 283, 285 (citing 4 Kent. Comm. 114).

A tenant holding over is not a tenant at will, unless he holds over at the express or implied consent of the landlord. Benfey v. Congdon, 40 Mich. 283, 285.

A tenant at will holds by the landlord's permission, express or implied, and differs in this respect from a tenant at sufferance, who holds over by wrong. Willis v. Harrell, 45 S. E. 794, 795, 118 Ga. 906.

A tenant under a lease, who holds over after the term is ended against the consent of the lessor, and refuses to surrender possession, is not a tenant at will. Perine v. Teague, 6 Pac. 84, 85, 66 Cal. 446.

A person who enters and holds land under a contract to buy it is to be regarded at law as at least a tenant at will. Jones v. Jones (S. C.) 2 Rich. Law, 542.

8 Wds. & P.—8

A verbal agreement between the wife, after her husband's death, and her son, that they should live together on the farm during her life, and that he should carry it on, and that they should pay the debts of the estate, and an entry and possession by the son under the agreement, creates a tenancy at will from year to year. Leavitt v. Leavitt, 47 N. H. 329, 340.

TENANT BY THE CURTESY.

See "Curtesy."

TENANT BY ENTIRETY.

See "Entirety (Estate By)."

TENANT FOR LIFE.

As owner, see "Owner."

A "tenant for life" of estates is one to whom lands or tenements are granted or devised, or to which he derives title by operation of law, for the term of his own life or the life of another. In re Hyde (N. Y.) 41 Hun, 72, 75; Hyde v. Gage (N. Y.) 11 Civ. Proc. R. 155, 159.

TENANT FOR YEARS.

See "Estate for Years."

TENANT FROM WEEK TO WEEK.

A "tenant from week to week" is not included in the description of tenants for life, lives, or years, in St. 4 Geo. II, c. 28, giving an action for double the value of rent for premises held over after a notice to quit. Lloyd v. Rosbee, 2 Camp. 453, 454.

TENANT FROM YEAR TO YEAR.

A "tenant from year to year" is one who holds lands or tenements under the demise of another, where no certain term has been mentioned, but an annual rent has been reserved. 1 Steph. Comm. 271; 4 Kent, Comm. 111, 114.

"A tenancy from year to year continues," says Lord Kenyon, O. J., "so long as both parties please, as between the original parties, so long as both of them live; and the tenant cannot be dispossessed without six months' notice ending at the expiration of the year." Shore v. Porter, 3 Term R. 13, 16 (cited in Brown v. Kayser, 18 N. W. 523, 524, 60 Wis. 1).

A demise for no definite period at a fixed rate per month creates a tenancy from year to year, under Rev. St. 1876, p. 338, providing that tenancies in which the premises are occupied by the consent of the landlord shall be deemed tenancies from year to year. Rothschild v. Williamson, 83 Ind. 387, 388.

"Tenancies from year to year" still exist in Minnesota as at common law, except so far as the length of notice required to terminate them has been changed by Gen. St. 1878, c. 75, § 40, relating to notices to quit. Hunter v. Frost, 49 N. W. 327, 329, 47 Minn. 1.

The decided weight of authority is that, when a lease is made not complying with the statute of frauds and possession is taken, there arises by operation of law a "tenancy from year to year." This implied tenancy will arise where occupation is had under a parol demise for years, void because exceeding the period allowed by the statute of frauds. Tayl. Landl. & Ten. 56. An entry under a lease for a term at an annual rent void for any cause, and a payment for rent, creates a tenancy from year to year on the terms of the lease, except as to duration. Arbenz v. Exley, Watkins & Co., 44 S. E. 149, 150, 52 W. Va. 476, 61 L. R. A. 957 (citing Wood, St. Frauds, § 22).

The term "year," as used in speaking of the estates from year to year, is merely descriptive, and therefore the estate includes tenancies from month to month, etc. Rosenblatt v. Perkins, 22 Pac. 598, 600, 18 Or. 156, 6 L. R. A. 257.

TENANT IN COMMON.

"Tenants in common" are such as hold by several and distinct titles, but by unity of possession, because none knoweth his own severalty, and therefore they all occupy promiscuously. 2 Bl. Comm. 191; Gould v. Subdistrict No. 3, 8 Minn. 427, 431 (Gil. 382, 384); Coster v. Lorillard (N. Y.) 14 Wend. 336; Manhattan Real Estate & Building Ass'n v. Cudlipp, 80 N. Y. Supp. 993, 996, 80 App. Div. 532; Taylor v. Millard, 23 N. Y. St. Rep. 694, 695; Taylor v. Millard, 23 N. E. 376, 377, 118 N. Y. 244, 6 L. R. A. 667; Griswold v. Johnson, 5 Conn. 363, 365; Silloway v. Brown, 94 Mass. (12 Allen) 30, 36; Gittings v. Worthington, 9 Atl. 228, 233, 67 Md. 139; O'Bryan v. Brown (Tenn.) 48 S. W. 315, 316. There is no necessity for unity of interest. Tenants in common are such as have a unity of possession, but distinct and several titles to their shares. Tilton v. Vall (N. Y.) 42 Hun, 638, 640. The quantities of their estate may be different, the shares may be unequal, the modes of acquisition of title may be unlike, and the only unity between them be that of possession. A remainderman may have a constructive possession sufficient to constitute the unity of the right of possession required to exist in a tenancy in common, and enable him to maintain an action for partition during the life of the life tenant. Sullivan v. Sullivan (N. Y.) 4 Hun, 198, 300.

Tenants in common are tenants who "are seized per my and per tout, each being entitled before severance to an interest in every inch of the soil." Martin v. Bowie, 15 S. E. 736, 742, 37 S. C. 102.

The relation of tenant in common arises where two or more persons are entitled to lands in such a manner that they have an undivided possession, but several freeholds; i. e., no one of them is entitled to the exclusive possession of any particular part of the land, each being entitled to occupy the whole in common with the others or to receive his share of the rents and profits. Carver v. Fennimore, 19 N. E. 103, 104, 116 Ind. 236 (citing Rap. & L. Law Dict.).

"Tenants in common are such as hold lands and tenements by any kind of title, either in fee, for life, for years, or at will." Bouv. Law Dict. 580. "There can be no tenancy in common in a mere actual possession by one. There must be some right or title to the possession, and not a mere actual possession, to create a co-tenancy. There may be a partnership or tenancy in common in a right or title to land; but I cannot see how there could be a partnership or tenancy in common in an actual possession, unless all the partners or tenants in common were actually occupying the land." Lillianskyoldt v. Goss, 2 Utah, 292, 297.

"Tenants in common" are persons who hold by unity of possession. The possession of one is the possession of the other, and the taking of the whole profits by one does not amount to an ouster of his companions. Tenancy in common is a joint estate, in which there is unity of possession, but separate and distinct titles. The tenants have separate and independent freeholds or leaseholds in their respective shares, which they manage and dispose of as freely as if the estate was one in severalty. There is no restriction upon their power of alienation; and the tenant may dispose of it by will, while the heirs of an intestate tenant will inherit the estate. Gage v. Gage, 29 Atl. 543, 546, 66 N. H. 282, 28 L. R. A. 829.

A tenancy in common is not created by several purchases of distinct and specific portions of common property, for it is said "tenants in common are generally defined to be such as hold the same land together by several and distinct title and by unity of possession, because none knows his own severalty, and therefore all occupy promiscuously." Hunter v. State, 30 S. W. 42, 44, 60 Ark. 312 (citing Black, Law Dict.).

Where one rents land for the purpose of having a single crop raised on it, of which the lessor is to have a part for the use of the land and the cultivator a part for his labor, and there is no evidence that it was the intention that the relation of landlord and tenant should exist between them, the parties are to be considered as tenants in common in the crop. Ponder v. Rhea, 32 Ark. 435, 437.

There can be neither a tenancy in common, nor a common interest, nor a joint tenancy and survivorship, in a mere expectancy; but, in order to create the object of a tenancy in common, there must be an actual estate in possession. Betts v. Betts (N. Y.) 4 Abb. N. C. 317, 353.

Wherever two or more persons from any cause are entitled to the possession simultaneously of any property in the state, a tenancy in common is created. Tenants in common may have unequal shares. They will be held to be equal, unless the contrary appears. The fact of inequality does not give the person holding the greater interest any privileges, as to possession, superior to the person owning a lesser interest, so long as the tenancy continues. Civ. Code Ga. 1895, § 3143.

Joint tenants distinguished.

The essential difference between joint tenants and tenants in common is that joint tenants have the land by one joint title and in one right, and tenants in common have several titles or by one title and several rights, which is the reason joint tenants have one joint freehold, and tenants in common have several freeholds. Coster v. Lorillard (N. Y.) 14 Wend. 265, 336.

The only practical difference between the estates of joint tenancy and tenancy in common is the right of survivorship, and, as the statute has abolished this and provided that the estate holden should be considered in the same manner as if they had been tenants in common, all distinction has been destroyed. Redemptorist Fathers v. Lawler, 54 Atl. 487, 488, 205 Pa. 24.

As owner.

See "Owner."

TENANT IN DOWER.

"Tenancy in dower" arises where the husband is seised of an estate of inheritance and dies. In this case the wife shall have a third part of all the lands and tenements whereof he was seised at any time during the coverture, to hold to herself for the term of her natural life. Combs v. Young's Heirs, 12 Tenn. (4 Yerg.) 218, 225, 26 Am. Dec. 225 (citing 2 Bl. Comm. 12a; Co. Litt. 31a).

TENANT IN FEE SIMPLE.

See "Fee Simple."

TENANT IN POSSESSION.

Practice Act, § 236, provided that "the purchaser at sheriff's sale from the time of the sale until a redemption, and a redemptioner from the time of his redemption until another redemption, shall be entitled to receive from the tenant in possession the rents of the property sold or the value of the use and occupation thereof." Held, that the phrase "tenant in possession" was intended to designate the class of persons from whom the purchaser was to receive the rents, and embraced the judgment debtor, as well as his lessee. Harris v. Reynolds, 13 Cal. 514, 516, 73 Am. Dec. 600 (quoted in Whithed v. St. Anthony & D. Elevator Co., 83 N. W. 238, 239, 9 N. D. 224, 50 L. R. A. 254, 81 Am. St. Rep. 562). The language is not that, when a tenant of the debtor is in possession, the tenant shall pay the purchaser, or that the debtor, when in possession, shall not pay; but the phraseology designed evidently to fix a general right, applying to all cases of tenancy, for none are excluded. Walker v. McCusker, 12 Pac. 723, 724, 71 Cal. 594.

TENANT OF THE FREEHOLD.

The phrase "tenant of the freehold," in a statute relating to the acquisition of land for public purposes, and providing for certain notice to be served on the tenant of the freehold, means tenant in possession appearing as a visible owner. Oulpeper County v. Gorrell (Va.) 20 Grat. 484, 511.

TENANTABLE REPAIR.

See "Good Tenantable Repair."

TENANT'S FIXTURES.

The term "tenant's fixtures," in a strict legal definition, is to be understood to signify things which are fixed to the freehold of the demised premises, but which nevertheless the tenant is allowed to disannex and take away, provided he seasonably exert his right to do so. A cistern and sinks, put into a building leased as a hotel, though fastened by nails or set into the floor by cutting away the boards, and water pipes fastened to the walls by hooks and passing through holes cut for the purpose in the floors and partitions, were held to be tenant's fixtures. Wall v. Hinds, 70 Mass. (4 Gray) 256, 270, 64 Am. Dec. 64.

TEND TO EXPOSE.

An instruction in a libel suit stating that matter is libelous which "tends to expose a man to public hatred" is a substantial compliance with Pen. Code, § 242, defining libel to be a malicious publication, etc., which exposes any person to contempt, ridicule, etc. Turton v. New York Recorder Co., 22 N. Y. Supp. 766, 769, 3 Misc. Rep. 314.

TENDED LINE.

"Tended line," as used in V. S. § 4583, imposing a penalty upon certain fishing, except fishing through ice with not more than 15 tended lines, means a line with a single hook fastened to any object upon the bank or upon the ice. State v. Stevens, 88 Atl. 80, 81, 69 Vt. 411.

TENDER.

"Tender" is defined to be the offer of money in satisfaction of a debt, by producing and showing the amount to the creditor or party claiming, and expressing verbally a willingness to pay it. Tompkins v. Batie, 7 N. W. 747, 748, 11 Neb. 147, 38 Am. Rep. 361 (citing Worcester Dict.).

"Tender" is an offer to perform an act which the party offering is bound to perform. McClain v. Batton, 50 W. Va. 121, 130, 40 S. E. 509.

Actual or manual production.

To constitute a valid legal tender there must be an actual offer of the sum due, unless the actual production of the money be dispensed with by a refusal to accept or something equivalent thereto; and this offer must be an absolute one, not coupled with any condition. See 2 Starkie, Ev. 778, 779, and cases there cited. Hunter v. Warner, 1 Wis. 141, 147.

To prove a plea of tender it must appear that there was a production and manual offer of the money, unless the same be dispensed with by some positive act or declaration on the part of the creditor; and it is not enough that the party has the money in his pocket, and says to the creditor that he has it ready for him, and asks him to take it, without showing the money. Bakeman v. Pooler (N. Y.) 15 Wend. 637, 638.

A plea of tender, offered at any time, at rules, or in court, ought not to be received unless the money tendered accompanies it. Downman v. Downman's Ex'rs (Va.) 1 Wash. 26, 31.

A tender must be made in money current at the time; otherwise, it is not money at all, and there is no tender. Downman v. Downman's Ex'rs (Va.) 1 Wash. 26, 31.

"Tender" has a definite legal significance. It imports, not merely the readiness and an ability to pay the money or to deliver over the deed or the property at the time and place mentioned in the contract, but also the actual production of the thing to be paid or delivered over, and an offer of it to the person to whom the tender is to be made. A money tender means an offer to pay in specie, and in the description of coin made current by the act of Congress.

Under a plea of tender, however, the party is not required to prove a literal and actual compliance with all the requisites of a legal tender, as it is defined in the books, in order to maintain the issue. He may prove his affirmance by showing an offer to pay in bank notes, which was not rejected on account of the character of the medium, or he may show that, when about to produce the money or thing to be tendered, his adversary told him it was unnecessary, and that he would not accept it, or any other act or declaration by which some of the formal requisites of a stated legal tender were dispensed with. Holmes v. Holmes (N. Y.) 12 Barb. 137, 144.

Equivalent to payment.

For the purpose of avoiding a penalty and forfeiture, or the loss of any rights or privileges, tender is the exact equivalent of payment, and it does not have to be repeated. Beatty v. Mutual Reserve Fund Life Ass'n (U. S.) 75 Fed. 65, 72, 21 C. C. A. 227.

Tender, if of sufficient amount, when accepted, is payment. When rejected, it operates as payment so long as it is kept good. Brown v. Lawton, 32 Atl. 733, 735, 87 Me. 83.

A legal tender is equivalent to payment as to all things that are incidental or consequential to the debt. The creditor, while not losing his rights to the prior debt by refusal of the tender itself, loses all collateral benefit and securities; and, where the tender is followed by payment into the court, interest and costs cannot be recovered. Wright v. John A. Robinson & Co., 32 N. Y. Supp. 463, 466, 84 Hun, 172.

Liability admitted.

Tender admits a liability or indebtedness to the amount of the sum tendered. Taylor v. Chicago, St. P. & K. C. Ry. Co., 40 N. W. 84, 86, 76 Iowa, 753 (citing Buford v. Funk [Iowa] 4 G. Greene, 493, 495).

Tender of any kind is only an admission to its extent, and no further. When made, it admits the fact of the tender, with all the conditions, limitations, and terms at the time imposed. Nothing further can be inferred from it. Brix v. Ott, 101 Ill. 70, 76.

Mutual promises.

The word "tender," as used in connection with mutual and concurrent promises, does not mean the same kind of offer as when it is used with reference to the payment or offer to pay an ordinary debt due in money, where the money is offered to a creditor who is entitled to receive it and nothing further remains to be done, and the transaction is completed and ended, but it only means a readiness and willingness, accompanied with the ability, on the part of one of the parties to do the acts which the agreement requires him to perform, provided that the other will concurrently do the acts which he is required to do by it, and a notice of the former to the latter of such readiness. Smith v. Lewis, 26 Conn. 110, 119; Raudabaugh v. Hart, 55 N. E. 214, 218, 61 Ohio St. 73, 76 Am. St. Rep. 361; Aborn v. Mason (U. S.) 1 Fed. Cas. 37, 39 (citing Smith v. Lewis, 26 Conn. 110; Adams v. Clark, 63 Mass. [9 Cush.] 215, 57 Am. Dec. 41); Cook v. Doggett, 84 Mass. (2 Allen) 439, 441; Gullford v. Mason, 48 Atl. 386, 388, 22 R. I. 422. See, also, Manistee Lumber Co. v. Union Nat. Bank, 32 N. E. 449, 452, 143 Ill. 490; Shouse v. Doane, 21 South. 807, 811, 39 Fla. 95.

In the case of mutual and concurrent promises, the word "tender" does not mean the same kind of an offer as when used in reference to the payment of a debt due in money; but it only means a readiness and willingness, accompanied with an ability on the part of the party, and such a tender does not require the bringing of money into court to keep it. Clark v. Wels, 87 Ill. 438, 441, 29 Am. Rep. 60.

Payment into court distinguished.

"Tender" is defined to be an offer by a debtor to the creditor of the amount of the debt. The offer must be in lawful money, which must be actually produced to the creditor, unless by words or acts he waives production, and the offer must be definite and unconditional. The payment of money into court under order is more than a simple tender. A tender is an offer to pay the debtor before suit, and cannot be made after suit is brought. It is purely ex parte. If it is not accepted, the debtor must retain his money; and, if established on plea, the only effect is to stop interest thenceforward on the amount tendered. But a payment into court is different. It is not ex parte, but done by order of court. The money paid in is for the plaintiff, and the possession of it cannot be resumed by the debtor. Salinas v. Ellis, 2 S. E. 121, 122, 26 S. C. 337.

Unconditional offer necessary.

A tender, in order to be effective, must be unconditional. United States v. World's Columbian Exposition (U. S.) 56 Fed. 630, 638.

A tender of money for the payment of a debt, to be available as a defense or as the foundation of an action in favor of the party making the tender, must be without qualification. Noyes v. Wyckoff, 21 N. E. 158, 114 N. Y. 204.

Tender must be unconditional. Thus, although a party who tenders money has a right to exclude any presumption against himself that the sum tendered is in part payment of the debt, yet, if he add a condition that the party who receives the money shall acknowledge that no more is due, it will invalidate the tender. The reason of this rule is manifest; for if the tender be of a sum as all that is due, that being disputed, and the creditor receives it, under these circumstances it might compromise his rights in seeking to recover more; whereas, if the same sum were tendered unconditionally, no such effect would follow. Thompkins v. Batie, 7 N. W. 747, 748, 11 Neb. 147, 38 Am. Rep. 361.

When a strict tender of money is required, it must be an unconditional offer of the full amount due, leaving it only at the will of the other to accept it. Irvin v. Gregory, 79 Mass. (13 Gray) 215, 218.

Where an offer is made to pay money by way of compromise, and with the understanding between the parties that, if the money is accepted, it shall be a complete and final settlement of all matters of dispute between the parties, such offer is not a tender in law, since a tender must be without condition, absolutely. Latham v. Hartford, 27 Kan. 249, 251.

An offer of money, coupled with the statement that it is a tender, in payment in full of all claims of the person to whom the money is thus offered, does not constitute a tender. Shiland v. Loeb, 69 N. Y. Supp. 11, 12, 58 App. Div. 565.

TENDER YEARS.

The phrase "minor of tender years," used in various connections in pleadings, may embrace as well minors of 20 years as of 20 months. It cannot be said absolutely what is or is not a tender age, and, applying to the rule that a pleading is to be taken most strongly against the pleader, little more effect can apparently be given to the phrase "minor of tender years" than that it indicates a minor not endowed with the discretion of maturity. Meyer v. King, 16 South. 245, 246, 72 Miss. 1, 35 L. R. A. 474.

TENDING TO SHOW.

The statement that there has been evidence "tending to show" a particular fact is equivalent to a statement that evidence has been offered relating to such fact; the force and effect of the evidence being in no sense suggested by the term. White v. State, 54 N. E. 763, 765, 153 Ind. 689.

TENEMENT.

See "Single Tenement."

"Tenement" signifies anything that may be holden, provided it be of a permanent nature, whether it be of a substantial and sensible, or of an unsubstantial, ideal kind. Mitchell v. Warner, 5 Conn. 497, 517 (citing 2 Bl. Comm. 18, 17; 1 Inst. 6); Lenfers v. Henke, 73 Ill. 405, 408, 24 Am. Rep. 263; Keller v. Pagan, 32 S. E. 353, 355, 54 S. C. 255.

The word "tenement" embraces, not only what may be inherited, but whatever may be holden. Pond v. Bergh (N. Y.) 10 Paige, 140, 156.

The word "tenement," in its most extensive signification, comprehends everything which may be holden, provided it be of a permanent nature. In a more restricted sense, it is a house or building. Oskaloosa Water Co. v. Board of Equalization, 51 N. W. 18, 19, 84 Iowa, 407, 15 L. R. A. 296.

The word "tenement," in its legal sense, means an estate in land, or some estate or interest connected with, pertaining to, or growing out of the reality, of which the owner might be dispossessed. A tenement comprises everything which may be holden so as to create a tenancy in the feudal sense of the word. Field v. Higgins, 35 Me. 339, 341, 342 (citing 3 Kent, Comm. 401).

"Tenement," in its ordinary acceptance, is applied to houses and other buildings, yet in its proper legal sense it signifies everything that may be holden. It not only includes land, but rents and other interests. Oskaloosa Water Co. v. Board of Equalization, 51 N. W. 18, 19, 84 Iowa, 407, 15 L. R. A. 296.

The word "tenement," in legal acceptance, means property held by a tenant. Marmet Co. v. Archibald, 17 S. E. 299, 300, 37 W. Va. 778.

"Tenement" is frequently used in a restricted sense, as signifying a house or building; but it is also used in a much more enlarged sense, as signifying land or any corporeal inheritance, and it will be understood in its enlarged sense in remedial statutes, like St. 1825, c. 89, providing further remedies for landlord and tenants. Sacket v. Wheaton, 34 Mass. (17 Pick.) 103, 105.

"Tenement" is a large word which will pass, not only lands and other inheritances, which are holden, but also offices, rents, commons, and profits arising from lands. 1 Co. Litt. 219; Shep. Touch. 91. "With us the word 'tenement' is applied exclusively to land, or what is usually denominated 'real property.'" Gibson v. Brockway, 8 N. H. 465, 470, 31 Am. Dec. 200 (quoting Stearns, Real Actions, 150).

"Tenements," as used in the common law, entitling a wife to dower in all lands and tenements of which the husband died seised, is, according to Blackstone, a word of greater extent than "lands," which includes any ground, soil, or earth whatever, and has in its legal signification an indefinite extent upward as well as downward. Lenfers v. Henke, 73 Ill. 405, 408, 24 Am. Rep. 263.

"Tenements" is a word of greater meaning and extent sometimes than "land," and includes, not only land, but rents, commons, and several other rights and interests issuing out of or concerning land. Canfield v. Ford (N. Y.) 28 Barb. 336, 338.

Pier or wharf.

A wharf or pier, reclaimed from tide water by embankment or by raising the bottom with stone, earth, or other material, is a "tenement," within the meaning of 2 Rev. St. p. 512, which authorizes summary proceedings in favor of a landlord to recover the possession of houses, lands, or tenements. The word "tenement" signifies everything which may be holden, if it be of a permanent nature. People v. Kelsey (N. Y.) 14 Abb. Prac. 372, 376.

Railroad franchise.

The word "tenements," while embracing simple franchises, nevertheless, as used in a statute relative to forcible entry and detainer, must be restricted to tenements upon which an entry can be made and of which there can be tangible possession, and hence does not include a railroad franchise. Gibbs v. Drew, 16 Fla. 147, 150, 28 Am. Rep. 700.

Term for years.

In an action for damages sustained by a breach of an implied covenant for quiet enjoyment in a lease of a wharf, with the right to collect wharfage for one year, the court said: "A term for years in lands is not in law a 'tenement' or a 'hereditament.'" Coke says that "'tenementum,'" or "tenement," is a large word, which will pass, not only lands and other inheritances, which are holden, but also offices, rents, commons, profits & prebends out of lands, and the like, wherein a man hath any frank tenement, and whereof he is seised ut de libero tenemento.' 1 Co. Litt. (by Thomas) 219. 'But "hereditaments,"' he says, 'is the largest word of all that kind; for whatsoever may be inherited is a hereditament, be it corporeal or incorporeal, real, personal or mixed.' Id. The first of these definitions requires that the estate or interest, to amount to a tenement, should be a freehold at least, and to be termed a hereditament, according to the second, it must be descendible by inheritance." The "terms for years" fall within the definition of things personal. They go to the executors, like other chattels, and, although they are denominated "chattels real," to distinguish them from mere movables, they are not, when speaking with legal accuracy, considered real estate. In People v. Westervelt (N. Y.) 17 Wend. 674, the meaning of the terms "real estate" and "tenements" at common law was shown to exclude "terms for years" and other chattel interests. City of New York v. Mable, 13 N. Y. (3 Kern.) 151, 159, 64 Am. Dec. 538.

The word "tenements" imports, not only land on which one has an estate of inheritance or other freehold, but also a tenancy for years. Merry v. Hallet (N. Y.) 2 Cow. 497.

TENEMENT HOUSE.

A "tenement house" is a building, the different rooms or parts of which are let for residence purposes by the possessor to others as distinct tenements, so that each tenant, as to the room or rooms occupied by him would sustain to the common landlord the same relation that the tenant occupying a whole house would do to his landlord. Lindwood Park Co. v. Van Dusen, 63 Ohio St. 183, 200, 58 N. E. 576.

"Tenement house" is defined in Laws 1867, c. 908, § 2273, as any house which is erected, leased, or hired to be kept or occupied as a home or residence for more than three families, living independent of one another and doing their cooking on the premises. White v. Collins Bldg. & Const. Co., 81 N. Y. Supp. 434, 437, 82 App. Div. 1.

The term "tenement house," as used in an act relating to tenement houses in cities of the first class, shall be taken to mean every building which, or a portion of which, is occupied, or is to be occupied, as a residence of three or more families, living independently of each other and doing their cooking upon the premises. 3 P. & L. Dig. Laws Pa. 1897, col. 60, § 15.

A four-story building, occupied by 3 families living in separate apartments on the second floor, and by 2 families living in separate apartments on the third floor, numbering in all 16 persons, all tenants of one owner, is a "tenement house," within the meaning of Rev. St. § 2573, making it the duty of any owner of any tenement house of more than two stories high to provide a convenient exit therefrom in case of fire, etc. Rose v. King, 30 N. E. 267, 270, 49 Ohio St. 213, 15 L. R. A. 160, 165.

A building occupied as a dwelling, whether attached to the land or not, is a tenement, within the meaning of a statute prohibiting the keeping and maintaining of a tenement for the illegal keeping and sale of intoxicating liquors. Commonwealth v. Mullen, 44 N. E. 343, 166 Mass. 377.

Apartment house distinguished.

The word "tenement house," in a covenant of a deed forbidding the erection of any tenement house on the premises, is to be construed in its plain, ordinary, and popular sense, not according to the definition of Acts 1867, c. 908, § 17, which declares that a tenement house, within the meaning of the act, shall be taken to mean and include every house, building, or portion thereof which is rented and hired out, and is occupied as the home or residence of more than three families, living independently of one another and doing their cooking on the premises, and of more than two families on a floor so living and cooking, but having a common right in the halls, stairways, yards, etc. "The question here, however," said Mr. Justice O'Brien in a similar case (Boyd v. Kerwin, 15 N. Y. Supp. 721), "is not what is defined as a tenement within the provisions of the act, but what was a tenement house within the meaning of the covenant." A tenement house then (1873), as well as now, has a well-defined popular meaning. When one says today that a person lives in a tenement house, he does not mean that such person lives in a house like the Navarro Flats; and yet those flats are occupied by more than three families living independently of one another and doing their cooking upon the premises. Webster's Dictionary of 1871 says that a tenement house is often, in modern usage, an inferior dwelling house rented to poor persons. Worcester, citing American Cyclopædia, says that a tenement house is a building having tenements occupied by poor families. "Tenement houses," says the International Cyclopædia (volume 14, p. 1851), "commonly speaking, are the poorest class of apartment houses. They are generally poorly built, without sufficient accommodations for light and ventilation, and are overcrowded. The middle rooms often receive no daylight, and it is no uncommon thing for several families to be crowded into one of these dark and unwholesome rooms. Bad air, want of sunlight, and filthy surroundings work the physical ruin of the wretched tenants, while their mental and moral condition is equally lowered. Attempts to reform the evils of tenement life have been going on for some time in a great many of the great cities of the world." Certainly the evils of tenement life, as above referred to, are not to be found in a tenement containing a parlor, library, dining room, butler's pantry, kitchen, five bedrooms, servant's room, private bathroom, and servant's bathroom, in a building lighted by electricity and having modern open plumbing, gas ranges, and telephone. The erection of such an apartment house is not the erection of a tenement house within the meaning of the covenant. Kitchings v. Brown, 75 N. Y. Supp. 763, 769, 37 Misc. Rep. 439.

The compound words "tenement house" signify and mean a house with distinct tenements or homes, which separate and different families and persons occupy as tenants, not merely a boarding house or hotel; for in these the occupancy is not one of tenancy, but that of guests or boarders. The conversion and change of houses into French flats or apartment houses is a violation of a covenant not to erect a tenement house, as a building which is to be occupied by tenants in name and in fact is clearly within the true meaning and definition of a tenement house. Musgrave v. Sherwood (N. Y.) 53 How. Prac. 811, 815, 54 How. Prac. 338, 358.

The words "tenement house," as used in a deed, executed in 1873, conveying property and containing a covenant, in favor of adjoining property, that no tenement house should be erected on the property, mean houses containing suites of rooms renting from $6 to $15 per month by persons of very limited means, and do not mean apartment houses, which at that time were unknown, and which came into use about 1880. Therefore the restriction did not prevent the construction of a modern apartment house of a commodious and handsome appearance, fitted with various suites of rooms to be occupied by tenants, each suite complete in itself and equipped with modern appliances and conveniences, renting from $600 to $1,100 per year. White v. Collins Bldg. & Const. Co., 81 N. Y. Supp. 434, 437, 82 App. Div. 1.

As building.

See "Building"; "Building (In Criminal Law)."

Different use of rooms.

"Tenement," in its modern use, often signifies such part of a house as is separately occupied by a single person or family, in contradistinction to the whole house. It may consist of a single room, or contiguous rooms, or rooms upon different stories, if controlled by a single person and used in connection with each other. The fact that one room is occupied and used as a shop, and another for a living room or kitchen, by the same person, does not make these rooms distinct tenements. Commonwealth v. Clynes, 22 N. E. 436, 150 Mass. 71.

House synonymous.

See "House."

Leased room.

A leased room is a "tenement," within Gen. St. 1875, § 17, providing that "the tenant of any tenement, which may without his fault or neglect" become unfit for occupancy, may quit possession of such tenement. Miller v. Benton, 13 Atl. 678, 680, 55 Conn. 529.

Part of a building.

An indictment, under Gen. St. c. 87, § 6, charging that the defendant kept and maintained a certain "tenement" for illegal sale of liquor, was supported by proof that the defendant used the cellar in his dwelling house for such a purpose. Commonwealth v. Welch, 84 Mass. (2 Allen) 510.

An indictment, under St. 1855, c. 405, for keeping a certain tenement for the illegal sale of intoxicating liquors, was sustained by proof of keeping a grocery shop, where there were jugs and decanters on the shelf in a room behind the shop and opening into it, where defendant sold liquor. Commonwealth v. McArty, 77 Mass. (11 Gray) 456.

A tenement is not necessarily an entire building. It may be a part of it, and proof that a defendant occupied a part of the building and used it for illegal purposes, while other persons occupied other parts of the same building, will not support a charge of keeping and maintaining a building, or a building and tenement. Commonwealth v. Lee, 18 N. E. 586, 587, 148 Mass. 8.

A shop, which was a room fronting on a wharf and extending back to a street, fitted up and equipped for the liquor traffic, was a "tenement," within the meaning of an act forbidding the maintaining of a tenement as a liquor nuisance. Commonwealth v. Cogan, 107 Mass. 212, 213.

In a statute declaring buildings or tenements in which liquor is sold to be common nuisances, "tenement" includes either a building or a part of a building. Commonwealth v. Quinlan, 27 N. E. 8, 9, 153 Mass. 483.

A tenement is not necessarily an entire building, but often is only a part. An indictment, under St. 1855, c. 405, for keeping a certain tenement for the illegal sale of intoxicating liquors, is sustained by proof of keeping a whole building, using part illegally, or of keeping a building consisting of one room only, and which might properly be called a "shop." Commonwealth v. Godley, 77 Mass. (11 Gray) 454, 455.

The word "tenement," in New Jersey, means "parts of a building leased without the land on which the buildings stand." Taylor v. Hart, 18 So. 546, 548, 73 Miss. 22, 80 L. R. A. 716 (citing Miller v. Benton, 13 Atl. 678, 680, 55 Conn. 529).

Part occupied by one family.

"Tenement," as used in an ordinance establishing the rates of charges for the use of water, and providing that the rate for each tenement having water fixtures should be $3 annually, means such part of the house as was separately occupied by a single family, in contradistinction from the whole house. Young v. City of Boston, 104 Mass. 95, 104.

"A tenement house, as defined in the Century Dictionary, is a house or block of buildings, divided into dwellings and occupied by separate families. The Pennsylvania statute defines tenement houses as every building in which rooms or floors are used or let to lodgers or families. In the light of these citations we see no reason to question the sufficiency of the definition of the words 'tenement house' contended for by the counsel for defendant in error, to wit, a building, the different rooms or parts of which are let for residence purposes by the possessor to others as distinct tenements, so that each tenant, as to the room or rooms occupied by him, would sustain to the common landlord the same relation that the tenant occupying the whole house would to his landlord." Rose v. King, 30 N. E. 267, 270, 49 Ohio St. 213, 15 L. R. A. 160.

Part of room.

In modern use "tenement" signifies rooms let in houses, or such part of a house as is separately occupied by a single family or person, in contradistinction from the whole house. Where a part of a room is occupied by one, and a distinct portion by another, as where one occupies one side of a room and another the opposite side, or one the front and the other the rear, the portion appropriated to either is properly called his "tenement," and himself the "tenant," even if no partition separates their respective buildings and a passageway between them is used in common. Commonwealth v. Hersey, 11 N. E. 116, 117, 144 Mass. 297.

TENEMENTUM.

The word "tenementum," in the statute de donis, has been held to extend to everything which savors of the realty. Blackwell v. Wilkinson (Va.) Jeff. 73, 79.

TENET.

The word "tenet," in a writ of partition, implies a tenant of freehold, and does not include tenants for years only. McKee v. Straub (Pa.) 2 Bin. 1, 8.

TENNESSEE MONEY.

"Tennessee money," as used in a note payable in Tennessee money, means gold and silver coin, since nothing but gold and silver constitutes Tennessee money. Searcy v. Vance, 8 Tenn. (Mart. & Y.) 225.

In construing a note "payable in Tennessee money" the court said: "The word 'Tennessee' was used to qualify and describe the kind of money in which the note was intended to be paid. There was not then, and never was, any other money answering to the description of 'Tennessee money,' except the notes of banks issued under the authority of Tennessee. Tennessee bank notes were therefore intended by the phrase 'Tennessee money.' The payors agreed to pay 'Tennessee bank note dollars.'" Taylor v. Neblett, 51 Tenn. (4 Heisk.) 491, 494.

TENOR.

See "According to Tenor and Effect."
Of like tenor, see "Like."

"Tenor" of an instrument imports identity. State v. Townsend, 86 N. C. 676, 679.

The word "tenor" imports an exact copy. McDonnell v. State, 24 S. W. 105, 58 Ark. 242; Thomas v. State, 2 N. E. 808, 812, 103 Ind. 419; Commonwealth v. Wright, 55 Mass. (1 Cush.) 46, 65; Beeson v. Beeson's Adm'rs (Del.) 1 Har. 466, 472; Dana v. State, 2 Ohio St. 91, 94; Edgerton v. State (Tex.) 70 S. W. 90, 91; State v. Callendine, 8 Iowa (8 Clarke) 288, 296.

By setting forth an instrument according to its tenor in an indictment is meant an exact copy of the instrument, while by setting it forth according to its purport and effect the import or substance only is indicated. State v. Bonney, 84 Me. 383, 384; Fogg v. State, 17 Tenn. (9 Yerg.) 392, 394; State v. Atkins (Ind.) 5 Blackf. 458; State v. Pullens, 81 Mo. 387, 392; State v. Fenly, 18 Mo. 445, 454; State v. Chinn, 44 S. W. 245, 246, 142 Mo. 507; Commonwealth v. Wright, 55 Mass. (1 Cush.) 46, 65; Miller v. State (Tex.) 84 S. W. 267, 268.

"Tenor," as used in pleadings alleging that the instruments are set out according to their tenor, binds a party to a strict recital. Commonwealth v. Stevens, 1 Mass. 203, 204.

"Tenor of the bill," as used in speaking of the tenor of a bill of exchange, "relates merely to the time and manner of payment." Lindley v. First Nat. Bank of Waterloo, 41 N. W. 381, 76 Iowa, 629, 2 L. R. A. 709, 14 Am. St. Rep. 254.

The "tenor of a will" means its purport and effect, as opposed to the exact words thereof. Jones v. Casler, 139 Ind. 382, 390, 38 N. E. 812, 815, 47 Am. St. Rep. 274.

TENT.

As building, see "Building."
As house, see "House."

A "tent," in the ordinary acceptation of the word, is a pavilion, portable lodge, or canvas house, inclosed with walls of cloth and covered with the same material. Killman v. State, 2 Tex. App. 222, 224, 28 Am. Rep. 432.

TENURE.

The word "tenure," in its technical sense, is the manner whereby lands or tenements are holden, or the service that the tenant owes to his lord, and there can be no tenure without some service, because the service makes the tenure. Again, tenure signifies the estate in land. The most common tenure by which lands are held in this country is "fee simple," which is an absolute tenure of land, to a man and his heirs, forever, without rendering service of any kind; and therefore the expression "according to the tenure of his patent," in a conveyance, by a patentee holding under a patent purporting to grant the fee, meant that the grantee was to hold the land free from any kind of service, and entitled him to a conveyance in fee with covenant of general warranty. Bard v. Grundy's Devisees, 2 Ky. (Ky. Dec.) 168, 169.

The word "tenure," when used in connection with the expression "tenure of office," means the term of office. Territory v. Ashenfelter, 12 Pac. 879, 897, 4 N. M. (Johns.) 85.

The word "tenure," as used in Act 1823 (Laws 46th Sess. p. 244), authorizing all commissioners to hold office by the same tenure as justices of the peace, was intended to include the duration of the term of office, in addition to the manner of the holding, and the commissioners held for the term given by the Constitution to justices of the peace. People v. Waite (N. Y.) 9 Wend. 58.

The word "tenure" is one of very extensive signification. It may import a mere possession, and may include mere holding of an inheritance. Richman v. Lippincott, 29 N. J. Law (5 Dutch.) 44, 59.

Const. art. 15, § 2, providing that "the General Assembly shall not create any office the tenure of which shall be more than four years," does not prevent one who holds an office created by the General Assembly, the term of which is four years, from holding over, after the expiration of his term, until his successor be elected and qualified, as the Constitution (article 15, § 3) also provides that officers holding for a given term, except members of the General Assembly, shall continue to hold, after the expiration of their term, until their successors be elected and qualified. State v. Harrison, 16 N. E. 384, 118 Ind. 434, 3 Am. St. Rep. 663.

TERCERONES.

The term "tercerones," as used in the Spanish and French West Indies, applies to persons who are the production of a white person and a mulatto; that is, a person of white and negro blood. Daniel v. Guy, 19 Ark. 121, 131.

TERM.

Worcester says that some of the meanings of the word "term" are condition, proposition, or stipulation. Webster, as an illustration, uses this as an example: "The terms of a proposition; the four members of which it is composed." Platter v. Elkhart County, 2 N. E. 544, 555, 103 Ind. 300.

The word "term" or "terms," in its general signification, denotes "words," "phrases," and "expressions," by which the definite meaning of language is conveyed and determined. Hurd v. Whitsett, 4 Colo. 77, 84.

Definite period implied.

"Term," as applied to time, signifies a fixed period, or a determined or prescribed duration. State v. Twichell, 38 Pac. 134, 135, 9 Wash. 530; State v. Tallman, 64 Pac. 759, 760, 24 Wash. 426 (citing People v. Brundage, 78 N. Y. 403).

"Term," as used in Rev. St. c. 143, § 50, providing that a person who shall break prison may be punished by imprisonment in addition to the unexpired portion of the term for which he was originally sentenced, cannot apply to persons lawfully imprisoned, but not under conviction and sentence, but only to those who are imprisoned for a definite term. Commonwealth v. Homer, 46 Mass. (5 Metc.) 555, 557.

Succession implied.

"Term," as used in St. 1817, § 8, requiring a residence for the term of seven years in a town to acquire a settlement therein, imports ex vi termini a succession of years. Town of Lincoln v. Town of Warren, 19 Vt. 170, 171.

"Term of seven years," as used in a statute giving a settlement to a pauper after a continued residence for that length of time, means a continuous residence. This is the set construction in leases, in contracts for service, and in analogous cases of settlement. It is the more obvious import of the words in their ordinary and popular signification. Town of Royalton v. Town of Bethel, 10 Vt. 22, 23.

Hutch. Code Miss. 495, § 3, providing that willful, continued, and obstinate desertion for the "term of three years" shall be a cause for divorce, implies a continued and uninterrupted desertion. Gaillard v. Gaillard, 23 Miss. (1 Cushm.) 152, 153.

Estate synonymous.

An indispensable legal requirement to the creation of a lease or a term of years is that it shall have a certain beginning and a certain end. Blackstone says that such an estate is frequently called a "term" because its duration or continuance is bounded or limited and determined. Gay Mfg. Co. v. Hobbs, 38 S. E. 26, 128 N. C. 46, 83 Am. St. Rep. 661.

The estate of a lessee for years is called a "term," because its duration is limited and determined; for every such estate must have a certain beginning and a certain end. Austin v. Huntsville Coal & Mining Co., 72 Mo. 535, 542, 37 Am. Rep. 448; Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. v. Sanderson, 1 Atl. 894, 397, 109 Pa. 583, 58 Am. Rep. 743; Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. v. Sanderson, 2 Pa. Com. Pl. 203, 209.

Term is the name applied to the estate demised by a lease. Sanderson v. City of Scranton, 105 Pa. 469, 472.

The word "term," in speaking of the term of a tenant, means the duration or extent of the interest in the premises acquired by the tenant from his landlord as the term of his lease. Grizzle v. Pennington, 77 Ky. (14 Bush) 115, 116.

"Term," as it is used in speaking of a term for years in land, is both an interest and an estate in such land. Chicago Attachment Co. v. Davis Sewing Mach. Co. (Ill.) 25 N. E. 669, 670.

The word "term," when used in respect to tenancies, has in law a distinct and technical definition, signifying time or duration, and it means not only limitation of the estate granted as to time, but it signifies the estate also and interest that passes by the lease. Hurd v. Whitsett, 4 Colo. 77, 84.

"Term" does not merely signify the time specified in the lease. It means that and more. It means the time in the lease, and the interest conveyed by the lease, and the estate vested in the lessee by the possession. Wood, Landl. & T. p. 103, § 65. The term of the lease is the period granted to the tenant for occupancy, and does not include the time previous thereto, though it includes the estate of the tenant in the land during such period. Gear, Landl. & T. § 23. The term is that period which is granted for the lessee or tenant to occupy and have possession of the premises. It is the estate or interest which he has in the land itself, by virtue of the lease, from the time it vests in possession. Baldwin v. Thibaudau, 17 N. Y. Supp. 532, 534, 28 Abb. N. C. 14 (citing Young v. Dake, 5 N. Y. [1 Seld.] 465, 467, 55 Am. Dec. 330).

The time between the making of a lease and its commencement in possession is no part of the term granted by it. The term is that period which is granted for the lessee or tenant to occupy and have possession of the terms. It is the estate or interest which he has in the land itself, by virtue of the lease, from the time it vests in possession. Taylor v. Terry, 11 Pac. 813, 814, 71 Cal. 46.

Terms distinguished.

The word "terms," as used in Rev. St. 1868, p. 333, § 7, authorizing a landlord, on notice to a tenant holding from month to month, to enlarge the "terms," does not give authority to enlarge the "term" or duration of a tenancy, as the words "term" and "terms" cannot legitimately be used synonymously. They are not generic in their relations to each other, but have a technical and specifically distinct meaning as applied to estates in the nature of tenancies. They are both derived from the Latin "terminus," but their application is technically distinct; "term" meaning, in brief, limited estate, and "terms" the limitations in the use of that estate, arising out of the covenants and conditions thereto annexed. Hurd v. Whitsett, 4 Colo. 77, 89.

Patent.

The "term" of a foreign patent, referred to in Rev. St. § 4887 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3382], which requires letters patent issued for an invention previously patented abroad to be limited "to expire at the same time with the foreign patent," or, if there be more than one, "with the one having the shortest term," is not the original term expressed in the foreign patent, but its period of actual existence; and the United States patent expires when the foreign patent having the shortest term is terminated by lapse or forfeiture, by failure of the patentee to comply with the requirements of the foreign patent law. Pohl v. Anchor Brewing Co. (U. S.) 39 Fed. 782.

The "term" of a foreign patent is the space of time during which the monopoly is placed within the patentee's control, without reference to whether he sees fit to retain it for the whole time or not. Diamond Match Co. v. Adirondack Match Co. (U. S.) 65 Fed. 803, 804.

The "term of a patent" is the period of duration expressed in the grant of the patent. It may be terminated by operation of law, or by the act of the parties at an earlier time. Under Rev. St. § 4887 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3382], a patent for an invention which had been previously patented in England for the term of 14 years does not expire, therefore, until 14 years from the date of the English patent, notwithstanding the grant of the English patent has terminated by the failure of the patentee to pay the stamp duty required as a condition of the continuance of the grant beyond the term of 3 years. Paillard v. Bruno (U. S.) 29 Fed. 864, 865.

TERM AT WHICH CAUSE COULD BE TRIED.

Under Act 1875, c. 137 (18 Stat. 470), providing that the petition for removal must be filed at or before the term at which the cause could be first tried, and before the trial, it is held that the expression "term at which the cause could be tried" means the first term at which the cause is in law triable; that is, the first term in which the cause would stand for trial, if the parties had taken the usual steps as to pleadings and other preparations. Gregory v. Hartley, 5 Sup. Ct. 743, 745, 113 U. S. 742, 28 L. Ed. 1150.

Act March 3, 1875, providing that a party seeking a removal of a cause from a state court to a federal court must make his application at the term "at which cause could be first tried" in the circuit court, means the term in which, according to the rules of procedure of the court, whether they be statutory or the rules of the court's adoption, the cause would stand for trial, if the parties had taken the usual steps as to pleading and other preparation; that is, the first term at which the cause is in law triable. Pullman Palace Car Co. v. Speck, 5 Sup. Ct. 374, 376, 113 U. S. 84, 28 L. Ed. 925.

"Term at which said case could be first tried" must be construed to mean (in a cause existing at the time of the passage of the act) a term occurring after the passage of the act, and not a term before. Merchants' & Manufacturers' Nat. Bank v. Wheeler (U. S.) 17 Fed. Cas. 40.

TERM AT WHICH VERDICT IS RENDERED OR TRIAL HAD.

The term at which the verdict is rendered or trial had, within the meaning of Circuit Court Rule 97, requiring the bill of exceptions to be made up and signed at such term, means the spring term, in a case in which there is a verdict and motion for new trial at the fall term, which is denied and the motion renewed during same term and not disposed of or judgment entered till the spring term. Greeley v. Percival, 21 Fla. 428, 430.

TERM FOR DELIBERATING.

By "term for deliberating" is understood the time given to the beneficiary heir to examine if it be for his interest to accept or reject the succession which has fallen to him. Civ. Code La. 1900, art. 1033.

TERM IN WHICH CASE IS TRIED.

The phrase "the term in which the case is tried" means the term at which final judgment is rendered; and hence a bill of exceptions, which must be filed at the term in which the cause is tried, may be filed at a term subsequent to the rendition of the verdict, at which the motion for a new trial is argued, the judgment not being rendered till after the motion is argued. People v. Gary, 105 Ill. 264, 270.

TERM OF COURT.

See "Adjourned Term"; "Appearance Term"; "Appellate Term"; "Entire Term"; "Equity Term"; "First Term"; "General Term"; "New Term"; "Next Term"; "Regular Term"; "Special Term"; "Subsequent Term"; "Succeeding Term."

Before next term, see "Before."

"Terms of court are those times or seasons of the year which are set apart for the dispatch of business in the superior courts of common law." Tidd, Prac. 105. Sir Henry Spelman traces their origin to the canonical constitutions of the church, which the four ordinary feasts of Hilary, Easter, Trinity, Michaelmas, being the names of the four terms of the courts of common law in England, very clearly indicate to be their true origin. These terms are described by him as being no other than those leisure seasons of the year which were not occupied by the great festivals or feasts, and which were not liable to the general avocations of rural business. Civilization and its attending commerce has in more modern times extended the administration of the law by courts of justice much beyond the limits of merely leisure periods; but still terms, definite and fixed, are prescribed and are absolutely necessary to the successful administration of judicial duties. Horton v. Miller, 38 Pa. (2 Wright) 270, 271; State v. McHatton, 25 Pac. 1046, 10 Mont. 370.

In England "the term," according to the common law, is understood as the term of a day, and that day is the first day of the term, to which all the proceedings have reference. This interpretation is there given in criminal, as well as in civil, proceedings. Bell's Case (Va.) 7 Grat. 646, 649.

The word "term," as used in a statute authorizing an appeal from a justice within six days after judgment, if the judgment is rendered during the term of the circuit court to which the appeal is taken, signifies the entire period, from the first day of a term as fixed by law to its final close. Hadley v. Bernero, 71 S. W. 451, 452, 97 Mo. App. 314.

A term of court continues "until the call of the next succeeding term, unless it should affirmatively appear that before that time it had been adjourned sine die." Dees v. State, 28 South. 849, 78 Miss. 250 (quoting Townshend v. Chew, 31 Md. 247).

A term, in law, is regarded as one day, and to inspect and contest a return of a garnishee the plaintiff must generally be allowed a day beyond it. He cannot be regarded as resting satisfied with a return, which may not be filed until the last moment of the term, by not filing his suggestion during the term. Martin v. Parham (S. C.) 1 Hill, 213, 215.

Under Rev. St. c. 77, § 1, providing that there shall be no priority of the lien of one judgment over that of another "rendered at the same term," judgments by confession, entered before the clerk as in vacation during an intermission, stand on the same footing as judgments rendered by the court during the term, either before or after the intermission. Hallam v. Coe, 74 Ill. App. 255, 257.

As fixed term.

A term of court is a definite and fixed term prescribed by law for the administration of judicial duties. Terms may be extended to a period of time outside of their proper limits by adjournment, but the fixed term is not thereby enlarged. In re Upper Mahanoy Tp. Road, 12 Pa. Co. Ct. R. 618, 619 (citing Horton v. Miller, 38 Pa. [2 Wright] 270).

As regular term.

The words "terms of court" imply periods of prescribed duration, and should receive such construction in Rev. St. 1894, § 8071 (Rev. St. 1881, § 5990), providing that all vacancies in the office of township trustee should be filled by the board doing county business in the term time or by the auditor in vacation; and hence "a session," authorized by another section to receive the report of trustees in regard to school revenues at a time other than the regular term time, cannot be considered a term, so as to give the court authority to fill a vacancy in the office of township trustee. Helm v. State, 44 N. E. 638, 639, 145 Ind. 605.

"Term," within the meaning of Revenue Laws, c. 7 (Rev. St. p. 479), which provides for the publication of delinquent tax lists, and enacts that the tax collector must publish with the delinquent tax list a notice that he will apply to the district court of said county, at the next term thereof, for judgment against the property described in said list, and shall also give notice that on the Monday next succeeding the day fixed by law for the commencement of such term all the property will be exposed to public sale, means the regular term of court as fixed by statute. It does not refer to special terms of court. Territory v. Apache County Delinquent Tax List, 21 Pac. 888, 889, 3 Ariz. 69.

Gen. St. 1866, c. 66, § 200, providing for notice of trial, etc., for the term, includes a special term at which the action noticed may properly be tried. Colt v. Vedder, 19 Minn. 539 (Gil. 469).

Session distinguished.

"Session" and "term," as applied to courts, are not convertible or synonymous, and where a statute provided that the court, at its first regular session after the filing of a petition with the clerk, should order an election, etc., the court said: "If the word 'term' had been used, and the regular term of the court had expired without a session, after the filing of a petition, then the petition could not be acted upon, according to the strict letter of the law, at a subsequent term." Robertson v. State, 70 S. W. 542, 543, 44 Tex. Cr. R. 270 (citing Lipari v. State, 19 Tex. App. 431).

As time of session.

The word "term," in practice, means the time during which the court holds its sessions. Sometimes a term is monthly, and at others it is a quarterly period, according to the constitution of the court. The whole term is considered but one day, so that judges may at any time during the term revise their judgments. Bouv. Law Dict. A day to which a court was adjourned is part of the same term at which the adjournment was made. Leib v. Commonwealth (Pa.) 9 Watts, 200. Terms of court are those terms or sessions of the year which are set apart for the dispatch of business in the superior courts of common law. Commonwealth v. Thompson, 18 Pa. Co. Ct. R. 487, 490, 491 (citing And. Law Dict.).

The word "term," when used with reference to a court, signifies the space of time during which the court holds a session. Lipari v. State, 19 Tex. App. 431, 433.

The word "term" is used, not only to designate the time appointed for holding court, but to convey the idea of a court actually held or in session. Byrd v. State, 2 Miss. (1 How.) 163, 169.

"Term" is defined as a space of time during which a court holds a session. Under the early organization of courts in England, terms of the courts were four periods in each year. They commenced on fixed days, and had a fixed time of termination, and they aggregated 91 days. All the days of the year not embraced in the terms are regarded as vacation. Conkling v. Ridgely, 1 N. E. 261, 262, 112 Ill. 36, 54 Am. Rep. 204.

"Term," as used in Act Feb. 18, 1785, providing that if any person shall be committed, and shall not be indicted and tried at some time in the next term, he shall be set at liberty, does not mean a mere period of time in which the court might have sat, but an actual session, available in law and in fact for the trial; and all circumstances of physical, moral, or legal necessity which prevent trial are exceptions which take the case out of the statute. Commonwealth v. Brown (Pa.) 11 Phila. 370.

As time set.

For some purposes the term of a court and the time appointed by law for the holding of the court have the same legal import and meaning. Thus the law may require process to be returned, pleadings to be filed, notices to be given, or other steps to be taken, a certain number of days before a given term of the court. A party of whom such a requirement is made has no right to wait till the time for holding the court arrives, and then, if for any cause the court is not held, avail himself of the omission to hold it as an excuse for not having performed an act which the law required to be done a certain number of days before the court could have been opened. In such cases the day on which the act is to be done is fixed by reference to the named term of the court with as much certainty as if it had been designated by its place in the calendar. In other instances the word "term" is considered as meaning, not the stated time when a court should be held, but the actual session of the court. Brown v. Hume (Va.) 16 Grat. 458, 462.

A term of court is the period of time fixed by law for the hearing of causes and the transaction of judicial business therein. The term, as fixed by the statute, commences upon a particular day, and after its commencement it continues, whether the court sits during the days composing it or not. A day may therefore be one of the days of the term, notwithstanding the court may not sit upon that particular day, and it can make no difference whether the failure of the court to sit results from an adjournment by the court from one day over to another day in the same term, or because the intervening day is dies non. Brown v. Leet, 26 N. E. 639, 640, 136 Ill. 203.

As trial term.

The word "term," as used in rule 54 of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia requiring bills of exceptions to be settled before the close of the term, means the trial term; that is, the term in which the verdict was had. Brown v. Bradley (U. S.) 6 App. D. C. 207, 223.

TERM OF INSURANCE.

The words "term of insurance," in Laws 1892, c. 690, § 150, providing that makers of deposit notes given by persons taking out insurance in certain mutual insurance companies shall only be liable on such notes till the expiration of the term of insurance, means the time for which the policy has been issued or the time it is in force, if it has been canceled as provided by its terms. Raegener v. Willard, 60 N. Y. Supp. 478, 482, 44 App. Div. 41.

"Term of insurance," as used in the act incorporating the Jefferson County Mutual Insurance Company (Laws 1836, c. 41, § 6), requiring every person becoming a member of the corporation to deposit a note for such sum as the directors shall determine, and that at the expiration of the term of insurance the note or a certain part of the same as shall remain unpaid, after deducting all losses and expenses occurring during said term, shall be given up to the maker thereof, refers to the term or time for which by the policy the insurance should continue. Bangs v. Skidmore, 21 N. Y. 133, 140.

TERM OF OFFICE.

See "Constitutional Term"; "During Term of Office"; "Full Term"; "Official Term"; "Probationary Term"; "Unexpired Term."

As contract, see "Contract."

"Term of office" means the period or limit of time during which the incumbent is permitted to hold. People v. Le Fevre, 40 Pac. 882, 886, 21 Colo. 218.

The words "term of office," as used in the Constitution with reference to the duration of office of a county judge, refer to the tenure or duration of the office, and not to the incumbent. Jameson v. Hudson, 82 Va. 279, 281.

The word "term," when used in reference to the tenure of office, means ordinarily a fixed and definite time. Crovatt v. Mason, 28 S. E. 891, 894, 101 Ga. 246; State v. Breidenthal, 40 Pac. 651, 652, 55 Kan. 308; State v. Tallman, 64 Pac. 759, 760, 24 Wash. 426; State v. Twichell, 38 Pac. 134, 135, 9 Wash. 530 (citing People v. Brundage, 78 N. Y. 403); State ex rel. Withers v. Stonestreet, 12 S. W. 895, 897, 99 Mo. 361.

The word "term," when used with reference to the tenure of office, ordinarily refers to a fixed and definite time, and does not apply to an appointive office, held at the pleasure of the appointing power. Field v. Malster, 41 Atl. 1087, 1088, 88 Md. 691; People v. Tierney, 52 N. Y. Supp. 871, 872, 81 App. Div. 309; Ida County Sav. Bank v. Seidensticker (Iowa) 92 N. W. 862, 866; Somers v. State, 58 N. W. 804, 806, 5 S. D. 321.

It is, strictly speaking, hardly correct to speak of the term of office of a pro tem. judge, for perhaps he may not technically have a term of office, and yet such an expression does no great violence to language. It clearly comes within the spirit and purpose of Laws 1850, c. 85, § 1, relating to the settling of a case on appeal, and providing that in all cases, when the term of a trial judge shall have expired, it shall be his duty to settle the case as if it had not expired, and requires the judge before whom the case is tried, before the time allowed for settling and signing the case, to so settle and sign it. His judicial life is ended, yet he may and must prepare for review a record of the proceedings before him. Missouri, K. & T. Ry. v. City of Ft. Scott, 15 Kan. 435, 476.

The word "term," in Ky. St. § 161, providing that the compensation of any city officer shall not be changed after his election or appointment, or during his term of office, refers to a fixed period of time, and applies only to officers having a specified term, and hence does not forbid the reduction of the salary of a policeman, removable by the board of police commissioners at pleasure. Lexington v. Rennick, 49 S. W. 787, 788, 105 Ky. 779, 20 Ky. Law Rep. 1609, 1610.

The word "term," as used in Const. art. 11, § 7, providing that no county officer shall be eligible to his office more than two terms in succession, does not apply to the time of holding an office under Const. art. 27, § 6, continuing in office all statutory officers until suspended by authority of the state. Smalley v. Snell, 32 Pac. 1062, 6 Wash. 161.

Officers who may be removed at the pleasure of the chancellor, and must be removed whenever by change of political opinion on their part or on the part of the mayor they cease to agree, cannot be said to hold their offices for a term. The word "term" is universally used to designate a fixed and definite period of time. Speed v. Crawford, 60 Ky. (8 Metc.) 207, 213 (citing Trustees of Owensboro v. Webb, 59 Ky. [2 Metc.] 576).

Under Const. art. 14, § 8, providing that the compensation or fees of no state, county, or municipal officer shall be increased during his term of office, and under the charter of the city of St. Louis, providing to the same effect and also declaring that the salary of no officer shall be changed during the term for which he is elected, the salary of an assessor and collector of water rates of St. Louis, whose term of office is four years and until a successor shall be duly appointed and qualified, cannot be increased during the term for which he was appointed, and the time he holds over the designated period of four years is as much a part of his term of office as that which precedes the date to which the new appointment should be made, and no increase of salary made during his term can be allowed him for such time so held over. State ex rel. Stevenson v. Smith, 87 Mo. 158, 159.

Under the charter prohibiting any change in the salary of a city officer during his term of office, and providing that an officer's term of office shall be four years and until his successor shall be elected and qualified, an officer is entitled to an increase in the salary of his office for a time during which he holds over after the expiration of his four-year term, where the salary of the office is increased during his four-year term. State v. Smith, 14 Mo. App. 589.

The expression "term of office," as applied to a charter providing: "No member of the common council shall, during the period for which he was elected, be appointed to or be competent to hold any office of which the emoluments are paid from the city treasury"—means the time for which he was elected to serve, whether he serve the time or not; and a member of the council, resigning before the expiration of such time, is, under the charter, ineligible to hold any office so prohibited. Ellis v. Lennon, 49 N. W. 308, 311, 86 Mich. 478.

Const. art. 4, § 9, providing that no senator or representative shall, during the "term for which he is elected," hold any office under the authority of the United States or the state of Minnesota, except that of postmaster, may very properly be construed to mean during his term of office, and this may be the full time during which the office may be held, or such shorter period as the incumbent may consent to hold it. The term of every elective office, in the absence of any express enactment of law to the contrary, may be terminated, at the pleasure of the incumbent, by resignation or by the acceptance of an incompatible office. The clause "during the term for which he is elected" cannot properly be construed as enlarging the scope of the prohibition, so as to include persons not in fact members of the Legislature. The express purpose of the provision was to prohibit senators and representatives from holding any other office than postmaster, and not to disqualify for a definite period of time persons who may become such, whether they remain in office or not. Barnum v. Gilman, 8 N. W. 875, 27 Minn. 468, 38 Am. Rep. 804.

TERM OF YEARS.

"Term of years," as used in St. 1817, c. 176, §§ 5, 6, providing that whenever any person, who shall be convicted of any crime the punishment whereof shall be confinement at hard labor for any term of years, shall have been before sentenced to a like punishment, etc., means a period of time not less than two years. Ex parte Seymour, 31 Mass. (14 Pick.) 40, 43.

"Term of years," as used in St. 1827, c. 118, §§ 19, 20, providing that whenever any person, who shall be convicted of any crime the punishment whereof shall be confinement at hard labor for any term of years, shall have been before sentenced to a like punishment, he shall be sentenced to punishment in addition to that by law prescribed for the offense of which he shall be convicted, embraces the case of a party who has been sentenced to confinement at hard labor for life. Commonwealth v. Evans, 33 Mass. (16 Pick.) 448, 450.

TERM TIME.

See "During Term Time."

The phrase "term time," as contained in Code, § 2039, providing that in certain proceedings an appeal from the board of county commissioners to the superior court may be made "at term time," means the next term of the appellate court; and where an order of the board of commissioners is entered on the 8th of May, and appeal bond given on the 15th, with the request that it should be sent up to the "next term" of the superior court on the 21st, and after two terms had passed it was discovered that the appeal had not been docketed, the appeal will be dismissed. Brown v. Plott, 40 S. E. 45, 46, 129 N. C. 272.

TERMS.

See "General Terms."

Accommodating terms, see "Accommodate—Accommodation."

The word "terms" is an expression applicable to the conveyance and covenants to be given, when used in a letter of attorney to sell land "on such terms in all respects as the agent deems advantageous," as much as to the amount of and the time of paying the consideration. Bouvier, in his Law Dictionary, says that in contracts the word is used in the civil law to denote the space of time granted to the debtor for paying his obligation. On the other hand, the word "terms" is susceptible of a very varied signification, dependent upon the subject-matters spoken of, where or in the sentence in which it is used. Webster construes it to mean a limit or boundary, any limited time; in law, the limitation of an estate, or the time in which a court is held, and in contracts terms (in the plural) are conditions, propositions stated, or provisions made, which, when assented to or accepted by another, settle the contract and bind the parties. Hutchinson v. Lord, 1 Wis. 286, 313, 314, 60 Am. Dec. 381.

The word "term" signifies, amongst other things, a limit, or a boundary. Beus v. Shaughnessy, 2 Utah, 492, 500.

Code 1891, c. 39, § 24, provides that, when the people have voted a subscription in aid of the construction of a railroad, the county court shall make it "on such terms as they may deem advisable." Held, that the imposing of a reasonable limitation in time for the completion of the work falls within the meaning of the word "terms." West Virginia & P. R. Co. v. Harrison County Court, 34 S. E. 786, 789, 47 W. Va. 273.

"Terms," as used in a power of attorney to grant, bargain, and sell land for such sum or price and on such terms as to the attorney should seem meet, empowers the attorney to sell on reasonable credit and to receive the purchase money. "Terms" is an expression applicable to the conveyances and covenants to be given, as much as to the offer and the time of paying the consideration. The word "terms" means the terms upon which the sum or price is to be paid. Carson v. Smith, 5 Minn. 78, 90 (Gil. 58, 65), 77 Am. Dec. 539.

"Terms," as used in a letter of attorney granting authority to the attorney to sell on such terms as to him should seem meet, in ordinary acceptance means the times and amounts of the payments, and does not mean the substance in which payment is to be made, so as to authorize the attorney to take bonds in payment, instead of money. If there are any deferred payments, the word "terms" may also embrace stipulations as to how such payments shall be secured. It certainly does not import that the attorney has license to take anything he pleases as payment, whether it is value or not. The use of this word does not authorize the attorney to subvert the rule of law applicable in such cases, and substitute for money, which the law implies, specific property of any kind. Paul v. Grimm, 30 Atl. 721, 722, 165 Pa. 139, 44 Am. St. Rep. 648.

"Terms," as contained in an act of appropriation, reciting that the railroad company, "having attempted and failed, and being unable, to agree with respondent in regard to the terms or in regard to the compensation therefor," etc., does not allege any attempt to agree as to the point and manner of the railroad crossing, but refers merely to the compensation therefor. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. Cincinnati, W. & M. R. R. Co., 19 N. E. 440, 444, 116 Ind. 578.

"Terms," in a statute providing that a railroad company may agree with the public authorities as to the manner, terms, and conditions under which the railroad may be constructed on a highway, means the boundary, limit, or extent of the grant. Cleveland, C., C. & St. L. R. Co. v. City of Cincinnati, 1 Ohio Prob. 269, 278.

A complaint on a bond for the performance of a contract alleged that by the terms of the bond damages for breach of the contract were liquidated at $5,000. The answer denied each of the allegations of the complaint not admitted, and then admitted the execution of a bond with the condition mentioned in the complaint, and alleged a defense growing out of the contract. Held, that the word "term" has a great variety of definitions, and among them means condition, or stipulation; but in its legal signification, as applied to an instrument, it is generally employed to state a result or conclusion, and not the condition or stipulation. The word is frequently found in points, arguments, and pleadings, thus: "The agreement, though not expressly, yet in terms, does," etc., thus giving the effect of all its provisions, and therefore may mean that by the contract a certain thing was agreed on, or that the whole agreement, construed together, in effect—that is, by its terms—contains the avowed condition, stipulation, or contract. The precise character in which the word “terms” is used is in general of little consequence; for, when the instrument is produced, as is generally done, the court determines the meaning of its covenants, conditions, or agreement as matter of law. Walsh v. Mehrback (N. Y.) 5 Hun, 448, 449.

The word “terms,” in the restricted and legal sense, and as used generally in reference to contracts, means the conditions, limitations, and propositions which comprise and govern the acts which the contracting parties agree expressly or impliedly to do or not to do. As employed in respect to leases, the word “terms” embraces the covenants and conditions which impose, confer, and limit the respective obligations and rights of a landlord and tenant during the continuancy of the tenancy. Hurd v. Whitsett, 4 Colo. 77, 84.

TERMS AND CONDITIONS.

The phrase “terms and conditions,” as used in the Nebraska statute providing generally what a receiver of a bank shall do, and, among other things, “sell all real and personal property belonging to the bank on such terms and conditions as the court or judge shall direct,” is perhaps ambiguous. If it means the time when and the manner of advertising, and the manner of making the sale, then an order by the court providing explicitly for all such matters is sufficient. If the phrase merely means the terms to the purchasers, then an order providing a sale for cash, by deposit of a certain percentage with the bid and payment of the remainder on confirmation, is sufficient. State v. Fawcett, 78 N. W. 636, 637, 58 Neb. 371.

“Terms and conditions,” as used in a fire policy forbidding the waiver or modification of any of the terms or conditions of this policy, means “those conditions and provisions of the policy which enter into and form a part of the contract of insurance, and are essential to make it a binding contract between the parties, and which are properly designated ‘conditions,’ and has no reference to those stipulations which are to be performed after a loss has occurred, such as giving notice and furnishing proofs of loss.” Rokes v. Amazon Ins. Co. of Cincinnati, 51 Md. 512, 519, 34 Am. Rep. 323.

TERMS CASH.

The words “terms cash,” in a bill for goods, the bill not being receipted, sent from a wholesale to a retail dealer, cannot be held to imply that the goods were paid for before they were shipped; there being evidence that it was the custom with reference to such bills that a payment on delivery or within 30 days thereafter was considered as cash. Wellauer v. Fellows, 4 N. W. 114, 116, 48 Wis. 105.

“Terms cash,” as used in a bill of goods purchased, in which the words stand by themselves, mean prima facie that the sale is for cash, but may be shown to have been used in a different meaning by the parties, in accordance with a usage by which the word had a different meaning, as only requiring a cash payment after the expiration of a given time. George v. Joy, 19 N. H. 544, 546.

By the use of the expression “terms cash,” all idea of credit is excluded, and a contract for the sale of goods, “terms cash less 1½ per cent,” is an agreement for a cash sale at a specified price, and not an agreement for a credit sale subject to a discount for cash. Samuel M. Lawder & Sons Co. v. Albert Mackie Grocer Co., 54 Atl. 634, 635, 97 Md. 1.

“Terms cash,” in a contract, do not make payment on delivery a condition precedent. Nelson v. Patrick, 2 Car. & K. 641, 642.

TERMS MOST ADVANTAGEOUS TO THE PUBLIC.

“Terms most advantageous to the public,” as used in Code Civ. Proc. § 211, providing that the Secretary of State, the Comptroller, and State Reporter, as a contracting board, shall advertise for, receive, and consider proposals for the publication of the Reports for the Court of Appeals, and to make a contract on terms most advantageous to the public, does not mean that the contract should be made with the lowest bidder, but implies that regard should be had to the proper execution of the work. People v. Carr, 23 N. Y. Supp. 112, 113, 5 Silvernail, 302.

TERMS OF SALE.

The phrase “terms of sale,” in a statute authorizing the board of commissioners to sell county property, but requiring the giving of notice thereof, stating the terms of sale, means the essential ingredients of the contract or transaction, and a notice which does not name a price or state what security will be accepted for deferred payments is not sufficient, and a sale made on such notice is void. Platter v. Elkhart County, 2 N. E. 544, 555, 103 Ind. 360.

TERMINAL POINT.

A terminal point of an interstate shipment is the place of consignment, or the point at which the carriage of one common carrier ends and that of another begins. Great Northern R. Co. v. Welsh (U. S.) 47 Fed. 406, 409.

TERMINALS.

A fuse, as used in an electric car, consists of a piece of metallic alloy similar in nature to soft solder, one or more inches in length, connected at each end with a small circular piece of copper. These pieces of copper are called the "terminals," and they are so cut that they can be easily slipped under the thumbscrews and clamped in place. The fuse and thumbscrews are held in what is called the "fuse box." Cassady v. Old Colony St. Ry. Co., 68 N. E. 10, 184 Mass. 156, 63 L. R. A. 285.

TERMINATE—TERMINATION.

Employment.

Two persons entered into a contract whereby one was to enter into the service of the other as collector and salesman, and he was to deposit $100 with his employer to secure the honest and faithful performance of his duty as collector, salesman, and otherwise; this sum to be returned to him within 60 days after the termination of his employment. Held, that "termination of his employment," as here used, was intended to mean final termination of his employment, and a mere change from one branch of his employer's service to another would not constitute a "termination of his employment." Edelsohn v. Singer Mfg. Co., 20 N. Y. Supp. 655, 1 Misc. Rep. 166.

Lease.

The ending of a lease, by the exercise of a landlord's option after condition broken, is the "termination of a lease," not the expiration of it. Kramer v. Amberg, 4 N. Y. Supp. 613, 15 Daly, 205.

The term "expire and terminate," as used in a lease providing that it should expire and terminate for nonpayment of rent, is merely equivalent to the expression "shall become void." Bowman v. Foot, 29 Conn. 331, 338.

Prosecution or suit.

The suspension of sentence indefinitely by the court on conviction of misdemeanor, and the allowing of defendant to be discharged from his recognizance and to go without day, constitute a termination of the prosecution, within Act 1887 (P. L. 133), which provides that the costs of prosecution in every case of misdemeanor shall, on the termination of the prosecution by verdict of a traverse jury and sentence of the court, be immediately chargeable to and paid by the proper county. Wright v. Donaldson, 27 Atl. 867, 868, 158 Pa. 88.

The entry of judgment in one party's favor, without costs, he consenting, is a termination of the suits within the meaning of the word "terminated," as used in an agreement to pay an attorney for services when two suits pending against the party were terminated. Hubbard v. Woodbury, 89 Mass. (7 Allen) 422, 424.

Voyage.

The "termination of a voyage" is understood to be when the vessel arrives at her port of destination and has been moored there in safety for 24 hours. Gracie v. Marine Ins. Co. of Baltimore, 12 U. S. (8 Cranch) 75, 82, 8 L. Ed. 492.

A final port of discharge or "termination of the voyage" of a vessel is a port where either cargo or ballast are discharged, or some other act done which in effect terminates the voyage. Schermacher v. Yates (U. S.) 57 Fed. 668, 669.

TERMINATING SOCIETY.

The simplest form of a building and loan association was one in which all the stock matured at the same time, and was known as a "terminating society." The face value was paid to the members, and the organization thereupon came to an end. Cook v. Equitable Building & Loan Ass'n, 30 S. E. 911, 914, 104 Ga. 814.

TERMINUS.

See "Final Terminus."

TERMINUS A QUO.

"Terminus a quo" is the point or place from which the grantee of a private right of way is to set out any order to use the way. Garrison v. Rudd, 19 Ill. 558, 563.

TERMINUS AD QUEM.

"Terminus ad quem" is the place where a private right of way ends. Garrison v. Rudd, 19 Ill. 558, 563.

TERRE-TENANT.

Not every one who happens to be in possession of land is a "terre-tenant." There can be no terre-tenant who is not a purchaser of the estate, mediately or immediately, from the debtor while it was bound by the judgment; and, when he has taken title thus bound, he must in ejectment show how the lien of it has been discharged, whether by payment, release, or efflux of time. Dengler v. Klehner, 13 Pa. (1 Harris) 38, 41, 53 Am. Dec. 441.

A terre-tenant, in a general sense, is one who is seised of the actual possession of lands, as the owner thereof. In a acre facias sur mortgage or judgment, a terre-tenant is in a more restricted sense one other than the holder who becomes seised or possessed of the holder's lands subject to the lien thereof. Those only are terre-tenants, therefore, in a technical sense, whose titles are subsequent to the incumbrance. Hulett v. Mutual Life Ins. Co., 6 Atl. 554, 555, 113 Pa. 142, 18 Wkly. Notes Cas. 374, 375 (citing Chahoon v. Hollenback [Pa.] 16 Serg. & R. 425, 16 Am. Dec. 587).

Where a husband deeded land to his wife, and subsequently, but prior to the recording of the deed, mortgaged it to a third person, and after the mortgage the land was deeded to a child of the husband and wife, in which conveyance both joined, such child may be named as a terre-tenant in a scire facias to foreclose the mortgage. Hulett v. Mutual Life Ins. Co., 6 Atl. 554, 555, 113 Pa. 142.

TERRIBLE.

The word "terrible," in its ordinary signification, means "frightful, adapted to excite terror, or dreadful." Denver & R. G. R. Co. v. Roller, 100 Fed. 738, 754, 41 C. C. A. 22, 49 L. R. A. 77.

TERRITORIAL JURISDICTION.

The tract of land or district within which a judge or magistrate has jurisdiction is called his "territory," and his power in relation to his territory is called his "territorial jurisdiction." Every act of jurisdiction exercised by a judge outside of his territory, either by pronouncing sentence or carrying it into execution, is null. Phillips v. Thralls, 26 Kan. 780, 781.

TERRITORIAL PRISON.

"Territorial prison," as used in the Penal Code, includes territorial prisons; also any other prison, in any other territory or state, in which this territory has the right, by contract or otherwise, to incarcerate persons convicted of crime in this territory; also county jails and every place designated by law for the keeping of persons held in custody under process of law or under any lawful arrest. Rev. St. Okl. 1903, § 2068.

TERRITORY.

See "Foreign Territory."
Like territory, see "Like."

The word "territory" is used as synonymous with "country" and "domain," and lexicographers so define it. Plummer v. Jarvis, 23 Me. (10 Shep.) 297, 301.

In an act settling the boundaries between towns, providing the territory and jurisdiction on either side of the said lines as hereby established are accordingly confirmed to the said city and town, respectively, the term "territory" was properly used, and it fixed the civil and political rights of those who might build and become inhabitants on the one or other side of the line, but had no bearing on the question of property. Commonwealth v. City of Roxbury, 75 Mass. (9 Gray) 451, 501.

The term "territory," as used in Comp. St. Dak. § 1115, which provides that on a petition signed by not less than three-fourths of the legal voters and by the owners of not less than three-fourths of the property in any territory within any incorporated city, and being on the border and within the limits thereof, the city council may disconnect and exclude such territory from the city, includes all the various pieces or parcels of land sought to be excluded; and it is sufficient that the territory described lies upon the border of such city, and that any piece or parcel of land is within that territory. It is not necessary, therefore, that each particular tract or parcel of land sought to be excluded is upon the border of the city, provided it is a part of the territory sought to be excluded. Oehler v. Big Stone City (S. D.) 91 N. W. 450, 451.

The words "territory of a state," in a resolve of January 24, 1839, authorizing and requiring a land agent to prevent trespassing on the territory of the state as bounded and established by the treaty of 1783, means the territory that is comprised within the limits of the state; and the resolve is equally applicable to such as may commit trespass on the lands of private persons and to such as trespass upon the public lands of the state. Plummer v. Jarvis, 23 Me. (10 Shep.) 297, 301.

As jurisdiction.

The tract of land or district within which a judge or magistrate has jurisdiction is called his "territory." Phillips v. Thralls, 26 Kan. 780, 781.

"The word 'territory,' as generally used, describes a jurisdiction and district of a country. Thus we speak of the territories of the United States, of the Northwest Territory, and the territory of Alaska, etc. The word refers to the jurisdiction. It is not limited, when speaking of any particular district as territory, to the line of high-water mark along the shores of navigable rivers or bays or straits. The territory of a jurisdiction of our country extends to its boundaries. It describes the possessions of a country." The Danube (U. S.) 55 Fed. 993, 995.

As locality.

"Territory," as used in Rev. St. U. S. § 5134 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3454], requiring national banking associations in their certificates to name the place where their operations of discount and deposit are to be carried on, designating the state, territory, or district, means simply the place, the locality, in which the business is to be carried on. Silver Bow County Com'rs v. Davis, 12 Pac. 688, 690, 6 Mont. 306.

Conquered or ceded territory.

The clause in the Constitution of the United States authorizing Congress to make all needful rules and regulations for the government of its territory and other property applies only to territory within the chartered limits of some one of the states when they were colonies of Great Britain, and which was surrendered by the British government to the old confederation of the states in the treaty of peace. It does not apply to territory acquired by the present federal government by treaty or conquest from a foreign nation. Dred Scott v. Sandford, 60 U. S. (19 How.) 393, 395, 15 L. Ed. 691.

TERRITORY.

See "Indian Territory."

"A territory, under the Constitution and laws of the United States, is an inchoate state; a portion of the country not included within the limits of any state, and not yet admitted as a state into the Union, but organized under the laws of Congress, with a separate Legislature, under territorial governor and other officers appointed by the President and Senate of the United States. The word 'territory,' when used to designate a political organization, has a distinctive, fixed, and legal meaning under our political institutions. We find a continental resolution of October 10, 1780, to be the foundation of our territorial system. This declares the demesne or territorial lands shall be disposed of for the common benefit of the United States, and be settled and formed into distinct republican states, which shall become members of the federal Union and have the same rights of sovereignty, freedom, and independence as other states. Schouler, U. S. Hist. 98. Again, in 1784, an ordinance was adopted by the Congress of the federation, providing for the division of all the country ceded, or to be ceded, into states, with boundaries ascertained by ordinance. This plan for the establishment of governments for the territories provided for their temporary government by the laws of any one of the states. This ordinance was superseded three years later by the ordinance of 1787, restricted in its application to the territory northwest of the River Ohio. These ordinances were all adopted prior to the adoption of the Constitution. Then came the clause of the Constitution giving to Congress the power to dispose and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States." Ex parte Morgan (U. S.) 20 Fed. 298, 304.

"Territories" are but political subdivisions of the outlying dominion of the United States. Their relation to the general government is much the same as that which counties bear to the respective states, and Congress may legislate for them as a state does for the municipal organizations. Congress may not only abrogate laws of the territorial Legislatures, but may legislate directly for the local government. It may make a void act of the territorial Legislature valid, and a valid act void. Per Wait, C. J., in First Nat. Bank of Brunswick v. Yankton County, 101 U. S. 129, 133, 25 L. Ed. 1046.

The term "territories" is frequently used as not including all of the territorial possessions of the United States, but only the portions thereof organized and exercising governmental functions under act of Congress. It is so used in Act Cong. Feb. 9, 1889, c. 120, 25 Stat. 658 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3630], making certain acts criminal, but exempting the territories from the operation of such act. In re Lane, 10 Sup. Ct. 760, 761, 135 U. S. 443, 34 L. Ed. 219.

As dependent governments.

Of the status and rank of territorial governments the Supreme Court of the United States, in the case of Snow v. United States, 85 U. S. (18 Wall.) 317, 21 L. Ed. 784, said: "The government of the territories of the United States belongs primarily to Congress, and secondarily to such agencies as Congress may establish for that purpose. During the term of their pupillage as territories they are mere dependencies of the United States. Their people do not constitute a sovereign power. All political authority exercised therein is derived from the general government. It is, indeed, the practice of the government to invest these dependencies with a limited power of self-government as soon as they have sufficient population for that purpose. The extent of the power thus granted depends entirely upon the organic act of Congress in each case, and is at all times subject to such alterations as Congress may see fit to adopt." A territorial government is an agency employed by Congress to aid in governing people of the territory in the same way as a municipal government is employed by the Legislature of a state to aid in the government of the population of a city. The Supreme Court further said of them, in the case of First Nat. Bank v. Yankton County, 101 U. S. 129, 25 L. Ed. 1046: "All territory within the jurisdiction of the United States, not included in any state, must necessarily be governed by or under the authority of Congress. The territories are but political subdivisions of the outlying dominion of the United States. Their relation to the general government is much the same as that which counties bear to the respective states, and Congress may legislate for them as a state does for its municipal organizations." People v. Daniels, 22 Pac. 159, 160, 6 Utah, 288, 5 L. R. A. 444.

A territory is a distinct political society, and therefore sovereign in its action, except as limited by the organic act; but its action is subject to approval or disapproval by Congress. To the people of a state in the Union is secured the right of self-government, while the people of the territories have not this right, and depend for their government on the will of Congress. The state regulates its own internal concerns, while Congress directs the internal affairs of a territory. In a territory the courts have no final jurisdiction. The power of the executive and the tenure of his office are likewise subject to this sovereign power and will of Congress and of the President, and in nothing pertaining to the existence, organization, or power of a territory is it sovereign and master of itself, and it has no authority to impose disabilities upon aliens within its limits, and much less has it the right to confiscate to its own use and benefit their property. Therefore an act by the Legislature of the territory of Montana "to provide for the forfeiture to the territory of placer mines held by aliens," was void. Territory v. Lee, 2 Mont. 124, 133, 134.

"The territories are not the political subdivisions of the outlying dominion of the United States. Their relation to the general government is much the same as that which counties bear to the respective states, and Congress may legislate for them as a state does for its municipal organizations. It is certainly now too late to doubt the power of Congress to govern territories. There have been some differences of opinion as to the particular clause of the Constitution from which the power is derived, but that it exists has always been conceded." First Nat. Bank of Brunswick v. Yankton County, 101 U. S. 129, 133, 25 L. Ed. 1046.

District of Columbia.

The term "territory," when used generally to include every territory of the United States, includes also the District of Columbia. Laws N. Y. 1892, c. 677, § 23.

Whenever the word "territory" shall be used in the civil practice act, it shall be held to include and apply to the District of Columbia. Comp. Laws Nev. 1900, § 3687.

Indian nation.

In holding that the term "territory," in the statute in reference to a certificate by the Governor of a state or territory annexed to certain deeds, included the Cherokee Nation, the court said: "This term is anomalous. It is certainly not a foreign territory, but is a part of the United States territory, using 'territory' in its general sense. It is not a state in the sense in which the other states are called, nor yet is it a recognized territory as the other recognized territories are, and yet it is a territory of the United States, set apart for the Cherokee Nation, with a recognized government, legislative, executive, and judicial, under the protection of the United States government, and under its tutelage and guardianship, and for the purposes now under consideration it must be considered a territory within the United States." Whitsett v. Forehand, 79 N. C. 230, 232.

As state.

See "State."

TERROR.

See "Circumstances of Terror."

"Terror" signifies more than "alarm" or "force." It is agitating or excessive fear, which usually benumbs the faculties. It is one of the passions the existence of which will sometimes reduce a homicide from murder to manslaughter, but it is never necessarily an element of self-defense. Arto v. State, 19 Tex. App. 126, 136.

TEST.

"Test," as used in the Constitution, providing for giving the form of an official oath, that no other oath, declaration, or test shall be required as a qualification for any office of public trust, includes inquiries into party affiliation or religious opinions, but does not include other qualifications often required for public services, such as education and scientific knowledge required in surveyors and other specialists, and legal knowledge in all the officers of the law. Attorney General v. Detroit Common Council, 24 N. W. 887, 889, 58 Mich. 213, 55 Am. Rep. 675.

"Test," as used in Const. art. 5, § 25, requiring all officers to take and subscribe a certain prescribed oath, and providing that no other oath, declaration, or test shall be required as a qualification, refers to the English test act, passed in the reign of Charles II, directing "all officers, civil and military, to take the oaths and make the declaration against transubstantiation, in any of the king's courts" and to "receive the sacrament of the Lord's supper, according to the usage of the Church of England, in some public church, immediately after divine service," and deliver into court a certificate thereof. People v. Hoffman, 5 N. E. 596, 605, 116 Ill. 587, 56 Am. Rep. 793.

The examinations provided for in the civil service act are not such "tests" as are contemplated by Const. art. 5, § 25, which, after subscribing the oath to be taken by civil officers, provides that no other oath, declaration, or test shall be required. People v. Loeffler, 51 N. E. 785, 789, 175 Ill. 585.

The section of the Constitution describing the form of oath to be taken by officers, and providing that "no other oath, declaration, or test shall be required as a qualification for any office or public trust," was evidently intended to prevent the subjection of an official to any ordeal to ascertain his political, religious, or social views. It was probably incorporated because of the obnoxious test oaths to which the civil and military officers were subjected under the English laws. "Test" being used in connection with the words "oath" or "declaration," it is evident that it was intended to have a restrictive meaning. The requirement that a health and street inspector shall take the examination and otherwise comply with the rules and requirements of the civil service before he can take the office is not requiring an additional test, within the meaning of the word as here used. Rogers v. City of Buffalo, 3 N. Y. Supp. 671, 674.

The term "testing with the polariscope," as used in the tariff act of 1897, relating to the fixing of the duty on raw sugars, etc., must be construed as meaning the polariscopic test which had at the time of the passage of the act been in commercial use for 20 years, and had been employed under the prior tariff act since 1883, by which an actual reading of the scale was taken as the value of the sugar for sale or duty purposes; and the Secretary of the Treasury was not authorized to adopt a different method of making such test, which had been used for two years under the sugar bounty act of 1890, by which certain arbitrary corrections, determined mathematically and varying with the temperature at which the test was made, were added to the scale readings. Bartram Bros. v. United States (U. S.) 123 Fed. 327, 329.

TESTABLE CAPACITY.

"Testable capacity," in a person in whom insanity is not supposed, amounts to nothing more than a knowledge of what he is about, and how he is disposing of his property, and the purpose so to do. Sutton v. Sutton (Del.) 5 Har. 459, 461.

TESTAMENT.

See "Inofficious."

"Swinburne defines a testament to be a just sentence of our will touching that we would have done after our death." Barney v. Hayes, 29 Pac. 282, 284, 11 Mont. 571, 28 Am. St. Rep. 495 (quoting Turner v. Scott, 51 Pa. [1 P. F. Smith] 126, 132); In re Nadal's

Will, 2 Hawaii, 400, 403; White v. Helmes (S. C.) 1 McCord, 430, 438.

A "testament" is a testimonial in which is contained and set forth the will of him who makes it, establishing or appointing his heirs, and disposing as he thinks fit of his property after death. Pluche v. Jones (U. S.) 54 Fed. 860, 865, 4 C. C. A. 622.

The words "will" and "testament" and the phrase "last will and testament" are exactly synonymous by common usage all over the world. Hill v. Hill, 35 Pac. 360, 7 Wash. 409.

By the law of France, testaments are of two kinds, viz.: (1) By public action, which must be executed before two notaries in the presence of two witnesses, or before one notary in the presence of four witnesses; and (2) by holograph, which is not valid unless it has been written, dated, and signed exclusively by the testator. An acte de notariete, disposing of a wife's property as follows: "To A., her husband, who accepts it, here present, the whole of her property," etc., "that A., in case of his survivorship, may dispose of said property as something belonging to him in full ownership from the date of the death of said donatrix"—is not under the law of France a testament, but is rather a donatio inter vivos. Appeal of Aubert, 1 Atl. 336, 338, 109 Pa. 447.

A "testament" in strictness concerns personal property. Until the Revised Statutes it needed no witness of its publication. It belongs to the ecclesiastical jurisdiction. It might by the canon law be made at the age of 14, and the executor could not act in all respects as such till he obtained letters testamentary of the ordinary; and it cannot be executed except by an executor or administrator. A will, or, as it more properly called, a "devise," of real estate, is of an entirely different and opposite character to a testament. Conklin v. Egerton's Adm'r (N. Y.) 21 Wend. 430, 436.

A "testament" is the legal declaration of a man's intentions, which he wills to be performed after his death. An instrument in writing, by which the donor, in consideration of natural love and affection, gave certain slaves to be equally divided among all his children at his death, was a testament, and not a deed. Ragsdale v. Booker (S. C.) 2 Strob. Eq. 348, 352, note (citing 2 Bl. Comm. 500; Rich. Wills, 3).

A "testament" is the act of last will, clothed with certain solemnities, by which the testator disposes of his property, either universally, or by universal title, or by particular title. Civ. Code La. 1900, art. 1571.

By "testament" is understood the expression of the will of a man or woman, who, being in possession of a sound mind and en-the judgment, provides verbally or in writing for the disposal of his or her property interests and rights, with legacies and benefits to his or her heirs, after his or her death. Comp. Laws N. M. 1897, § 1946.

See "Devise."

TESTAMENTARY CAPACITY.

"Testamentary capacity" exists where the testator has understanding of the nature of the business he is engaged in, of the kind and value of the property devised, of the persons who are the natural objects of his bounty, and of the manner in which he desires it to be distributed. Nicewander v. Nicewander, 87 N. E. 698, 700, 151 Ill. 156.

"Testamentary capacity" means such capacity on the part of a testator as to enable him to know his estate, his children and heirs at law, their natural claims on his bounty, and to take a rational survey of his estate and dispose of the same according to a fixed purpose of his own. Oberdorfer v. Newberger, 23 Ky. Law Rep. 2323, 2325, 67 S. W. 287.

"Testamentary capacity" is the ability to comprehend the condition of one's property and the testator's relations to those who may naturally expect to become the objects of his bounty. Godden v. Burke's Ex'rs, 35 La. Ann. 160, 173.

Testamentary capacity "implies that the testator fully understands what he is doing and how he is doing it. He must have mind and memory sufficiently strong to understand the business in which he is engaged when he executes the will." Clark's Heirs v. Ellis, 9 Or. 128, 129.

Under the law, as now settled, "testamentary capacity" is not determined by what one believes; but the test is, putting aside all perversion, peculiarities, and hallucinations of the mind, does there remain in the subject an untrammelled intellect, sufficiently strong and rational to know the value and extent of his property, the number and names of those who are the natural objects of his bounty, their deserts with reference to their conduct and treatment towards him, and memory sufficient to carry these things in mind long enough to have his will prepared and executed? Wait v. Westfall, 68 N. E. 271, 276, 161 Ind. 648.

In order to possess testamentary capacity, it is essential that the testator should have sufficient capacity to comprehend perfectly the condition of his property, his relation to the persons who were or should or might have been the objects of his bounty, and the scope and bearing of the provisions of his will. He must have sufficient active memory to collect in his mind, without prompting, the particulars or elements of the business to be transacted, and to hold them in his mind a sufficient length of time to perceive at least their obvious relations to each other, and be able to form some rational judgment in relation to them. Delafield v. Parish, 25 N. Y. 9, 29.

Any person capable of recollecting of what his property consists, and who by ties of blood or friendship have claims upon his bounty, and whose mind is sufficiently sound to enable him to know and understand what disposition he wishes to make of his property after his death, has testamentary capacity. Bennett v. Bennett, 26 Atl. 573, 50 N. J. Eq. (5 Dick.) 439.

"It may be stated as a general proposition that if a testator, when he writes or dictates a will, is possessed of sufficient mind and memory to understand and direct the business in which he is engaged, he can perform a valid testamentary act. In ordinary cases, and as a general rule, mere feebleness of intellect, which does not deprive a testator of an understanding of what he intends to do with his property, is insufficient to invalidate a will. This is also true of one who entertains erroneous, foolish, and even absurd ideas on some subjects, unless such vagaries of the mind operated on the testamentary disposition of his property, the mind being otherwise apparently sound and clear. The courts have gone very far in the effort to sustain wills, where it appears that a testator had intelligence enough to know what he was doing. This at times may only be seen as through a glass darkly; yet, if so much can be made to appear, a testamentary disposition of property will be sustained. A lunatic, even, may make a good will, if it be shown that it was executed when he enjoyed a lucid interval, and at the time was in possession of his faculties. A disposing mind and memory is one in which the testator is shown to have had, at the making and execution of a last will, a full and intelligent consciousness of the nature and effect of the act he was engaged in, a full knowledge of the property he possessed, an understanding of what he wished to do with it, and of the persons and objects whom he desired to participate in his bounty." Yardley v. Cuthbertson, 108 Pa. 395, 405, 1 Atl. 765, 56 Am. Rep. 218.

To constitute "testamentary capacity," the intellect of a testator need not be in its most perfect state of integrity and possess all its original force and vigor. "Testamentary incapacity does not necessarily suppose the existence of insanity, properly so called. Weakness of intellect from extreme age, from great bodily infirmity, from intemperance to the extent of disqualifying a testator from knowing and appreciating the nature, effect, and circumstance of the act he is engaged in, is as much testamentary incapacity as raving madness. If from any cause an alleged testator is so enfeebled in mind as to be incapable of knowing the property he possesses, of appreciating the effect of any disposition made by him of it, and of distinctly understanding to whom he intends to bequeath it, he is without the testamentary capacity required to make a valid will." Leech v. Leech, 21 Pa. (9 Harris) 67, 68.

To be possessed of "testamentary capacity," one must have a sound, disposing mind and memory, to be able to converse rationally and act with judgment and reflection in reference to the matter he was about. He must have sufficient mind to know that he was making a will, and to understand what was implied in that act. If the testator was at the time the victim of insanity, or a maniac laboring under a fixed delusion in regard to some subject, which no rational mind could entertain, and which had a direct influence or bearing on the will, he was not possessed of testamentary capacity. "A perfect capacity is usually tested by this: that the individual talks rationally and sensibly, and is fully capable of any rational act requiring thought, judgment, and reflection. This is the standard of a perfect capacity, but the question is not how well a man can talk or reason, or how much judgment he can display, or with how great propriety and sense he can act. It is, only, has he mind and reason, can he talk rationally and sensibly, or has he thought, judgment, and reflection? Weakness of mind may exist in many different degrees without making a man intestable. Courts will not measure the extent of place, understandings, or capacities. If a man be legally compos mentis, be he wise or unwise, he is the disposer of his own property, and his will stands as the reason for his actions." Duffield v. Robeson (Del.) 2 Har. 375, 379.

Testamentary capacity "means a sound and disposing mind and memory. The testator must have memory. A man in whom this faculty is totally extinguished cannot be said to possess understanding to any degree whatever or for any purpose. But his memory may be very imperfect. It may be greatly impaired by age or disease. He may not be able at all times to recollect the names of persons or the families of those with whom he had been intimately acquainted. He may at times ask idle questions, and repeat those which had been before asked and answered. Yet his understanding may be sufficiently sound for many of the ordinary transactions of life. He may not have sufficient strength of memory and vigor of intellect to make and digest all the parts of a contract, and yet be competent to direct the distribution of his property by will; but the question is not so much what was the degree of memory possessed by the testator as this: Had he a disposing memory, and was he capable of recollecting the property he is about to bequeath, or manner of distributing it, and the objects of his bounty? To sum up the whole in the most simple and intelligible form: Were his mind and memory sufficiently sound to enable him to know and to understand the business in which he was engaged?" Lowe v. Williamson, 2 N. J. Eq. (1 H. W. Green) 82, 85.

In order to possess testamentary capacity testator must be possessed of sound and disposing mind and memory. He may not be able at all times to recollect the names of the persons or the families of those with whom he had been intimately acquainted, but must possess sufficiently sound understanding to enable him to know and understand the business in which he was engaged at the time he executed his will; and, if he was capable of recollecting what property he was about to bequeath, the manner of distributing it, and the object of his bounty, he possessed testamentary capacity. Stackhouse v. Horton, 15 N. J. Eq. (2 McCart) 202, 206.

To have the capacity to make a will, a man must be able to know the number of his children, or other dependents on his bounty, their deserts with reference to conduct and capacity, as well as need, and what he has before done for them relatively to each other, and the amount and condition of his property. If he has an insane delusion in respect to one of his children or other natural object of his bounty, and the instrument presented for probate is the product of such insane delusion, it is void, because he has not the testamentary capacity which the law requires. In re Segur's Will, 44 Atl. 342, 343, 71 Vt. 224.

No better definition of what constitutes "testamentary capacity" can be given than that in Wilson v. Mitchell, 101 Pa. 495, 503: "The question is not so much what was the degree of memory possessed by the testator as this: Had he a disposing memory? Was he capable of recollecting the property he was about to bequeath, the manner of distributing it, and the objects of his bounty? To sum up the whole in the most simple and intelligent form: Were his mind and memory sufficiently sound to enable him to know and to understand the business in which he engaged at the time when he executed the will?" In re Yorke's Estate, 6 Pa. Dist. R. 321, 322.

In Brinkman v. Rueggessick, 71 Mo. 553, the court quoted with approval Judge Redfield's conclusion as to the extent of mental capacity required to make a will, as follows: "The result of the best considered cases on the subject seems to put the quantum of understanding requisite to the valid execution of a will on the basis of knowing and comprehending the transaction, or, in popular phrase, that the testator should at the time know and understand what he was about." And the court then proceeds to say: "And it is conceded in most of the cases that a man may be capable of making a will, and yet incapable of making a contract or managing his estate." Crossan v. Crossan, 70 S. W. 136, 138, 139, 169 Mo. 631 (citing Couch v. Gentry, 113 Mo. 248, 20 S. W. 890).

In the case of Wise v. Foot, 81 Ky. 10, in discussing testamentary capacity, the court uses this language: "Testable capacity does not rise to the high degree of extending to an ability necessary to render a person capable of making a contract where the parties deal at arm's length; but exists where the testator has mind and memory enough to understand that he is selecting the persons whom he wishes to have his property, and to know his property and the natural objects of his bounty, and his duties to them and the persons upon whom his bounty is bestowed by the testamentary paper which he signs." Howat v. Howat's Ex'r (Ky.) 41 S. W. 771, 772.

The test of "testamentary capacity" in this state is, not whether the testator is entirely sane, but whether he is of sound and disposing mind and capable of executing a valid deed or contract. In Davis v. Calvert (Md.) 5 Gill & J. 269, 25 Am. Dec. 282, and Colvin v. Warford, 20 Md. 357, the meaning of these words has been defined to be that the testator must have had sufficient capacity, at the time of executing the will, to make a disposition of his estate with judgment and understanding, in reference to the amount and situation of his property and the relative claims of the different persons who should have been the objects of his bounty; and the court added: "But the meaning of the words 'judgment and understanding' is not that the jury should reject the will because they may believe that it was in its provisions unjust or injudicious, though those provisions may be considered by them in deciding the question as to the testator's capacity." In Higgins v. Carlton, 28 Md. 115, 92 Am. Dec. 666, an instruction was approved in which the jury were told that neither age, nor sickness, nor extreme distress, nor debility of body, will disqualify a person from making a will, if sufficient intelligence remains. In Whitney v. Twombly, 136 Mass. 145, the court said: "The highest degree of mental soundness is not required in order to constitute capacity to make a testamentary disposition of property." Jones v. Collins, 51 Atl. 398, 399, 94 Md. 403.

Mere eccentricity of belief, including the belief in Spiritualism, is not evidence of want of testamentary capacity, provided the testator is not affected with any delusions respecting matters of fact. McClary v. Stull, 44 Neb. 175, 188, 62 N. W. 501.

TESTAMENTARY CONDITION.

A "testamentary condition" is a future and uncertain event, upon existence of which the testator has made his bounty to depend. In re Wheeler's Estate, 8 N. Y. Leg. Obs. 378, 380 (citing 13 Pothier, Pandectes, p. 265).

TESTAMENTARY DISPOSITION.

A gift of property to take effect after the grantor's death is a "testamentary disposition." Chestnut St. Nat. Bank v. Fidelity Ins., Trust & Safe-Deposit Co., 40 Atl. 486, 487, 186 Pa. 333, 65 Am. St. Rep. 880.

A "testamentary disposition" of property is one which is not to take effect unless the grantor dies, or until that event. Diefendorf v. Diefendorf, 8 N. Y. Supp. 617, 699, 56 Hun, 639.

The meaning of the words "testamentary disposition," in the law relative to the property rights of married persons and the law of descent of real property, is "disposition by will." Hill v. Hill, 35 Pac. 360, 7 Wash. 409.

TESTAMENTARY GUARDIANSHIP.

"Testamentary guardianship," or, as it was sometimes called, "statutory guardianship," was established by St. 4 & 5 Phil. & M. c. 8, and St. 12 Car. II, c. 24, § 8, by which a father might appoint by deed or will a guardian for his infant children until their full age. This is in force in Maryland, and is recognized in Acts 1798, c. 101, subc. 12, § 1. Mauro v. Ritchie, 16 Fed. Cas. 1171, 1179.

TESTAMENTARY INSTRUMENT.

A "testamentary instrument" is one which declares the present will of the maker as to disposal of his property after death, without attempting to declare or create any rights therein prior to such event. Templeton v. Butler, 94 N. W. 306, 308, 117 Wis. 455.

TESTAMENTARY INVENTORY.

A "testamentary inventory" is the instrument containing a list of the property and other articles belonging to the estate of the deceased, making a will or dying intestate, made with regularity and order. Comp. Laws N. M. 1897, § 2021.

TESTAMENTARY SUCCESSION.

"Testamentary succession" is that which results from the institution of heir contained in a testament executed in the form prescribed by law. Civ. Code La. 1900, art. 876.

TESTAMENTARY TRUSTEE.

The expression "testamentary trustee" includes every person, except an executor, an administrator with the will annexed, or a guardian, who is designated by a will, or by any competent authority, to execute a trust created by a will; and it includes such an executor or administrator, where he is acting in the execution of a trust created by the will, which is separable from his functions as executor or administrator. Code Civ. Proc. N. Y. 1890, § 2514, subd. 6; In re Clark (N. Y.) 5 Redf. Sur. 466, 468; In re Hazard, 4 N. Y. Supp. 701, 51 Hun, 201.

Where an executor is directed to sell testator's real estate, and invest the proceeds, and pay the income to his daughter, he is a "testamentary trustee," within Code Civ. Proc. § 2514, subd. 6. In re Valentine's Estate, 23 N. Y. Supp. 239, 291, 1 Misc. Rep. 491.

To constitute a "testamentary trustee," it is necessary that some express trust be created by the will. Merely calling an executor or guardian a trustee does not make him such. Every executor and every guardian is in a sense a trustee, for he deals with property of others confided to his care; but he is not a trustee in the sense in which that term is used in courts of equity and in statutes. In re Hawley, 10 N. E. 352, 356, 104 N. Y. 250.

He is a trustee who takes a trust as a devisee under the will. He is an executor who takes under the probate of the will. The title of a devisee never depends on the probate. An executor is not vested with any title, until so vested by letters testamentary. In re Anderson's Estate, 5 N. Y. Leg. Obs. 302, 303.

TESTIFY.

The word "testify" means to bear witness to; to give evidence or testimony of. State v. Robertson, 1 S. E. 443, 445, 26 S. C. 117.

"To testify" means to be examined as a witness under oath or affirmation. Gannon v. Stevens, 13 Kan. 447, 459.

"Testifying" is making a solemn declaration on oath or affirmation, for the purpose of establishing or making proof of some fact. Naah v. Hoxie, 18 N. W. 408, 410, 59 Wis. 384.

The word "testify" has three definitions: (1) To make a statement or declaration in confirmation of some fact; to bear witness. (2) To give evidence or testimony in regard to a case depending in a court or tribunal. (3) In law, to make a solemn declaration under oath or affirmation, before a tribunal, court, judge, or magistrate, for the purpose of proving some fact. O'Brien v. State, 25 N. E. 137, 139, 125 Ind. 38, 9 L. R. A. 323.

"Testify as a witness," as used in Rev. St. tit. 1, § 142, providing that any party to a civil action may compel any adverse party to testify as a witness in his behalf, means that such party may be compelled to give evidence on the trial or by deposition. Buckingham v. Barnum, 30 Conn. 358, 359.

To testify is to give evidence, and the reasonable and just interpretation of the word, in a statute declaring that a party to an action may be examined as a witness and subjected to the same rules of examination as any other witness, to testify either at the trial, or conditionally, or upon commission (Code, § 390), requires that he give evidence in the same manner as other witnesses are bound to do. Mudge v. Gilbert (N. Y.) 43 How. Prac. 219, 221 (citing Bonesteel v. Lynde [N. Y.] 8 How. Prac. 226, 233).

Every mode of oral statement under oath or affirmation is embraced by the term "testify." Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 5135; Civ. Code S. D. 1903, § 2469; Civ. Code Mont. 1895, § 4662; Pen. Code Mont. 1895, § 7; Code Civ. Proc. Mont. 1895, § 3463; Pol. Code Mont. 1895, § 16; Pen. Code Cal. 1903, § 7; Civ. Code Cal. 1903, § 14; Code Civ. Proc. Cal. 1903, § 17; Rev. St. Utah 1898, § 2498; Rev. St. Okl. 1903, § 2808.

Affidavits.

In Rev. St. § 1694, requiring sureties to testify as to their responsibility, the word "testify" signifies the giving of testimony, whether orally or in writing, and is satisfied where the sureties testify through affidavits as to their responsibility. Case v. James, 63 N. W. 237, 90 Wis. 320.

Appearance for identification.

The word "testify" comprehends an intelligent, active performance, in which a person, by words or writing or other comprehensible signs, communicates facts within his own mind to another. Under Code Civ. Proc. § 831, rendering a husband or wife incompetent to testify against the other upon the trial of an action, etc., a simple appearance for identification cannot be held to be testifying within the meaning of the section. Jacobson v. Jacobson (N. Y.) 12 Civ. Proc. R. 198, 202.

Production of documents.

Code, § 390, provides for the examination of a party as a witness at the instance of the adverse party, and declares that for that purpose he may be compelled, in the same manner and subject to the same rules for the examination of any other witness, to testify either at the trial or conditionally or on commission. Held, that the word "testify" means to give evidence, and the party may at the instance of an adverse party be compelled to appear and produce papers and books, as other witnesses may be compelled to do. Bonesteel v. Lynde (N. Y.) 8 How. Prac. 228, 233.

TESTIFY THE WHOLE TRUTH.

A certificate of an officer to a deposition, stating the deponent was first sworn "to testify the whole truth," is not a sufficient compliance with the statute, requiring the certificate to show that the deponent was sworn "to testify the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth." Western Union Telegraph Co. v. Collins, 25 Pac. 187, 188, 45 Kan. 88, 10 L. R. A. 515.

TESTIMONIO.

A "testimonio" is an authentic copy of a deed or other instrument, given to an interested party as evidence of his title, the original of which is left in the public archives. Gullbeau v. Mays, 15 Tex. 410, 414.

TESTIMONY.

See "Direct Testimony"; "Incompetent Evidence"; "Negative Testimony"; "Oral Testimony"; "Positive Testimony."

The word "testimony," in its ordinary meaning, means the statement made by a witness under oath. Baker v. Woodward, 6 Pac. 173, 183, 12 Or. 3; Nash v. Hoxie, 18 N. W. 408, 410, 59 Wis. 384.

The term "testimony" is defined to be words uttered by witnesses in court. Schultz v. Bower, 59 N. W. 631, 57 Minn. 493, 47 Am. St. Rep. 630.

"Testimony" is the statements given by witnesses; and, if relevant, they are evidence. United States v. Lee Huen (U. S.) 118 Fed. 442, 456.

The word "testimony," in its restricted legal sense, means a statement made under oath in a legal proceeding, and does not embrace a document or private writing. Webst. Dict.; Black, Law Dict. But the word "testimony," as often and possibly generally used, embraces more than mere legal statements made under oath in a legal proceeding. In re Brown's Estate, 60 N. W. 659, 661, 92 Iowa, 379.

"Testimony," strictly speaking, means the evidence of a witness given under oath, and, even when used in its widest sense, it still has reference to some living agent as its author. McEntyre v. Tucker, 25 N. Y. Supp. 95, 96, 5 Misc. Rep. 228.

The word "testimony" does not include documentary evidence. Barley v. Dunn, 85 Ind. 338, 339.

"Testimony" is defined as the statement made by a witness under an oath or affirmation. Testimony cannot be taken without administering an oath to the witness. Peters v. United States, 33 Pac. 1031, 1033, 2 Okl. 116.

"Testimony" embraces only the declarations of witnesses made under oath or averment. Wyoming Loan & Trust Co. v. W. H. Holliday Co., 24 Pac. 193, 194, 8 Wyo. 386.

"Testimony," as used in Code, § 4604, permitting interested witnesses to testify to transactions with a decedent where the latter's testimony is admitted in evidence, has reference to the facts related by a witness under proper oath or affirmation, and the application of the language must be confined to the sworn testimony of the deceased taken in his lifetime before some court or officer in due form of law. Admission of book entries of advancements made by a testator does not render his children competent to testify to such advancements in partition to divide his estate pursuant to his will, taking into consideration advancements received by them; such evidence not being testimony of the deceased. Whisler v. Whisler, 89 N. W. 1110, 1111, 117 Iowa, 712.

Affidavit.

Testimony is the statement or declaration of a witness. It is merely a species or class of evidence. McDonald v. Elfe, 61 Ind. 279. While it may be true that the word "testimony" means the statement of a witness under oath, yet it does not necessarily mean that it is delivered to a judicial tribunal. A deposition, made and affirmed, does contain testimony in a cause, and yet may never be delivered or read to the tribunal in which the cause is pending. Webster defines the word "testimony" as a solemn declaration or affirmation, made for the purpose of establishing or proving some fact. "Affidavit" is defined to be a statement or declaration, reduced to writing, and sworn to or affirmed before some officer who has authority to administer an oath or affirmation. By general practice affidavits are allowable to present evidence upon the hearing of a motion, although the motion may involve the very merits of the action. According to this definition of the word "affidavit," it may be evidence; and, if it is evidence, then it is in a sense testimony. So that a juror who has formed an opinion as to the guilt or innocence of a defendant in a criminal case, based on reading an affidavit of a witness to the transaction, is within the letter of the Criminal Code, which renders incompetent jurors who have formed or expressed opinions based on conversation with witnesses to the transaction, or reading their testimony, or hearing them testify. Woods v. State, 83 N. E. 901, 903, 134 Ind. 85.

Deposition.

The word "testimony," as used by a police judge, in his statement binding a person over for trial, to the effect that it appeared by the testimony that the offense mentioned had been committed and that there was sufficient cause to believe a designated person guilty thereof, was used for the word "depositions," which he took and which he was required to return as provided by law. The word "testimony" is used as a synonym for "deposition." People v. Lee Ah Chuck, 6 Pac. 859, 860, 66 Cal. 662.

Evidence distinguished.

The term "testimony," in common language, is frequently used synonymously with "evidence," though "testimony," strictly speaking, means only that evidence which comes from living witnesses, who testify orally, and is included in the word "evidence," which is a more comprehensive term. Mann v. Higgins, 23 Pac. 206, 207, 83 Cal. 66.

"Testimony" is a species of evidence by means of witnesses. The broader term "evidence" includes that which is given by witnesses or offered by documents. Carroll v. Bancker, 10 South. 187, 192, 43 La. Ann. 1078, 1194.

The words "evidence" and "testimony" are synonymous in meaning, though evidence includes testimony, as well as all other kinds of proof. Noyes v. Pugin, 27 Pac. 548, 550, 2 Wash. St. 653.

The term "testimony" is not synonymous with "evidence." So that a statement that a bill of exceptions contains all of the testimony offered does not affirmatively show that it contains all of the evidence in the case. Central Union Telephone Co. v. State, 12 N. E. 136, 137, 110 Ind. 203; Kleyla v. State, 13 N. E. 255, 112 Ind. 146; Downs v. Downs, 17 Ind. 95, 96; McConaha v. Carr, 18 Ind. 443; Sandford Tool & Fork Co. v. Mullen, 1 Ind. App. 204, 206, 27 N. E. 448; Gazette Printing Co. v. Morss, 60 Ind. 153, 157; Ingel v. Scott, 86 Ind. 518, 521; McDonald v. Elfes, 61 Ind. 279, 284; Craggs v. Bohart (Ind. T.) 69 S. W. 931, 934.

Where the word "testimony" was used as synonymous with "evidence" in making the case on appeal, though its use was an inaccurate one, and was not the correct one, it should be considered as meaning evidence. Lilly v. Russell & Co., 44 Pac. 212, 213, 4 Okl. 94 (citing Miller v. Wolf, 63 Iowa, 233, 18 N. W. 889).

"Testimony" and "evidence" are not synonymous terms. Testimony is a kind or species of evidence. It is, in a trial, the portion of the evidence which may be given orally by witnesses. The use of the word "testimony" for "evidence" in the certificate of the trial judge in the allowance of a bill of exceptions, if the meaning is obvious or it is clear that the latter is intended, will not render the document inoperative. Columbia Nat. Bank v. German Nat. Bank, 77 N. W. 346, 347, 56 Neb. 803.

The word "testimony" is not a synonym of the word "evidence," but it is held that where a bill of exceptions recited that the plaintiff introduced the following testimony, and the context made it clear that the word "testimony" referred to documentary evidence, the misuse of the word would not defeat the operation of the instrument. Harris v. Tomlinson, 30 N. E. 214, 215, 130 Ind. 426.

The word "testimony," in Laws 1894, p. 125, § 30, providing that the court may state the testimony and declare the law, is equivalent to the term "evidence." United States v. Clark, 14 Pac. 288, 291, 5 Utah, 226.

TEXAS.

Citizen of, see "Citizen of Texas."

TEXAS MONEY.

"Texas money," as used in a note for $125, Texas money, at its current price at New Orleans, does not mean gold or silver. The term "Texas money" means that the amount named in the note should be paid in Texas money or its equivalent in specie, or the amount should be in specie by paying enough of Texas money to be equivalent to that amount. Roberts v. Short, 1 Tex. 373, 383.

TEXT-BOOK.

A "text-book" is a book or manual used in teaching; a book for students, containing the principles of a science or any branch of learning (Webster); a book to be used as a standard book for a particular branch of study for the use of students (Stormonth); and hence, as used in School Law, art. 5, § 26 (Hurd's Rev. St. 1889, p. 1235), providing that the board of directors of each district shall not permit text-books to be changed oftener than once in four years, will be construed to include writing or copy books. People v. Board of Education of Aurora, 51 N. E. 633, 636, 175 Ill. 9.

School supplies.

"Text-books," as used in the title of Sess. Laws 1891, p. 334, c. 46, being "An act to provide cheaper text-books and for dis-strict ownership of the same," will not be given a technical meaning, but will be held to include globes, maps, charts, and appliances which are proper to be used in the schools, and would come within the meaning of the term "school supplies"; and hence a section of the act authorizing the purchase of school supplies does not make the act invalid, as not expressing its subject in its title. Affholder v. State, 70 N. W. 544, 545, 51 Neb. 91.

TEXT-BOOK BOARD.

The term "text-book board," as used in the title of Act March 2, 1901, "An act to establish a text-book board for the public schools of C. county and to define its powers and duties," has not by either technical or ordinary usage acquired a meaning which could of itself indicate that the creation of a board bearing that name would be attended by the selection and exclusive use of text-books of uniform series in the public schools referred to, and even less does the title imply such use would be unchangeable for a long time, and would be compelled under forfeitures and penalties or otherwise. If it be conceded that the creation of a body bearing the name of "text-book board" might imply that its duty would be the selection of text-books, yet the exercise of that function would of itself be wholly ineffective to accomplish the main legislative purpose. State v. Griggin, 81 South. 112, 118, 132 Ala. 47.

TEXTILE FABRIC.

A "textile fabric" is a fabric which is woven or may be woven; a fabric made by weaving. Wood v. Allen, 111 Iowa, 97, 100, 82 N. W. 451.

"Textile fabrics," as the term is used in Tariff Act Oct. 1, 1890, § 373, would include embroidered handkerchiefs which are not hemstitched. In re Gribbon (U. S.) 53 Fed. 78, 81.

THALWEG.

The "thalweg" is the middle of the deepest channel of a river. State of Iowa v. State of Illinois, 13 Sup. Ct. 239, 242, 147 U. S. 1, 37 L. Ed. 55; Keokuk & Hamilton Bridge Co. v. People, 84 N. E. 482, 483, 145 Ill. 596.

THAN.

See "Other Than."

THAT.

"That," as used in a charter party stipulating that the ship was to carry out 700 tons measurement of assorted cargo, or more, if that does not make her draw over 14 feet of water, must be construed as relative to both the preceding words. As ordinarily used, in conformity to the established rules of the language, it would relate to what is signified by the antecedent word "more," which from its own connection or relation, or relation to the preceding word "cargo," clearly implied more cargo than 700 tons; but to restrict it to that alone would be productive of irrational results. Roberts v. Opdyke, 40 N. Y. 259, 261.

"That," as contained in a deed to a trustee, to hold as the absolute property of the grantor's wife, "that she may have a permanent home for her life, and his children by her a pittance after her death," is equivalent to "in order that," "to the end that," and was never designed to vest any interest or estate in his children by her after her death. Fackler v. Berry, 25 S. E. 887, 888, 93 Va. 565, 57 Am. St. Rep. 819.

THE.

An order authorizing an election as to the issuance of bonds provided that those voting in favor of the issue should deposit ballots "For the bonds." The ballots read "For bonds," and it was held that the two expressions were equivalent. State v. Metzger, 26 Kan. 395, 396.

A count, in stating that defendant broke and entered the iron foundries, machinery, and apparatus, and tore up, broke down, pulled to pieces, prostrated, and destroyed "the same," may mean all these, or some one of these, things; that is, the statement may be taken disjunctively. Hare v. Horton, 5 Barn. & Adol. 715, 729.

Under Acts 25th Gen. Assem. c. 62, § 17, providing that, in order to sell intoxicating liquors, a written statement or consent from all resident freeholders owning property within 50 feet of the premises where such business is carried on must be filed, the words "the premises" mean such premises as are actually occupied for the business, and would not include the whole of a building, where a partition separated the saloon from the other portion. State v. Mateer, 62 N. W. 684, 685, 94 Iowa, 42.

"The company," as used in a telegraph blank limiting the liability of the company for error or delay in the transmission of any message, and providing that no liability is assumed for the error or neglect of any other company, etc., means the company to whom the message was originally delivered, and applies only to the contract with the first company for service to be rendered on its line alone. Squire v. Western Union Telegraph Co., 98 Mass. 232, 93 Am. Dec. 157.

The use of the word "the" in a legacy of 10 shares of the stock of a certain railroad company is ambiguous, and may as well refer to the stock of the company in general as to the stock owned by the testatrix, and does not operate to make the legacy specific. Harvard Unitarian Soc. v. Tufts, 23 N. E. 1006, 1007, 151 Mass. 76, 7 L. R. A. 390.

As all.

As used in an insurance policy providing that, if the property insured shall hereafter become mortgaged or incumbered, the policy becomes null and void, "the" refers to the whole property mortgaged; and hence the policy is not forfeited by a mortgage of a portion thereof. Born v. Home Ins. Co. of New York, 81 N. W. 676, 678, 110 Iowa, 379, 80 Am. St. Rep. 300.

As any.

In all our uses of the article "the," it directs what particular thing or things we are to take or assume as spoken of. "The," says Dr. Lowth, "determines what particular thing is meant; i. e., what particular thing we are to assume to be meant." Yet this article is not always used to mean but one. Take the well-worn and well-wearing quotation, "The man that hath not music in his soul is fit for treason," etc., the meaning of the article is not exhausted when one man is found with no music in himself. "The man" means "any man." So, in a statute giving the surrogate the right to give costs to the party entitled, it means any party entitled. Noyes v. Children Aid Soc. (N. Y.) 3 Abb. N. C. 36, 40.

The article "the" directs what particular thing or things we are to take or assume as spoken of. It determines what particular thing is meant; that is, what particular thing we are to assume to be meant. Yet this article is not always to mean but one, and as used in 2 N. Y. Rev. St. p. 223, § 10, conferring on the surrogate a discretionary power to award costs to "the party" who in his judgment is entitled thereto, does not prohibit the award of costs to more than one of the parties. Noyes v. Children's Aid Soc. 70 N. Y. 481, 484.

As one.

A bill of lading providing that in no event should the holder of such bill of lading demand beyond the sum of $50.00, at which "the article forwarded" is hereby valued, unless otherwise herein expressed, or unless specially insured by the carrier and so specified in the receipt, means the single package received, though the interior of the package was subdivided into three boxes or packages. Each of the three separate boxes cannot be "the article forwarded"; each of them containing the same substances. Wetzel v. Dinsmore, 54 N. Y. 496, 498.

As designating a particular object.

"The," as used in an instruction that, though plaintiff was negligent, he was not precluded from a recovery, unless his negligence was the proximate cause of the injury, designates one particular from a class or number, disassociating it from others of the same class, so that attention is thus called to the particular object singled out of the class and thus individualized; and hence such instruction is erroneous, as instructing that plaintiff should recover, unless his negligence was the sole causal agency in producing the injury. Wastl v. Montana Union Ry. Co., 61 Pac. 9, 15, 24 Mont. 159.

"The" is the word used before nouns, with a specifying or particularizing effect, opposed to the indefinite or generalizing force of "a" or "an." United States v. Hudson (U. S.) 65 Fed. 68, 71.

In an instruction, in an action to recover damages on account of a personal injury, stating that, in determining whether the injury was committed willfully, the jury might consider, with other circumstances of the case, the manner of the conductor, the force, if any used by him, and the effects of his acts, together with the presumption that every person intends the natural and probable consequences of his reasonable acts, and an unlawful intent may be inferred from the conduct, which shows a reckless disregard of consequences and willingness to inflict injury by purposely and voluntarily doing the act with knowledge that some one is in a situation to be unavoidably injured thereby, the word "the" does not convey to the mind the idea that the court was characterizing the conduct of the conductor, who was alleged to have inflicted the injuries for which the suit was brought, as reckless and in disregard of consequences, and as exhibiting a willingness to inflict an injury by doing an act purposely and voluntarily, with a knowledge that some one was in a situation to be unavoidably injured thereby. Citizens' St. R. Co. v. Willoebey, 33 N. E. 627, 628, 134 Ind. 563.

The use of "the" in Liquor Tax Law 1896, § 16, providing that a certified copy of the statement of the result of a vote shall be filed by the town clerk, etc., gives to those words precise and definite application, thus making the words refer to the formal return of the result of the canvass of the votes, which must be made and signed by the inspectors of the election. People v. Hamilton, 58 N. Y. Supp. 584, 586, 27 Misc. Rep. 308.

"The same," as used in a demurrer stating that the defendants demur to each paragraph of the complaint as amended, because "the same" does not state facts sufficient to state a cause of action, must be regarded as referring to each paragraph, and not to the entire complaint. Terre Haute

Defendants accepted an order of a third person in favor of plaintiff to a certain amount, payable out of the certificates due the third person under a contract between him and defendants, and specified in the order, "the same not to be due" until September 1st. Held, that the words "the same not to be due" should be construed to refer to the certificates, and not to the order, and that defendants paid at their peril any person other than plaintiff for work for which such certificates were given. French Spiral Spring Co. v. New England Car Trust (U. S.) 32 Fed. 44, 46.

"The administrator," as used in St. 1857, c. 305, § 1, providing that, where an executor or administrator is a party to the suit, the other party shall not be permitted to testify in his own favor, except as to such acts or contracts as have been done or made before the probate of the will or the appointment of the administrator, construed to mean only the administrator bringing the suit, and not a former administrator; and hence the opposite party may testify as to contracts entered into or transactions had with the former administrator. Palmer v. Kellogg, 77 Mass. (11 Gray) 27, 28.

As thing first mentioned.

The use of the words "the county," in an indictment for a misdemeanor, in which the name of the county is first written in full and twice thereafter referred to as the county aforesaid, and then by the words "the county," is a sufficient designation of the county first mentioned, though it might be insufficient in an indictment for felony, as the use of the definite article "the" necessarily meant the county the name of which had been immediately before three times repeated. Sanderlin v. State, 21 Tenn. (2 Humph.) 815, 819.

THE FIELD.

See "Field."

THEATER.

See, also, "Opera House."

As house, see "House."

A "theater" is defined to be a building appropriated to the representation of dramatic spectrals; a place for show; a playhouse. Commonwealth v. Fox, 10 Phila. 204.

A "theater" is a house for the exhibition of dramatic performances, as tragedies, comedies, and farces; a playhouse, comprehending the stage, the pit, the boxes, galleries, and orchestra. Among the ancients it signified an edifice in which spectacles or shows were exhibited for the amusement of spectators, as its derivation from the Greek verb "to see" plainly shows. Rowland v. Kleber, 1 Pittsb. R. 68, 71; Bell v. Mahn, 15 Atl. 521, 523, 121 Pa. 225, 1 L. R. A. 364, 6 Am. St. Rep. 786.

The word "theater" imports nothing more than a stage on which the actors play and the room in which the acting is done and seen, and does not import a place where valuable goods which may be the subject of larceny are stored; and an indictment for breaking into and entering a theater with intent to commit a larceny is insufficient. Lee v. State, 56 Ga. 477, 478.

A theater is a house for the exhibition of dramatic performances, but the word "theater" in Act 1850 (P. L. 773), providing a punishment for any person or persons attempting to show, hold, or exhibit any theater, circus, or menagerie, etc. without a license, refers, not to the place, but to the troupe or the exhibition itself—the language being "every other county within the bounds of which such theater may be shown, held, or exhibited"; that is, in every county in which the dramatic performance is exhibited the license shall be paid. Commonwealth v. Keeler, 3 Pa. Dist. R. 158, 161.

Every edifice used for the purpose of dramatic or operatic or other representations, plays, or performances, for admission to which entrance money is received, not including halls rented or used occasionally for concerts or theatrical representations, shall be regarded as a "theater," within the meaning of the war revenue act of 1898. U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 2287.

Circus.

Although the term "theater" has an extended signification and comprehends a variety of performances, yet it is conceived that all which it does legitimately comprehend partake more or less of the character of the drama. The dramatic performances which are recognized as belonging to a theater are those adapted to the stage, with the appropriate scenery for their representation. The stage, with its machinery and appurtenances, forms an essential element in the definition of the term "theater." A circus, on the other hand, has no stage, but a ring, and the performances are of a character that can take place in the circle, in the absence of the stage and its appurtenances. A license to keep a theater will not protect one who by contract with the licensee exhibits therein feats of legerdemain or slight of hand, as it cannot be said to be a dramatic performance. Jacko v. State, 22 Ala. 73, 74.

Opera.

An opera company need not be licensed under an act fixing licenses for theaters. Rowland v. Kleber, 1 Pittsb. R. 68, 71.

THEATRICAL BUSINESS.

The term "theatrical business" includes, not only the pure drama, but also minstrel performances. Taxing Dist. of Shelby Co. v. Emerson, 72 Tenn. (4 Lea) 312, 314.

THEATRICAL PERFORMANCE.

A musical performance is not a theatrical, nor a dramatic, performance, within the meaning of Rev. St. Ohio, § 7032a, prohibiting any theatrical or dramatic performance of any kind or description on Sunday. State v. Fennessy, 10 Ohio S. & C. P. Dec. 608, 609.

THEFT.

See "Loss by Theft."
See, also, "Larceny."

Theft is the fraudulent taking of corporeal personal property belonging to another from his possession, or from the possession of some person holding the same for him, without his consent, with intent to deprive the owner of the value of the same, and to appropriate it to the use or benefit of the person taking. Pen. Code Tex. 1895, art. 358; Quiltzow v. State, 1 Tex. App. 65, 68; Sansbury v. State, 4 Tex. App. 99, 100; Chance v. State, 27 Tex. App. 441, 443, 11 S. W. 457.

Theft includes swindling and embezzlement, and all unlawful acquisitions of personal property punishable by the Penal Code. Code Cr. Proc. art. 714, subd. 6. Theft is the fraudulent taking of personal property under certain designated circumstances, and necessarily involves the idea of an unlawful acquisition. Whitworth v. State, 11 Tex. App. 414, 428, 429.

An ordinary indictment for theft will support a conviction for unlawfully taking into possession and driving from its accustomed range the animal of another, without the consent of the owner and with intent to deprive the owner of its value; for Pen. Code, art. 749, provides that if any person shall willfully take into possession and drive and remove from its accustomed range any live stock not his own, without the consent of the owner and with intent to defraud the owner thereof, he shall be deemed guilty of theft. Campbell v. State, 22 Tex. App. 262, 269, 2 S. W. 825.

Theft, under Pen. Code, § 3096, includes all unlawful acquisitions of personal property. Counts v. State, 37 Tex. 593, 594.

Any person having possession of personal property of another by virtue of a contract of hiring or borrowing, or other bailment, who shall, without the consent of the owner, fraudulently convert such property to his own use, with intent to deprive the owner of the value of the same, shall be guilty of theft. Brooks v. State, 26 Tex. App. 184, 189, 9 S. W. 562 (citing Willson, Tex. Cr. Laws, § 1292). It will be observed that, in defining this species of theft, the intention to appropriate the property is not expressly made an element of the offense, as it is in the definition of theft in general. Purcell v. State, 13 S. W. 993, 994, 29 Tex. App. 1.

"Theft" is the fraudulent taking of personal property from another with intent to appropriate the same to the taker's own use. That the taking may have been by assault, or by violence, and putting in fear of life or bodily injury, renders it no less a fraudulent taking. Skipworth v. State, 8 Tex. App. 135, 138.

As an accident.

See "Accident—Accidental."

Criminal intent.

"Theft" is the fraudulent taking of personalty, so that one who takes property under the belief that he has a right to take it, and that it is his, is not guilty of theft, though he takes it from an officer who has the possession thereof, who has levied thereon as the property of another. Bullard v. State, 53 S. W. 637, 638, 41 Tex. Cr. R. 225.

The term "theft" was construed not to include the taking of a saddle belonging to his cousin by defendant, who wished to leave the neighborhood to avoid a difficulty, but who left with the cousin more than sufficient property to pay for the saddle, with a letter directing him to take such property in payment; the decision being based upon want of felonious intent. Beckham v. State (Tex. Cr. App.) 22 S. W. 411.

"Theft" is the fraudulent taking of property with intent to deprive the owner of the value of the same and to appropriate it to the use of the person taking it. The taking must be a fraud upon the rights of another, and that must be an actual and intended fraud, and not a constructive or legal one. The crime of theft is not constituted by the taking, or the fraudulent taking; but it also includes the purpose and intent to defraud. There must be an intentional taking without the consent of the owner, an intentional fraud, and an intentional appropriation, or the theft is not complete. Mullins v. State, 37 Tex. 337, 338.

To constitute theft of lost property, the fraudulent intent, which is the gist of the offense, must exist in the mind of the taker at the time of the taking, and in lost property the time of the taking is the time of finding the property. If the fraudulent intent did not exist at the time of taking, no subsequent fraudulent intent in relation to the property will constitute theft. State v. Riggs, 70 Pac. 947, 951, 8 Idaho, 630.

Embezzlement distinguished.

The terms "theft" and "embezzlement" cannot characterize the same act, because they are repugnant to and irreconcilable with each other. United States v. Thomas (U. S.) 69 Fed. 588, 590.

"Theft," as distinguished from "embezzlement," is taking property of another from the possession of the owner with intent to defraud. "Embezzlement," as distinguished from "theft," is taking property of another in the possession of the accused with intent to defraud. The crimes are essentially the same, but most unfortunately are, for the purposes of prosecution, entirely distinct. The one demands, as an essential element, a trespass, a breach of technical possession; the other cannot be committed unless the element of trespass or breach of technical possession is absent. The former is a crime at common law; the latter is a statutory offense. State v. Hanley, 39 Atl. 148, 149, 70 Conn. 265.

"Theft" is the fraudulent taking of personal property under certain designated circumstances, and necessarily involves the idea of unlawful acquisition, thereby differing from embezzlement, which is the fraudulent conversion of similar property after its possession has been lawfully acquired. Simco v. State, 8 Tex. App. 406, 407.

Fraudulent taking.

See "Fraudulent Taking."

Larceny synonymous.

"Theft" is a popular name for larceny. State v. Boyce, 65 Ark. 82, 83, 44 S. W. 1043.

Blackstone regards "theft" as synonymous with "larceny." It is the felonious taking and carrying away of the personal goods of another. Mathews v. State, 36 Tex. 675, 676 (citing 4 Bl. Comm. 230).

"Theft" is defined as a proper term for larceny, and is used by Blackstone as synonymous with the latter word, and as descriptive of one and the same offense. Hence it is held that the word "theft" describes a crime, and is synonymous with larceny; so that a recital in an executive warrant for extradition, stating that the party sought to be extradited was charged with theft, was sufficient. People v. Donohue, 84 N. Y. 438, 442.

Swindling.

See "Swindle—Swindling."

THEFT BOTE.

"Theft bote" as defined by Blackstone, occurs "where the party robbed not only knows the felon, but also takes his goods again, or other amends, on the agreement not to prosecute." This is frequently called "compounding a felony," and was formerly held to make a man an accessory. Forshner v. Whitcomb, 44 N. H. 14, 16; Commonwealth v. Pease, 16 Mass. 91, 93.

THEFT FROM THE PERSON.

See, also, "From the Person."

"Theft from the person" is an offense distinct from any other theft, and the punishment prescribed therefor is not limited the same as for other thefts. The two essential elements of theft from the person are that the property was taken from the person, and that it was so taken without the knowledge of the person from whom it was taken, or so suddenly as not to allow the injured person time to resist. It can transpire only in the county of the actual overt act of taking, and hence that county is the county of the venue. Gage v. State, 22 Tex. App. 123, 127, 2 S. W. 638.

THEFT OF ANIMALS.

The words "theft of animals," in a bail bond, describing the offense of which the principal is accused, imports the theft of a species of animals which are subject to theft, and therefore, as the words necessarily mean an offense known to the law, their use is sufficient, without describing the nature of the animals alleged to have been stolen. Vivian v. State, 16 Tex. App. 262, 264.

THEFT ON LAND OR AFLOAT.

A bill of lading recited that a ship company would not be liable for any loss or injury, etc., of goods transported, from theft on land or afloat, etc. Held, that the clause, "theft on land or afloat" should not be construed to exempt the company from a theft committed by the purser, who was placed in charge of the articles by the company itself. Spinette v. Atlas S. S. Co. (N. Y.) 14 Hun, 100, 105.

THEIR.

As all.

"Their roads," as used in Act Ill. Feb. 12, 1855, providing that all railroad companies incorporated under the laws of the state were empowered to make contracts and arrangements with each other and with railroad corporations of other states for leasing or running their roads or any part thereof, by the grammatical and natural construction, includes roads of Illinois corporations as well as roads of corporations of other states. St. Louis, V. & T. H. R. Co. v. Terre Haute & I. R. Co., 12 Sup. Ct. 953, 955, 145 U. S. 393, 36 L. Ed. 743.

"Their," as used in a will directing trustees to pay annually from the income of the estate the proper sum for the respectable maintenance of the testator's son and his wife and his children, to them jointly or to either of them, during their joint lives, or for their use and benefit, etc., should be construed to apply to the children, as well as to the parents. Sargent v. Bourne, 47 Mass. (6 Metc.) 32, 49.

"Their," as used in an indictment charging the defendant with the taking of property belonging to two owners from a house, with intent to take the property from the possession of the owners, or either of them, without their consent, refers to them collectively, and is not tantamount to negating the consent of each of them, and therefore the indictment is insufficient. Young v. State, 59 S. W. 890, 891, 42 Tex. Cr. R. 301.

As importing joint obligation.

The word "their" imports a joint obligation. Cottrell v. Hathaway, 66 N. W. 596, 597, 108 Mich. 619 (citing Edwards v. Hughes, 20 Mich. 289; Miller v. Bay Circuit Judge, 41 Mich. 326, 2 N. W. 26; Geiges v. Greiner, 68 Mich. 153, 155, 36 N. W. 48; Sword v. Lenawee Circuit Judge, 71 Mich. 284, 285, 38 N. W. 870).

As implying ownership.

A fire policy to insured on "their four-story stone or brick building" is an assertion by the insured that they were the owners of the property, but it did not mean that they held it by a technical legal title. It did not mean that the insured had the conveyance of the perfect title at law. If the insured were the owners of the property, in so far as to have the entire beneficial interest, and in case of loss to lose the whole value of the property, then they were owners as set forth in the policy, and the property was their property as stated in the policy. Gaylor v. Lamar Fire Ins. Co., 40 Mo. 13, 17, 93 Am. Dec. 289.

THEIR CHILDREN.

"Their children," as used in a life policy payable to the wife of the assured, and, in the event that she died before him, then to their children, mean the children common to the assured and his wife. Evans v. Opperman, 13 S. W. 312, 76 Tex. 293.

THEIR DEATH.

A will devising land to two sons named, "and after their death to their children," meant the death of the survivor, and created a life estate, with remainder to their children as purchasers on the death of the survivor. Jones v. Cable, 7 Atl. 791, 792, 114 Pa. 586.

THEIR JOINT AND NATURAL LIVES.

A marriage settlement between parties "during their joint and natural lives" means during their joint lives and the life of each of them. Smith v. Oakes, 14 Sim. 122, 124.

THEIR LIVES.

Where a testator directed his executors to procure a suitable residence for his daughter at an expense not exceeding $6,000, and to hold the same in trust for her and her son during their lives, devising the property over, the term "during their lives" clearly imported an intention on the part of the testator to give an interest during their joint lives and the life of the survivor, which, on her death before the testator's death, did not lapse, but went to the son for life. Dow v. Doyle, 103 Mass. 489, 491.

An agreement to pay an annuity to a husband and wife "during their natural lives" binds the party to pay the annuity during the joint lives of the husband and wife and during the life of the survivor. Douglas v. Parsons, 22 Ohio St. 526.

THEIR OWN LAND.

In Act Me. March 16, 1836, authorizing a corporation to erect and maintain a mill-dam on their own land, across the head of Little River Harbor, the words "on their own land" merely meant to exclude any inference that the Legislature intended to authorize the corporation to take the lands of others for that purpose, and did not limit the words "across the head of [the] harbor," so as to prevent the dam from crossing the main channel. Parker v. Cutler Milldam Co., 20 Me. 353, 356, 37 Am. Dec. 56.

THEIR PART.

"Their part," as used in a will devising property to testator's children, and directing that, in the event of the death of any of them, "their part" be given to their children, means "the part of such dead child." Andrews v. Andrews, 54 Tenn. (7 Heisk.) 234, 243.

THEM.

"Them," as used in a will reciting: "I give and bequeath to my daughter Catherine, married to Samuel Melsenheiter, the one-eighth part of my estate to them. Those that I have advanced to them in my lifetime towards their legacies shall be all equalized, that they all may share alike"—means the same and refers to the same persons as the previous pronoun "those," and makes the bequest one to the husband and wife, to which the husband, surviving the wife, is entitled. "Them" is a pronoun, and in grammar comes in instead of repeating the two last named persons. Every person uses the word "him," instead of repeating the name of the person referred to, and uses the word "they" or "them," instead of repeating the names of the persons spoken of. "He" or "him," "they" or "them," in writing or in conversation, are not unmeaning, nor even vague, when they refer to persons just named before. Hamm v. Melsenbelter (Pa.) 9 Watts, 349, 351.

As all.

"Them," as used in a will directing trustees to pay annually from the income of the estate the proper sum for the respectable maintenance of the testator's son and his wife and his children, to them jointly or to either of them during their joint lives, or for their use and benefit, etc., should be construed to apply to the children, as well as to the parents. Sargent v. Bourne, 47 Mass. (6 Metc.) 32, 49.

The use of the word "them," instead of "it," in Consolidation Act, § 1769, providing that the board of coroners may, for cause, remove the physicians appointed by them, warrants the construction that one coroner cannot remove an incumbent, even though the latter was appointed by such coroner. People v. Zucca, 78 N. Y. Supp. 311, 312, 86 Misc. Rep. 280.

As themselves.

In a deed reading that "B. and wife, party of the first part, for them—, heirs, executors, and administrators, do covenant," etc., the covenants are somewhat obscure, but are susceptible to being made clear. The word "them" should be read "themselves." The following words, "heirs, executors, and administrators," are under our statute surplusage, and it is unnecessary to insert them in order to bind them, on the principle, recognized by our statute, that the heir is bound for all demands against his ancestor to the extent of the real estate which he may inherit. Baker v. Hunt, 40 Ill. 264, 265, 89 Am. Dec. 346.

THEM ALL.

The use of the words "them all," in a will devising a slave and her child to A., but directing that, in case of the death of A. without a child, testator leaves "them all" to other designated beneficiaries, cannot be restricted to the children of the slave born after the death of the testatrix, but includes the slave and her family. Moye v. Moye, 58 N. C. 359, 360.

THEM AND THEIR HEIRS AND ASSIGNS.

The use of the phrase "to them and their heirs and assigns, forever," in the devise of a contingent remainder to certain devisees, does not describe the devisees, but the quantity of their estate, or, in other words, that the estate to be taken by virtue of the previous words is an estate in fee. Thomson v. Lundington, 104 Mass. 193, 194.

THEN.

The word "then" means, when used as a word of reasoning, "in that event," or "in that case," or "therefore." It also means "at that time," or "immediately afterwards." Dudley v. Porter, 18 Ga. 613, 617.

"The word 'then' may be used either as a word of reasoning or of time, when it is used in the limitation of estates or in framing contingencies, unless something in the context makes a different meaning for it necessary. 'It is to be regarded,' said Lord Hardwicke, in Beauclerk v. Dormer, 2 Atk. 311, 'as a word of reference, but it may be used on such occasions in its grammatical sense; that is, as an adverb of time.' In such case the context should plainly show that it was so used before effect is thus given to it. When it is employed in the former sense, it is synonymous with the phrase 'in that event,' or 'in that case'; when in the latter, with the words, 'at that time.'" Harris v. Smith, 16 Ga. 545, 557.

In a grammatical sense "then" is an adverb of time; but in limitations of estates, in framing contingencies, it is a word of reference, and relates to a determination of the first limitation in the estate where the contingency arises. Beauclerk v. Dormer, 2 Atk. 308, 311; Bigge v. Bensley, 1 Brown, Ch. 187, 190.

"Then," in a will, is not ordinarily a word which points to the time, but only to the event which has taken place. Gundry v. Pinniger, 7 Eng. Law & Eq. 148, 151.

"Then," as used in Code Civ. Proc. § 2458, providing that, to entitle a judgment creditor to maintain proceedings supplementary to execution, the execution must have been issued, if the judgment debtor is then a resident of the state, refers to the commencement of the special proceedings. Schenck v. Irwin, 15 N. Y. Supp. 55, 56, 60 Hun, 361.

As at that time.

The word "then," as an adverb, means at that time, referring to a time specified, either past or future. It has no power in itself to fix a time. It simply refers to a time already fixed. Mangum v. Piester, 16 S. C. 316, 329.

"Then," as used in a contract containing a proviso that, if defendant shall sell or lease certain machines in any foreign country at less rates than those in this country, then the royalty rate to be paid shall be a certain per cent. in lieu of the per cent. thereinbefore provided, is used as an adverb of time, bearing the meaning of "at that time." National Sewing Mach. Co. v. Willcox & Gibbs Sewing Mach. Co. (U. S.) 74 Fed. 557, 559, 20 C. C. A. 654.

The word "then" may mean: First, at that time; secondly, afterwards, or soon afterwards. A bill of exceptions showed the following entry: "Defendant then filed motion for new trial, as follows." As it is the settled law that the bill of exceptions must show affirmatively that the motion for new trial was filed within four days, excluding intervening Sundays, after the trial, the use of the word "then" is insufficient; for the word "then" does not show that the motion was filed at the time of the trial, and therefore within the statutory limit, or afterwards; for that is not necessarily limited to the four days allotted for such motion. Bruns v. Capstick, 62 Mo. App. 57, 59.

"Then," as used in a conveyance describing the land by a course from a certain point to another point, then to a tree, then to another tree, etc., "means afterwards, immediately afterwards, or at that time, and such is the meaning in all surveys; that is, as soon as the surveyor comes to a determination of one line, he commenced running the next." Hammond v. Ridgely's Lessee (Md.) 5 Har. & J. 245, 259, 9 Am. Dec. 522.

The word "then," in a clause in a will giving property to testator's wife during her life, and after her death or remarriage "I give * * * the same unto all my children then living," etc., was used as an adverb of time, and not as a conjunction, signifying merely "in that case," or "in that event or contingency." Thran v. Herzog, 12 Pa. Super. Ct. 551, 559.

The word "then," in a will giving testator's property to certain beneficiaries, and providing and directing that, "if either beneficiary die without child or children, then all the legacies given them shall vest and be considered as my estate," means "at the time," which is the natural, plain, simple construction of the word. Gibson v. Hardaway, 68 Ga. 370, 378.

The word "then," in a devise of property to a certain beneficiary, but providing that, "should the beneficiary die without leaving any issue, then the property should go to another," plainly refers to the event, to the happening of that contingency, and not to the time at which the last beneficiary's right should commence. Hennessy v. Patterson, 85 N. Y. 91, 101.

The word "then," in a will directing that, if testator's grandson should "die leaving no lawful heirs, then in that case it is my will," etc., is plainly used as an adverb of time, because it is in immediate juxtaposition with the phrase "in that case." Harris v. Smith, 16 Ga. 545, 557.

A chattel mortgage provided that the mortgagee might take possession whenever he deemed himself insecure, and authorized him to "then dispose of the property by sale," etc. Held, that the word "then" applied to and meant the time when the mortgagee deemed himself insecure, and did not relate to the time when he was permitted to foreclose after default, thus giving the mortgagee the right to sell at once after taking possession on deeming himself insecure. Schmittziel v. Moore, 60 N. W. 279, 280, 101 Mich. 590.

As immediately.

"Then or at any time after," as used in Laws 1882, c. 197, § 5, authorizing water commissioners of Amsterdam to condemn lands, and providing that, in case the commissioners take possession of land without having the same condemned, the owner may "then or at any time after" apply for the appointment of commissioners to ascertain his compensation, are used in the sense of "immediately," "forthwith," or "at once," so that the statute of limitations begins to run against the owner's claim immediately on the taking possession of the land by the commissioners. In re Clark, 26 N. Y. Supp. 214, 215, 74 Hun. 294.

Death of taker referred to.

On the devise of certain property to testator's widow, and on her death "then my said estate shall be equally divided," the term "then" refers to the death of the widow. Schwencke v. Hafner, 45 N. Y. Supp. 937, 938, 18 App. Div. 182.

In a will devising certain property to testator's son during life, remainder to his children, if any, but, in the event of his leaving no children, the property then to revert to testator's estate, the word "then" is an adverb of time, and relates to the time of the death of the son and to his leaving no child or children at that time. Sanford v. Sanford, 58 Ga. 259, 260.

The word "then," in a clause in a will devising property to testator's grandson, and directing that, "in case of his death at any time without issue, I then give and bequeath" the property given to him to another, refers to the time of the death of the grandson. Appeal of Snyder, 95 Pa. 174, 182 (quoted in Re Miller's Estate, 22 Atl. 1044, 145 Pa. 561).

The word "then," in a will in which testator gives real estate to his son, and directs that, if the son die without issue, then at his decease the said property shall go to others, is to be construed as referring to the time of the death of the son. Sinnickson v. Snitcher, 14 N. J. Law (2 J. S. Green) 53, 59.

In Wilkins v. South, 7 Term R. 555, involving a will in which a leasehold was bequeathed to P. and the heirs of his body lawfully begotten, and their heirs and assigns, forever, but, in default of such issue, then, after his decease, to go over, etc., Lord Kenyon considered the words "then after his decease" as clearly pointing to the death of P. as the time when the estate would vest. Chism's Adm'r v. Williams, 29 Mo. 288, 296.

Where a will directed that the residuary estate of the testator at the death of his daughter should be divided "equally amongst all my nephews and nieces, and also all the children of my said nieces and nephews, who may then be living, so that each of my said nieces and nephews and grand nieces and nephews shall receive and be paid an equal share thereof," the words "who may then be living" refer to the time of the daughter's death, and apply equally to nieces and nephews and grand nieces and nephews, each one of whom, living at the time of the daughter's death, should receive an equal share. Bigelow v. Clap, 43 N. E. 1037, 1038, 166 Mass. 88.

"Then," as used in a will giving property to the widow as long as she lives, and after her decease to be equally divided between children then living, referred to the time of his wife's death; and the children who are living at that time were the only children entitled to take, unless it should appear that on the true construction of the whole will, and to effectuate a clear intention appearing in other parts of it, the words "then living" ought to be rejected as repugnant. Tawney v. Ward, 1 Beav. 563, 565.

Where a testator directed that the residue of his estate should remain in the control of his executors and their successors until the decease of the last survivor of the life annuitants, and that then the said residue, with all accumulated interest, should be equally divided among his grandchildren, so distributed, and to their heirs, etc., forever, the word "then" in the residuary clause has reference, not only to the period of distribution, but also to the persons who shall take, though in some instances it is construed in the former sense only, and hence the grandchildren will take a contingent remainder in such residue. Hale v. Hobson, 45 N. E. 913, 915, 167 Mass. 397.

"Then," as used in a deed conveying property to a certain person and to the heirs of his body, and in default of such issue then to the surviving sons and daughters of a certain other person, etc., denotes the time when the interest vests in them as at such grantee's death, as well as the persons to take; that is, those who shall then be the survivors of such grantee. Westbrooke v. Romeyn (U. S.) 29 Fed. Cas. 732, 734.

"Then be living," as used in a will providing for the distribution of the surplus at the death or marriage of the testator's widow among the nearest relatives, or the heirs of their bodies, as then be living, refers to the time when the distribution is to be made, and limits it to the surviving issue, or deceased's nearest relatives. Hall v. Wiggin, 29 Atl. 671, 673, 67 N. H. 89.

Where testator's will directed that on the happening of a certain contingency a trust fund should be conveyed to H., or, if he be dead, to his then heirs at law, "then heirs" meant his heirs who would have been entitled as of the time when the conveyance would have been made to him, had he then been living. Proctor v. Clark, 27 N. E. 673, 674, 154 Mass. 45, 12 L. R. A. 721, 724.

Death of testator referred to.

The word "then" is an adverb of time, and usually relates to some antecedent period or event. As used in a will devising the testator's residuary estate to all his children who might then be living, it relates to the death of the testator. In re Cresson's Estate (Pa.) 8 Phila. 207, 208.

"The cases are common which hold that adverbs of time, such as 'when,' 'then after,' 'from and after,' etc., in the devise of a remainder limited upon a life estate, are to be construed merely as relating to the time of the enjoyment of the estate, and not to the time of its vesting in interest, and that the law favors such a construction of a will as will avoid the disinheritance of remaindermen, who may happen to die before the determination of the precedent estates. In Connelly v. O'Brien, 168 N. Y. 406, 60 N. E. 20, the Court of Appeals carried this doctrine so far as to hold that, where testator gave his property to his widow during her life and to such of his children that should then be alive, the adverb was intended by him to refer to the time of his own death, and not to that of his widow, and that consequently a daughter, who survived him, but died before the widow, took a vested share." Ackerman v. Ackerman, 71 N. Y. Supp. 780, 781, 63 App. Div. 370.

As in that case or event.

"Then," as used by a testator in bequeathing a fund in trust for the benefit of his four children, each to receive one-fourth of the income for life, "and upon the decease of each then" one-fourth of the corpus or residue to go to the use of his child or children who should attain the age of 25 years, is not an adverb of time, but merely means "in that case." Appeal of Coggrins, 16 Atl. 579, 581, 124 Pa. 10, 10 Am. St. Rep. 565.

"Then," as used in a will providing that, on the death of any child, then its share should go to the issue of the child so dying, is not an adverb of time, but should be construed to mean "in that event," and the child to take a vested estate. Colonial City Traction Co. v. Kingston City R. Co., 47 N. E. 812, 813, 153 N. Y. 540.

"Then," as used in a will by which testatrix gave property to two devisees, providing that, in case of the death of one of them, then the property should go to the survivor, refers to the event itself, and not to the time of its occurrence. One of the interpretations of "then" by lexicographers is "in that case." Ash v. Coleman (N. Y.) 24 Barb. 645, 647.

"Then," as used in a will devising real estate to testator's wife to hold during her lifetime, and then to descend to testator's heirs, is to be construed as meaning "in that event," referring to the death of the wife. Bunting v. Speck, 21 Pac. 288, 298, 41 Kan. 424, 3 L. R. A. 690.

"Then," as used in a will providing that "if my wife, the said Mary Anne, shall remain single during the minority of her children, then she shall at their maturity give to said children," etc., is to be understood, not as indicating the point of time when the payment to the children is to be made, for that is fixed at their maturity, but is simply equivalent to the phrase "in that event." Rose v. McHose's Ex'rs, 26 Mo. 590, 596.

The word "then," as used by a testator, who, after having used expressions which, though containing no word of inheritance, would, standing by themselves, have given a fee simple absolutely to his grandchildren, added a provision "that the property willed by me to the said grandchildren should be held in common, and, if either of them should depart this life without leaving living issue, then and in that case the survivor, or the heirs of his body, shall inherit all the property and estate devised to both of them," is used as an adverb of time, so that the latter words referred to a death either before or after testator's death, and each grandson took a determinable fee, defeasible by his death without leaving issue, leaving the other grandson surviving. First Nat. Bank v. De Pauw (U. S.) 75 Fed. 775, 780.

The word "then," in a bequest of personal property in trust to A. and his heirs and assigns, forever, but directing, in case he should die before arriving at the age of 21 years, then the property shall go to other beneficiaries, only emphasizes the event upon which the gift becomes absolute, and refers back to the words relating to A., which precede. It is as though the testator had said, "In case of the death of my son A., in that event, or in such case, I give." Baker v. Southerland (N. Y.) 6 Dem. Sur. 220, 223.

In construing a clause in a will that, "in case my said son C. decease leaving issue, then to provide and distribute said share to and among said issue in the same way the laws of the commonwealth for the time being would divide and distribute the same," the court said: "The word 'then,' although in a strictly grammatical sense an adverb of time, is nevertheless often used for the purpose of denoting an event or contingency, and is equivalent to the words 'in that event,' or 'in that case.' Such is often its popular signification, and in this sense it is frequently used in legal instruments to designate limitations of estates or future contingencies on which they are made to depend. In this sense, to point out a contingency or event, and not to mark a precise time, we think it was used by the testator in the sixth clause of his will." Hall v. Priest, 72 Mass. (8 Gray) 18, 24.

The word "then," as used in a will whereby a testator devised the residue of his estate to his executors, in trust to be invested and the income applied to the use of his children until the youngest child became 21 years of age, when the estate was to be divided equally among the children, and providing that, should either of the children die, leaving issue, before the testator's death and before the time fixed for distribution, then such issue should take the share to which the parent of such child would be entitled, if living, means merely "in that event." In re Moloughney, 78 N. Y. Supp. 598, 599, 67 App. Div. 148.

"Then," as used in a lease of a farm, including a peach orchard, for a term of three years, which lease provided that the tenant might use the peach orchard for a longer period, unless a sale of the farm was made, and, if so, then the orchard was to be appraised, was not employed as an adverb of time, fixing the period when the appraisal was to be made, but of contingency, to wit, the sale of the farm. Pintard v. Irwin, 20 N. J. Law (Spencer) 497, 505.

Time of enjoyment referred to.

The word "then," when used in a devise of a remainder limited upon a particular estate, determinable on an event which must necessarily happen, and used to designate the time of the happening of such event, is to be construed as relating merely to the time of the enjoyment of the estate, and not to the time of its vesting. Haug v. Schumacher, 64 N. Y. Supp. 310, 313, 50 App. Div. 562; Ackerman v. Ackerman, 71 N. Y. Supp. 780, 781, 63 App. Div. 370; Moore v. Lyons (N. Y.) 25 Wend. 119, 144; Sheridan v. House, *43 N. Y. (4 Keyes) 569, 589, 4 Abb. Dec. 218, 219; Livingston v. Greene, 52 N. Y. 118, 123; Ackerman v. Gorton, 67 N. Y. 63, 66; Nelson v. Russell, 31 N. E. 1008, 1009, 135 N. Y. 187; Canfield v. Fallon, 57 N. Y. Supp. 149, 154, 43 App. Div. 561, 26 Misc. Rep. 345; Hersee v. Simpson, 48 N. E. 890, 891, 154 N. Y. 496.

"Then," as used in the grant of a remainder, did not import a contingency, or make anything necessary to precede the vesting of a remainder, but only expressed the time when the remainder shall take effect in possession, and not when it should become vested. Middleton's Heirs v. Middleton's Devisees (Ky.) 43 S. W. 677 (citing Williams v. Williams, 91 Ky. 547, 554, 555, 16 S. W. 361; Williamson v. Williamson, 57 Ky. [18 B. Mon.] 329, 375).

In a bequest wherein the testator gave a certain sum in trust for his son, the interest to be used for such son's benefit until he was of lawful age, then the principal to be his, or his heirs and assigns forever, "then" has reference to the time when the property shall come into such son's possession, so that the property vested in such son upon the death of the testator; such son having survived the testator, but dying during his minority. Newberry v. Hinman, 49 Conn. 130, 132.

Testator's will, after devising the residue of his real estate to his daughters, and the survivors of them, until death or marriage, provided as follows: "After the marriage or death of my surviving daughters, the estate herein devised shall descend to those persons who may then be entitled to take the same as my heirs." Held, that the word "then" designated the time when they should come into the enjoyment of that which was devised to them, and was not inserted by way of description of the persons who were to take. Dove v. Torr, 128 Mass. 38, 40.

A conveyance to one for life, and on his death "then to go" to C., creates a present estate in remainder in C.; the words "then to go" meaning that the possession and enjoyment of the property shall go to him on the death of the life tenant. Chambers v. Chambers, 38 N. E. 334, 337, 139 Ind. 111.

"Then," as used in a will directing that, if any of the testator's children should die without heirs, then the property bequeathed to them should be equally divided among the balance of his heirs, shows that the limitation over is to take effect at the time of the death of the first taker, the immediate offspring of the testator, without issue then living. Gray v. Bridgeforth, 33 Miss. 312, 335 (citing Evans v. Wells, 26 Tenn. [7 Humph.] 559, 568; Loving v. Hunter, 16 Tenn. [8 Yerg.] 4, 29; Hickman v. Quinn, 14 Tenn. [6 Yerg.] 96).

"Then," as used in a will giving a legacy to the testator's wife of the dividends of certain stock for her life, which he directed should be continued in the same stock, then to be shared equally by his children that should be then living, refers to the death of the wife. Reeves v. Brymer, 4 Ves. 693, 698.

As used in a will by which testator bequeathed the residue of his real and personal estate to his daughter absolutely on her attaining 21, or, in case of her decease before that time, to the testator's wife, if living, then in further trust to pay the produce of the residuary estate to and among the children of my sister Ann, to be divided among them share and share alike, the word "then" meant the period at which the gift was to take effect in possession, and not the period of the daughter's death. Hetherington v. Oakman, 2 Younge & C. Ch. 299, 301.

Where testator devised land to his executors, to hold the same in trust for the lives of testator's two grandsons, but not to exceed 16 years, and at the end of the 16 years to sell the land and divide it between such grandsons and the issue of such of them as may be then dead, leaving such issue or servants then surviving, the words "then dead" and "then surviving" should be construed as referring to the end of the 16-year period, unless shortened by death of both grandsons before that time. In re Valentine, 13 N. Y. Supp. 444, 445, 59 Hun, 619.

"Then," as used in a will wherein a husband devised his personal estate, to be laid out in securities and the interest of the whole to be paid to his wife for her life, and after her decease the principal to be paid to his sister and her children, or such of them as should be then living, means the same as the precedent words, "after her decease," and those words are not to be construed to mean after her natural death, but after the determination of her interest by natural death, civil death, forfeiture, or otherwise. Dansen v. Hawes, 1 Amb. 276.

A testator left his property to trustees, the income to be paid to his wife and children during their lives; the will providing: "At the decease of the last survivor of my said children, if my said wife shall not then be living, but, if living, then upon her death this trust shall cease; and I give, devise, and bequeath all the estate which shall then be held in trust under this will to my grandchildren, who shall then be living," etc. In construing this will the court said: "The grammatical, as well as the legal, import of the words 'I give, devise, and bequeath,' etc., gives a vested interest. The death of the last survivor of the trustees refers, not to the time of the vesting, but to the time for the trust to cease. The words are not to be carried over, so as to qualify the words of the gift therein represented in connection with the gift. They are not repeated in connection with the gift, nor even referred to by use of the adverb 'then,' as 'I then give, devise,' etc.; but all reference to them is omitted. The sentence is complete, and conveys to the professional mind a distinct and unequivocal legal meaning, a present gift. Time is in no sense attached to its substance. Later in the sentence the word 'then' is used: 'All the estate which shall then be held in trust.' But it is there used for the purpose, not of indicating the time when the estate is to vest, but for the purpose of pointing out the subject of the gift. The word 'then' is again used in this connection: 'To my grandchildren who shall then be living.' It is here used to point out the persons who are to take, and not to indicate the time when the estate is to vest." Farnam v. Farnam, 2 Atl. 325, 332, 53 Conn. 261.

Where a testator devised a portion of his estate in trust to his executors to pay the income to his grandson during his life, and the principal at their discretion, and, in case he should die without issue, then on his death to pay said principal to W. and S., by the words "then to pay" he merely indicated the time when the right of possession is to begin, and did not postpone the vesting. Roosa v. Harrington, 64 N. E. 1, 4, 171 N. Y. 341.

Sequence denoted.

"Then," as used in a subdivision of a will, beginning with the words: "Further, my said executors and trustees shall then pay over the following gifts and bequests, namely," etc., does not denote anything more than an order of sequence, and will not be construed of itself to make the legacies following them residuary, nor to import a preference. Porter v. Howe, 54 N. E. 255, 257, 173 Mass. 521.

"Then," as used in a will, providing that "I give all my estate to my wife during her life, and then to such of my children," etc., is used in the sense of "second," and serves to indicate the order of a gift. Connelly v. O'Brien, 58 N. Y. Supp. 45, 46, 40 App. Div. 574.

Subsequent time imported.

In an action on account for goods sold, defendant pleaded as to a certain parcel that "on a certain day, at the plaintiff's request, he delivered certain goods to a third person; that it was then, to wit, on the day and year aforesaid, in consideration thereof, agreed between them that plaintiff should accept such delivery to a third person in discharge of the debt as to the certain parcel; and that plaintiff did then accept such delivery in full satisfaction and discharge." The word "then" was capable of being construed as meaning "at the same time," but was also susceptible of meaning that the alleged agreement took place subsequent to the delivery of the goods, and its use, therefore, rendered the plea ambiguous. Stead v. Boyer, 1 C. B. 782, 786.

THEN AND THERE.

"Then and there," when used in an indictment, must be referred to that antecedent to which the tenor of the indictment or the principle of law require it should refer, whether exactly according to the rules of syntax or not. Jeffries v. Commonwealth, 94 Mass. (12 Allen) 145, 152.

"Then and there," as used in indictments, specifying the time and place of the commission of the crime, is sufficient as an allegation that all the acts alleged in the indictment occurred at such time. "It is undoubtedly a rule in criminal pleading that every material fact must be alleged with the venue and be charged as done at some time and place. This is usually done, after the time and place have been definitely stated, by the words 'then and there.' In this indictment the assault is averred technically at a time and place, thereby giving, etc., the mortal blow. The present participle is often thus used as an express averment. We think that, without violation to the grammatical construction, the whole may be read as one sentence, averring acts done simultaneously, so that the term 'then and there' applies to all the facts thus averred." Turns v. Commonwealth, 47 Mass. (6 Metc.) 224, 234.

At the trial of a crime the averment of the date means at any time within the statute of limitations, and the subsequent reference, "then and there," means at any such time and at any place within the county. Dreyer v. People, 176 Ill. 590, 598, 52 N. E. 372.

Where one fact is alleged in an indictment with time and place, the words "then and there," subsequently used as to the occurrence of another fact, necessarily import that the two were co-existent, and are a sufficient statement of the time and place of the second occurrence. Palmer v. People, 28 N. E. 130, 131, 138 Ill. 356, 32 Am. St. Rep. 146.

The allegation that, in consideration that the plaintiff had "then and there" delivered to the defendant a certain horse in exchange for a certain horse of the defendant, and that the defendant "then and there" promised that the latter horse was sound, meant that the acts or undertakings of the parties were concurrent and simultaneous. Wightman v. Carlisle, 14 Vt. 296, 299.

"Then and there," as used in an indictment charging that the defendant did then and there with force and arms beat the plaintiff, refers to the time and place where the assault was made, and not to the county in the margin of the indictment. Kennedy v. Commonwealth, 6 Ky. (3 Bibb) 490, 491.

"Then and there," as used in the concluding part of an indictment against one for being present and abetting a murder, refers to the act which caused the death, and not to the time and place of the death. State v. Fley (S. C.) 2 Brev. 338, 347, 4 Am. Dec. 583.

An indictment charging that B. unlawfully and willfully did in a certain room keep a certain slot machine is not defective because the words "then and there" do not precede the words "keep a certain slot machine"; the time and place being distinctly alleged. Bobel v. People, 50 N. E. 322, 323, 173 Ill. 19, 64 Am. St. Rep. 64.

A caption stating that "at a court of oyer and terminer and general gaol delivery held on the fourth Tuesday in May, 1827, by the oath and affirmation of good and lawful men sworn, affirmed, and charged to inquire, it is presented," is sufficient, though the caption omits the phrase "then and there," commonly inserted in such captions after the words "sworn, affirmed, and charged." State v. Price, 11 N. J. Law (6 Halst.) 203, 210.

Indefinite time indicated.

The words "then and there," in an indictment alleging that a charter election was duly held in a certain ward on the 7th of March, and duly continued until and including the 10th of March, and charging that A. did then and there illegally vote at such election, without otherwise designating the day on which the offense was committed, is insufficient to describe such day, as the words may refer to any day between the 7th and 10th of March, inclusive. State v. Day, 74 Me. 220, 221.

The use of the words "then and there," in an indictment, after several distinct times have been stated in the indictment, is bad for uncertainty. State v. Hayes, 24 Mo. 353, 360.

The words "then and there" are relative, and refer to some foregone averment, and their meaning is to be determined by the allegation to which they refer. If that is a single act done, and it then avers that "then and there" another fact occurred, it necessarily imports that the two acts were precisely co-existent, and the word then refers to the precise time. In the case of Rex v. Williams, 2 Leach, Cr. Cas. 529, the averment was that the accused on a certain day made an assault, and on the same day inflicted a wound. Non constat, said the court, that it was at the same time. But if the indictment had observed the usual form, that he made an assault and then and there inflicted the wound, it would be averred to be simultaneous, because the assault was a single act. But where the antecedent averment fixes no precise time and alleges no precise, single, definite act, the word "then," used afterwards, fixed no one definite time; and so, where an indictment averred that defendant on a certain day had in his possession 10 counterfeit bank bills, and that he had then and there aided and assisted in rendering current each of the said bills, the use of the word "then" might be taken as meaning that he had 10 single bills, one at a time, at 10 different times on that day. Edwards v. Commonwealth, 36 Mass. (19 Pick.) 124, 126.

Unless an indictment states a time when as well as a place where the offense was committed, the adverbs "then" and "there" have no antecedent time, and the objection is good on motion in arrest. State v. Slack, 30 Tex. 354, 355.

Where a complaint in a prosecution for exposing for sale and selling intoxicants without a license charges that defendant, on the 1st day of June, 1894, and divers other days and times between that day and the filing of the complaint, exposed and kept for sale, without license or authority to then and there expose or keep for sale, the words "then and there" apply to the whole period from the stated time to the filing of the complaint, and cannot be construed as charging the commission of an offense only on the day named. Commonwealth v. Manning, 42 N. E. 95, 164 Mass. 547.

As instantly.

"Then and there," as used in an indictment for murder, alleging an assault on R. on a certain day and that it resulted in a mortal wound, "of which said mortal wound the said R. then and there died," will be construed to mean "instantly," and, hence, to state with sufficient accuracy the time of death. Commonwealth v. Robertson, 38 N. E. 25, 26, 162 Mass. 90.

As time and place previously mentioned.

Where an indictment specifies a certain date in the caption and another date in the body thereof, and the phrase "then and there" is afterwards used in the indictment, it will be construed as referring to the date last mentioned. Commonwealth v. McKenney, 80 Mass. (14 Gray) 1, 2.

"Then and there," as used in an indictment, means the time and place last previously mentioned therein. State v. Hurley, 71 Me. 354, 355.

The words "then and there," as used in an indictment, are words of reference, and, when time and place have once been named with certainty, it is sufficient to refer to them afterwards by these words, and they will have the same effect as if the time and place were actually repeated. These words also refer to the time and place last specified, unless there be some phrase connected therewith which shows that a different reference is intended. State v. Cotton, 24 N. H. 143, 146.

When time is once mentioned in any part of the information or indictment, it may subsequently be laid as the time of the commission of the offense by words of reference, as "then and there," with the same effect as if it were actually repeated, and likewise, where the time is laid in one count, it may be laid in subsequent counts by such words of reference; but such reference is not sufficient where more than one time is laid in the part of the pleading referred to by the words, because it would not appear to which time such words applied. United States v. Peuschel (U. S.) 116 Fed. 642, 648 (citing Jane v. State, 3 Mo. 61; State v. Hayes, 24 Mo. 358; Commonwealth v. Moore, 85 Mass. [11 Oush.] 600; State v. Day, 74 Me. 220).

"Then and there," as used in an indictment, after stating the date of the assault and that the deceased then and there died therefrom, the word "then" has relation to that time, and the word "there" to the place previously stated. State v. Luke, 16 S. W. 242, 248, 104 Mo. 563.

"Then and there," as used in an indictment, are words of reference, and mean a time and place last previously stated in an indictment, and have the same effect as if the words designating time and place were actually repeated. State v. Cotton, 24 N. H. (4 Fost.) 143, 146.

"Then and there," as used in an indictment, subsequent to an allegation of an occurrence alleged with time and place, refers to the same point of time. Commonwealth v. Butterick, 100 Mass. 12, 17.

"Then and there" is a reaffirmation of allegations of time and place in traversable averments. The rule requiring time and place to be repeated in traversable averments, though strictly required in capital cases, is not so much regarded in indictments for inferior offenses. "Then and there" need not be repeated to an averment which merely declares a legal conclusion. State v. Willis, 2 Atl. 848, 849, 78 Me. 70.

The words "then and there," in an allegation in an indictment for arson that defendant burned a certain house then and there occupied, controlled, and owned by him, refers to the time and county previously stated, and is a sufficient statement of the locus in quo of the house burned. Baker v. State, 8 S. W. 23, 24, 25 Tex. App. 1, 8 Am. St. Rep. 427.

THEN BEING.

Where a testator directed his wife's debts and funeral expenses to be paid out of the estate, then gave the rest then being unto trustees, by the phrase "then being" the testator meant that which the trustees would hold after the payment of the wife's debts and funeral expenses. Bauernschmidt v. Bauernschmidt, 54 Atl. 637, 642, 97 Md. 35.

THEN DUE.

The words "then due," as contained in a mortgage, stating that it was given to secure the sum of $100 "and other indebtedness which may then be due" the mortgagee by the mortgagor, refer to the time when the $100 was to become due. Moore v. Terry, 50 S. W. 998, 1000, 66 Ark. 393.

THEN IN FORCE.

"Then in force," as used in Act Feb. 4, 1857, providing that the provisions of the act should not apply to any actions commenced, nor to any cases where the rights of action or of entry should have accrued, before the time when the act took effect, but that the same should remain subject to the "laws then in force," means the laws in force when the statute was passed and has no reference to the laws in force at the time of the accrual of a cause of action. Gilker v. Brown, 47 Mo. 105, 110.

THEN IN OFFICE.

"Then in office," as used in Gen. Law 1872, § 3, providing that the city officers then in office should continue to exercise the powers conferred upon like officers in this act until their successors should be elected and qualified, in case the act is adopted by the people of a city at an election in lieu of a special charter, is to be construed as meaning the officers of the city holding their office at the time of such election, and not candidates elected for such offices at such election. Crook v. People, 106 Ill. 237, 246.

THEN NEXT.

Rev. St. c. 85, § 13, providing that an appeal from a judgment of a justice may be taken at any time within 24 hours after the entry of the judgment in the court of common pleas "then next to be held in the same county," means the court held next after the entry of judgment by the justice, though before the taking of the appeal. McIniffe v. Wheelock, 67 Mass. (1 Gray) 600, 603.

THEN STOCKHOLDERS.

Where the report of a corporation gives its assets and debts on a certain date, and the names of its then stockholders, the term "then stockholders" has reference to the existing stockholders at the date fixed in the report. American Grocery Co. v. Pratt, 55 N. Y. Supp. 467, 468, 36 App. Div. 152.

THENCE.

See "From Thence."

"Thence," as used in the description of land, means from that place; and where a call for land is west to the west line of said block, thence south along the east line of said block, it is an impossible and insufficient description of land. Tracy v. Harmon, 43 Pac. 500, 501, 17 Mont. 465.

THENCEFORTH.

See "From Thenceforth."

THEOLOGICAL EDUCATION.

A will by which testatrix provided for the payment of the expenses of a "collegiate and theological education" for certain of her relatives in case they chose to take advantage of such provisions, means "such an academic and theological training as is practical and suitable to prepare a person to be a minister of the gospel, and it would be improper to construe the phrase disjunctively, so as to permit a collegiate education not followed by a theological course." Shepard v. Shepard, 17 Atl. 173, 174, 57 Conn. 24.

THEORETICAL INCH.

A "theoretical inch," in reference to water power, is a stream of water having a cross-section area at right angles with its flow of one square inch and moving with a velocity due to the given head. Jackson Milling Co. v. Chandos, 52 N. W. 759, 761, 82 Wis. 437 (citing Janesville Cotton Mills v. Ford, 52 N. W. 764, 82 Wis. 416, 17 L. R. A. 564).

THEORY.

The terms "theory" and "theories," as used in a pleading, relate to the basis of liability or the grounds of defense. South Bend Mfg. Co. v. Liphart, 39 N. E. 908, 909, 12 Ind. App. 185.

THERAPY.

"Therapy" is the treatment of disease, and surgery is therapy of a distinctly operative kind. Stewart v. Raab, 55 Minn. 20, 21, 56 N. W. 256.

THERE.

See "Then and There."
There is given, see "Give."

"There," as used alone, is a word of very uncertain meaning. It must in some way be confined as to locality before it conveys any definite idea; and thus a letter authorizing a party, if he is still there, to draw a draft on the writer, would be sufficient to authorize the payment of the draft upon presentation wherever the party was and render the writer liable. Posey v. Denver Nat. Bank, 42 Pac. 684, 686, 7 Colo. App. 108.

THERE BE, AND HEREBY IS, GRANTED.

"There be, and hereby is, granted," as used in an act of Congress which declares that there be, and hereby is, granted certain lands, etc., should be construed as words which import a grant in present, and not in futuro, or the promise of a grant. Board of Trustees v. Cuppett, 40 N. E. 792, 795, 52 Ohio St. 567.

THERE BEING IN.

The expression "there being in the lot hereby conveyed 135 acres," in a deed which had before sufficiently described the premises, means the same as though the expression had been "containing 135 acres," and does not amount to a covenant that the land shall contain 135 acres, but is merely descriptive of the land conveyed. Roat v. Puff (N. Y.) 3 Barb. 353, 354, 356.

THERE IS HEREBY APPROPRIATED.

The phrase "there is hereby appropriated the sum," etc., is customarily used in bills appropriating money for the payment of salary and other expenses of government; but it is not essential to the validity of an appropriation that those words, or any of them, should be used, if the Legislature has clearly designated the amount and the fund out of which it is to be paid. Humbert v. Dunn, 24 Pac. 111, 84 Cal. 57.

THERE SITUATE.

"There situate," as used in an indictment charging that defendant, in a certain county and town, broke and entered a house there situate, are not words of form or addition merely, which need not be proved, or strictly proved, but are words descriptive of the dwelling house, and constitute a material part of its description, and are required to be strictly proved. State v. Kelley, 29 Atl. 843, 845, 66 N. H. 577.

THEREABOUTS.

A declaration alleged that certain work was reasonably worth $1,000 or thereabouts, and that defendants had only paid $500 or thereabouts. It was held that, as "thereabouts" is defined as nearly, or near that number, degree, or quantity, the amount claimed would be construed as less than $1,000, so as to give jurisdiction, rather than as above that sum. Dwyer v. Rathbone, Sard & Co., 2 N. Y. Supp. 170, 172, 49 Hun, 609.

"Of the measurement of 180 tons to 200 tons or thereabout," as used in a charter party in which plaintiff was described as "of the ship A., of the measurement of 180 tons to 200 tons or thereabout," was a matter of description only, and did not amount to a warranty. Barker v. Windle, 6 Bl. & Bl. 675, 680.

Where a lot of land is conveyed by boundaries, and it is stated in the conveyance that the contract contains a certain number of acres or "thereabouts," the whole tract will pass, although it contains more than the specified number of acres. Mann v. Pearson (N. Y.) 2 Johns. 37, 44.

THEREAFTER.

The adverb "thereafter" means "afterwards," or "after that"; and as used in Rev. St. 1889, § 2168, providing that a bill of exceptions may be filed during the term at which it is taken, or within such time thereafter as the court may by order allow, which may be extended in vacation for good cause shown, or within the time the attorneys may thereafter agree upon, refers to the making of the order of court extending time beyond the judgment term, so that an order of the court first extending the time beyond the term is an essential condition to an extension by the attorneys. State v. Ryan, 25 S. W. 351, 353, 120 Mo. 88.

"Thereafter," as used in a note promising to pay on demand and after a certain date, and interest at a certain rate thereafter, limits the interest period; for, without it, interest would have run from the date of the note. Larrabee v. Southard, 50 Atl. 20, 95 Me. 385.

The word "thereafter," as used in a clause of a will by which testator gave stock for life to his wife and married daughter, and to the survivor, with the provision that, if his son-in-law survives, he should have the use for life, to be thereafter disposed of, does not postpone the vesting, but refers to the time of enjoyment of those beneficially interested. In re Conger's Estate, 81 N. Y. Supp. 733, 735, 40 Misc. Rep. 157.

Adverbs of time, as "where," "thereafter," "from," etc., in a devise of a remainder, are construed to relate merely to the time of the enjoyment of the estate, and not the time of the vesting in interest. Poor v. Considine, 73 U. S. (6 Wall.) 458, 475, 18 L. Ed. 869, 874.

Act June 1871, § 1, providing that the select and common councils of the city of Philadelphia should meet in joint convention at any stated meeting in every June thereafter and elect four persons, one of whom should represent the minority of city councils, to be members of the board of guardians of the poor of said city, to serve for three years, cannot be construed as meaning that the year 1871 was not to be included, but every year after 1871. Commonwealth v. Armstrong (Pa.) 9 Phila. 479, 480.

THEREBY.

"Thereby," as used in an instruction that if, while plaintiff was crossing a track, defendant ran its train upon the track recklessly, etc., thereby causing the plaintiff serious injury, plaintiff would be entitled to recover, etc., referred to all that preceded it, both as to the act of propulsion and the act of striking. Union Rolling Mill Co. v. Gillen, 100 Ill. 52, 54.

As by that means.

"Thereby" signifies "by that means," or "in consequence of that," and is so used in an allegation of a complaint that defendants permitted fire to be taken from a threshing machine and placed upon the ground in and about the straw and stable, and thereby through wanton carelessness allowed and permitted the fire to spread and burn into the field of the plaintiff so that the negligence is sufficiently alleged. Lieuallen v. Mosgrove, 54 Pac. 200, 202, 33 Or. 282.

In a complaint for libel which alleged that defendant made the slanderous statement in the presence of two reporters, and thereby defendant caused such statement to be published, "thereby" will be construed as used in the sense of "by that means," or in consequence of the preceding allegations; and hence the averment was of a conclusion as to the effect or result of the facts previously alleged, and not a sufficient allegation that defendant caused the publication of the words spoken. Schoepflin v. Coffey, 56 N. E. 502, 503, 162 N. Y. 12.

As because.

"Thereby," as used in Code W. Va. c. 47, § 44, providing that any city, town, or village which shall fail for one year to keep its roads, streets, alleys, etc., in good repair and order, or which shall fail for one year to exercise its corporate powers and privileges, shall "thereby forfeit its charters, and all the rights, powers and privileges conferred thereby," means only that "by reason of" or "because of" such acts the charter shall be forfeited. It is only equivalent to the word "because," in the language "shall because of such failure forfeit its charter to the state," and does not amount to a legislative forfeiture in advance, without sentence. It merely specifies a cause of forfeiture, leaving its ascertainment to be governed by the general law on the subject. Hornbrook v. Town of Elm Grove, 21 S. E. 851, 852, 40 W. Va. 543, 28 L. R. A. 416.

THEREFOR.

Olympia City Charter, subd. 25, declares that, without a petition of a majority of property owners or a two-thirds vote of the city council, "there shall in no case a sidewalk be built and an assessment be made or tax levied to pay therefor." Held, that the term "therefor" related to and meant "for the sidewalk being built" and not to the word "sidewalk" alone; hence it did not prohibit a repair thereof without vote or petition. Hutchinson v. City of Olympia, 5 Pac. 606, 607, 2 Wash. T. 314.

"Therefor," as used in Rev. St. c. 61, § 4, relating to causes of action against a wife, and providing that a suit may be maintained against her, or against her and her husband, therefor, refers to all the different causes of action before enumerated in that section. Marcus v. Rovinsky, 49 Atl. 420, 421, 95 Me. 106.

"Therefor," as used in Ky. St. 1894, § 2494, relative to mechanics' liens upon railroads, which provides that no lien shall attach unless the person who performs the labor, or furnishes the labor, materials, or teams, shall, within 60 days after the last day of the last month in which any labor was performed or material furnished, file a statement setting forth the amount due therefor and for which the lien is claimed, does not refer to the last labor that was performed or the last materials that were furnished by some other person, but means the time in which such party completes his own work. Central Trust Co. v. Richmond, N. I. & B. R. Co. (U. S.) 68 Fed. 90, 96, 15 C. C. A. 273, 41 L. R. A. 459.

THEREFORE.

Where the record of a default of defendants proceeds immediately, "Therefore it is considered by the court," etc., the word "therefore," in such connection, is defined in Worcester's Dictionary as "for this reason; consequently"—and in Webster's Dictionary, "for that; for that or this reason; referring to something previously stated." Thompson v. Gilmore, 50 Me. 428, 433.

THEREIN.

"Therein," as used in an act granting the exclusive power to the authorities of a borough to enact and ordain streets, alleys, etc., therein, meant such only as begin and end within the limits of the municipality, and did not extend to public roads laid out through or to a point within the limits of a borough, of which only a part was within the borough lines. In re Parkesburg Borough Streets, 17 Atl. 27, 28, 124 Pa. 511.

"Therein," as used in Const. art. 8, § 6, providing that no municipal corporation shall become indebted beyond 1½ per cent. of its taxable property "without the assent of three-fifths of the voters therein voting at an election to be held for that purpose," merely qualifies the persons who might vote in the body of voters who must vote to constitute a lawful majority, and means voters residing therein; i. e., within the city limits. Metcalfe v. City of Seattle, 25 Pac. 1010, 1013, 1 Wash. St. 297.

As word of reference.

As used in a notice of a motion for an order vacating and setting aside the judgment entered in said action and "all proceedings therein," the quoted phrase refers to all proceedings in the action, and not merely to proceedings in pursuance of or subsequent to the judgment. Cummings v. Tabor, 21 N. W. 72, 75, 61 Wis. 185.

"Therein," as used in Rev. St. U. S. § 5478 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3696], defining the offense of entering a post office to commit larceny as forcibly breaking into or attempting to break into any post office, or building used in part as a post office, with intent to commit larceny therein, means in the post office. United States v. Williams (U. S.) 57 Fed. 201, 202.

In a will, in which the first clause indicates that the testator was then dealing with all his estate, and by the second clause he devised to his wife, "in lieu and satisfaction of all her dower and other right therein," certain houses named, it was clearly intended to debar the wife of dower in the whole of the testator's estate. Knighton v. Young, 22 Md. 359, 373.

In construing Rev. St. § 5478 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3696], providing that "any person who shall forcibly break into or attempt to break into any post office, or any building used in whole or in part as a post office, with intent to commit therein larceny or other depredation, shall be punished," etc., the court said: "The language employed, taken literally, may mean breaking with intent to commit a larceny in any part of the building; that is, when used in part for a post office. Thus construed, it would make the statute refer to and make criminal acts which might in no wise affect the postal service, and that, too, where the party charged had no intent to commit a larceny in that part of the building used for a post office. Such a construction is not admissible. In the words of the statute, 'with the intent to commit therein larceny or other depredation,' the word 'therein' obviously refers to that part of the building used for a post office. Under this construction, if there is a breaking into any part of a building used in part as a post office, with intent to commit larceny in the part so used, it constitutes an offense within the true meaning of the statute, and, so construed, the statute is open to no constitutional objection." United States v. Saunders (U. S.) 77 Fed. 170, 171; United States v. Campbell (U. S.) 16 Fed. 233.

"Therein," as used in an antenuptial contract whereby the wife agreed to accept a certain sum in settlement of her "rights of dower and inheritance" in her husband's estate, both real and personal, and relinquish all claim therein, refers to dower inheritance, and not to estate, and the widow's right to occupy the homestead is not thereby barred. Mahaffy v. Mahaffy, 17 N. W. 46, 47, 61 Iowa, 679. See Id., 18 N. W. 685, 690, 63 Iowa, 55.

The words "nothing therein," in Judiciary Act 1789, § 30, providing that nothing therein should be construed to prevent any court of the United States from granting a dedimus potestatem to take depositions according to common usage, etc., was construed as equivalent to the words "nothing in this act." United States v. Cameron (U. S.) 15 Fed. 794, 795.

THEREOF.

"Thereof," as used in a lease, providing that the lessee would not make "any external alteration whatsoever in the premises, nor any internal alterations in the said dwelling house that may lessen the value thereof," applies only to the last antecedent, namely internal alterations; and in an action for breach of the covenant in regard to external alterations it is not incumbent on the lessor to prove that the same diminished the value of the premises. Perry v. Davis, 3 C. B. (N. S.) 769, 778.

The word "thereof" means "of that," or "of it." As used in Supreme Court Rule 36 (11 Sup. Ct. iv), providing that, where such writ of error is allowed in cases of conviction of infamous crimes, etc., the Circuit Court or District Court, or any justice or judge thereof, shall have power to admit the accused to bail, limits the words justice or judge to a justice or judge of the Circuit or District Courts. United States v. Hudson (U. S.) 65 Fed. 68, 71.

"Thereof," as used in Act March 3, 1797, c. 74, § 5, declaring that the claim of priority on the part of the United States shall accrue in cases where a debtor, not having sufficient property to pay all his debts, shall have made a voluntary assignment thereof, refers to the word "property" as used. United States v. Hoove, 7 U. S. (3 Cranch) 73, 91, 2 L. Ed. 370.

"Thereof," as used in Baltimore City Ordinance March 9, 1807, § 13, declaring that, if the commissioners of health shall at any time report to the city commissioners that a nuisance exists in any street, lane, or alley in the city, which will endanger the health thereof, etc., relates not to the city of Baltimore, so as to make it mean a nuisance which will endanger the city, but relates to any street, lane, or alley, etc., and means a nuisance that will endanger the health of such street, etc. City of Baltimore v. Hughes' Adm'r (Md.) 1 Gill & J. 480, 495, 19 Am. Dec. 243.

"Thereof," as used in 16 Stat. 193, § 97, enacting that no person shall maintain an action for the infringement of his copyright unless he shall give notice thereof by inserting in the several copies of every edition published, if it be a book, on the title page or the page immediately following, or if a map, chart, painting, etc., by inscribing upon some portion of the face or front thereof, the words "Entered according to act of Congress," etc., refers back to the words "the several copies," so that the words "Entered according to act of Congress," etc., should not be inscribed on a copyrighted painting, but on the photograph or other publication thereof. Werckmeister v. Pierce & Bushnell Mfg. Co. (U. S.) 63 Fed. 445, 454.

In a will providing that certain property should be held for certain children, who should have and receive one-half of the income therefrom, and that upon their decease their children are to have and receive one-half part or portion thereof, etc., "thereof" refers to the property, and not to the income. Fussey v. White, 113 Ill. 637, 643.

"Thereof," as used in a statute making a special partner who fails to pay the amount of capital agreed to be paid by him in cash liable for all engagements thereof as general partners, is to be construed as meaning "the engagements of the partnership as long as it has a legal existence." Haviland v. Chace (N. Y.) 39 Barb. 283, 287.

The word "thereof," in a deed of trust securing the payment of three promissory notes at different times, reciting its purpose to be to secure the prompt payment of said notes at the maturity thereof, is to be construed to have reference to each of said notes, and the clause may be read as "on or before the maturity of each of said notes." Bridges v. Ballard, 62 Miss. 237, 241.

"A sufficiency thereof," as used in a will in which testator gave to his wife, in lieu of her dower, the plantation on which they then resided during her natural life, and also the live stock of every description, as also all the household furniture and other items not particularly mentioned and otherwise disposed of in the will, during her natural life, "she, however, first disposing of a sufficiency thereof to pay my just debts as aforesaid," comprehends all the real and personal property. Smith v. McIntire (U. S.) 83 Fed. 456, 461.

In considering the first clause of St. 1852, c. 322, § 12, providing that "no person shall be allowed to be a manufacturer of any spirituous or intoxicating liquors for sale, or a common seller thereof, without being duly appointed or authorized," in answer to the argument that "thereof" means all liquors manufactured by the defendant, the court said: "This is ingenious, but we think not sound. Taking it in strict grammatical construction, we cannot see how 'thereof' can include 'manufactured by himself.' The section, expressed more fully, would be thus: 'No person shall be allowed to be a manufacturer of any spirituous or intoxicating liquors for sale, or a common seller of spirituous or intoxicating liquors.' The article is not drawn with the highest degree of skill and precision. These two offenses are brought together, probably because they are punishable in the same manner." Commonwealth v. Bralley, 69 Mass. (3 Gray) 456, 457.

THEREON.

A deed describing the land as commencing at the west part of lot No. 10, thence east 20 feet, etc., "with a brick tenement thereon," was not a covenant that the tenement was on the lot, but was merely descriptive. Dryden v. Holmes, 9 Mo. 135, 136.

"Thereon," as used in the sixteenth section of the New Jersey act incorporating the Camden & Amboy Railway Company, authorizing the company to demand and receive such sum or sums of money for tolls and the transportation of persons and property thereon as they shall from time to time think reasonable and proper, provided that they shall not charge more than the rate of eight cents per mile for the transportation of property and more than ten cents per mile for the carriage of passengers, does not mean the railroad, but means the whole line of connection between the cities to which the company built their road, and the company is entitled to charge on this whole line the rate of toll per mile fixed by the act, and applies to a steamboat used by the company to take passengers and goods across the Delaware river. Camden & A. R. & Transp. Co. v. Briggs, 22 N. J. Law (2 Zab.) 623, 641.

The word "thereon," in a statute providing that, on the failure of a railroad to fence its track as required, it shall be liable for all damages which may be done by the agents, employes, engineer, or cars of such corporation to any cattle and other stock thereon, "seems to indicate that the animal must be injured on the track, and, if so, it is reasonable to conclude that the intention was that the injury should be done by the engine or cars. Jeffersonville, M. & I. R. Co. v. Dunlap, 13 N. E. 403, 408, 112 Ind. 93.

The word "thereon" has exactly the same meaning as if the expression had been "on the same," as used in a policy insuring a ship for a voyage to a port on the north side of Cuba, with the liberty of a second port thereon. Nicholson v. Mercantile Marine Ins. Co., 106 Mass. 399, 400.

THERETO.

In a writing on the margin of a contract for the shipment of purchased goods by a certain vessel, which has been chartered, but which has not arrived in port, that, if the vessel be lost before reaching port of loading, other vessels will be substituted for same shipment, or as near thereto as practicable, the word "thereto" means as near to the date fixed in the original contract for shipment as is possible. Browne v. Paterson, 55 N. Y. Supp. 404, 408, 38 App. Div. 167.

The phrase "avenue leading thereto," in a statute making it criminal for any reputed thief to frequent any river, canal, dock, quay, wharf, or warehouse near or adjoining thereto, or any street, highway, or avenue leading thereto, means avenue leading to a street or highway. Reg. v. Brown, 17 Adol. & E. (N. S.) 833, 837.

THERETOFORE.

The word "theretofore," as used in an indictment alleging that defendant on a certain date, having theretofore fraudulently devised a scheme to defraud, etc., means "before then." Hume v. United States (U. S.) 118 Fed. 689, 696, 55 C. C. A. 407.

THEREUNTO BELONGING.

These words are, in common speech, of different import, according to the subject of which they are spoken. If we speak of a farm or a field, with reference to the ownership, we say it belongs to such a one, meaning thereby that it is the property of that person; if with reference to any estate of a particular name, we say it belongs to such an estate, as to the Britton Ferry estate, meaning that it is parcel of that estate; if with reference to its locality, we say it belongs to such a parish or township, meaning that it is situate in or part of that manor, in the ordinary and popular sense of the word "part," and not in the strictly legal sense, as part of the demesnes of that manor, or as holden of the manor, or of the lord thereof. Doe v. Langton, 2 Barn. & Adol. 680.

THEREUPON.

Webster defines "thereupon" to mean upon this, or that, and sometimes immediately, at once, without delay; and hence, where a case-made stated that parties in support of their motions introduced affidavits, and thereupon the court made an order, etc., it sufficiently appeared that the court's order was based on the affidavits, and nothing else, since, if the word "thereupon" had been used in one sense, it meant that on the testimony the court ordered, and, if it was used in another sense, it meant then that immediately on the reading of the affidavits, and without anything intervening, the court ordered. Dewey v. Linscott, 20 Kan. 684, 687.

In an action for malicious prosecution the declaration alleged in one count that the defendant made a false and malicious complaint against the plaintiff before a trial justice, and testified falsely at the trial thereof before the justice, and thereupon the justice found the plaintiff guilty. Held, that the use of the words "and thereupon" marked the succession of events in order of time, and did not exclude the existence of other facts than those previously recited, and hence the declaration did not show that the conviction before the trial justice was obtained solely on the false testimony of the defendant. Dennehey v. Woodsum, 100 Mass. 195, 197.

As concurrently.

In a plea alleging that plaintiff had committed a forcible entry and breach of the peace in the presence of the constable, and that the defendant thereupon gave the plaintiff in charge, and the constable took him for the purpose of carrying him before a magistrate "thereupon" would indicate that the act was concurrent with the breach of the peace. Derecourt v. Corbishley, 5 El. & Bl. 188, 190.

As in consideration thereof.

"Thereupon," as used in a declaration that plaintiff delivered certain logs to the defendants at their request, and thereupon defendants delivered their agreement to the plaintiff, may fairly be considered as referring to the reason of the promise of the defendants. Wherever the connecting matter would seem to require such an interpretation, the word may be taken to mean "in consideration thereof." Bean v. Ayers, 67 Me. 482, 487.

As in consequence of.

"Thereupon," as used in a plea by defendant in an action on a bond of a corporate officer, alleging that the corporation had obtained a certificate of complete registration by and under a different name, and thereupon said officer ceased to be appointed as such, the word "thereupon" meant in "consequence of." Groux's Improved Soap Co. v. Cooper, 8 C. B. (N. S.) 800, 814.

"Thereupon," in Revision, p. 762, § 52, providing for inventory, appraisal, and selection of certain property for the family of a deceased person, and further providing that the goods and chattels, money, or effects so selected "shall thereupon become" the property of such family and remain for their use, means that, upon the selection, that which shall be selected, not having theretofore been the property of the family, shall thereupon become its property. Before the selection, it, with the other personal estate, is the property of the personal representative of the decedent for the execution of his trust, and therein primarily reserved for selection for the use of the family. Until the selection is made, and title to that which is selected is thereby secured to the family, all that the family has is a personal right to take by selection. Carey v. Monroe, 35 Atl. 456, 458, 54 N. J. Eq. 632.

As immediately.

The word "thereupon" means without delay or lapse of time. Putnam v. Langley, 183 Mass. 204, 205.

"Thereupon," as used in Code Civ. Proc. § 1283, providing that a submission to arbitrators may stipulate that it be entered as an order of the Supreme Court, for which purpose it must be filed with the court, who must thereupon enter in his register of actions a note of a submission, with the names of the parties, the names of the arbitrators, and the dates, does not mean immediately. California Academy of Sciences v. Fletcher, 33 Pac. 855, 857, 99 Cal. 207.

The word "thereupon" means immediately, at once, or without delay; and hence, as used in Const. art. 5, par. 16, providing that a bill passed by the Assembly, being approved and signed by the Governor, shall thereupon become a law, it is and does become a law immediately after receiving such approval, though by express provisions it does not go into effect until a future time. People v. Inglis, 43 N. E. 1103, 1104, 161 Ill. 256.

"Thereupon," means immediately, at once, or without delay, and as used in Laws 1893, p. 301, § 31, relating to establishment of roads, and requiring the clerk of the county commissioners, when a certificate of the work of construction has been filed, to thereupon issue a warrant, requires the issuance of a warrant within less than 10 days. State v. Van Wyck, 54 Pac. 768, 771, 20 Wash. 39.

"Thereupon," as used in a record that, in rendering of judgment against defendant, he thereupon filed his motion for a new trial, means immediately after, and upon the same day of, the occurrence last before cited. Hill v. Wand, 47 Kan. 340, 27 Pac. 988, 27 Am. St. Rep. 288; Hallam v. Huffman, 48 Pac. 602, 603, 5 Kan. App. 303.

"Thereupon," as used in Code Civ. Proc. § 1039, requiring a justice to certify to the district court in certain cases and thereupon file the original papers, is an adverb of time, and signifies without delay or lapse of time. Kaufmann v. Drexel, 76 N. W. 559, 560, 56 Neb. 229.

"Thereupon," as used in Rev. St. 1841, c. 21, §§ 47, 48, providing that, whenever any highway shall be laid out by the county commissioners, they shall thereupon cause an assessment to be made on the tracts of land, township, or plantation, or divisions thereof, through which it runs, means immediately, or without delay. The word implies close connection, not disconnection. No period of time is to intervene between the steps to be taken. Mansur v. County Com'rs, 22 Atl. 358, 359, 83 Me. 514.

"Thereupon," as used in St. 1891, p. 196, relating to street improvements, and providing that, after certain publications of notices of street improvements, the street superintendent shall thereupon cause to be conspicuously posted, etc., means upon those precedent conditions, and does not mean immediately, but that the posting shall follow within a reasonable time. Porphyry Pav. Co. v. Ancker, 37 Pac. 1050, 1051, 104 Cal. 340.

"Thereupon" is an adverb, signifying, according to Webster, "immediately, at once, or without delay"; and it is in that sense that it would ordinarily be understood in the connection in which it is used in a bill of exceptions setting out a copy of a deed, and then reading: "It was conceded on the trial that the plaintiffs were residents, etc., when this suit was begun, and thereupon the court announced that his finding was against the interpleader and garnishees." To say the least, it fails to give to the bill of exceptions that degree of certainty which the rules of pleading require. It is suggested that the word "thereupon" should be construed as meaning "upon the foregoing evidence"; but such, however, is not the usual signification which the rule of interpretation—I. e., that a bill of exceptions, like all other pleadings, is to be construed most strongly against the pleader—should give it. First Nat. Bank of Michigan City v. Haskell, 23 Ill. App. 616, 618.

As word of reference.

"Thereupon," as used in a statute declaring that in all actions of trespass brought against any person entitled to rent, relating to any entry by virtue of the act upon the premises chargeable with such rent, or to any debts or seizure, or to any sale or disposal of any goods, thereupon, it shall be lawful, etc., refers to the premises chargeable with rent, and not to the debts or seizure. Oliver v. Phelps, 20 N. J. Law (Spencer) 180, 193.

The word "thereupon," in Rev. Laws, 629, 635, providing that, if judgment is given against a freeholder for a sum exceeding $60, no execution shall be issued thereon until after six months, unless the party in whose favor judgment may be given shall make it appear to the satisfaction of the justice that the debt will be in danger of being lost if such delay of execution is allowed, and making it the duty of the justice to issue execution immediately, unless the party against whom judgment is given shall thereupon give security, etc., means upon the justice being satisfied, as before mentioned. Krumeick v. Krumeick, 14 N. J. Law (2 J. S. Green) 39, 44.

As then.

In a will providing that the executor shall sell certain property and thereupon divide the whole as follows, "thereupon" will be construed to have been used in the sense of "then," and will not vest a present interest in the estate. In re Cameron, 27 N. Y. Supp. 1031, 1033, 76 Hun. 429.

As thereby.

Where a declaration, after stating certain facts, alleges that it "thereupon" became the duty of the defendant to do a certain act, such allegation is to be understood as a mere acceptance of the legal liability supposed to result from the previously stated facts as an assertion that the defendant became thereby bound to do the act, and not as a distinct substantive allegation. The word "thereupon" is to be understood, not merely as "afterwards," but is equivalent to "thereby." Brown v. Mallett, 5 C. B. 600, 614.

THEREWITH.

The word "therewith," according to the latest standard dictionaries of the English language, is the equivalent in meaning of the words "with that or this," or "at the same time"; and it is so used in Rev. St. 1899, § 4228, providing that every person who shall board any horse shall have a lien on the animal and on any equipment "coming into his possession therewith." It is plain that no other interpretation can be placed on all the words, other than that the liveryman is given a lien only on the vehicle or equipment when it comes into his possession at the same time with the animal. Zartman-Thalman Carriage Co. v. Reid & Lowe, 73 S. W. 942, 943, 99 Mo. App. 415.

THERMOSTAT.

A thermostat is a self-acting apparatus for the regulation of temperature. It includes the whole apparatus, as well as the expanding strip or strips of metal or other substance upon which the heat first acts, as the intermediate wires, magnets, or other apparatus, if any, by which the dampers of the furnace are open or closed as the strips expand or contract; and hence an application for a patent, stating that it was for a "thermostat" and an automatic machine, the automatic machine will be held to apply solely to the clockwork device, and not to the thermostat. Murphey v. Weil, 66 N. W. 532, 534, 92 Wis. 467.

THESE.

"These" is the plural of "this," and opposed to "those," and relates to the persons or things nearest or last-mentioned, and "those" to the first-mentioned or most remote. Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. Beebe, 69 Ill. App. 363, 386 (citing Worcester).

A testator devised to his wife "the Draper place of 150 acres, and 125 acres of land on the where we now live, and the Smith lot and the Possession lot, to have the use of in the family," until certain parties should have their lands set off to them, and "these other two lots during her natural life, then to be divided amongst the children as she direct." Held, that the words "these other two lots" meant the lots first mentioned, instead of, as customary, referring to the nearest antecedent. Russell v. Kennedy, 66 Pa. 248, 251.

A newspaper advertisement, reciting that sundry houses and other buildings had been recently set on fire, and offering a reward of $500 to any person "who shall give information so that the perpetrator of these outrages shall be convicted," meant past acts, and was not an offer of reward for the detection of a class of crimes to be afterwards committed, without limit of time. Freeman v. City of Boston, 48 Mass. (5 Metc.) 56, 59.

THEY.

"They," as used in Code 1873, § 4030, providing that if any persons, being within the prohibited degrees of consanguinity, carnally know each other, they shall be guilty of incest, will be construed to be equivalent to "both" or "each." State v. Hurd, 70 N. W. 613, 615, 101 Iowa, 391.

An agreement by two or more persons that they will desist from and discontinue their business is not shown to have been violated by an allegation that one of them has carried on the business, since the word "they," as used in the agreement, would thus be construed to mean that they and each of them would desist from, etc., which construction will not be given in the cases restricting trade. Lawrence v. Kidder (N. Y.) 10 Barb. 641, 655.

The word "they," may refer to a corporation. Wiley v. Borough of Towanda (U. S.) 26 Fed. 594, 595.

The relative pronoun "they," as used in the Penal Code, includes females as well as males, unless there is some express declaration to the contrary. Pen. Code Tex. 1895, art. 21.

THIEF.

See "Common Thief."

To call one a "thief" does not necessarily impute to him the crime of larceny, so as to be actionable per se. Egan v. Semrad, 88 N. W. 906, 908, 113 Wis. 84.

Where the words used by a defendant in libel were shown to have been that "T. is a thief, and so was his father before him, and I can prove it," but it was also added, "T. received the earnings of the ship and ought to pay the wages," the word "thief" was not used in a sense imputing a felony, and was not actionable, though the word prima facie would carry such imputation. Thompson v. Bernard, 1 Camp. 48.

"Thieves," in law as in common parlance, means those who have committed either compound or simple larceny. America Ins. Co. of City of New York v. Bryan (N. Y.) 1 Hill, 25, 28.

The words, "He is a thief," import in themselves in their usual sense a charge of larceny. Robinson v. Keyser, 22 N. H. 323, 324.

The statement in regard to a person that he is a "thief" is a complete charge of slander in itself, sufficient to sustain the action, without proof of other allegations. Smith v. Moore, 52 Atl. 320, 74 Vt. 81.

Simply to call a man a thief is prima facie actionable, as it imputes felony; but if it appears that the word was used as a mere term of abuse, and that there was in point of fact no imputation of actual theft conveyed by it, there is no cause of action. Thus, where the defendant said of the plaintiff, "He is a damned thief, and so was his father before him," and it appears that the words were uttered in the heat of anger; during a conversation respecting plaintiff's refusal to pay over some money which he received as executor, Lord Ellenborough directed a nonsuit, saying that it was manifest from the whole conversation that the words as used did not impute felony. 2 Add. Torts, § 1119. If it is doubtful whether the term is used in an actionable sense, the question is for the jury; but if, from the plaintiff's own showing, it appears that they were not used in such a sense, he will be nonsuited. Bridgman v. Armer, 57 Mo. App. 528, 532.

To call a man a "thief" is not necessarily actionable, as importing a felony, when it is apparent, from the circumstances under which the words are spoken, that they are not intended nor understood to be used in such sense. Quinn v. O'Gara (N. Y.) 2 E. D. Smith, 388, 389.

A "thief" being one who steals, to charge another with being a thief is actionable, as importing that he is a criminal. Little v. Barlow, 26 Ga. 423, 425, 71 Am. Dec. 219.

The word "thief," in a charge that a man is a thief, is equivalent to the statement that he belongs to one of the class known as "thieves," and is libelous, as importing a charge of being a criminal. Tillman v. Willis, 61 Ga. 433, 435.

A charge that plaintiff is a "thief" is not actionable per se, when it is made in connection with other language showing that the remark is predicated on a taking of marl, which in its natural state is a part of the freehold and not a subject of larceny. Formerly a distinction was made between saying, "You are a thief, you have stolen," or "and have stolen my trees," and saying, "You are a thief, for you have stolen," etc.; but latter opinions make no difference, if the words are spoken at the same time. Ogden v. Riley, 14 N. J. Law (2 J. S. Green) 186, 187, 25 Am. Dec. 513.

The charge that another man is a "thief," though actionable per se as charging a felony, is not actionable if spoken in relation to a subject as to which no larceny or felony was capable of being committed. Fawsett v. Clark, 48 Md. 494, 502, 30 Am. Rep. 481.

Eyre, O. J., in Saville v. Jardine, 2 H. Bl. 531, in holding that charging plaintiff with being a swindler was not slanderous, said: "Thief" always implies felony, but 'cheat' not always." Chase v. Whitlock (N. Y.) 3 Hill, 139, 140.

The term "thieves," as used in a marine policy insuring against thieves, etc., "is not intended as a mere translation of the word 'pillage,' used in the ordinance of Louis IX and the present Commercial Codes of France and other continental powers, and hence it is not confined to assaulting thieves, or those who assault and rob the ship by violence from without, but includes persons on ship-board as passengers who commit larceny without the fault of the assured." American Ins. Co. v. Bryan (N. Y.) 28 Wend. 563, 573, 37 Am. Dec. 278; Id., 1 Hill, 25, 23.

THIEVING.

The adjective "thieving" imports an act committed, and not merely an inclination to commit it; and to charge one with being a thieving person is to charge him with being guilty of stealing. Allen v. Neely (Ind.) 5 Blackf. 200, 201; Reynolds v. Ross, 42 Ind. 387.

The words "He gets his living by thieving," are actionable per se. Rutherford v. Moore (U. S.) 21 Fed. Cas. 95.

The term "thieving puppy", or "thieving wretch," imports a felony, and would be so understood by any one of ordinary understanding; and therefore a charge that another is a thieving puppy is actionable. Little v. Barlow, 26 Ga. 423, 425, 71 Am. Dec. 219.

THIN.

"Thin" is defined as slender, slight, or filmy; so that an instruction that "I think it is a very thin case" expresses an opinion as to the merits of the case detrimental to the plaintiff, and is erroneous. Stieling v. Clark, 41 N. Y. Supp. 982, 985, 18 Misc. Rep. 464.

THING.

See "Incorporeal Thing."
Other thing, see "Other."

The word "thing" is of extensive signification, and in common parlance may intend all matters of substance, in contradistinction to person; but in a deed in which the grantor grants, assigns, bargains, and sells all goods, chattels, debts, moneys, and all other things whatsoever, as well real or personal, without any description or allusion to any particular tract of land, does not pass real estate. Ingell v. Nooney, 19 Mass. (2 Pick.) 362, 367, 13 Am. Dec. 434.

The civil law of Spain, after dividing things into those of divine right and those of human right, subdivides the former into things sacred and religious, and the latter (or human) things, into things common, things public, things of a corporation or a university, and things private. Things are also divided into those which are corporeal and those which are incorporeal. Sullivan v. Richardson, 14 South. 692, 703, 33 Fla. 1.

THING ADJUDGED.

"Thing adjudged" is said of that which has been decided by a final judgment, from which there can be no appeal, either because the appeal did not lie, or because the time fixed by law for appealing has elapsed, or because it has been confirmed on the appeal. Civ. Code La. 1900, art. 3556, subd. 31; New Orleans Nat. Bank Ass'n v. Adams (U. S.) 18 Fed. Cas. 118, 120.

See, also, "Anything of Value"; "Valuable Thing."
Other thing of value, see "Other."

The term "thing of value," in 2 Hill's Pen. Code, § 234, providing for the punishment of any person who shall by false pretense obtain from any person anything of value, includes a lady's beaver shoulder cape. State v. Reiff, 45 Pac. 318, 14 Wash. 664.

Cat.

A cat, which is kept as a household pet, may properly be considered a thing of value. It ministers to the pleasure of its owner and serves obviatæ solatium. Ford v. Glennon, 49 Atl. 189, 74 Conn. 6.

Check or note.

A check represents a certain sum of money, which the drawer of the check intends that the payee shall in fact have. While not money, a check is a thing of value, and therefore the subject of conversion. Pawson v. Miller, 72 N. Y. Supp. 1011, 1012, 66 App. Div. 12.

The release of a claim, on the settlement and payment thereof by notes, is not a "thing of value," within Pub. St. c. 157, § 93, providing that a discharge will not be granted a debtor if, within six months before the filing of the petition in insolvency, he has obtained on credit anything of value with intent not to pay for it, since such release did not constitute an asset in the debtor's estate. Clarke v. Stanwood, 44 N. E. 537, 539, 166 Mass. 379, 34 L. R. A. 378.

Chips.

Checks, or chips, which represent certain sums, which chips, when presented, are redeemed by the dealer of cards at the price they represent, are "things of value," within the statute making it gaming to play for money or other thing of value. They are representatives of value. The bet is really for money, and the check is merely to aid in keeping the account, as well as for convenience. Porter v. State, 51 Ga. 300, 301.

THING PATENTED.

"Thing patented," as used in Act July 4, 1836, § 18, giving a certain use to the owner of the thing patented, includes patent for a process, a machine, or a manufacture, and is not confined exclusively to machines. Day v. Union India Rubber Co. (U. S.) 7 Fed. Cas. 271, 276.

THINGS COMMON.

"Things common," within the classification of the Spanish civil law, included "those things which belong to birds, beasts, and all living creatures, as being able to make use of them, as well as to man. Such were the air, the water from heaven, the sea, and its shore. Any one might navigate on the sea and on its shore, where also he might build a cottage or a house for shelter." Sullivan v. Richardson, 14 South. 692, 708, 33 Fla. 1.

Domat defines "things common to all" to be "the heavens, the stars, the light, the air, and the sea." Morgan v. Negodish, 3 South. 636, 637, 40 La. Ann. 246 (quoting 1 Dom. Civ. Law, § 1, art. 1, par. 115).

The "things common to mankind by the law of nature" are said by Justinian to be "the air, running water, the sea, and consequently the shores of the sea." Morgan v. Negodish, 3 South. 636, 637, 40 La. Ann. 246 (quoting Lib. 2, tit. 1, par. 1).

THINGS OF A CORPORATION.

"Things belonging to a corporation," within the classification of the Spanish civil law, "were those things belonging exclusively to the inhabitants of any city, town, or castle, or any other place where men reside; and of those things some might be used by any inhabitant of that city, town, or place, and others were for the particular use of the corporation, it being its duty to apply the fruits, produce, or rents to the common benefit of the city or town. Fountains or springs, places for holding markets and fairs, and places for the meetings of the corporation, sandy beaches or grounds on the banks of rivers, and commons or pasture ground, belonged to the former class, and were for the use of any inhabitant; and flocks, fields, and vineyards, also plantations and lands producing fruit and rent, were of the latter class." Sullivan v. Richardson, 14 South. 692, 708, 33 Fla. 1.

THINGS PERSONAL.

"Things personal" are said to "not only include things movable, but also something more, the whole of which is comprehended under the general name of 'chattels.'" People v. Holbrook, 13 Johns. 90, 94 (quoting 2 Bl. Comm. 385).

"Things personal" are defined by Blackstone as things movable, or which may be carried about with and attendant on a man's person. United States v. Moulton (U. S.) 27 Fed. Cas. 11, 12 (citing 2 Bl. Comm. c. 24).

"Things personal" are goods, money, and all other movables, which may tend the owner's person wherever he thinks proper to go. People v. City of Brooklyn (N. Y.) 9 Barb. 536, 546.

THINGS PRIVATE.

"Things private," in the classification of the Spanish civil law, were those which belonged in particular to every individual, and of which he might acquire or lose dominion. Sullivan v. Richardson, 14 South. 692, 708, 33 Fla. 1.

THINGS PUBLIC.

"Things public," according to the classification of the Spanish civil law, were those which belonged only to mankind. Rivers, ports, harbors, and high roads were among things public. Not only might the inhabitants of a place make use of things public, but also strangers could do so. No new mill or any other thing could be built on any part of the river by which its navigation might be impeded, and old buildings, obstructing the common use of things public, might be destroyed or pulled down; neither could any building or thing be erected by which the common use of high roads, squares, or market places, threshing grounds for corn, churches, etc., would be obstructed. Sullivan v. Richardson, 14 South. 692, 708, 33 Fla. 1.

"Things public" are those the property of which is vested in the whole nation, and the use of which is allowed to all the members of the nation. Of this kind are navigable rivers, seaports, roadsteads and harbors, highways, and the beds of rivers as long as the same are covered with water. Civ. Code La. 1900, art. 453.

THINGS REAL.

"Things real" are such things as are permanent, fixed, and immovable, and which cannot be carried out of place, as lands and tenements. People v. City of Brooklyn (N. Y.) 9 Barb. 530, 546 (citing 2 Bl. Comm. 2, 18).

"Things real" are defined by Blackstone as lands, tenements, and hereditaments, taking hereditaments as comprising every species of things real or which may be inheritable, which consists, first, of corporeal hereditaments, as lands and tenements, and, second, of incorporeal hereditaments, as advowsons, rents, offices, etc. Bates v. Sparrell, 10 Mass. 323, 324.

THINK.

"Think," means believe, consider, or esteem. As used by a jury in a finding of fact, it sufficiently expresses the finding. Martin v. Central Iowa Ry. Co., 13 N. W. 424, 425, 59 Iowa, 511.

"We think not," as used by jurors in answering questions in a special verdict submitted to them, is equivalent to "No." Missouri Pac. Ry. Co. v. Reynolds, 1 Pac. 150, 153, 31 Kan. 132.

As believe.

The word "think" is defined to mean "consider" or "believe," and as used in an instruction, authorizing the jury to find any fact to be proved "which they think may be rightfully and reasonably inferred from the evidence," restricts the inferences to be drawn by the jury to such as may be rightfully inferred from the evidence; that is, to such inferences as the jury, in view of the evidence, consider or believe rightfully and reasonably arise from the evidence. North Chicago St. R. Co. v. Rodert, 67 N. E. 812, 813, 203 Ill. 413.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 376, describing what shall be causes for challenges to jurors, and providing that the previous expression or formation of an opinion as to the guilt or innocence of defendant is not ground of challenge for actual bias to a person otherwise legally qualified, if he declares on oath that he believes such opinion will not influence his verdict, it is sufficient for a juror to swear that he thinks such opinion will not influence his verdict, inasmuch as the words "believes" and "thinks" are substantially equivalent. People v. Martell, 33 N. E. 838, 840, 138 N. Y. 595.

As expression of opinion.

The employment of the word "think" by a witness, in answering a question calling for his knowledge of certain facts that he thinks so and so, is not sufficient in itself to show that the witness is merely stating his opinion, instead of stating facts. Voisin v. Commercial Mut. Ins. Co., 70 N. Y. Supp. 147, 154, 60 App. Div. 139.

As recollect or remember.

"Think," as used in the testimony of a witness testifying from recollection, in which he said, "I think," etc., means, according to Webster, "to recollect or call to mind," and does not make such testimony illegal. Humphries v. Parker, 52 Me. 502, 504.

"Think" as used in the testimony of a witness that he thought certain occurrences took place, is to be taken as a statement of what the witness remembered. Galveston, H. & S. A. Ry. Co. v. Parrish (Tex.) 43 S. W. 536.

THINK BEST.

A trust deed authorized the trustee to sell the premises "entire, without division, or in parcels, as he may think best." Held, that such provision did not give to the trustee the right to sell the premises according to his arbitrary discretion, without regard to the benefits to be derived on the sale in another manner than that chosen, since the power given by its very terms implied that the trustee assumed the duty of thinking on the subject, and was obligated to adopt that course which he should think would be best to secure a good price. The clause does not mean that the trustee may do as he pleases, or that he may do that which would be most convenient for him; and hence such clause did not deprive the owner from insisting that it was the duty of the trustee to offer the property in parcels, and when it is shown that a sale in parcels would have been more advantageous, and that the trustee was requested to so offer the property, a sale en masse would be set aside. Cassidy v. Cooke, 99 Ill. 385, 388.

THINK FIT.

A "power to appoint a fund in such portions as a party shall think fit" implies that he may apportion it out in such manner as he pleases. "Consequently he may give one interest for life in a particular share to one child, or limit the capital of the same share to another, or even go so far as to limit to a third child on a contingency, provided he doles out the whole in this various way among all the children only. The power does not require that he should distribute it in gross sums, and give each child an absolute interest in that gross sum; for such a power enables the gift of particular interests, and the appointment of such interests, and a general power to apportion lands receives the same construction. Therefore life estates or rent charges may in like manner, be given to any of the children." Beardsley v. Hutchkiss, 96 N. Y. 201, 219 (citing 2 Sugd. Powers, p. 294).

THINK PROPER.

A bequest in a will, by which testator bequeathed all his funds to his wife for life, for the benefit of herself and children, "to be used as she may think proper," means only such a use as is consistent with the life estate given; and an investment thereof in land by the husband gives the wife only a life estate therein, with the remainder to the testator's heirs in fee, free from her debts. Johns v. Johns, 10 S. E. 2, 3, 86 Va. 333.

"Think proper," as used in a will in which testator directed his executors to sell his real estate "in such manner as they may think proper," are entirely without force or efficacy, since, had the phrase been omitted, the executors would have been bound to exercise the same discretion. Drummond v. Jones, 13 Atl. 611, 612, 44 N. J. Eq. (17 Stew.) 53.

"Think proper," as used in a devise in trust to sell in such manner and at such time as the trustees shall think proper, did not render the period of the conversion of the property from realty into personalty dependent on an arbitrary discretion, or even a sound discretion, vested in the trustees in each case; but the trustees were required to sell within a reasonable time according to all the circumstances of the case. Walker v. Shore, 19 Ves. 386.

A bond for the plaintiff's maintenance, which required the obligor to furnish to the obligee money necessary for him to spend

"whenever he thinks proper" to visit his friends, means that whenever, in the honest and fair exercise of his judgment, the obligee thought proper to make such visits, the obligor was bound to furnish money, but not if exercised wantonly or capriciously. Berry v. Harris, 43 N. H. 376, 377.

THIRDS.

The word "thirds," as used in a devise and bequest of all testator's estate, both real and personal, subject to the dower and thirds of his wife, obviously meant the same thing as dower. O'Hara v. Dever (N. Y.) 46 Barb. 609, 614, 2 Abb. Prac. (N. S.) 418, 423, 41 N. Y. (2 Keyes) 558, 561; O'Hara v. Dever (N. Y.) 8 Abb. Dec. 407, 409.

"Thirds," as used in a devise of the residue of a testator's estate, real and personal, after his wife shall have taken her thirds, should be construed to mean the one-third of the personalty to which she was entitled by statute, together with her dower interest in the testator's realty. Yeomans v. Stevens, 84 Mass. (2 Allen) 349, 350; Horsey v. Horsey's Ex'rs (Del.) 1 Houst. 438, 440.

THIRD OPPOSITION.

Under the Code of Practice of Louisiana, when property not liable is seized on execution, the remedy of the owner is by an intervention called a "third opposition," on which, by giving security, an injunction or prohibition may be granted to stop the sale. A third opposition is a legal remedy, and reviewable by writ of error. City of New Orleans v. Louisiana Const. Co., 9 Sup. Ct. 223, 129 U. S. 45, 32 L. Ed. 607.

THIRD PERSON.

The words "third person" include all who are not parties to the obligation or transaction concerning which the phrase is used. Rev. St. Okl. 1903, § 2796; Code Civ. Proc. Mont. 1895, § 3463; Civ. Code Mont. 1895, § 4663; Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 5123; Civ. Code S. D. 1903, § 2457.

In respect to a contract or judgment, third persons are all who are not parties to it. In case of failure, third persons are, particularly, those creditors of the debtor who contracted with him without knowledge of the rights which he had transferred to another. Civ. Code La. 1900, art. 3556, subd. 32.

The term "third persons," as used in Hill's Code, § 292, providing that, where a portion of the land to be sold under execution is claimed by third persons, such portion shall on his request be sold separately, evidently means one who was not a party to the judgment or decree, but who has acquired a title to a portion of the judgment debtor's real property subsequent to the rendition of the judgment or decree, and is privy to and bound by it, but, having obtained his title subsequent to the lien of the judgment, is entitled, upon request, to have that portion of the debtor's estate claimed by him sold separately, in order that he may redeem it from the sale. Balfour v. Burnett, 41 Pac. 1, 2, 28 Or. 72.

Prior mortgagees of property of the purchaser, whose mortgage was also to attach to after-acquired property, are not "third persons," within the statute providing that conditional sales may be valid as between the parties, but are made with the risk on the part of the vendor of losing his lien, if it works a legal wrong to any third person. Fosdick v. Schall, 99 U. S. 235, 251, 25 L. Ed. 339.

The term "third persons," in Act Cong. March 3, 1851, "to ascertain and settle the private land claims" in California, and declaring "that for all claims finally confirmed by the said commissioners," etc., a patent shall issue to the claimant, but that such patent shall be conclusive between the United States and the said claimants only, and "shall not affect the interests of third persons," does not embrace all persons other than the United States and the claimants, but only those who hold superior titles, such as will enable them to resist successfully any action of the government in disposing of the property. Colorado Fuel Co. v. Maxwell Land Grant Co., 22 Colo. 71, 72, 43 Pac. 556, 557 (citing Beard v. Federy, 70 U. S. [3 Wall.] 473, 18 L. Ed. 88).

THIRD POSSESSOR.

A "third possessor" is one who buys the mortgaged property without assuming to pay the mortgage. If one buys real estate by notarial or other act, and does not assume the payment of the first mortgage, he is bound only as a third possessor. He must either give up the property or pay the amount for which it was mortgaged. He is limited to the one or the other alternative. Thompson v. Levy, 23 South. 913, 50 La. Ann. 751.

THIRDED.

A direction by testator that his widow, in case of a second marriage, shall be "thirded," means that she should have a third in the estate allotted, to which she would have been entitled by law, had there been no will, or had she elected to renounce the provisions which it offered her. Baker v. Red, 34 Ky. (4 Dana) 158, 162.

THIRTY DAYS.

Where a document was to be filed within "thirty days" after the adjournment of court, and the last day fell on Sunday, the filing on the next day, Monday, will be construed to be a filing within the time prescribed. Page v. Blackshear, 75 Ga. 885, 886.

Where thirty days' notice of a sale is required to be published previous to the day of the sale, the rule is to exclude the day of publication and include the day of sale. Magnusson v. Williams, 111 Ill. 450, 455.

"Thirty days," as used in the statute requiring appeal to be taken within thirty days, is complied with by an appeal taken April 14th from a judgment rendered March 15th. Faure v. United States Exp. Co., 23 Ind. 48.

Loc. Code Md. art. 4, § 874, requiring thirty days' notice of sale in a certain proceeding to be published twice a week, etc., for a sale which shall be held after the expiration of thirty days' notice, is not complied with where the notice of a sale was published March 15th, and the sale took place on the 14th of April following, the words "thirty days' notice" meaning that both the day of giving the notice and making its first publication and the day of sale should be excluded from the computation. Steuart v. Meyer, 54 Md. 454, 463.

Where notice of a sale under a trust deed was given by publication in a daily newspaper, the first insertion being on September 22d and the last insertion on October 22d of the same year, and the sale took place on October 23d, there was "thirty days' public notice" of the time, terms, and place of the sale by advertisement in a daily paper, as required by the trust deed. German Bank v. Stumpf, 6 Mo. App. 17, 18.

As consecutive days.

Rev. St. § 1175, providing that in no case shall a tax deed be issued upon a tax certificate upon land not occupied or possessed for the period of "thirty days" or more, at any time within the six months immediately preceding the time when the tax deed upon such sale shall be applied for, means thirty consecutive days. Howe v. Genin, 15 N. W. 161, 57 Wis. 268.

As equivalent to month.

"Thirty days," as used in Acts 1872-73, c. 115, § 15, providing that all persons who willfully fail to pay their poll tax shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and liable to imprisonment for not more than thirty days, should not be construed as synonymous with "month," since the word "month" in this state means calendar month, and may be less or more than thirty days. State v. Upchurch, 72 N. C. 140, 143.

THIS.

When "this" and "that" refer to different things, before expressed "this" refers to the thing last mentioned, and "that" to the thing first mentioned. Russell v. Kennedy, 66 Pa. (16 P. F. Smith) 248, 251 (citing Webst. Dict.).

"This," as used in Act S. C. March 4, 1878 (16 St. at Large, p. 411), requiring that every lien shall be filed in the office of the register of mesne conveyances for the county in which the lienor resides, and he shall keep an index for all such liens so filed, and this shall be a sufficient record of the same, refers to the new mode of filing directed by this statute, and not merely to one of the incidents of the new mode, viz., the indexing, but to both the filing and the indexing. Sternberger v. McSween, 14 S. C. 35, 43.

THIS ACT.

In Sess. Laws 1855, c. 231, declaring that all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with this act are hereby repealed, the phrase "this act" should be construed only to include the portion of the act containing such repealing clause, which is not in conflict with the Constitution. People v. Tiphaine, 3 Parker, Cr. R. 241, 244.

THIS CASE.

See "Trial of This Case."

THIS DAY.

"This day," as used in a guaranty stating that, in consideration of "your having this day advanced to our client a certain sum," the guarantors undertake to pay the same, "may mean something which has been done or which is to be done this day," and hence parol evidence is admissible to explain its meaning. Goldshede v. Swan, 1 Exch. 154, 160.

Where the evidence showing the existence of a parol express trust consists in part of an agreement subsequently made recognizing the trust, the fact that such agreement uses the words, "We have this day entered into this agreement," does not show that the trust was not established at the date of the deed carrying the trust; the expression "this day" having reference merely to the time the writing was entered into. Renshaw v. First Nat. Bank (Tenn.) 63 S. W. 194, 205.

THIS IS TO CERTIFY.

"This is to certify," as used in the commencement of a deed, is equivalent to "All those to whom these presents shall come." Evans v. Gifford, 1 N. J. Law (Coxe) 197-199.

The words "This is to certify," although not in the form usual to deeds, are not essentially different from the more usual "This indenture witnesseth," and the words "I have given" are sufficient in Georgia as words of conveyance of land. Brice v. Sheffield, 44 S. E. 843, 844, 118 Ga. 128.

THIS SECTION.

Rev. St. U. S. § 3894 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 2659], providing that no letter or circular concerning lotteries shall be carried in the mail, and that any person who shall knowingly deposit or send anything to be conveyed by mail "in violation of this section" shall be punishable, etc., means in violation of the general and sole prohibition on which it all rests—that is, that it shall not be carried in the mail; and no sending can conflict with this inhibition which is not effected in the mail. United States v. Dauphin (U. S.) 20 Fed. 625, 630.

THOROUGHbred.

No warranty will be implied from the statement of the seller of horses that the animals were thoroughbred, this being simply a descriptive term. Burnett v. Hensley, 92 N. W. 678, 679, 118 Iowa, 575.

The term "thoroughbred" was defined by a witness in an action involving thoroughbred cattle to mean an animal whose ancestry on both sides is perfect in blood and duly recorded in the American Herd Book. Hamilton v. Wabash, St. L. & P. Ry. Co., 21 Mo. App. 152, 158.

THOROUGHFARE.

See "Public Thoroughfare."

A "thoroughfare," Mr. Webster says, is "a passage through; a passage from one street or opening to another." Wiggins v. Tallmadge, 11 Barb. 457, 462.

The term "thoroughfare," in its ordinary sense, cannot be applied to a road that has no outlet at one end thereof. Cemetery Ass'n v. Meninger, 14 Kan. 312, 315.

A "thoroughfare" is defined as a passage through, or a street or way open at both ends and free from any obstruction; so that a finding that a cul-de-sac was no thoroughfare was not inconsistent with a finding that it was used and occupied as a street by the public and adjoining property holders so much and so far as the necessity of the public and their convenience required. City of Mankato v. Warren, 20 Minn. 144, 150 (Gil. 128, 133).

"Thoroughfare" is the name applied to a narrow, tortuous, tidal stream, traversing a salt marsh, separating an island on the seacoast from the mainland. Freeman v. Sea View Hotel Co., 40 Atl. 218, 220, 57 N. J. Eq. 68.

THOROUGHLY DRIED.

St. 1830, c. 99, § 6, declares that if any side or sides of sole leather shall weigh, when "thoroughly dried," 5 per cent. more or less than the weight marked thereon by an inspector, the inspector who inspected the same shall be subject to the payment of the whole variation at a fair valuation, to be recovered by the party injured thereby. Held, that the words "thoroughly dried," as there used, meant that the leather was suitably and sufficiently dried so as to be in a proper state for sale and use. Tenney v. How, 41 Mass. (24 Pick.) 335.

THOROUGHLY SATISFIED.

The court, in an instruction in an action for damages stating that the jury must be "thoroughly satisfied" that the accident did not occur in consequence of the carelessness of the plaintiff, meant that the jury must not only believe that the weight of evidence on the subject of contributory negligence was in plaintiff's favor, but that their belief must be so strong as to exclude every reasonable doubt of plaintiff's carelessness contributing to the injury. Bradwell v. Pittsburgh & W. E. P. R. Co., 20 Atl. 1046, 1047, 139 Pa. 404.

THOS.

The abbreviation "Thos.," on the back of an indictment indorsed "Thos. M. Boston," is not a variance from his name in the body of the bill, where it is written as "Thomas M. Boston." Studstill v. State, 7 Ga. 2, 16.

THOUGH.

See "Even Though."

THOUSAND.

In a contract for the purchase of shingles, where it has been the custom in prior contracts between the parties to reckon a thousand shingles by measurement, instead of by actual count, such custom is binding upon the parties, and the number of shingles will be ascertained by measurement. Bragg v. Bletz, 7 D. C. 105, 110.

The term "thousand brick," within the meaning of a contract for the delivery of brick at so much per thousand, must be taken in its ordinary sense, in the absence of evidence of custom showing a particular meaning; but evidence is admissible that the term by custom means so many brick, to be ascertained, not by actual count, but by the measurement of the walls in which the bricks are laid. Lowe v. Lehman, 15 Ohio St. 179, 182.

As twelve hundred.

"Thousand," as used in a lease of a rabbit warren, providing that at the expiration of the term the lessee would leave 10,000 rabbits on the warren, the lessor paying for them £60 per thousand, means 1,200. Smith v. Wilson, 3 Barn. & Adol. 728.

The expression "a thousand a year," as used in contracts, has been held to mean $1,200. McCulsky v. Klosterman, 25 Pac. 366, 370, 20 Or. 108, 10 L. R. A. 785 (citing Lawson, Usages & Cust. 368).

Under certain conditions, parol evidence is admissible of a custom showing that the term "a thousand" means 1,200. Coquard v. Bank of Kansas City, 12 Mo. App. 261, 265.

THREAD.

A small line or twist of any fibrous or filamentous substance, as flax, silk, cotton, or wool, particularly such as is used for weaving or for sewing; a filament; a small string. Luckemeyer v. Magone (U. S.) 38 Fed. 30, 34.

THREAD LACE.

"Thread lace" is that manufactured upon a cushion from thread wound on bobbins moved by hand, and it is equally thread lace whether made of cotton or silk, and whether white or black. Arthur v. Lahey, 96 U. S. 112, 114, 24 L. Ed. 766.

Thread laces, made wholly by machinery and composed of linen and cotton thread, first introduced into this country subsequent to the tariff act of July 30, 1846, which were invoiced and always known to the trade under the denomination of "thread laces," were within the description of "thread lace" in schedule E, and not within the enumeration of schedule D, of manufactures composed wholly of cotton not otherwise provided for. Lottimer v. Lawrence (U. S.) 15 Fed. Cas. 928, 929.

THREAD OF A STREAM.

The thread of a stream is the middle line of a channel; that is, of the hollow bed of running water, when the water is at its ordinary stages. Dayton v. Cooper Hydraulic Co., 10 Ohio S. & C. P. Dec. 192, 205.

The thread of a stream is the line midway between the banks at the ordinary stage of water, without regard to the channel, or the lowest and deepest part of the stream. State v. Burton, 31 South. 291, 292, 106 La. 732.

The phrases "the middle of the river" and "the middle of the main channel," when applied to rivers as boundaries between states, mean the center line of the main channel, or, as it is most frequently expressed, the "thread of the stream." Buttenuh v. St. Louis Bridge Co., 17 N. E. 439, 443, 123 Ill. 535, 5 Am. St. Rep. 545.

THREAT.

A threat in criminal law is a menace or declaration of one's purpose or intention to work injury to the person, property, or rights of another. State v. Cushing, 50 Pac. 512, 515, 17 Wash. 544.

A threat "is any menace of such a nature and extent as to unsettle the mind of the person on whom it operates, and to take away from his acts that free, voluntary action which alone constitutes consent." And. Law Dict. "To hold up as a terror the expectation of evil, or to alarm with the promise of evil." Webster. A "threat," whether it be verbal, written, or printed, to be within Code 1873, § 3871, prescribing a punishment for the extortion of money by threats, need not be made personally to the one threatened. In order to be a "threat," it must be so made and under such circumstances as to operate at least on the mind of the one whom it is expected to influence. The meaning of the word implies that it is a menace of some kind, which in some manner comes to the knowledge of the one sought to be affected thereby. State v. Brownlee, 51 N. W. 25, 27, 84 Iowa, 473.

A "threat" of accusation, within the meaning of Gen. St. c. 160, § 28, making it criminal to extort money by threat, etc., comprehends a threat to use any of the preliminary means necessary to cause a person to be proceeded against for a criminal offense. A false statement that the warrant is issued to arrest a person for crime, which will be served unless money is paid to stay the process, is a threat to accuse a person of crime. Commonwealth v. Murphy, 94 Mass. (12 Allen) 449, 451.

When threats are charged to have been the means by which a rape was effected, the jury should be instructed that the threats must be such as might reasonably create a just fear of death or great bodily harm, in view of the relative conditions of the parties as to health, strength, and all other circumstances of the case. Jones v. State, 10 Tex. App. 552, 559.

In an action to recover damages sustained by a conspiracy between defendants to damage plaintiff and deprive him of his source of business and his customers, no threats are shown in the legal sense where defendants stated that, if other dealers in certain goods continued to sell to plaintiff, the members of defendant association would not buy from them. It does not interfere with the dealer's free choice. It may have prompted him to a somewhat sordid calculation. He may have considered which custom is most profitable and have acted accordingly; but it was not a threat, constituting unlawful combination. Cote v. Murphy, 28 Atl. 190, 194, 159 Pa. 420, 23 L. R. A. 135, 39 Am. St. Rep. 686.

A declaration that a person by means of "threats" drove the customers of another from him and succeeded in breaking up his business means a declaration of an intention or determination to injure another by the commission of some unlawful act. If the act intended to be done is not unlawful, the declaration is not a "threat" in law. Payne v. Western & A. R. Co., 81 Tenn. (13 Lea) 507, 514, 49 Am. Rep. 666.

Actions or signs.

"Threat" does not necessarily require that violent language be employed, but a threat may be communicated by signs or actions as fully as by word of mouth. Armstrong v. Vicksburg, S. & P. R. Co., 16 South. 468, 474, 46 La. Ann. 1448.

Persuasion.

"Threats," as used in Code, § 2508, requiring the certificate of a wife's acknowledgment to a deed of her husband's homestead to state that her acknowledgment was not made under threats of her husband, means more than is indicated by the word "persuasion," and such a certificate, in which the word "persuasion" is substituted for the word "threats," is not a substantial compliance with the statute. Daniels v. Lowery, 8 South. 352, 353, 92 Ala. 519.

Simple request.

Where striking employes had been enjoined from interfering with other employes by the use of threats or intimidations, a simple request to do or not to do a thing, made by one or more of a body of strikers under circumstances calculated to convey a threatening intimidation, with a design to hinder or obstruct employes in the performance of their duties, is a direct threat and intimidation, and will be punished as such. Ex parte Richards (U. S.) 117 Fed. 658, 666 (citing In re Doolittle [U. S.] 23 Fed. 545; United States v. Kane, Id. 748, 750, 751; In re Wabash R. Co. [U. S.] 24 Fed. 217).

Vulgar and abusive epithets.

Mere vulgar and abusive epithets do not constitute "threats," such as to furnish adequate cause to reduce the killing to the grade of manslaughter. Levy v. State, 12 S. W. 596, 597, 28 Tex. App. 203, 19 Am. St. Rep. 826.

THREAT TO INJURE PROPERTY.

A threat to injure a person's business by inducing his employes, who are on a strike, to persist in their refusal to work for him, is not a "threat to do an injury to property" of such person. People v. Barondessa, 16 N. Y. Supp. 436, 437, 61 Hun, 571.

THREATEN AND ACCUSE.

In an indictment charging a conspiracy entered into by defendants to maliciously "threaten and accuse" one B. of the crime of adultery, with the intent unjustly and fraudulently to extort money, the words quoted were used in the same sense as the words "charge and accuse" in a prior allegation in the indictment, alleging the conspiracy, and mean an imputation of such offenses against the prosecutor as a means of inducing him to pay money to avoid prosecution. Commonwealth v. O'Brien, 66 Mass. (12 Cush.) 84, 90.

THREATENED TO KILL.

The phrase "threatened to kill," as used in an indictment charging that defendant "threatened to kill," etc., is equivalent to "threatening to take life," prohibited by Pasch. Dig. arts. 6585, 6586. Bule v. State, 1 Tex. App. 58, 60.

THREATENED TO MURDER.

The phrase "threatened to murder," as used in an indictment charging that defendant "threatened to murder," etc., is equivalent to "threatening to take life," prohibited by Pasch. Dig. arts. 6585, 6586. Bule v. State, 1 Tex. App. 58, 60.

THREATENED WITH ATTACK.

"Being threatened with an attack as a defense to a prosecution for carrying concealed weapons implies only that a threat must have been made and stand uncanceled by after-reconciliation or other evidence of abandonment." Polk v. State, 62 Ala. 237, 239.

THREATENING.

Threatening supposes some danger in prospect, but more remote than imminent or impending. Eckhardt v. City of Buffalo, 46 N. Y. Supp. 204, 211, 19 App. Div. 1.

THREATENING CHARACTER.

"Threatening character," as used in Act Sept. 26, 1888, relating to the depositing of postal cards containing allegations of a "threatening character," do not include a postal card containing an allegation, "You have promised and do not perform," and "I see very plainly you do not intend to pay any attention to my letters or your agreements." United States v. Simmons (U. S.) 61 Fed. 640.

THREATENING LETTERS.

"Threatening letters," within the meaning of the statute making it criminal to send threatening letters with a view of extorting money, was intended to embrace only cases where the intent is to obtain that which in justice and equity the writer of the letter is not entitled to receive. It does not extend to cases where the person threatened actually owes the writer of the letter the sum claimed by him. To support an indictment under that statute, the end, as well as the means employed to obtain it, must be wrongful and unlawful. People v. Griffin, 2 Barb. 427, 429.

THREE.

Three days.

A statute requiring three days' notice of an act proposed to be done is sufficiently complied with by a performance of the act on the third day. Ducheneau v. House, 10 Pac. 427, 428, 4 Utah, 363 (citing Misch v. Mayhew, 51 Cal. 514, 515).

Justices' Code, § 12, declaring that a summons must be served at least "three days before the time of appearance," does not mean that three full days shall transpire between the day of service and the day of appearance, but should be construed, according to the ordinary rule for the computation of time, so as to exclude the first day and include the last. Schultz v. American Clock Co., 18 Pac. 221, 222, 39 Kan. 334.

How. St. § 8028, providing that a citation to show cause why an attachment should not be dissolved "shall be served within three days at least before the return day thereof," means three days, exclusive of Sunday, which is not to be included in the computation. Caupfield v. Cook, 52 N. W. 1031, 92 Mich. 628.

Three months.

Where a verdict was returned on the 12th of October, and a petition filed for certiorari on the 12th of January following, the petition was not filed within "three months," as required by statute. Western & A. R. R. v. Carson, 70 Ga. 388, 389.

Three weeks.

An order of court providing that notice of the time and place of the meeting of certain commissioners should be given "three weeks before the time of the meeting" has no reference to the number of insertions in the paper, but was intended to give all persons interested a definite period to prepare for the meeting, and means that three full weeks' notice should be given, and hence three successive insertions, made within less than three weeks, did not constitute a compliance with the order. In re North Whitehall Tp., 47 Pa. (11 Wright) 156, 160.

Three consecutive weeks.

Where an ordinance is required to be published for three consecutive weeks in some newspaper, the words "three consecutive weeks" should be construed to mean that the publication required is one for 21 days, and not simple insertions, one in each week, in such newspaper. Loughridge v. City of Huntington, 56 Ind. 253, 259.

Three successive weeks.

Where a power of sale in a mortgage required a notice to be published "once each week for three successive weeks," the language did not mean that the first publication should be made three weeks before the time appointed for the sale. Dexter v. Shepard, 117 Mass. 480, 484.

Act June 16, 1836, directing a sheriff to advertise a sale once a week during "three successive weeks," means calendar weeks or specified periods of time, and an advertisement in three successive periods of the kind, although the advertisements may not have been all on the same day of the week, and there may not have been 21 full days between the first and the date of the sale. McKee v. Kerr, 43 Atl. 953, 954, 192 Pa. 164; Hollister v. Vanderlin, 30 Atl. 1002, 1003, 165 Pa. 248, 44 Am. St. Rep. 657.

Three weeks successively.

In construing a statute providing that, in case of an administrator's sale of real estate, notice shall be published in a newspaper for "three weeks successively" next before such sale, as applied to a case where a notice was published in a daily paper one day in each week for three weeks, the court said: "If the publication had been made in a weekly paper on regular publication days, separated by intervals of a week, there can be no question that it would have satisfied the statute. The single publication on the regular publication day would be a publication for a week. It follows that, to constitute a good publication for a given number of weeks, a daily publication is not essential. Publications on regular publication days at the rate of one a week, if separated by intervals of a week, are sufficient. We can perceive no reason why this rule is not as applicable to a publication in a daily as to one in a weekly publication." Dayton v. Mintzer, 22 Minn. 393, 395.

A statutory requirement that a notice of a hearing be published "three weeks successively" before the hearing is satisfied, in the case of a hearing on the 30th day of a month, by a publication in a weekly newspaper, in issues thereof dated the 15th, 22d, and 29th days of said month. It is not necessary that a full week shall intervene between the last publication and the time of hearing. Swett v. Sprague, 55 Me. 190, 192.

2 Rev. St. 1876, § 467, requiring the publication for three weeks successively of a sheriff's sale of real estate, is complied with by a publication for 21 days, excluding either the date of the first publication or the day of sale. Meredith v. Chancey, 59 Ind. 466, 467.

An order to give notice by publishing in a newspaper "three weeks successively" is complied with by publishing in such paper in three successive weeks, although there be not an interval of a week between either the first and second or the second and third publications. Bachelor v. Bachelor, 1 Mass. 256.

Comp. St. c. 23, § 140, requiring that notice of the probate of a will shall be made by publication "three weeks successively," means a publication once each week for three successive weeks, three weekly publications, and the last publication need not necessarily be 21 days from the date of the first publication. Alexander v. Alexander, 41 N. W. 1065, 1067, 26 Neb. 68.

"Three weeks successively," as used in Code Civ. Proc. § 1547, directing a notice of sale of the property of a decedent to be published in a newspaper for "three weeks successively," and under section 1705, providing that, when any publication is ordered, the judge or court may order a publication for a less number of times than each issue of the paper, embraces a notice published in a daily newspaper once a week for three successive weeks. In re Cunningham's Estate, 15 Pac. 136, 73 Cal. 558.

Three years successively.

"Three years successively," in St. 1793, c. 34, giving a settlement to persons having a freehold of the clear yearly income of £3 and taking the rents and profits thereof three years successively, is to be understood to mean each and every one of the three years, and a statute therefore requires an income with such a value during each of the years. Inhabitants of Western v. Inhabitants of Leicester, 20 Mass. (3 Pick.) 198.

THREE STORY.

The phrase "three story building," as used in a fire policy, was applicable to designate a building with a granite front only and three stories high in the front and rear, although only one story high in the middle. Medina v. Builders' Mut. Fire Ins. Co., 120 Mass. 225, 226.

THRESHING MACHINE.

"Threshing machine," as generally used and understood in the state of Nebraska, includes within its meaning the horse power by means of which the separator is propelled. Osborne v. McAllister, 19 N. W. 510, 511, 15 Neb. 428.

A self-feeder is covered by a policy insuring a "threshing outfit," though not specifically insured, when it constitutes part of the outfit. Minneapolis Threshing Mach. Co. v. Darnall, 83 N. W. 266, 269, 13 S. D. 279.

THROAT.

"Throat," as used in an indictment charging a cutting of the "throat," is not to be confined to that part of the neck scientifically called the throat, but means that which is commonly called the throat; and the allegation was proved by showing that the jugular vein was divided, though the carotid artery was not cut. Rex v. Edwards, 6 Car. & P. 401.

THROAT DISEASE.

The words "throat disease," in a proposal for life insurance in which the applicant said that he had never had throat disease, mean something more than a temporary inflammation, which at the time the proposal was made was completely cured. Elsner v. Guardian Mut. Life Ins. Co., 3 Cent. Law J. 302.

THROUGH.

The word "through," when used in a deed granting a right of way in, upon, and through lands of U., speaks an intent to concede a mere passage, and not to grant the land itself. Uhl v. Ohio River R. Co., 41 S. E. 340, 341, 51 W. Va. 106.

An indenture granting a right of drainage "in and through" three private ways or avenues named does not entitle the grantee, either expressly or impliedly, to extend the drain to the sea beyond, across lands belonging to a third party, which belonged to the grantor at the date of the indenture. Fiske v. Wetmore, 10 Atl. 627, 628, 15 R. I. 354.

As along.

"Through," as used in a grant by a city of authority to a telephone company to run and maintain wires over and through the streets of the city, is equivalent to "along," and does not authorize a laying of the wires under, below, or beneath the streets. Commonwealth v. Warwick, 40 Atl. 93, 94, 185 Pa. 623.

The words "through whose land" the highway may pass, in Rev. St. 1894, § 8747, relative to the establishment and vacation of highways, and giving a remedy to any person through whose land the highway may pass, do not require such a highway to separate the land of the owner into two parts, but they apply where his land merely abuts on the highway. Brandenburg v. Hittel (Ind.), 37 N. E. 329, 330.

As into.

Under a city charter providing that the city may take stock in companies constructing roads running to the city, it is held that a road running through the city is a road running to it. City of Aurora v. West, 9 Ind. 74, 85.

"Through" does not always mean from end to end or from side to side, but frequently means simply within. As used in an agreement that negotiable bonds issued by a county should be delivered to a railroad company when its road had been so completed through such county that a train of cars shall have passed over the same, the word does not require a road passing entirely through the county from one side to the other, but the condition is satisfied by the construction of a road into the county and within two miles of the opposite side. Provident Life & Trust Co. of Philadelphia v. Mercer County, 18 Sup. Ct. 788, 792, 170 U. S. 593, 42 L. Ed. 1156 (reversing Mercer County v. Provident Life & Trust Co., 62 Fed. 623, 19 C. C. A. 44).

"Through," as used in a conveyance of one-half of the grantor's dwelling house and a lot of land on the side of the house, reserving a privilege to pass and repass through the land to the outer cellarway, and through said way and cellar where it may do the least damage, does not mean to or into or out only, and the grantor may go through the cellar to his rooms above without having any occasion to go into the cellar to do any particular business therein. The passage reserved is through, not to, the cellar, as it would have been if the parties intended to limit the right of passage for the purpose of depositing anything in or carrying anything from the cellar. A passage through cannot mean a passage into or out only. Choate v. Burnham, 24 Mass. (7 Pick.) 274, 278.

As over.

The word "through," in an act amendatory to the charter of a cemetery association, providing that no road, street, alley, or thoroughfare shall be laid out or opened through said grounds or any part thereof without consent of the directors, was intended to mean the same as the word "over"; the obvious intention being to protect the cemetery lands or any part thereof from being taken for road or street purposes. Village of Hyde Park v. Oakwoods Cemetery Ass'n, 7 N. E. 627, 629, 119 Ill. 141.

THROUGH CONTRACT.

A "through contract," as used with reference to railroad contracts for the shipment of goods, is a contract made by the carrier to whom the goods are originally delivered agreeing that the goods shall be transported to their destination; such destination being beyond the terminus of its own road and requiring the service of one or more connecting lines. "Such a contract is more for the convenience of shippers than carriers. It enables property to be transported over long routes, composed of many distinct companies and lines, with great safety and dispatch, and without necessity of employing any intermediate agents other than the carriers themselves. It adds to the public convenience to have such contracts entered into and carried out, and holdings which would have a tendency to discourage and destroy the custom should not be unnecessarily made. For this reason such connecting carriers ought not to be required to ascertain at their peril whether there are any secret agreements affecting the liability of goods received in the ordinary course of business to the ordinary freights. A contract by a railroad company receiving goods at Pittsburgh, Pa., destined for Hudson, Wis., which stipulated against responsibility as a carrier beyond its own line, but guaranteed that the cost of transportation to Hudson would not exceed a certain sum, less than the aggregate of the charges on the several lines between Pittsburgh and Hudson at the usual rates, will not be deemed a "through contract." Schneider v. Evans, 25 Wis. 241, 251, 3 Am. Rep. 56.

Plaintiff shipped at Cairo, Ill., by the Illinois Central Railroad, a quantity of cotton assigned to a company in New York. In the bill of lading given by the railroad company its agent was named as consignee at Chicago. The bill of lading exempted that company from damage or loss by fire, and also from all responsibility for the stowage and safe carriage of the packages beyond the line of its road, and stipulated that the other road should pay a specified sum per 100 pounds. The Illinois Central Railroad Company contracted for the transportation from Chicago to New York with the Union Transportation Company, and it was held that the contract with the Illinois Central Railroad Company was not a through contract, and that under it that company had power to contract for the transportation beyond the line of its road, and to provide in such contract for a like exemption of subsequent carriers as that contained in its own contract with plaintiff. Lamb v. Camden & A. R. & Transp. Co., 46 N. Y. 271, 7 Am. Rep. 327.

THROUGH ELEVATORS.

Acts 1872, c. 244, providing that all grain arriving in the city of Baltimore must be reported to the grain weigher's office, except grain carried to the city on wagons, carts, railroad cars, or through elevators, should be construed to apply to grain which arrived in Baltimore City by water, which was taken out of the vessel by elevator machinery and deposited in an elevator, where it was weighed by an employé of the elevator and came under the immediate superintendence and direction of an assistant weigher of grain stationed there by the weigher general for the purpose of superintending and directing the weighing, though the grain has never been taken from the elevator. When the grain has been removed from the vessels and taken up into the elevators, and thence let down in the harbors and weighed, and after weighing has been put into the bins of purchasers, it has been carried through the elevators in contemplation of the act. Gill v. Cacy, 49 Md. 243, 244.

THROUGH FREIGHT.

A "through freight" is a train which does not switch, and neither sets out nor takes in cars at intermediate stations. Oviatt v. Dakota Cent. Ry. Co., 43 Minn. 800, 301, 302, 45 N. W. 436.

THROUGH GRAIN.

"Through grain," in a contract with a railroad company at the terminus of its line requiring the elevator to receive and discharge all through grain at a certain rate, and that the elevator should have the handling of all through grain at such a rate, does not mean shipped through merely to that terminus of said railroad company, but all grain consigned through that terminus to some point beyond by the terms of the shipment. Richmond v. Dubuque & S. C. R. Co., 26 Iowa, 191, 199.

THROUGH THE MOTHER.

"Through the mother," as used in Rev. St. Tex. art. 1657, providing that illegitimate children shall be capable of inheriting from and through the mother, confines the general right of inheritance to the mother and her lineal ascendants; so that it will not go to the mother's brothers and sisters. Blair v. Adams (U. S.) 59 Fed. 243, 246.

THROUGH OR UNDER US.

The term "through or under us," in a deed executed by three, covenanting to warrant and defend the premises against the lawful "claims and demands of all persons claiming by or through or under us," is broad enough to embrace all lawful claims derived from the covenantors collectively or severally. The covenant was joint, and it would be too narrow a construction to hold that each might have conveyed separately without a breach; and all three grantors are liable on the covenant if a legal claim under any one of them existed at the time.

Carleton v. Tyler, 16 Me. 392, 393, 33 Am. Dec. 673.

THROUGH TICKET.

A through railway ticket is, in the absence of any agreement to the contrary, an entirety, neither party being entitled to its performance in parts, so that the purchaser of a ticket is entitled to but a continuous passage, and has no right to stop over at an intermediate station and afterwards demand a completion of a contract on a later train. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Klyman, 67 S. W. 472, 474, 108 Tenn. 304, 56 L. R. A. 769, 91 Am. St. Rep. 755.

THROUGH WITHOUT TRANSFER.

A contract by a transportation company to ship certain goods "through without transfer" in cars owned and controlled by the company means that the goods should be shipped through without transfer, and does not permit the company to transfer the goods into a warehouse for the purpose of changing into other cars. Robinson v. Merchants' Despatch Transp. Co., 45 Iowa, 470, 474.

THROUGHOUT.

"Throughout," as used in St. 1846, c. 167, § 2, authorizing the city to build aqueducts into and through the city and to distribute "the water throughout the city," carries with it a suggestion of continuity in distribution within the city, and does not authorize a construction of the system beyond the city limits. Inhabitants of Town of Quincy v. City of Boston, 19 N. E. 519, 521, 148 Mass. 389.

"Throughout the state," as used in the Constitution, declaring that "laws of a general nature shall have uniform operation throughout the state," necessarily implies that, in order that a law partake of the nature of generality, it should by its terms show that it was capable of being applied in any county in the state. It is not necessary that every county in the state at the time of the passage of the law should fall within its operation, but it is necessary that none should be excepted in such a way that it can never fall within its provisions. Thomas v. Austin, 30 S. E. 627, 628, 103 Ga. 701.

THROWING PLANT.

A "throwing plant" is a machine which takes raw silk, after it is wound from the cocoon and reeled into hanks, and doubles and twists it into silk threads of varying size and strength, according to the needs of the dyer and weaver. American Cent. Ins. Co. v. Landau, 49 Atl. 788, 749, 62 N. J. Eq. 73.

THROWN INTO BANKRUPTCY.

The term "thrown into bankruptcy" implies that the person or corporation spoken of as being thrown into bankruptcy has been adjudicated a bankrupt. Wilcox v. Toledo & A. A. R. Co., 7 N. W. 892, 893, 45 Mich. 280.

THRUSTING.

"Thrusting," as used in Rev. St. § 790, providing that any person guilty of thrusting any person with a dangerous weapon with intent to commit murder, etc., shall be punished, etc., includes thrusting with an iron bolt, rod, or pin, whether the point be sharp or not. The word "thrust," as a transitive verb, means to drive or impel. As an intransitive verb it means to make a push, or to attack with a pointed weapon; as, a fencer thrusts at his antagonist. The statute punishes thrusting a person, not thrusting at a person. State v. Lowry, 33 La. Ann. 1224.

THUJA GIGANTEA.

"Thuja gigantea" is the botanical name for the tree popularly known as "red cedar" or "canoe cedar." The wood is soft, light, and slightly fragrant. It does not take a polish, and is not of the class of woods known as "cabinet woods." In re Myers (U. S.) 69 Fed. 237, 238.

TICKET.

See "Commutation Ticket"; "Foreign Ticket"; "General Ticket"; "Limited Ticket"; "Local Ticket"; "Lottery Ticket"; "Party-Rate Ticket"; "Policy Tickets"; "Pool Ticket"; "Prize Tickets"; "Railroad Ticket"; "Special Ticket"; "Subpoena Ticket"; "Through Ticket."

The word "ticket" has no legal or other fixed and determinate meaning. There are tickets of various description and for various purposes, such as lottery tickets, playhouse tickets, or admission tickets at public exhibitions or private parties, or to a seat in a stage, or for a passage in a steamboat, etc. As used in Act Feb. 16, 1831, prohibiting the circulation or passing of tickets, a man is not prohibited from giving a duebill or other written evidence of a debt or promise to pay a debt to his creditor, or an order on his own store or factor or anybody else for money or goods. Allaire v. Howell Works Co., 14 N. J. Law (2 J. S. Green) 21, 24.

The word "ticket" in the ballot law, providing that "the ticket then declared by a majority of the members of said committee shall be final, and declare the duly nominated candidates," etc., means the candidates nominated by the respective parties. In re Gerberich's Nomination, 24 Pa. Co. Ct. R. 250, 255.

TICKET AGENT.

See "Acting Ticket Agent."

TICKET BROKER.

See "Scalper."

TICKLER.

A "tickler" or "telltale" is a contrivance to warn railroad brakemen of the proximity of a bridge. It is constructed of an upright on each side of the road and a pole running across the road upon the uprights, from which pole a number of strands of wire are suspended. Wallace v. Central Vt. Ry. Co., 18 N. Y. Supp. 280, 281, 63 Hun, 632.

TIDE.

See "Neap Tide"; "Ordinary Tides."

Three sorts of tides are recognized by Sir Matthew Hale in De Juris Maris, c. 6. They are: First. High spring tides, which are the fluxes of the sea and those tides which happen at the two equinoxes; but the line embraced within these tides does not belong to the crown, "for such spring tides overflow ancient meadows and salt marshes, which yet unquestionably belong to the subject. Second. The spring tides, which happen twice every month, at full and change of the moon; and the shoar in question is by some opinion not denominated by these tides neither, but the lands overflowed by these fluxes ordinarily belong to the subject prima facie, unless the king hath a prescription to the contrary. And the reason seems to be because for the most part the lands covered with these fluxes are dry and maniorable; for at other tides the sea doth not cover them. Third. Ordinary tides, or nepe tides, which happen between the full and change of the moon; and this is that which is properly littus maris, sometimes called 'marettum,' sometimes 'warrettum.'" Baird v. Campbell, 73 N. Y. Supp. 617, 624, 67 App. Div. 104.

TIDE LANDS.

"The words 'tide lands,' in the legislation of California, applies to land covered and uncovered by the ordinary tide, which the state owns by virtue of its sovereignty." Rondell v. Fay, 32 Cal. 354.

"Tide lands," as contained in Act May 14, 1861, entitled "An act to provide for the sale of the marsh and tide lands of this state," refers to such tide lands as are subject to periodical overflow, but which are susceptible of reclamation, so as to be valuable for agricultural purposes. People v. Morrill, 26 Cal. 336.

The expression "tide lands" is to be understood as referring to those lands only which are covered and uncovered by the daily flux and reflux of the tide. City of Oakland v. Oakland Water Front Co., 50 Pac. 277, 285, 118 Cal. 160.

By the words "tide lands," as used in connection with the reservation of the same by the United States government for the purposes of navigation, commerce, and fishery, is meant that portion of the shore or beach covered and uncovered by the ebb and flow of the tide. Pacific Steam Whaling Co. v. Alaska Packers' Ass'n, 72 Pac. 161, 162, 138 Cal. 632.

The words "tide lands" mean land "that lies between ordinary high-water mark and low-water mark, and which is alternately covered and left dry by the ordinary flux and reflux of the tide. Lands adjacent to navigable waters where the tide flows and reflows, which at high tide are submerged and at low tide are bare, come within such description. It would seem to be correspondent to or be synonymous with 'shore' or 'tract'; and this at common law is that land which lies between ordinary high-water mark and low-water mark." Andrus v. Knott, 8 Pac. 763, 12 Or. 501; Elliott v. Stewart, 14 Pac. 416, 417, 15 Or. 259; Walker v. Marks (U. S.) 29 Fed. Cas. 36, 37.

As public or state lands.

See "Public Land"; "State Lands."

Submerged lands.

The word "tide lands" means such lands only as are covered and uncovered by the tide, and does not include lands permanently submerged, within the meaning of Act May 14, 1861, entitled "An act to provide for the sale of marsh and tide lands." People v. Davidson, 30 Cal. 379, 385.

"Tide lands," as used in an act to provide for the sale of the marsh and tide lands of the state, means lands covered and uncovered by the tides, and does not include lands permanently submerged by the waters of the Bay of San Francisco. Walker v. State Harbor Com'rs, 84 U. S. (17 Wall.) 648, 650, 21 L. Ed. 744.

"Tide lands," as used in the Constitution and legislation of the state of Washington, includes more than the mere land over which the tide ebbs and flows, and which is bare at low tide. It includes the beds of navigable waters covered by not more than four fathoms of water at ordinary low tide. State v. Forrest, 39 Pac. 684, 11 Wash. 227.

TIDE MILL.

A "tide mill" is understood to be a mill placed upon a dam thrown across a creek or inlet from the sea into which the tide naturally ebbs and flows, and wherein the water is raised by the flow of the tide, and at high water and the turn of the tide the water is stopped by the dam and the sluice gates, and kept to that height, until the tide has so far ebbed below the dam as to create a fall, by means of which the mill is worked a few hours, until the return of the flood tide prevents it. Murdock v. Stickney, 62 Mass. (8 Cush.) 113, 114.

TIDE WATER.

"Tide waters" are waters, whether salt or fresh, wherever the ebb and flow of the tide of the sea is felt. Commonwealth v. Vincent, 108 Mass. 441, 447.

In England the ebb and flow of the tide became the test of the navigability of a stream. Other "tide waters," with a few small and unimportant exceptions, meant nothing more than public rivers, as contradistinguished from private ones; and hence arose the doctrine of admiralty jurisdiction, which was confined to the ebb and flow of the tide—in other words, to public navigable waters. Packer v. Bird, 11 Sup. Ct. 210, 212, 137 U. S. 661, 34 L. Ed. 819.

In reference to rivers and creeks, "tide water" is the place where the water rises and falls, and is not determined by the proportion of salt water to fresh; and a place where the fluctuation is only two feet, which is caused by the river water meeting the sea, is within tide water. Attorney General v. Woods, 108 Mass. 436, 439, 11 Am. Rep. 380.

A grant of land bounded on "tide water" extends only to ordinary high-water mark. Wiswall v. Hall (N. Y.) 3 Paige, 313, 317; City of New York v. Hart, 95 N. Y. 443; Oblenis v. Creeth (U. S.) 67 Fed. 303, 304; Doane v. Willcutt, 71 Mass. (5 Gray) 328, 336, 66 Am. Dec. 369.

A grant of lands "within the limits of tide water," "running to" or "extending unto," conveys only to high-water mark. Oblenis v. Creeth (U. S.) 67 Fed. 303, 304 (citing City of New York v. Hart, 95 N. Y. 443).

TIE.

The word "tie," as applied to an appointment by election, signifies a state of equality between two or more competitors for the same position. A tie is that which is tied. It is a knot, and where a casting vote is given it is simply to allow him to untie the knot. Wooster v. Mullins, 30 Atl. 144, 64 Conn. 340, 25 L. R. A. 694.

8 Wds. & P.—12

TIGHT.

The term "tight," used in a claim to qualify the construction of the inner chamber or tobacco holder, means sufficiently tight to subserve the purposes of the invention. Slight crevices or openings arising from defective mechanical construction, if not large enough to admit steam in such quantity or volume as to wet the tobacco and defeat the operation of the apparatus, will not violate such rule of construction or relieve such apparatus from the charge of infringement. Robinson v. Sutter (U. S.) 8 Fed. 828, 830.

"Tight," as used in a contract to make a certain number of tight joint clamps for natural gas pipes, means a gas-tight joint, or a joint that would reasonably retain natural gas or prevent the leaking of the gas from the joint. Albree v. Philadelphia Co., 50 Atl. 984, 201 Pa. 165.

TILE.

Derivatively the word "tile" means a covering, and is applied to such articles as are used for covering roofs, pavements, walls, and the like. The original meaning of the word refers, therefore, to the use made of the article, and not to the material of which it may be composed. In the Encyclopædia Britannica, under the article, "Roofing Tiles," it is said: "In the most important temples of ancient Greece, the roof was covered with tiles of white marble, fitted together in the most perfect way, so as to exclude rain." And in a note to this article it is further stated that "marble tiles are said to have been first made by Byzes of Naxos about 620 B. C." In Jules Adeline's Art Dictionary it is stated that "Roman temples were sometimes covered with bronze tiles laid side by side, while the roofs of Chinese temples generally consist of crane porcelain, painted green or yellow. The term is also applied to plaques of marble, stone, or earthenware, sometimes decorated, sometimes with a uniform surface, which are used to cover walls or pavements." Among the definitions of the word in the Century Dictionary is that of "also a slab of stone or marble, used with others like it in a pavement or revetment." Pieces of marble less than an inch in length and breadth, and pasted on paper in the form of blocks, or loose in boxes and intended to be imbedded in cement, so as to form a mosaic pavement, are dutiable under 26 Stat. 567, par. 124, relating to marble paving tiles. United States v. Davis (U. S.) 54 Fed. 147, 149, 4 C. C. A. 251.

TILLTill landed.

Where goods are insured "till landed," without express words, the insurance extends to the boat the usual method of landing goods out of ship on the shore, and the insurance would cover the goods while they are in a warehouse to which they had been removed temporarily during a stop for the purpose of refitting the vessel. Pelly v. Royal Exchange Assur. Co., 1 Burrows, 341, 348.

Till next term.

An exception was taken to a ruling of the court, and time was given "till the next term of the court" to file a bill of exceptions; but the bill was not filed until the sixth day of the next term. The phrase "till next term" did not include the time during the next term, nor any part of it; and hence the bill was filed too late. De Haven v. De Haven, 46 Ind. 296, 298.

Till paid.

A promissory note, payable at a certain time, "with 10 per cent. interest thereon till paid" bore interest between its date and its maturity. Pittman v. Barret, 34 Mo. 84, 85.

Where a mortgage was given on a mill to secure certain notes, and made a lien on the mill and machinery "till the payment of said notes," it embraced all machinery placed in the building after the mortgage until the notes were satisfied. Johnston v. Morrow, 60 Mo. 339, 341.

TILLAGE.

"Tillage" means husbandry; the cultivation of the land, particularly by the plow. United States v. Williams (U. S.) 18 Fed. 475, 478.

TIMBER.

See "Standing Timber."

As personal property, see "Personal Property."

"Timber," as used in a deed of all the pine and spruce timber standing on a township, cannot be construed in the sense of trees suitable to then make timber, but as synonymous with trees or growth. The word "timber" of commerce is squared sticks of wood used in building. The trees from which they were cut became known as "timber trees." The word "timber" may mean wood suitable for building houses or ships, or for use in carpentry, joinery, etc.; trees cut and squared, or capable of being squared and cut into beams, rafters, planks, boards, etc.; growing trees, yielding wood suitable for constructive uses; trees generally; woods. Donworth v. Sawyer, 47 Atl. 521, 523, 94 Me. 243 (citing Cent. Dict.).

The term "timber," as used in commerce, refers generally only to large sticks of wood, squared or capable of being squared, for building houses or vessels; and certain trees only having been formerly used for such purposes, namely, the oak, the ash, and the elm, they alone were recognized as "timber trees"; but the numerous uses to which wood has come to be applied, and the general employment of all kinds of trees for some valuable purpose, has wrought a change in the general acceptance of terms in connection therewith, and, as defined by Webster, "timber" is that sort of wood which is proper for buildings, or for tools, utensils, furniture, carriages, fences, ships, and the like. As used in Rev. St. § 2461, providing penalties for the cutting of timber on land belonging to the United States, includes trees of any size, of a character or sort that may be used in any kind of manufacture, or the construction of any article. United States v. Stores (U. S.) 14 Fed. 824, 825.

Buildings.

"Timber," as used in Gen. St. c. 43, § 13, allowing the owner of land taken for a highway, a reasonable time to take off his timber, wood, and trees, includes buildings and parts of buildings. Commonwealth v. Noxon, 121 Mass. 42, 43.

Fence rails.

"Timber," as used in Pen. Code, art. 77, punishing cutting and destroying and carrying away timber, does not include fence rails. McCauley v. State, 43 Tex. 374.

The word "timber," as used in the article punishing the cutting down or destroying of any tree or timber, or the carrying away thereof, includes rails or other articles manufactured from timber. Pen. Code Tex. 1895, art. 826.

As firewood.

A contract for the right to cut down and haul all timber and bark on certain premises down to as small as 10 inches at the stump of the trees should be construed to mean timber for firewood only, and not material used for shipbuilding. Nash v. Drisco, 51 Me. 417, 418.

"Timber," as used in a statute providing a punishment for the offense of carrying away timber, etc., means wood prepared for building or for tools, utensils, furniture, carriages, fences, ships, and the like, usually said of fallen trees, but sometimes of those standing, but does not include wood suitable for fuel. Wilson v. State, 17 Tex. App. 393.

Mesquite.

"Timber" includes all kinds of wood used either for building purposes or in the manufacture or construction of useful articles. As used in Rev. St. U. S. § 2461 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1527], declaring that any person who cuts any live oak or red cedar trees or other timber on the lands of the United States, etc., includes mesquite; it being a wood very hard and almost indestructible, and used for beams and underpinnings of adobe houses, or for posts, fencing, fuel, and furniture. United States v. Soto (Ariz.) 64 Pac. 419, 420 (overruling Bustamante v. United States [Ariz.] 42 Pac. 111).

Pulp wood.

"Timber," as used in Rev. St. c. 42, § 6, providing that the cost of driving timber so intermixed with logs that it cannot be conveniently separated may be recovered from the owner of such timber, comprises all products of the forest conveniently floatable to market. It includes, not only logs, but other wood products, and is intended to have a comprehensive meaning suited to the purpose of the statute, and would include pulp wood. Bearce v. Dudley, 84 Atl. 260, 88 Me. 410.

Railroad ties.

"Timber," as used in a contract to enter upon defendant's land and cut all timber, etc., on the land, and remove such timber within a certain time, and the contract also providing that all such timber not removed from such land within the stated time, whether cut or standing, is to be the property of the defendant, means trees standing or felled and lying in their natural state upon the land, and does not include railroad ties made out of the trees. Hubbard v. Burton, 75 Mo. 65, 67.

"Timber," as used in Rev. St. § 3330, as amended by Laws 1879, c. 187, § 1, in that part of the section which applies to the county of Marathon and provides for a lien in favor of persons furnishing supplies to men engaged in getting out logs and timber in that county, means the stems or trunks of trees when cut and shaped for use in the erection of buildings or other structures, and not manufactured into lumber within the ordinary meaning of the word "lumber," and it therefore includes railroad ties. Kollock v. Parcher, 9 N. W. 67, 69, 52 Wis. 393.

A contract for the purchase of "merchantable timber" meant merchantable saw logs, and not merchantable lumber. Bullock v. Consumers' Lumber Co. (Cal.) 31 Pac. 367, 368

Scrub oaks.

"Timber," as used in the act of Congress forbidding any one to cut and sell timber from government lands, would not include scrub oaks. O'Hanlon v. Denvir, 22 Pac. 407, 408, 81 Cal. 60, 15 Am. St. Rep. 19.

Shingles or shingle bolts.

The word "timber," as a generic term, properly signifies only such trees as are used in building either business houses or dwellings. Castillero v. United States, 67 U. S. (2 Black) 281, 17 L. Ed. 360; 1 Crabb, Real Prop. § 20; Burrill, Law Dict. tit. "Timber." But its signification is not limited to trees. It applies to the wood, or the particular form which the tree assumes when no longer growing or standing in the ground. It does not include shingles and shingle bolts. United States v. Schuler (U. S.) 27 Fed. Cas. 978.

Logs and timber, in Rev. St. c. 91, § 34, giving a labor lien on logs and timber for cutting the same, includes cedar shingle rift, cut four feet in length. Cutting up the logs does not defeat the lien. Sands v. Sands, 74 Me. 239, 240.

Soil.

"Timber and other trees," as used in a lease of a tenement, save and except all timber and other trees, does not include the soil. Leigh v. Heald, 1 Barn. & Adol. 622, 625.

TIMBER BEING WROUGHT IN VESSELS.

The terms "timber in process of being wrought in vessels," in a fire policy on such timber, was construed to include capstans of locusts partly prepared for vessels which the insured was building. Webb v. National Fire Ins. Co., 4 N. Y. Super. Ct. (2 Sandf.) 497, 504.

TIMBER CULTURE ENTRY.

The expression "timber culture entry" has an accepted and well-recognized signification in the acts of Congress, in the decisions of the courts, and in common parlance. It is an entry under the provisions of "An act to encourage the growth of timber on Western prairies," approved March 3, 1873 (17 Stat. 605, c. 277), and the amendments and additions thereto. Rev. St. §§ 2464, 2469 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, pp. 1534, 1537]. Hartman v. Warren (U. S.) 76 Fed. 157, 160, 22 C. C. A. 30.

TIMBER TREES.

A grant of "timber trees" will not pass fruit trees, nor will a grant of "all timber trees, but not the annual fruit thereof," pass apple trees. Bullen v. Denning, 5 Barn. & C. 842, 847.

TIME.

See "Actual Time"; "Additional Time"; "Business Time"; "Fixed Time"; "Unreasonable Time."
All times, see "All."

An offer to buy certain stock at any time after January 1st, if "at that time you desire to have me do so," means "at that date," and required an acceptance on January 1st. Park v. Whitney, 19 N. E. 161, 148 Mass. 278.

A certificate of publication, stating that notice of a special assessment had been published "five times" in a certain daily newspaper, cannot be construed so as to sufficiently show that the notice was published for five successive days. Chandler v. People, 43 N. E. 590, 591, 161 Ill. 41.

Gen. Laws, c. 46, § 4, requires the assessor to assess the taxes at the time ordered by the town, and the town voted that the tax be assessed in the month of September of each year. It was claimed that the assessment did not comply with the statute, because fixing a month is not fixing a time. It was held that the word "time" is of a more general character, and implies a discretion within fixed limits which may be necessary or convenient for assessors, and that there was no intention to fix a particular day on which the assessment must be made, and the assessment made during the month of September was valid. Warwick & Coventry Water Co. v. Carr, 52 Atl. 1030, 1031, 24 R. I. 226.

The time given or limited for the performance of an obligation is called its "term." Civ. Code La. 1900, art. 2048.

Computation.

In a computation of time, where the time must be computed from an act done, the day on which the act is done is to be included, especially where the computation must be from and after the doing of the act. Arnold v. United States, 13 U. S. (9 Cranch) 104, 106, 3 L. Ed. 671.

In computing the time within which a statute requires a chattel mortgage to be recorded (Rev. St. 1881, § 4913), the day on which it was executed is excluded, and that on which it was recorded is included. Towell v. Hollweg, 81 Ind. 154, 158.

The day of an act or statute from which a future time is to be ascertained is to be excluded from the computation. This rule is applicable, not only to contracts, wills, and other instruments, but to statutes and proceedings under them. Thus, where a court of probate on the 14th of December passed an order limiting six months from that time for the exhibition of claims against a decedent's estate, a claim exhibited on the 14th of June following was exhibited in time. Weeks v. Hull, 19 Conn. 376, 380, 50 Am. Dec. 249.

Const. art. 3, § 22, declares that, if a bill or joint resolution shall not be returned by the Governor within three days after the same shall have been presented to him, it shall become a law. Held that, in counting the three days within which the bill is to be returned by the Governor, the day on which the bill was presented to him must be excluded. Corwin v. Comptroller General, 6 S. C. (6 Rich.) 390, 395.

St. 1815, c. 137, § 1, providing that a right in equity sold on execution may be redeemed within one year next after the "time of executing the deed" thereof by the officer to the purchaser, means in legal acceptance the day of delivery, which is the same as the date, or the day of the date, and in computing the time the day in which the deed was executed should be excluded. No moment of time can be said to be after a given day until that day has expired. Bigelow v. Willson, 18 Mass. (1 Pick.) 485, 494.

An order made Monday, November 21st, extending for two weeks the time to file a bill of exceptions, extends the time so as to include Monday, December 5th, one day being excluded and the other included. Cavanaugh v. Corckran, 11 Ky. Law Rep. 855.

In computing the time allowed for signing a bill of exceptions by an order made in term time permitting it to be done within a stated time after the adjournment of the term, the first day after the adjournment must be excluded under Code 1896, § 11, providing that, in computing the time within which an act required by law must be done, the first day shall be excluded and the last included. Ragsdale v. Kinney, 24 South. 443, 447, 119 Ala. 454.

The statutory rule that the "time" within which an act is to be done is to be computed by excluding the first day and including the last applies to the filing of bills of exceptions. State v. Thorn, 28 Ind. 306, 308.

Where 60 days' "time" from the 3d of December is allowed within which to file a bill of exceptions, the 2d day of February following is too late. Schoonover v. Irwin, 58 Ind. 287, 289.

Where, by agreement of parties, appellant was to have 60 days from March 17th in which to file a bill of exceptions, and it appeared that said bill was filed May 17th, it is too late. McCoid v. Rafferty, 84 Iowa, 532, 51 N. W. 24.

The time within which an act is to be done shall be computed by excluding the first day and including the last. If the last day be Sunday, it shall be excluded. Clark's Code N. C. 1900, § 596.

TIME BEING.

See "For the Time Being."

TIME CHECK.

A certificate signed by the master mechanic or other person in charge of laborers, recting the amount due to the laborer for labor for a specified time. Burlington Voluntary Relief Department v. White, 59 N. W. 747, 748, 41 Neb. 547, 43 Am. St. Rep. 701.

TIME FIXED BY AGREEMENT.

The phrase "time fixed by agreement," in Pub. St. c. 188, § 5, providing that the time by which an award shall be made and reported may be varied according to the agreement of the parties, but no award made after the time fixed by the agreement shall have any legal effect or operation, unless made upon a recommitment by the court to which it is reported, has the same meaning as the phrase "time limited in the submission" in section 9, which provides that the award may be returned at any term or session of the court held within the time limited in the submission. Bent v. Erie Telegraph & Telephone Co., 10 N. E. 778, 781, 144 Mass. 165.

TIME GIVEN.

"Time given," as used in Code Civ. Proc. § 1187, requiring a claim for a mechanic's lien to contain a statement of the terms of the "time given" and conditions of the contract, means the time of payment for the work and labor performed and materials furnished as agreed on, as expressed in the contract. If the words "time given" refer to the time agreed on for the completion of the contract, and no period of time for such completion is fixed by the contract, but such time is allowed as the law gives, no time need be stated in the claim. Where there is no express agreement as to time in the contract, it is not necessary to give the time in the claim. Hills v. Ohlig, 63 Cal. 104.

TIMEKEEPER.

As laborer, see "Laborer."

TIME OF ABSENCE.

The phrase "time of his absence" in a statute providing that if, after the cause of action shall have accrued, the debtor shall depart from and reside out of the state, the time of his absence shall not be taken as any part of the time limited for the commencement of the action, has the same meaning as the expression "reside out of the state." Burroughs v. Bloomer (N. Y.) 5 Denio, 532, 535.

TIME OF ACCIDENT.

A notice to a city that a person has been injured by a defect in a highway sufficiently describes the "time of the accident," within the requirement of St. 1877, c. 234, § 3, by naming the day, in the absence of evidence that anything depended upon the nature of the defect or upon the particular hour of the accident. Donnelly v. City of Fall River, 130 Mass. 115.

Gen. St. § 2673, requiring notices of the time and place of the occurrence of an injury by means of a defective road or bridge, means the day on which it occurred, together with the month and the year, stated in the common and ordinary manner. Gardner v. City of New London, 28 Atl. 42, 43, 63 Conn. 267.

"Time," as used in a statute providing that in an action against a railroad for injuries for killing or injuring live stock, etc., the time when and the place where the killing or the injury occurred must be alleged in the complaint, is complied with by a statement of a specified day of a given month and year on which the accident occurred. East Tennessee, V. & G. R. Co. v. Carloss, 77 Ala. 443, 447.

TIME OF ADJUDICATION.

Bankr. Act, § 38, provided that the filing of a petition for adjudication in bankruptcy shall be deemed to be the commencement of proceedings in bankruptcy, and section 14 provided that the assignee should be substituted for the bankrupt in suits pending "at the time of the adjudication in bankruptcy." Held, that the phrase "at the time of the adjudication in bankruptcy" meant the time when proceedings were commenced by the filing of a petition, as provided by section 38. In re Patterson (U. S.) 18 Fed. Cas. 1315, 1316.

TIME OF BANKRUPTCY.

"Time of bankruptcy," as used in the bankruptcy act, providing that, where the bankrupt is liable to pay rent, the creditor may prove for a proportionate part thereof up to the "time of the bankruptcy," means the time when the petition was filed, to which time the adjudication relates. In re May (U. S.) 16 Fed. Cas. 1205, 1206.

"Time of bankruptcy," as used in the bankruptcy act, with reference to time, shall mean the date when the petition was filed. U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3419.

Under St. 6 Geo. IV, c. 16, § 72, empowering the commissioners in bankruptcy to dispose of goods being in the possession, order, or disposition of the bankrupt, as reputed owner, at the time he becomes bankrupt, held, that the phrase "at the time he becomes bankrupt" means the time of committing the act of bankruptcy, and not the time when the fiat issues. Fawcett v. Fearne, 6 Q. B. 20.

TIME OF INJURY.

The "time of injury," within the meaning of the divorce statute, when applied to impotency, applies to any time while the impotency lasts, as it is a continuing injury. A. B. v. C. B., 34 N. J. Eq. (7 Stew.) 43, 44.

TIME OF MEMORY.

At the common law "time of memory" commenced from the beginning of the reign of Richard I. Any custom may be destroyed by evidence of the nonexistence of such custom in any part of the period in the beginning of the reign. Ackerman v. Shelp, 8 N. J. Law (3 Halst.) 125, 130.

TIME OF PEACE.

See "Peace."

TIME OF WAR.

See "War."

TIME OPTION.

A "time option" to purchase contains the following elements: An offer to sell, accompanied by an agreement to hold such offer of sale open for a specified time, supported by a sufficient consideration. Peterson v. Chase (Wis.) 91 N. W. 687, 688.

TIME POLICY.

A time policy, as the term is used in the law of marine insurance, is a policy on a vessel for any prescribed time, which covers the vessel during such time on any voyage she may undertake. Wilkins v. Tobacco Ins. Co., 30 Ohio St. 317, 339, 27 Am. Rep. 455 (citing 1 Arn. Ins. 333, 409).

A "policy on time," as the term is used in marine insurance, "insures no specific voyage, but covers any voyage within the prescribed time. It is of the nature of a policy on time that it limits the vessel to no geographical track, and deviation is therefore not predicable of it." Greenleaf v. St. Louis Ins. Co., 37 Mo. 25, 29 (citing Bradlie v. Maryland Ins. Co., 37 U. S. [12 Pet.] 378, 9 L. Ed. 1123; Union Ins. Co. v. Tysen [N. Y.] 3 Hill, 118; Keeler v. Firemen's Ins. Co., Id. 250).

TIME WHEN EXECUTION IS ISSUABLE.

"Time when execution is legally issuable," within the meaning of 2 Comp. Laws, § 5462, which provides that no execution issued on a judgment rendered on appeal to the circuit court against the plaintiff and the surety on his appeal bond shall be levied on the property of the surety, unless such execution, if issued in the circuit court, is issued within 30 days from the time when the same shall be legally issuable, means the date of the taxation of costs. Weiss v. Chambers, 15 N. W. 63, 64, 50 Mich. 158.

TIMIDITY.

Doubt distinguished, see "Doubt."

TIN CANS.

"Tin cans," within the meaning of a fire policy giving permission to keep one barrel of benzine or turpentine in tin cans, is to be construed not to be limited to a number of tin cans, but to include one tin can large enough to hold a barrel of the liquid. Maryland Fire Ins. Co. v. Whiteford, 81 Md. 219, 224, 100 Am. Rep. 45.

TIN FOIL.

Where a defendant in a patent suit was enjoined from the application of tin foil or its equivalents during the process of vulcanizing India rubber to preserve the form of material, the words "tin foil or its equivalents" do not include sheets of tin similar to roofing tin. Poppenhusen v. New York Gutta Percha Comb Co. (U. S.) 19 Fed. Cas. 1058.

TIPPLE.

"Tipple," as used in the act of 1877, providing that it shall not be lawful for any person to sell or tipple in intoxicating beverages, etc., means to sell and to be drunk at the place of sale. Harney v. State, 76 Tenn. (8 Lea) 113, 114.

TIPPLER.

A "tippler" is one who sells liquor by the quart or in larger quantities, which liquor is not drunk or intended to be drunk on the premises of the seller. State v. Lowenhaupt, 79 Tenn. (11 Lea) 13, 14.

TIPPLING HOUSE OR SHOP.

See "Common Tippling House."

As disorderly house, see "Disorderly House."

"Tippling houses" are common drinking houses, kept for lucre or gain, where all persons may, if they will, resort and drink ad libitum. Werner v. Washington (U. S.) 29 Fed. Cas. 705, 707.

A tippling house is a place where liquor is sold, and formerly represented that class of the liquor traffic now filled by saloons and barrooms. Town of Leesburg v. Putman, 29 S. E. 602, 603, 103 Ga. 110, 68 Am. St. Rep. 80.

A tippling house is "either a house in which tippling and drinking is allowed, or a house kept for the purpose of making a profit by selling spirituous liquors, without furnishing accommodations for travelers, with or without license." Woods v. Commonwealth, 40 Ky. (1 B. Mon.) 74, 75.

"Tippling house" has a definite and well-understood meaning in the common law and in common language. Though the fact that spirituous liquors are sold on a single occasion in a quantity less than a quart and permitted to be drunk in the house of the vendor will not constitute the place a tippling house, yet the frequent repetition of such acts will constitute the place a tippling house according to the common law and common language of the country and within the meaning of the term as used in the act of 1793 imposing a penalty for keeping a tippling house. Morrison v. Commonwealth, 37 Ky. (7 Dana) 218, 219.

A "tippling house" is a place in which intoxicating liquors are sold in quantities less than a quart without a license. The fact that persons became drunk at a place does not make it a tippling house. Dunnaway v. State, 17 Tenn. (9 Yerg.) 350, 352.

To constitute a "tippling house," it is necessary that intoxicating drinks should be sold therein. Hence an instruction that it is a place where spirituous liquors or other drinks are sold is rendered erroneous by the addition of the words "or other drinks." Patten v. City of Centralia, 47 Ill. 370, 372.

The term "tippling house," within the meaning of a statute prohibiting the keeping open of a tippling house on the Sabbath day, includes a place where liquor is retailed and tippled on the Sabbath day, with a door to get into it so kept that anybody can push it open and go in and drink. It makes no difference in law whether the place be called a barroom, or a glee club resort, or a parlor, or a restaurant, if it be a place where liquor is retailed and tippled on the Sabbath day. It makes no difference if the drinking be done standing or sitting at a bar or round the table. It is tippling, and the place where it is done is a tippling house; and if anybody wishing to drink can have access therein, if ingress and egress be free to all comers, it is a tippling house kept open on Sunday. Hussey v. State, 69 Ga. 54, 58.

A tippling house is defined to be a public drinking house, and it is not necessary that the liquors or intoxicating drink be drunk on the premises. Harris v. People, 39 Pac. 1084, 1085, 21 Colo. 95.

A tippling shop is a place in which liquors are sold in drams or small quantities, and where men are accustomed to tipple, and necessarily includes the element of drinking on the premises; and hence a city, under authority to regulate tippling places, has no authority to regulate places for the sale of intoxicating liquors, unless such liquors are drunk on the premises. City of Yankton v. Douglass, 66 N. W. 923, 924, 8 S. D. 441.

"Tippling houses," within the meaning of a statute prohibiting the keeping open of tippling houses on the Sabbath, was held in Hall v. State, 3 Ga. (3 Kelly) 18, to include one tippling house, and that the keeping open of such a house was criminal within the meaning of the statute. Bethune v. State, 48 Ga. 505, 510.

Proof that accused, upon three different Sundays within the same year, at least, sold whisky in her dwelling house to different persons at retail, permitting the same or a portion thereof to be drunk on the premises, held to prove the offense of keeping open a tippling house on the Sabbath. Williams v. State, 100 Ga. 511, 526, 28 S. E. 624, 629, 39 L. R. A. 269.

Club rooms.

A tippling house is a place where intoxicating drinks are sold in drams of small quantities to be drunk on the premises; a place of public resort, where spirituous, fermented, or other intoxicating liquors are sold or drunk in small quantities without a license therefor; a public drinking house, where intoxicating liquor is either sold by drams to the public, or else given away, and imbibed; and a social club, maintaining club rooms, which were open only to members, wherein a bar was kept and drinks dispensed to the members, is guilty of keeping open a "tippling house" on Sunday, where such place was open on Sunday. Mohrman v. State, 32 S. E. 143, 145, 105 Ga. 709, 43 L. R. A. 398, 70 Am. St. Rep. 74.

Place for sale of beer.

"Tippling house," as used in a statute prohibiting the keeping open of a tippling house on Sunday, means a public drinking house, and includes a house wherein beer alone is sold. Koop v. People, 47 Ill. 327, 329.

Place where liquors are given away.

"Tippling house," as used in Code, § 4535, prohibiting the keeping open of tippling houses on the Sabbath day, is not limited to places kept for the purpose of selling liquors by drams or small quantities to the public, and where men are accustomed to tipple, but includes a place where liquors are given away by the drink, not merely one or two, but where it was a usual and common thing on Sunday, notwithstanding there was no money given or received for the drinks. Minor v. State, 63 Ga. 318, 321.

As place without a license.

A "tippling house," within the meaning of the statute, is a place where spirituous liquors are sold without license in less quantities than a quart to be drank at the place. Harney v. State, 76 Tenn. (8 Lea) 113, 114.

"Tippling shop," as used in an ordinance providing that no tippling shop shall be kept within corporate limits of the city without a license, is not identical with "disorderly house." Bouvier defines a tippling house as a place where spirituous liquors are sold and drank in violation of law. To like effect are the definitions in Webster's and Worcester's Dictionaries. An instruction that a tippling house is a place of public resort, where spirituous, fermented, or other intoxicating liquors are sold and drank in small quantities without having a license therefor, was incorrect. City of Emporia v. Volmer, 12 Kan. 622, 629.

An indictment charging the defendant with "keeping a tippling house" for three consecutive months imports an unlawful selling of spirituous liquors by retail without license. Commonwealth v. Campbell, 68 Ky. (5 Bush) 311, 312.

TIPLING PURPOSES.

"Tippling purposes," as used in Laws 1877, c. 251, § 22, prohibiting the sale of cider for "tippling purposes," implies that the place of drinking and the place of sale is the same. State v. McNamara, 69 Me. 133, 135.

TISSUE.

The word "tissue," in the trade-name of an article as "French Tissue," is descriptive of its texture, and cannot be appropriated as part of the trade-mark. Draper v. Skerrett (U. S.) 116 Fed. 206, 208.

TISSUE PAPER

"Tissue paper," as used in Tariff Act Oct. 1, 1890, par. 419, includes merchandise imported and invoiced as crepe, or crepe tissue, which, according to the finding of the board of general appraisers, is made in a tissue paper mill, and invoiced, advertised, and sold as "tissue." Dennison Mfg. Co. v. United States (U. S.) 66 Fed. 728.

TITLE.Of action.

Code Proc. § 274, provides that in an appeal the papers must be entitled as in the action, but that the title of the action shall not be changed in consequence of the appeal, but that the parties shall be known as "appellant" and "respondent." Held, that the phrase "but the title of the action shall not be changed," etc., had reference only to the names of the parties to the cause and their order, and not to the name of the court; and hence the motion papers on appeal must be entitled "In the Appellate Court," notwithstanding the requirement that the title shall not be changed. Clickman v. Clickman, 1 N. Y. (1 Comst.) 611.

Of affidavit.

The "title of an affidavit" embraces its entire heading; that is, the name or style of the court, as well as the names of the parties. Bowman v. Sheldon, 10 N. Y. Leg. Obs. 339, 340.

Of legislative act.

The title of an act is part of the act and a guide to its right construction. Commonwealth v. Lloyd, 35 Atl. 816, 818, 178 Pa. 308.

The term "title," when used in speaking of the title of an act, means that part of the act by which it is known and distinguished from other acts. It does not include the divisions, subdivisions, arrangement, and classification of the provisions of an act. Robinson v. State, 15 Tex. 311, 312.

Originally in the English courts the title was held to be no part of the act. "No more," says Lord Holt, "than the title of a book is part of the book." It was generally framed by a clerk of the House of Parliament, where the act originated, and was intended only as a means of convenient reference. At the present day the title constitutes a part of the act, but it is still considered as only a formal part. It cannot be used to extend or restrain any positive provisions contained in the body of the act. It is only when the meaning of these are doubtful that resort may be had to the title, and even then it has little weight. Hadden v. Collector, 72 U. S. (5 Wall.) 107, 110, 18 L. Ed. 518.

"In England the title is no part of a statute. Lord Mansfield gives as a reason for this that it does not pass with the same solemnity. One reading is often sufficient. Rex v. Williams, 1 W. Bl. 93. With us, however, it is always read three times. There may be good reason for holding that the title, as well as the preamble, may be resorted to for the purpose of assisting the construction, whenever the enacting clause is doubtful, but it certainly is not to overrule or control it." Yeager v. Weaver, 64 Pa. (14 P. F. Smith) 425, 428.

"The title of an act is a label, and not an index. In the interpretation of the constitutional provision that every law shall embrace but one object, which shall be embraced in the title, the object of a law must not be confused with its product. The object of every law must be singular and be expressed in the title. The product may be as diverse as the object requires, and finds its expression in the terms of the enactment only." Moore v. Burdett, 40 Atl. 631, 62 N. J. Law, 163.

The "title of an act" is a limitation upon the extent to which effect can be given to it. An act entitled "An act to establish an excise department in cities of this state" (P. L. 1884, p. 133), cannot be applied to a town, though in its enacting clause it is provided that it shall apply to any town or city. Jones v. Town of Morristown, 49 Atl. 440, 441, 66 N. J. Law, 488.

Of political party.

"Title" is not synonymous with the word "name" in the new election law, providing that the nominees of each party shall be printed on separate tickets, underneath the name or title of the party making the nomination. State v. Black, 24 Atl. 489, 493, 54 N. J. Law, 446, 16 L. R. A. 769.

"Title" is defined as the means whereby the owner of lands hath the just possession of his property. 2 Bl. Comm. 195; Co. Litt. 345; Woodruff v. Wallace, 41 Pac. 357, 360, 3 Okl. 355; Donovan v. Pitcher, 53 Ala. 411, 417, 25 Am. Rep. 634; Houston v. Farris, 71 Ala. 570, 571; Kamphouse v. Gaffner, 73 Ill. 453, 458; Pannill v. Coles, 81 Va. 380, 383; Arrington v. Liscom, 34 Cal. 365, 385, 94 Am. Dec. 722; Fitzgerald v. Miller, 63 N. W. 221, 223, 7 S. D. 61; Parker v. Metzger, 7 Pac. 518, 521, 12 Or. 407; Botsford v. Morehouse, 4 Conn. 550, 551; Jacob Tome Institute v. Davis, 41 Atl. 168, 168, 87 Md. 591.

"Title" arises when a man has lawful cause of entry into lands whereof another is seised; and it signifies also the means whereby a man comes to lands or tenements, as by feoffment, last will, and testament, etc. Joy v. Stump, 12 Pac. 929, 930, 14 Or. 361.

"Title" may be defined to be that which constitutes a just cause of exclusive possession, or which is the foundation of ownership of property. Webst. Dict.; Houston v. Farris, 71 Ala. 570, 571; Pratt v. Fountain, 73 Ga. 261, 262.

In legal acceptance "title" has respect to that which is the subject of ownership, and is that which is the foundation of ownership, and with a change of title the right of property and ownership passes. Allen, J., in Springfield Fire & Marine Ins. Co. v. Allen, 43 N. Y. 389, 3 Am. Rep. 711. As applied to real estate, it is defined to be "the means whereby the owner of land or other real property has the trust and legal possession and enjoyment of it; the lawful cause or ground of possessing that which is ours. 2 Bouv. Law Dict.; Loy v. Home Ins. Co., 24 Minn. 315, 318, 31 Am. Rep. 346.

"Title" is defined as the lawful cause or ground of possessing that which is ours. It is that which is the foundation of ownership of property, real or personal. The title to a debt consists in the facts which, taken together, created the contract relations of the parties thereto. Hunt v. Eaton, 21 N. W. 429, 431, 55 Mich. 362.

"Title" has respect to that which is the subject of ownership, and is that which is the foundation of ownership, and with a change of title the right of property in the owner passes. Springfield Fire & Marine Ins. Co. v. Allen, 43 N. Y. 389, 395, 3 Am. Rep. 711.

"Title" is the means whereby a person's right to property is established. Civ. Code Ga. 1895, § 3208.

As adjudicated title.

"Title" within the meaning of Rev. St. Ohio, § 5955, providing that, when summons has been served or publication made, the action is pending, so as to charge third persons with notice of its pendency, and that, while pending, no interest can be acquired by third persons in the subject-matter thereof, as against the plaintiff's title, does not mean the title claimed in the pleading, but the title as finally determined by the adjudication of the court. McClaskey v. Barr (U. S.) 43 Fed. 130, 132.

As chain of transfer.

By the term "title," as used in a provision requiring suit to recover real estate, as against persons in peaceable and adverse possession thereof under title, to be commenced within three years next after the cause of action shall have accrued, is meant a regular chain of transfer from or under the sovereignty of the soil. Rev. St. Tex. 1895, art. 3341; Buford v. Bostick, 58 Tex. 63, 70; Horton v. Crawford, 10 Tex. 382, 386; Rice v. P. J. Willis & Bro., 87 Fed. 626, 628, 31 C. C. A. 154; Miller v. Texas & P. R. Co., 10 Sup. Ct. 206, 216, 132 U. S. 662, 33 L. Ed. 487.

As estate in fee.

The word "title," when used in reference to title to real estate, implies an estate in fee. Nothing short thereof is a complete title. Gillespie v. Broas (N. Y.) 23 Barb. 370, 381.

Where plaintiff contracted to give a sufficient deed to vest in the defendant the "title of the said farm," a deed which plaintiff's wife had not executed with the solemnities required by law to bar her dower was not such a deed as required or as defendant was obliged to accept. The "title" meant the legal estate in fee, free and clear of all valid claims, liens, and incumbrances whatsoever. It is the ownership of the land dominium directum et absolutum, without any rightful participation by any other person in any part of it. If the plaintiff's wife had a contingent life estate in one-third part of the farm, the defendant had not a clear and absolute title. Jones v. Gardner (N. Y.) 10 Johns. 266, 269.

Sometimes the word "title" is used in a general sense, so as to include any title or interest; but "title" in common acceptance means the full and absolute title. When we speak of a man as having title to certain lands, the ordinary understanding is that he is the owner of the fee, and not that he is a mere lessee. United States v. Hunter (U. S.) 21 Fed. 615, 617.

The word "title," as defined by the Century Dictionary, means "ownership; absolute ownership; the unincumbered fee." Thus allegations that the land was conveyed to third persons, who thereby acquired the title, and that his tenant entered upon and holds possession under him, fairly imports that the conveyance was by deed legally executed, and that the possession by the tenant was lawfully held. Langmede v. Weaver, 60 N. E. 992, 997, 65 Ohio St. 17.

Same—Leasehold.

The word "title," as used in Rev. St. U. S. § 2116, prohibiting contracts for the title or purchase of any Indian lands, does not include a leasehold interest for grazing purposes merely. United States v. Hunter (U. S.) 21 Fed. 615, 617.

The phrase "title to real estate," as used in Rev. St. § 230, subd. 1, declaring that the jurisdiction of justices shall not extend to any action wherein the title to lands, tenements, etc., may in any wise come in question, and as used in Rev. St. p. 241, § 40, providing that when the defendant shall, as a justification of an act for trespass quare clausum fregit, plead title to any real estate in himself or in another, the plaintiff may thereupon commence his action in the Supreme Court, embraces both freehold and leasehold estates and any right to enter and have possession of the property. Campfield v. Johnson, 21 N. J. Law (1 Zab.) 83, 85.

Interest distinguished.

As used in an insurance policy the terms "interest" and "title" are not synonymous. A mortgagor in possession and a purchaser holding under a deed defectively executed have both of them absolute as well as insurable interests in the property, though neither of them has the legal title. "Absolute" is here synonymous with "vested," and is used in contradistinction to "contingent" or "conditional." Loventhal v. Home Ins. Co., 112 Ala. 108, 116, 20 South. 419, 83 L. R. A. 258, 57 Am. St. Rep. 17.

As legal title.

In ordinary acceptance "title to land" is considered to mean the legal title, and will be held to be so used in a submission of certain matters in controversy in relation to the title to certain land; and hence "title," as used in Code Civ. Proc. 1884, § 1135, providing that all controversies which might be the subject of civil action, except the question of title to real property in fee or for life, may be submitted for arbitration, means the legal title. Thygerson v. Whitbeck, 16 Pac. 403, 404, 5 Utah, 406.

Act Cong. March 3, 1881, providing that if, in any action brought in pursuance of Rev. St. U. S. § 2326 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1430], "title to the grounds in controversy" shall not be established by either party, the jury shall so find, and a judgment shall be entered according to the verdict, means that in such actions recovery cannot be sustained merely by proof of occupancy of the premises in dispute; but either party, before he can secure judgment, must show compliance with the statutes, state and federal, and also miners' rules and regulations enforced, relating to the location of mining claims on the public domain. Becker v. Pugh, 13 Pac. 906, 907, 9 Colo. 589.

The word "title," in Code, p. 475, c. 74, § 10, declaring that "a purchaser shall not be affected by the record of a deed or contract made by a person under whom his title is not derived," necessarily means a complete or legal title, being without qualification. Hoult v. Donahue, 21 W. Va. 294, 299.

Same—Imperfect title.

"Title," as used in Act 1835, requiring that the person who would avail himself of these provisions should have a connected title in law or equity, deducible of record from the state or the United States, or from any public officer or other person authorized by the laws of the state to sell such land for the nonpayment of taxes, means nothing more than such a title as is evidenced by a deed in proper form and duly executed by one of the officers or persons named in the act as the source with which the person relying upon it is required to connect himself by a regular chain of conveyances. It should not be construed to mean a perfect title, nor is the word in its ordinary acceptance understood in such a restricted sense. There are perfect titles and apparent or imperfect titles. Even a naked possession constitutes a species of title, though it may be the lowest degree. The meaning of the word is to be ascertained from the connection in which it is used. Irving v. Brownell, 11 Ill. (1 Peck) 402, 414.

The expression "title," in the general proposition that, when equities are equal, he that has the legal title will be preferred, includes, in its broadest sense, all rights capable of being enjoyed and secured under the law. One holding a legal title to lands is certainly included, but rights amounting to less than the full legal title are equally included with it; and it is not necessary that one should acquire the full legal title to lands to entitle him to the protection of the defense of purchase for valuable consideration without notice of a prior lien. Haynsworth v. Bischoff, 6 S. C. (6 Rich.) 159, 167.

As ownership.

Where a policy provided that, if the interest of the assured should be other than the sole ownership, the policy should be void, the word "ownership" was synonymous with "title." Woodward v. Republic Fire Ins. Co. (N. Y.) 82 Hun, 365, 369.

The "title" to goods and chattels "means the right to the property and the right to the possession thereof; in short, the ownership thereof." Frank v. Forgotston, 61 N. Y. Supp. 1118, 1119, 30 Misc. Rep. 816.

"Title," as used in an assignment by a judgment creditor of his right, title, and interest in the judgment, "relates to the assignor's ownership of the judgment; that is, by the use of the word, they indicate the intention to transfer whatever property they may hold in it." Scofield v. Moore, 31 Iowa, 241, 245.

When it is alleged that plaintiff has title to certain premises, in an action to recover possession of land, the meaning ordinarily attached to such statement is that plaintiff is the owner of the premises or is seised of the same. Livingston v. Ruff, 43 S. E. 678, 679, 65 S. C. 284.

A party may have a title to property, though he is not the absolute owner. If he has the actual or constructive possession of property, or the right of possession, he has a title thereto, though another person may be the owner. An instruction, in an action of trespass for taking and carrying away goods, that, in order to entitle plaintiff to a verdict, he must show a title to the property or some part of it, is, therefore, not erroneous. Roberts v. Wentworth, 59 Mass. (5 Cush.) 192, 193.

As right of possession.

"Title" means right of possession. Dunster v. Kelly, 18 N. E. 361, 362, 110 N. Y. 558.

"Title" is generally applied to signify the right to land and real estate. It is a right of possession or of property in lands, and distinct from actual possession. Campfield v. Johnson, 21 N. J. Law (1 Zab.) 83, 85.

"Title," as used in the statute in relation to summary process, providing that, if the lessee obtain a title after the date of the lease against the lessor, he may show it, means a right to the possession paramount to that of the complainant. Rodgers v. Palmer, 33 Conn. 155, 156.

The question of actual possession of lands is not one of title, within the meaning of the statute providing that a justice of the peace shall have no jurisdiction of cases involving the title of land. Ehle v. Quackenboss (N. Y.) 6 Hill, 537, 539.

"Title," as used in Code Civ. Proc. § 2951, requiring a justice of the peace to discontinue an action for trespass where it is shown that title to real property will come in question, means right of possession. Manfredi v. Wiederman, 35 N. Y. Supp. 680, 14 Misc. Rep. 342.

The word "title," as used in Comp. Laws, § 642, declaring that a justice of the peace shall have no jurisdiction of an action for an injury to real property, where the title to such property comes in question, does not embrace the different degrees or stages of right; but it is limited to the right of possession, for where that is in question before a justice he has no jurisdiction of the case. The word "title," as used in the statute, means precisely what it means in reference to the common-law action of ejectment. It is synonymous with the right of possession. Therefore, where plaintiff in his complaint alleged that he was entitled to the possession of certain premises, which allegation defendant denied, a question of title was raised, ousting the justice of his jurisdiction. Grosso v. City of Lead, 68 N. W. 310, 9 S. D. 165.

The word "title," in 2 Rev. St. p. 226, § 4, providing that a justice of the peace shall have no cognizance of any action "where the title to land shall in any wise come in question as hereinafter provided," is synonymous with the right of possession, and a question of "actual possession" is not one of title within the statute. Ehle v. Quackenboss (N. Y.) 6 Hill, 537, 539.

In Pub. St. c. 196, § 30, providing that whenever an action of trespass shall be brought before any justice court, and the defendant shall plead the general issue, he shall not be allowed to offer any evidence that may bring the title to real estate in question, the word "title" signifies, not the fact of plaintiff's possession, but his right of possession. Carroll v. Rigney, 23 Atl. 46, 47, 15 R. I. 81.

"Title," as used in a statute declaring that the jurisdiction given to justices of the peace shall not extend to any action wherein the title of any lands, tenements, hereditaments, or other real estate shall or may in any wise come in question, is to be understood in a strict technical sense. "An action wherein the title comes in question is, in the meaning of the statute, one in which something more is brought into controversy than the actual occupation, or mere pedis possessio. It is one which involves justa causa possidendi." Gregory v. Kanouse, 11 N. J. Law (6 Halst.) 62, 63.

As right to property.

"It is insisted that the complainant has not acquired a title to the land by the issuing and levying of an execution thereon before the filing of the bill. Much learning has been expended in this case as to the meaning of this word 'title.' We take it to mean no more than this: that the party has acquired a right to the property in dispute, a right to question the title of the fraudulent grantee, who holds by conveyances giving him a perfect title as against the grantor, but which may be avoided by a creditor." McKibben v. Barton, 1 Mich. (Manning) 213, 214.

"Title," as defined by Jacob, in his Law Dictionary, includes a right, but is the more general word. Abbott defines "title" to be such a claim to the exclusive control and enjoyment of a thing as the law will recognize and the courts, and, as applied to lands or goods, signifies either a party's right to the enjoyment thereof or the means whereby such right is approved or by which it is evidenced. Webster defines it as a right, as a good title, or an imperfect title; the instrument which is evidence of a right; that by which a beneficiary holds a benefice by the canon law. Worcester defines it as that which gives a right or claim to ownership; that by which the owner of lands or personal property has the just possession of his property; the instrument or document by which a title to something is approved. Pratt v. Fountain, 73 Ga. 261, 262.

Same—Evidence of right.

The word "title," as used in reference to bona fide purchasers, has reference to the evidence of rights held by the vendor, which by a conveyance becomes the purchaser's evidence of right, and not to what may be the real beneficial interest of that person, as may be shown outside of such evidence by extrinsic proof. Patty v. Middleton, 82 Tex. 586, 591, 17 S. W. 909, 911.

"Title" may be defined generally "to be the evidence of right which a person has to the possession of property." 2 Abb. Law Dict. 566; Chapman v. Dougherty, 87 Mo. 617, 620, 56 Am. Rep. 469.

The word "title," when used in connection with real estate, is generally defined to be the evidence of right by which a person has possession of property. Guler v. Bridges (Ky.) 70 S. W. 288, 289.

One's title to land is the evidence of his right or of the extent of his interest; the means whereby the owner is enabled to assert or maintain his possession; the right of the owner, considered with reference either to the manner in which it has been acquired or its capacity of being effectually transferred. Robertson v. Vancleave, 29 N. E. 781, 129 Ind. 217, 15 L. R. A. 68.

TITLE BOND.

Though a title bond has become a common mode of making an equitable conveyance, it is in fact but an executory contract in writing for the sale of real estate, to be afterwards consummated by further action when the conditions are complied with. It has been assimilated to a conveyance from the vendor, followed by a reconveyance to him from the vendee by way of mortgage to secure the purchase money. It does resemble that, and in effect has substantially the same consequences in most respects; yet, where the real justice of the case requires a distinction, the general analogy should not be suffered to mislead. In every respect a title bond is but an agreement to convey, from which a court of equity creates an equitable estate in the vendee, holding the vendor as his trustee for the land and the purchaser as the vendor's trustee for the money. Atkinson v. Hudson, 44 Ark. 192, 196.

A title bond has always been considered a lien merely. Light v. Greenwich Ins. Co. (Tenn.) 58 S. W. 851, 853.

"Title bonds" are said to be mortgages at common law, and the relations of the parties are those of mortgagor and mortgagee. Wells v. Francis, 4 Pac. 49, 50, 7 Colo. 396 (citing Merritt v. Judd, 14 Cal. 59; Lewis v. Hawkins, 90 U. S. [23 Wall.] 123, 23 L. Ed. 113).

Deed distinguished.

There is a wide difference between a deed for land and a title bond. The one is the evidence of an executive contract; the other is the evidence of an unexecuted contract. The former is evidence that a sale has been made; the latter that a sale is to be made. The one is a sale; and the other a contract for a sale. Peterson v. Richman, 23 S. W. 53, 54, 93 Tenn. 71 (citing Moseby v. Partee, 52 Tenn. [5 Helsk.] 30).

TITLE BY ADVERSE POSSESSION.

"Title by adverse possession" is not merely an equitable, but a complete legal, title. The law creates and confers the title arising from adverse possession. It does not flow from a contract between the parties which could be reduced to writing and put of record. There is no privity between the possessor and him who is dispossessed, and the right of the former does not result from any act of the latter, but is the effect given by the law to his possession. MacGregor v. Thompson, 26 S. W. 649, 7 Tex. Civ. App. 82.

TITLE BY ALLUVION.

See "Alluvion."

TITLE BY DESCENT.

"Title by descent" is a title by which one person upon the death of another acquires real estate of the latter as his heir at law. Property acquired by descent is property which the law, upon the death of the ancestor, casts on the heir. Orr v. White, 6 N. E. 909, 910, 106 Ind. 341.

TITLE BY LIMITATION.

"Title by limitation" and title by prescription to real estate are practically synonymous. Dalton v. Rentaria, 15 Pac. 37, 41, 2 Ariz. 275.

TITLE BY PRESCRIPTION.

Title by limitation and "title by prescription" to real estate are practically synonymous. Dalton v. Rentaria, 15 Pac. 37, 41, 2 Ariz. 275.

A title by prescription is defined as one acquired by possession had during the time and in the manner fixed by law, and as applied to highways it is an easement over land acquired by user during the period and in the manner fixed by law. Gross v. McNutt, 38 Pac. 935, 937, 4 Idaho, 286, 300.

"Title by prescription" is a right which a possessor of land acquires by reason of his adverse possession during a period of time fixed by law, and where it does not originate in part under a claim of right. Burdell v. Blain, 66 Ga. 169, 170.

TITLE BY PURCHASE.

"Title by purchase," as defined by Blackstone (2 Bl. Comm. c. 15), includes every mode of acquiring an estate except that of inheritance. It includes the mode of acquiring an estate by devise or will, as well as by other modes of purchase. Delaney v. City of Salina, 9 Pac. 271, 276, 34 Kan. 532.

TITLE DEDUCIBLE FROM STATE.

An auditor's tax deed is a title "deducible of record from the state, * * * or from any public officer or other person authorized * * * to sell such lands for nonpayment of taxes," within the meaning of Rev. St. Ill. c. 66, § 2, providing that possession under such title for seven years is sufficient to protect the holder thereof. Mattison v. Walker (U. S.) 16 Fed. Cas. 1146.

TITLE DEFECTIVE IN FORM.

The phrase "title defective in form," as used in the proposition that a title defective in form cannot form the basis of a prescriptive right, does not mean a title which, though apparently good, has some latent defect, nor does it mean a title which, though apparently clothed with all the formalities required by law, may be proved defective by extensive evidence; but it means a title on the face of which the defect is stamped, so that the holder of such a title cannot pretend that he possesses in good faith, for he is supposed to know the defect of form which his title shows, and cannot plead ignorance of law. Texas & P. Ry. Co. v. Smith, 15 Sup. Ct. 994, 995, 159 U. S. 66, 40 L. Ed. 77.

TITLE IN FEE.

See "Fee."

TITLE OF RECORD.

Const. § 251, provides that no action shall be maintained for possession of any lands lying within this state, where it is necessary for the claimant to rely for his recovery on a grant or petition issued by the commonwealth of Virginia prior to the year 1820 against any person claiming by possession under a title of record, unless such action be commenced within a stipulated time. Held, that the words "title of record" meant a title from the commonwealth. Shaw v. Robinson, 64 S. W. 620, 622, 111 Ky. 715.

TITLED.

"Titled," as used in Act Feb. 5, 1850 (Pasch. Dig. art. 809), providing that no certificate of land, land warrant, or evidence of land claim, of any kind whatever, shall hereafter be located upon any land heretofore titled within certain limits, means land granted by the government. Truehart v. Babcock, 51 Tex. 169, 177.

"Titled," as used in Const. art. 14, § 2, providing that all genuine land certificates shall be located, surveyed, or patented only on vacant and unappropriated public domain, and not upon any lands titled from the sovereignty of the state, means land for which a patent is issued, which on its face is evidence that the state has parted with its right and conferred it on the grantee, for reasons not appearing on the face of the patent. The grant may be void, or voidable, but the land embraced in it is nevertheless land titled. Winsor v. O'Connor, 8 S. W. 519, 520, 69 Tex. 571.

"Titled lands," as used in Const. art. 14, § 2, providing that land certificates shall not be located on any "land titled or equitably owned under color of title from the state," includes lands conveyed by a commissioner with power to issue title, and locations of grants made on such lands do not constitute titled land, nor color of title. Texas-Mexican Ry. Co. v. Locke, 12 S. W. 80, 89, 74 Tex. 370.

TITULO.

The Spanish word "título" means, according to Spanish authority, the cause in virtue of which anything is possessed, and the instrument by which the right is accredited; and in Spain and Mexico they are a class of title (títulos), not translatable of property. But it is to be applied as well to title papers, which convey "title," in the usual acceptance of the term, as to those which confer a mere right of occupancy. De Haro v. United States, 72 U. S. (5 Wall.) 599, 626, 18 L. Ed. 681.

TO.

See "From and To."

The preposition "to" indicates direction, so that an agreement to convey title to the government would be plain, but where it is used in an agreement stating that the title to certain lands is in the government means ownership of the land or property. Balch v. Arnold, 59 Pac. 434, 437, 9 Wyo. 17.

"To," as commonly used, conveys the idea of movement towards, and actually reaching, a specified point or object, and the meaning is not satisfied until the point or object be actually attained. An agreement to pay a certain sum of money when a railroad should be extended to a certain section did not become obligatory upon the extension of the road within 500 feet of the section. Stevens v. Ambler, 23 South. 10, 12, 39 Fla. 575.

A charge of a court that plaintiff, in support of his allegations, "brings evidence to show" certain facts, is not an affirmation that the evidence does show facts stated, and is quite distinct from and opposite to an assertion that he brings facts that show such and such things. The one form of expression merely designates the purpose for which the evidence is introduced; the other is a positive declaration that it establishes those facts. Central R. R. v. Freeman, 75 Ga. 331, 338.

The use of the words "to or from" in the reservation in a deed to lay railroad tracks to or from limekilns reserved by the grantor means to or from the locality where they are situated, in such a manner and to such an extent as to enable the grantor to enjoy their use and possession for the purpose named in the reservation. Janes v. Fonda, 8 Atl. 195, 58 Vt. 453.

As exclusive or inclusive.

In designating boundaries the word "to" without the word "inclusive" excludes the object to which the line runs. Thompson v. Blackwell, 5 La. 465, 466; Municipality No. 2 v. Municipality No. 1, 17 La. 573, 576.

The words "from," "to," and "at" are taken inclusively, according to the subject-matter. Union Pac. R. Co. v. Hall, 91 U. S. 343, 346, 23 L. Ed. 428.

The word "to" is a word of exclusion, when used in describing premises—to an object named, excluding the terminus mentioned. Bradley v. Rice, 13 Me. (1 Shep.) 198, 201, 29 Am. Dec. 501; Bonney v. Morrill, 52 Me. 252, 256; Montgomery v. Reed, 69 Me. 510, 514.

The words "to," "from," and "by," when used to express boundaries, ordinarily mean terms of exclusion, and are always to be understood in that way, unless there is something in the connection which makes it manifest that they were used in a different sense. Wells v. Jackson Iron Mfg. Co., 48 N. H. 491, 537.

Where a municipal charter provided that the damages incurred in extending a street shall be paid by the real estate fronting on either side of the extension and of the original street to a point to be fixed by the common council, and also by the real estate fronting on cross streets, or streets forming a junction with such street improvement, and within a hundred feet of the same, and an assessment was made for the extension of L. street from A. street, southerly "to R. street," the words "to R. street" should not be construed to include R. street for the purposes of taxation. Schumacker v. Toberman, 56 Cal. 508, 510.

"To" is a word of exclusion, unless it appears by necessary implication to have been used in a different sense. Bradley v. Rice, 13 Me. (1 Shep.) 198, 29 Am. Dec. 501. As used in Acts Vt. 1898, No. 265, prescribing the proceedings for the appointment of commissioners to determine the damages sustained by the owners of land taken, and providing that they shall be the same as those provided for in V. S. 8815 "to" 3821, which sections shall govern all proceedings to the final determination of the matter, it is inclusive. Littleton Bridge Co. v. Pike, 47 Atl. 108, 72 Vt. 7.

In an order granting parties to the 28th of January in which to file a certain statement of facts, the word "to" will be held to include the day mentioned, so that service on the 28th day was sufficient. Ordinarily whether the words "to," "till," or "until" will be held to be words of inclusion or exclusion is usually determined by the context of the statute or instrument in which they are used, and will be held to include or exclude the day named, as the evident intention requires. State v. Benson, 58 Pac. 217, 219, 21 Wash. 365.

An order issued under Pub. Loc. Laws of the City of Baltimore, art. 4, § 170, providing that a bill of exceptions may be signed within 30 days, but not thereafter, unless the time for signing such bill shall have been previously extended by order of court, extending the time for the signing of such a bill "to" a certain day, must be regarded as intending to include the day named, so that an order issued on such a day for a still further extension is valid. Gottlieb v. Fred W. Wolf Co., 23 Atl. 198, 199, 75 Md. 126.

Same—Computation of time.

"To" has no settled legal meaning, but is defined to be a word of exclusion, unless, by necessary implication, it must be held to be used in an inclusive sense; and as used in an order extending the time to make and serve a case to a certain date is used in the sense of "till" or "until," and does not include such date. City of Garden City v. Merchants' & Farmers' Nat. Bank, 60 Pac. 823, 824, 8 Kan. App. 785.

As used in an indorsement on a promissory note as follows: "Interest paid on the within note to July 26th, '71"—"to" is construed to mean that the interest is paid up to the 26th, and not including the 26th. Stearns v. Sweet, 78 Ill. 446, 448.

Where an order extends the time for filing a statement on motion for a new trial or for doing any act in practice to a specified day, the day specified is part of the time within which the act may be done. Penn Placer Min. Co. v. Schreiner, 35 Pac. 878, 14 Mont. 121.

The word "to," in common parlance and sometimes in legal phraseology, is applied to time. It has also various significations indicating toward, to, and into. In regard to time, it often indicates a coming or passing into a day; and hence where a seller was to deliver oil, "buyer's option, at any time from this date to December 31, 1870," the seller had the whole of December 31st to perform. Conawingo Petroleum Refining Co. v. Cunningham, 75 Pa. (25 P. F. Smith) 138, 140.

Gen. Laws, c. 112, § 4, making it an offense for any person to have in his possession any ruffed grouse "from" the 1st day of January "to" the 1st day of October, will be construed as reading between the 1st day of January and the 1st day of October. State v. Stone, 38 Atl. 654, 20 R. I. 269.

As by.

In considering a complaint for an unlawful sale of intoxicating liquors by the defendant "to a person whose name is not known by the complainant," the courts said: "The allegation that a person is not known 'by' the complainant has the same signification as the allegation that he is not known 'to' him." Commonwealth v. Griffin, 115 Mass. 175, 176.

As from.

A railroad ticket with the words "Portland to Boston" on it does not entitle the holder to a ride from Boston to Portland. Keeley v. Boston & M. R. Co., 67 Me. 163, 165, 24 Am. Rep. 19.

As in.

"To," as used in a deed describing the property as lot 14, in block No. 19, "to" a certain village, should be construed as meaning "in," though it is not so accurate and proper as the word "in." Delorme v. Ferk, 24 Wis. 201, 203.

"To the house," as used in a benefit certificate, providing that the beneficiary should receive sick benefits if he were sick so as to be totally disabled, and absolutely, necessarily, and continuously confined "to the house," does not mean the same as in the house. "To" signifies direction, connection with, appurtenant, while "in" signifies the quality of being interior. Strictly speaking, confinement to a house differs from confinement in a house. According to the strictly literal meaning of the words, the person may be absolutely, necessarily, and continuously confined to the house notwithstanding he spent a portion of his time in the dooryard. It would be generally understood that a sick person was confined to the house although he went into the dooryard to take sun baths or get fresh air. Scales v. Masonic Protective Ass'n, 48 Atl. 1084, 1085, 70 N. H. 490.

As in furtherance of.

"To a common purpose," as used in Laws 1893, p. 120, § 2, giving as the four requisites to constitute co-employees fellow servants, as: "They must be engaged in the common service, in the same grade of employment, working together at the same time and place, and to a common purpose"—means that the acts required of each in the performance of his duties at the time of the accident must be in furtherance of the common service. Gulf, C. & S. F. Ry. Co. v. Warner, 35 S. W. 364, 366, 89 Tex. 475.

As into.

"To," as used in a charter authorizing a railroad company to construct its line "to" a city, empowers it to construct the line "into" the city. Waycross Air-Line R. Co. v. Offerman & W. R. Co., 35 S. E. 275, 276, 109 Ga. 827; Hazlehurst v. Freeman, 52 Ga. 244, 246.

When used in a charter of a turnpike company authorizing them to build a road from Troy "to" Hudson, the word "to" does not mean that the road was to terminate on arriving at the bounds of the city of Hudson, but entitled the company to construct the road within the corporate limits to the compact part of the city. President, etc., of Farmers' Turnpike Road v. Coventry (N. Y.) 10 Johns. 389, 392.

"To," when used in a charter authorizing a turnpike company to construct a railroad to a certain city, means to a point within the city to which the corporation was authorized to construct its road. Mohawk Bridge Co. v. Utica & S. R. Co. (N. Y.) 6 Paige, 554, 562.

"To," as used in an indictment charging an illegal transportation of intoxicating liquors from a place in one county to a town in another county, does not mean into or within such town. Going "to" a line is not going beyond it. It is not crossing the line. "To" is a term of exclusion, unless, by necessary implication, it is manifestly used in a different sense. "To" an object excludes the terminus referred to. State v. Bushey, 24 Atl. 940, 84 Me. 459.

As through.

Under a city charter providing that the city may take stock in companies constructing roads running to the city, it is held that a road running through the city is a road running to it. City of Aurora v. West, 9 Ind. 74, 85.

The words "to said city," in an authority to a city to take stock in a chartered company for making a road or roads to said city, does not limit the city to subscriptions to roads terminating in the city, but it may subscribe to stock in a road to other cities and towns, from the nearest of which to the city subscribing there is a direct road; the road in which the stock is taken being in fact a road in extension and prolongation of one leading into the city. Von Hostrup v. Madison City, 68 U. S. (1 Wall.) 291, 296, 17 L. Ed. 538.

As towards.

As used in a marine policy providing that the ship should not sail from any port on the east coast of Great Britain to any port in the belts between certain dates, "to" means "towards" or "on the voyage to," and is not limited to going to the place of destination so as to arrive at a belt port within the prohibited time, and is not synonymous with "at," and consequently prohibits voyages toward the places named within the period mentioned; and hence if the vessel was on the voyage to a belt port within the prohibited period, but would not arrive there until after the expiration of such period, the insurance company would not be liable for a loss sustained. Colledge v. Harty, 6 Exch. 205, 211.

As which.

Where a statute giving a right of action for stock injured on its right of way, and excepting any railroad company whose road is inclosed with a good and lawful fence "to prevent" such animals from being on the track, the use of the words "which prevent" in an instruction in an action for damages, instead of the language of the statute "to prevent," should not be construed as misleading, the two phrases being practically synonymous. Missouri Pac. Ry. Co. v. Eckel, 31 Pac. 693, 694, 49 Kan. 794.

TO ALL INTENTS AND PURPOSES.

Under 9 Ann. c. 14, § 1, providing that notes given for money lent for gaming purposes shall be void, "to all intents and purposes," such notes are void even in the hands of an innocent purchaser for value without notice, since it would be making the notes of some value to the lender if he could pay his own debts with it. Bowyer v. Bampton, 2 Strange, 1155.

Under St. 23 Geo. III, c. 56, certain trustees on behalf of the parish of St. Luke purchased premises in the parish of St. Leonards, and there erected a workhouse. Section 11 exempted the premises from any greater parochial or parliamentary tax than to such amount as they were before assessed at. 40 Geo. III, c. 97, § 1, repealed this act, and constituted a new governing body in the parish, transferring to them all the property vested in them and possessed by them "as fully, effectually, and beneficially, and in as large and ample manner, and to all intents and purposes whatsoever, as the same were vested in and possessed by the former trustees." Held, that while the word "beneficially" alone might not have the effect of reserving the exemption concerning taxation contained in the repeal act, being coupled with the words, "to all intents and purposes whatsoever," they were to be considered as having that effect, and such words were not merely words of conveyance only. Reg. v. Inhabitants of St. Leonard's, Shoreditch, 13 Q. B. 964, 975.

Though a statute providing that gaming notes were void to "all intents and purposes whatever," it should not be construed so as to avoid the note in the hands of a bona fide indorsee. Haight v. Joyce, 2 Cal. 64, 66, 56 Am. Dec. 311.

TO AND ALONG.

"To and along," as used in the description of a deed carrying the property to and along a road, would, by well-settled construction, carry the boundary to the center, if not controlled by the starting point. Kings County Fire Ins. Co. v. Stevens, 87 N. Y. 287, 293, 41 Am. Rep. 361.

TO AND AMONGST.

Where those words were used in a will relating to the division of property "to and amongst" children, each child must have some share assigned to him. Doe v. Alchin, 2 Barn. & Ald. 122, 125.

TO THE AMOUNT OF.

Where a policy of insurance for $6,000 was assigned to B. as "collateral security to the amount of $3,000," the sum or aggregate amount to be received by the assignee was thereby limited and fixed at $3,000. It would have been no stronger had the words used been "to an amount not exceeding $3,000." To say "to the amount of" means "no more than that amount." Swartley v. McCracken (Pa.) 7 Montg. Co. Law Rep'r, 49, 50.

Const. 1868, art. 13, §§ 2, 3, providing that stockholders shall be liable for all debts of the corporation due at the time of its dissolution to the amount of their stock, means that the stockholders shall not only be liable to the amount remaining undue on their stock, but in an additional sum equal to the amount of their stock. McDonald v. Alabama Gold Life Ins. Co., 5 South. 120, 121, 85 Ala. 401.

TO AND FOR HER BENEFIT.

A bequest to a wife, stipulating that the property shall be held by her "to and for her use, benefit, and right, without let, hindrance, molestation," has the effect of excluding her husband from any rights in the property. Newman v. James, 12 Ala. 29, 31.

TO ARRIVE.

"To arrive" is a neuter verb, and when applied to an object moving from place to place designates the fact of coming to or reaching one place from another, or reaching a place by traveling or moving towards it. Thompson v. United States (U. S.) 23 Fed. Cas. 1107, 1109.

As rendering sale conditional.

The use of the phrase "to arrive," in a contract of sale of goods to arrive by a certain vessel, operates to preclude title to the goods from passing till the vessel arrives. Benedict v. Field, 16 N. Y. 595, 597.

The use of the words "to arrive" in a contract to sell and deliver goods "to arrive" on a certain vessel operates to render the contract conditional, and if the ship be lost, or the subject-matter of the sale does not arrive in the ship, the contract is at an end. Shields v. Pettee, 4 N. Y. Super. Ct. (2 Sandf.) 262, 268.

As a warranty.

Defendant agreed to sell plaintiffs one hundred tons of soda, "to arrive" ex Daniel Grant, etc. Held, that the contract did not amount to a warranty on the part of the seller that the soda would arrive if the vessel arrived, but was a contract for the sale of goods at a future period, subject to a double condition of the arrival of the vessel with the specified cargo on board. Johnson v. MacDonald, 9 Mees. & W. 600.

Where a seller agreed to sell goods expected to arrive by a particular ship, and goods of the description contracted to be sold do arrive on that ship, but are consigned to a third party, the vendor is not liable for failure to deliver the goods, since there was an implied condition that the goods were not only to arrive, but that they were to be consigned to the vendor so as to be within his power. Gorriessen v. Perrin, 2 C. B. (N. S.) 681, 702.

Defendant contracted to sell plaintiffs 50 tons of palm oil, "to arrive" per the Mansfield, etc., and in case of nonarrival of the vessels, or of the arrival of vessels not having so much on board after the delivery of former contracts, the contract to be void. The Mansfield on arrival had on board 235 tons of oil, but the contracts made previously to that above mentioned amounted to 228 tons, leaving only seven tons applicable to the contract. Held, that the contract was for 50 tons, and was entire, and, such an amount not having arrived on the Mansfield after delivery of oil to prior contracts, the plaintiffs were not even entitled to the seven tons over that required to satisfy such former contracts, the words "to arrive," etc., being a condition precedent to defendant's liability to deliver. Lovatt v. Hamilton, 5 Mees. & W. 639.

"To arrive by vessel or vessels," as used in a contract to sell goods to arrive by vessel or vessels within 60 days from date, is to be construed as not limited to goods arriving in the seller's vessels, but by all vessels coming to the port where the sale was made. Fraser v. Harbeck, 27 N. Y. Super. Ct. (4 Rob.) 179, 181.

In considering an instrument worded "Sold D. H. Rogers 1,000 sacks coarse Liverpool and 2,000 sacks fine Liverpool salt at $2.10 per sack, to arrive by the 15th of November," the court said: "Effect is, of course, to be given to the words of the contract to arrive by the 15th of November; but the question is, what effect? They are, we think, words of condition and description only, and cannot be considered as warranty that the salt shall arrive. They serve to distinguish the salt which was the subject of the contract from the mass of salt of the same variety found in the market. The salt plaintiffs contracted to sell and defendants contracted to buy was not salt which plaintiffs may have had on hand or salt which may have previously arrived. It was salt which was to arrive between the date of the contract and the 15th of November. Whether it would arrive or not depended upon contingencies not absolutely within the control of either party. If it arrived within the time limited, plaintiffs were impliedly bound to deliver it under the contract. If it failed to arrive within that time, no such obligation arose. There was in that case no salt which under the terms of the contract the plaintiffs were bound to deliver or the defendant bound to accept. Rogers v. Woodruff, 23 Ohio St. 632, 635, 636, 13 Am. Rep. 276.

TO BE.

"To be" is sometimes used as synonymous with "to become," "to be made to be." Bolsdere v. Citizens' Bank, 9 La. 506, 511, 29 Am. Dec. 453.

TO BE ADVANCED.

"To be advanced," as used in a bond by which the undersigned agreed to indemnify the national bank to the extent of £1,000 "advanced or to be advanced" a certain person, but said indemnity to cease when he shall have paid in the said sum of £1,000 to the credit of his account, the words "advanced or to be advanced," though fairly admitting of the construction that future as well as past advances were meant, would not be so considered, in view of the fact that at the time the guaranty was given the person to whom advances were secured already owed a debt of £1,400, due to the bank. Bell v. Welch, 9 C. B. 154, 168.

TO BE CHARGED.

A city ordinance providing that the rates of fare "to be charged" on any street railway within the city limits shall be a certain fixed sum applies not only to companies existing at the time the ordinance was enacted, but to those coming into existence thereafter; the words refer to the future, to what is to be charged hereafter, and are certainly prospective in their meaning. Chicago Union Traction Co. v. City of Chicago, 65 N. E. 451, 470, 199 Ill. 484, 50 L. R. A. 631.

TO BE COMMENCED.

Where in one section of an act it is provided that in suits "commenced" the plaintiff will not be allowed more costs than damages if he recover less than $6, and in another section the provisions were made applicable only to suits "to be commenced," the ambiguity of the phraseology was such as to forbid a construction rendering the act applicable to actions commenced prior to its passage. White v. Hunt, 6 N. J. Law (1 Halst. Ch.) 415, 418.

TO BE DEFINED.

When an already fixed and defined boundary line is proposed "to be defined," the expression is tantamount to saying that the line already defined will be redefined, changed, altered, and differently fixed. State v. Hocker, 18 South. 767, 769, 36 Fla. 358.

TO BE DESIGNATED.

"To be designated from time to time," as used in Laws 1870, c. 383, § 1, providing for the publication of city advertising in a specified number of newspapers, "to be designated from time to time" by the mayor and comptroller of said city, does not abrogate all previous designations, but until the officers named made new designations under that act the designations made under previous acts remained in force. It does not imperatively require subsequent action on the part of those officers in order to make any publication lawful. "The Legislature intended to confer the power on the mayor and comptroller to change the selection of newspapers after the passage of the act from time to time in their discretion, and the words 'to be' may have been deemed necessary to accomplish that intent. Without them the act might have been construed as referring only to prior designations, and the expression 'from time to time' may be held to limit and qualify the force which might otherwise be given to the words 'to be.' In re Folsom, 56 N. Y. 60, 65.

TO BE PAID.

The words "to be paid," in a note to be paid in solvent notes and accounts of other men, are equivalent to the word "payable." Williams v. Sims, 22 Ala. 512, 516.

"To be paid," as used in the insurance law providing that all money "to be paid" on a policy by a mutual benefit insurance company shall be exempt, seems to have been chosen to exclude the possibility of a construction which would exempt such moneys from the payment of debts or liabilities of members or other beneficiaries after they had been paid over. The exemption refers, not to moneys paid or when paid, but to be paid. This view accords not only with the ordinary and appropriate use of the language employed, but with the obvious purpose of the Legislature to protect membership insurance companies as well as their members and beneficiaries from the annoyances which would result if a beneficiary fund could be the subject of attack by the importunate creditors of such members and beneficiaries. Bull v. Case, 59 N. E. 301, 302, 165 N. Y. 578.

TO BE PASSED.

"To be passed," as used in the bond of a tax officer given to secure the collection of taxes, which provides that it is to secure the collection of taxes which may be authorized by any act to be passed in the present session of parliament, and which is executed during the session, is to be construed as including any act passed during such session, though passed before the execution of the bond. Nares v. Rowles, 14 East, 510, 518.

TO BE SELECTED.

"To be selected," as used in a conveyance by the owner of a township of a certain number of acres "to be selected" in the east half of the township by the grantor in one or two lots, implies that title passed to be held in common until selected. The right of selection was not a condition precedent, but a right subordinate, to be exercised or not, at the will of the grantee upon partition. Donworth v. Sawyer, 47 Atl. 521, 523, 94 Me. 243.

TO BE TAKEN.

"To be taken," as used in a contract for the sale and purchase of glassware "to be made after September first, and to be taken by January first, 1883," by a custom in such business gives the buyer a right of ordering the goods to be shipped as he wishes between the dates, and the seller must ship as ordered, and may not deliver the goods without such order. Atkinson v. Truesdell, 6 N. Y. Supp. 509, 57 N. Y. Super. Ct. (25 Jones & S.) 228.

TO BE USED.

The words, "to be used by a certain date," in a limited railroad passenger ticket, do not operate to require the passenger to complete his journey by the date mentioned, but he is only required to commence the journey by such time. Gulf, O. & S. F. Ry. Co. v. Looney, 19 S. W. 1039, 1042, 85 Tex. 158, 16 L. R. A. 471, 34 Am. St. Rep. 796.

"To be used as cabinet warerooms," as used in a lease of a building "to be used as cabinet warerooms," does not amount to a direct covenant to use the building as such and for no other purposes whatever. Brugman v. Noyes, 6 Wis. 1, 10.

Where plaintiff furnished a large quantity of brick under a general contract to a contractor engaged in the erection of several distinct buildings, and had no knowledge that any particular supply was going to any particular building, he cannot enforce a lien for a balance due against one of the buildings in which a portion of the bricks were used on the ground that such bricks were materials furnished "to be used," within the meaning of a Washington statute giving a lien for such materials. Eisenbeis v. Wakeman, 28 Pac. 923, 924, 3 Wash. 534.

TO BECOME.

See "Become."

TO THE COLLECTOR.

"To the collector," as used in U. S. Embargo Act, 2 Story's Laws, p. 1071 (2 Stat. 451), providing that no registered or sea letter vessel shall be allowed to depart from one port of the United States to any other within the same, unless the owner, master, consignee, or factor of such vessel shall first "give bonds," with one or more sureties, to the collector of the districts from which she is bound to depart, etc., does not mean that the bond is to be made payable to the collector, but that it is to be made payable to the United States and delivered to the collector. Dixon v. United States (U. S.) 7 Fed. Cas. 761, 763.

TO EFFECT.

See "Prosecute to or with Effect."

TO THE FULL AMOUNT.

The phrase "to the full amount," in Sess. Laws 1896, c. 185, § 80, providing that no corporation shall make dividends except from the surplus or net profits from the business, or pay to the stockholders any part of the capital stock, except in accordance therewith, and providing that the directors violating such provision shall be jointly and severally liable to the corporation and its creditors, in the event of its dissolution or insolvency, to the full amount of the dividend made, "seems to indicate that the liability may, under supposable circumstances, be less than the whole amount of the dividends paid. The provision in the act is intended as an indemnity against injury, such as is capable of computation in dollars and cents, and giving it that construction will avoid enforcing a pure penalty." Siegman v. Maloney, 51 Atl. 1008, 1010, 63 N. J. Eq. 422.

TO HAVE AND TO HOLD.

The words "to have and to hold" in a deed is but a habendum clause, the purpose of which is merely to define the estate which the grantee is to take in the property conveyed. Wheeler v. Wayne County, 24 N. E. 625, 626, 132 Ill. 599.

TO HER SOLE AND SEPARATE USE.

See "Sole Use."

TO HER USE AND BEHOOF FOREVER.

A devise to testator's wife, "to her use and behoof forever," giving her power to expend the property for her support and maintenance during her lifetime, and providing that so much of the estate as remains unexpended at her death shall be disposed of in a specified manner, implies that the wife should have the power of expending the property only for her support and maintenance during her lifetime, with the power of expending it only so far as it was necessary for her reasonable support and maintenance. Chase v. Ladd, 153 Mass. 126, 26 N. E. 429, 25 Am. St. Rep. 614.

TO LOW WATER MARK.

"To the low water mark," as used in Me. Colonial Ord. 1641, which provides that in all creeks, coves, and other places above and upon salt water, where the sea ebbs and flows, the proprietor of the land adjoining shall have propriety to the "low water mark," etc., means to the low water mark in the nearest direction, without any regard to the course of the side lines of the upland to which the flats are adjoining and appurtenant. Emerson v. Taylor, 9 Me. (9 Greenl.) 42, 43, 23 Am. Dec. 531.

TO A MOUNTAIN OR RIDGE.

To a mountain or ridge means summit point, or summit line, unless otherwise expressed. Pol. Code Cal. 1903, § 3905; Pol. Code Mont. 1895, § 4105; Rev. St. Ariz. 1901, par. 929.

TO MY KNOWLEDGE.

"To my knowledge," as used in an application for a life insurance policy in which the applicant stated that there is no hereditary taint of any kind in the family on either side of the house "to my knowledge," restricts and narrows down the affirmation to what the applicant himself personally knew touching the subject. The affirmation has this extent, no more. Northwestern Mut. Life Ins. Co. v. Gridley, 100 U. S. 614, 616, 25 L. Ed. 748.

TO MY USE.

An indorsement on a bill of exchange to "pay the money to my use" has been held to be a restrictive indorsement, which operates to put an end to the negotiability of the paper. Lee v. Chillicothe Branch of State Bank (U. S.) 15 Fed. Cas. 151, 153.

TO THE OCEAN SHORE.

To the ocean shore means a point three miles from shore. Pol. Code Cal. 1903, § 3907.

TO THE ORDER OF.

A bill payable "to the order of A." is the same as if payable "to A. or order." Huling v. Hugg (Pa.) 1 Watts & S. 418, 420.

TO PLAINTIFF'S DAMAGE.

"To plaintiff's damage," as used in a complaint declaring upon a book account of $929.59, which, after stating the cause of action, concluded with the words, "to plaintiff's damage" $500, which allegation was followed by a prayer for judgment for the amount of the debt, interest, and costs, means nothing. It is a mere flourish of the pleader, and is not intended to limit, nor does it limit, the entire amount of the recovery to $500. Where interest is allowable not eo nomine, but by way of damages, such an allegation may be proper. Buer v. Prescott, 14 S. W. 138, 77 Tex. 438.

TO THE ROAD.

A conveyance describing one call as being "to a road," and then running along the road, should be construed to mean to the center of the road. Sizer v. Devereux (N. Y.) 16 Barb. 160, 166.

"To the road," as used in a deed of land reciting that the line runs "to the road, and thence by the road," means to the center of the road, though the measurement of distances would extend only to the side of the road. Oxton v. Groves, 68 Me. 371, 372, 28 Am. Rep. 75 (citing Hunt v. Rich, 38 Me. 195; Cottle v. Young, 59 Me. 105; In re Reed, 13 N. H. 381, 384).

The words "to a highway" in a deed describing lands as running to a highway will be construed, in the absence of anything showing a contrary intention, as fixing the boundary of the land at the center of the highway. Buck v. Squiers, 22 Vt. 484, 489.

"To the road," as used in a deed of land describing a line as extending westerly "to the road," means to the center of the road. Goodeno v. Hutchinson, 54 N. H. 159, 163.

A deed describing the boundaries of the land as "to, upon, or along a highway or railroad" does not convey the land to the center of the highway or railroad, unless the grantor owns the fee of the highway or railroad. Church v. Stiles, 10 Atl. 674, 675, 59 Vt. 642.

TO THE SATISFACTION OF THE COURT.

See "Satisfaction of the Court."

TO THE STREAM.

A boundary in a deed "to a stream," "on a stream," or "by a stream" includes the flats at least to low water mark, and in many cases to the middle thread of the river. Thomas v. Hatch (U. S.) 23 Fed. Cas. 948, 949.

To a creek, river, slough, strait, or bay means the middle of the main channel thereof, unless otherwise expressed. Pol. Code Mont. 1895, § 4106; Pol. Code Cal. 1903, § 3908.

A deed describing land as extending "to a tree on the bank of the river" should be construed to locate the line at the thread of the stream, notwithstanding the description contains other words giving the length of lines and quantity of land conveyed. Kent v. Taylor, 13 Atl. 419, 64 N. H. 489.

TO THAT EFFECT.

See "Effect."

TO THAT END.

Where a testator directed his executors to pay certain legacies, and gave to trustees all property remaining after such payments and after the payment of debts, and after directing the trustees to pay certain bequests he declared that "to that end" he gave them all property remaining after payment of debts and of such legacies and other payments as are to be paid by the executors, the words "to that end" should not be construed to cut down the amount of property given to the trustees, but to only explain why he did not leave in the hands of the executors enough to pay all of the legacies, and that the property given the trustees was not restricted to what was necessary to pay certain legacies to be paid through them. Weber v. Bryant, 37 N. E. 203, 161 Mass. 400.

TO THE USE OF A THIRD PERSON.

An indorsement on a bill of exchange to "pay the contents to the use of a third person" has been held to be a restrictive indorsement, which operates to put an end to the negotiability of the paper. Lee v. Chillicothe Branch State Bank (U. S.) 15 Fed. Cas. 151, 153.

TO THE WATER.

Calls in a deed which describe land on the sea shore as running "to the water, and thence by the water," carry the grant to low water mark. The words "to the water" have the same significance to carry boundary to low water mark that other words have been decided to have, such as "by the sea," "tide water," "salt water," "a harbor," "bay," "cove," "creek," "river." Babson v. Tainter, 10 Atl. 63, 64, 79 Me. 368 (citing Gould, Waters, § 195).

TO WHOM IT MAY CONCERN.

See, also, "Whom It May Concern."

A guaranty of a negotiable instrument addressed "to whom it may concern" is in the nature of an open letter of credit, and is evidently intended to give the instrument currency, and any person who advances money on the faith of it may enforce payment of the guarantor. Sawyer v. Hopgood, 13 N. Y. St. Rep. 711.

TO WIT.

The office of "to wit" is to particularize what is too general in a preceding sentence, and render clear, and of certain application, that which might seem otherwise doubtful or obscure. Buck v. Lewis, 9 Minn. 314, 317 (Gil. 298, 300).

"To wit" are words used to call attention to a more particular specification of what has preceded; and a record which stated that the jury retired to consult of "their verdict as follows, to wit," and the result of their deliberation is then given, and the verdict arrived at is spread at large upon the record, sufficiently identifies the verdict recorded as the one rendered by the Jury. Gilligan v. Commonwealth, 37 S. E. 962, 964, 99 Va. 816.

The words "to wit" and "that is to say," as used in a pleading, are termed a "videlicet." "The natural and proper use of a videlicet is to particularize that which is general before, and to explain that which is indefinite, doubtful, or obscure; but it must neither be contrary to the premises, nor increase or diminish the precedent matter; and therefore if a man selsed in fee of black acre, white acre, and green acre in D. should grant all his lands in D., viz., black acre and white acre, yet green acre shall also pass by the grant." Stukeley v. Butler, Hob. 168.

The use of the videlicet is to avoid a variance, and to avoid a positive averment, which must be strictly proved. Brown v. Berry, 47 Ill. 175, 177.

The office of a videlicet is to explain what goes before, and when it is repugnant to or inconsistent with the preceding matter it is inoperative and void. Cotton v. Ward, 19 Ky. (3 T. B. Mon.) 304, 310.

The precise and legal use of a videlicet in every species of pleading is to enable the pleader to distinguish and fix with certainty that which was before general, and which without such explanation might with equal propriety have been applied to different objects. Commonwealth v. Hart, 76 Mass. (10 Gray) 465, 468.

The office of the videlicet is to mark that the party does not undertake to prove the precise circumstances alleged, and in such cases, i. e., when the circumstances are not essential in their nature, he is ordinarily not held to prove them. State v. Heck, 23 Minn. 549, 550.

"The office of a videlicet is to explain what went before, and where it is repugnant or contradictory it is material and traversable, and as such an averment coming after a videlicet is traversable so it must be proved when material, if averred without a videlicet. The general rule in relation to allegations under a videlicet or a scilicet seems to be that if they be impossible or contrary or repugnant to the preceding matter they shall be rejected as surplusage, but where they are used to explain what goes before them, and are consistent with the preceding matter, they are material and traversable." Gleason v. McVickar (N. Y.) 7 Cow. 42, 43.

The common office of a videlicet is to state time, place, or manner which are not of the essence of the matter in issue, and thereby to relieve the party of the duty of proving the allegation strictly as made; but it may be and is frequently used as particularizing the more general antecedent matter. Sullivan v. State, 67 Miss. 346, 354, 7 South 275, 277.

The proper office of a videlicet is to particularize or explain what goes before it. It may restrain the generality of preceding words, but cannot enlarge or diminish the preceding subject-matter. In the former case it is merely explanatory of the thing which precedes it, while in the latter it is repugnant to it. When a material videlicet is preceded by words of direct averment, the videlicet is regarded as a direct allegation, and therefore is traversable, and, being regarded as traversable, it follows that if traversed it must be proved. Gould, Pl. c. 3, §§ 35-41. The pleader cannot relieve himself from the necessity of proving unnecessary allegations or irrelevant matter by putting them under a videlicet. Where, in an action on an accident policy, the complaint, after alleging the accidental death of the insured, alleged, under a videlicet clause, the cause and manner of the accident in such a manner as to make one complete and consistent allegation, the general issue traverses not only the general allegation, but also the allegations under the videlicet. Clark v. Employers' Liability Assur. Co., 48 Atl. 639, 642, 72 Vt. 458.

The precise and legal use of a videlicet in every species of pleading is defined to be to enable the pleader to isolate, to distinguish, and to fix with certainty that which was before general, and without which explanation might with equal propriety be applied to different objects. Commonwealth v. Quinlan, 153 Mass. 483, 484, 27 N. E. 8.

TOBACCO.

See "Leaf Tobacco."
As medicine, see "Medicine."

TOGETHER.

See "Acting Together"; "Taken Together."

"Together" means "in company"; "into or in union with each other as wholes or parts, so as to be combined or joined with each other; conjointly; in the same place or at the same spot with each other locally, as in company; at the same moment of time; simultaneously; contemporaneously; mutually; reciprocally." Parties contracted, in settlement of litigation over an estate, that complainant should have in fee an undivided one-third of a certain tract of land, together with the mansion house and all improvements thereon. The improvements were scattered over more than one-third of the land, and so situated that it would be impracticable to partition the tract so as to award all improvements to her. Held, that the contract should be construed as giving to complainant one-third of the tract as improved, and not one-third of the land and all the improvements in addition thereto. Clack v. Hadley (Tenn.) 64 S. W. 408, 407.

"Together," as used in Rev. St. § 1343, providing that to be fellow servants the servants must be working together at the same time and place, will not admit of the construction that they may be associated together in the prosecution of various enterprises and when residing far apart. Dryburg v. Mercur Gold Min. & Mill. Co., 55 Pac. 367, 371, 18 Utah, 410.

Where a declaration against the owner of a stagecoach asserted that the owner undertook to carry the plaintiff, her children and servants, "together" in and by a certain stage, evidence that the whole inside of the coach was taken for the plaintiff and her three daughters, and two outside places for her servants, supported the averments. Long v. Horne. 1 Car. & P. 610.

"Together," as used in a contract relating to patents, and providing that they should be "sold, leased, or disposed of together," should be construed to mean that one or more of the patents might be sold or disposed of after reasonable exertions had been made, during a reasonable length of time, under all the circumstances that might be found to exist, to sell or dispose of them together. Fowler v. Mallory, 3 Atl. 560, 563, 53 Conn. 420.

TOGETHER WITH IMPROVEMENTS.

The clause, "together with all improvements which I may make," in an assignment of a patent for a large consideration, was construed to authorize the assignee to make and sell the original invention as improved by the inventor after the assignment. Aspinwall Mfg. Co. v. Gill (U. S.) 32 Fed. 697, 700.

TOILET SOAP.

"Toilet soap," as used in Tariff Act Oct. 1, 1890, par. 79, will not include a medical soap, containing 20 per cent. of carbolic acid, and used for curative purposes. Park v. United States (U. S.) 66 Fed. 731.

TOKEN.

See "False Token."

Bank Note as Public Token, see "Bank Note."

A "token" is defined to be a sign or mark. State v. Green, 18 N. J. Law (3 Har.) 179, 181.

"Token," as used with reference to the offense of cheating, means anything which has the semblance of public authority, as false weights, measures, seals, marks of produce and manufacture, false dice, marked cards, and things of a similar kind, false and deceptive, used in unlawful games. State v. Middleton (S. C.) Dud. 275, 285.

"Token," as used in 2 Gav. & H. Rev. St. p. 445, § 27, providing for the punishment of any person who, with intent to defraud another designedly, by color of any false "token," obtains the signature of any person to a written instrument or obtains anything of value, means, as defined by Bouvier, a document or sign of the existence of a fact. Tokens are either public and general or privy tokens. They are either true or false. When a token is false, and indicates a general intent to defraud, and is used for that purpose, it will render the offender guilty of the crime of cheating; but if it is a mere privy token, as counterfeiting a letter in any man's name in order to cheat the one individual, it would not be indictable. Jones v. State, 50 Ind. 473, 476.

TOLERABLY SAFE.

"Tolerably safe" and 'actually dangerous' are not necessarily conflicting terms; indeed, the former frequently, perhaps usually, implies the latter. To illustrate, it is a dangerous thing to stand on the brink of Table Rock, and gaze into the turbulent waters of the Niagara; yet because hundred of thousands of people have done so safely, and very few have been precipitated into the abyss beneath, the act is tolerably safe." A railroad which was in a tolerably safe condition was not in a reasonably safe condition, as required by law. Stetler v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co., 6 N. W. 303, 307, 49 Wis. 609.

TOLERATE.

"The word 'tolerate' is defined thus: To allow, so as not to hinder; to permit, as something not wholly approved; to suffer; to endure; to admit." It implies knowledge of the thing tolerated. Gregory v. United States (U. S.) 10 Fed. Cas. 1195, 1198.

TOLL.

See "Intermediate Toll."

Toll is a settled, certain and defined sum exacted for the use of a common passage. Wadsworth v. Smith, 11 Me. 278, 283, 26 Am. Dec. 525.

A toll is a demand of proprietorship. St. Louis Brewing Ass'n v. City of St. Louis, 37 S. W. 525, 528, 140 Mo. 419 (citing Philadelphia & R. R. Co. v. State of Pennsylvania, 82 U. S. [15 Wall.] 232, 21 L. Ed. 146).

"Toll" is defined to be a compensation in markets and fairs for goods, cattle, etc., bought and sold. Jac. Law Dict. 'Toll.' A tribute or custom paid for passage or a duty imposed on goods and passengers traveling public roads, bridges, etc.; a tribute for passage; a reasonable sum due to the lord of a fair for things sold and which are tollable. Burr. Law Dict. "Toll"; Crabb, Real Prop. § 683. It is defined by Webster: (1) A tax paid for some liberty or privilege; particularly for the privilege of passing on a bridge or a highway, or for that of vending goods in a fair, market, or the like. (2) A liberty to buy and sell within the bounds of a manor. (3) A portion of grain taken by a miller as a compensation for grinding." The word, as used in a contract to pay for the passage of boats of one party on the canal of the other party during a specified period, does not necessarily import that payment is to be made at the times of a passage. Pennsylvania Coal Co. v. Delaware & H. Canal Co., 8 Abb. Dec. 470, 477.

In order that a demand may constitute a toll, there must be some relation between the payment to be made and the engines or wagons or quantity of coal to be conveyed over the line; some measure upon which the rate or charge or payment is to be made; and that the word "tolls" could not be construed to mean such terms of payment as the parties may agree upon. South Yorkshire R. & River Dun Co. v. Great Northern R. Co., 22 Eng. Law & Eq. 531, 535.

"Toll is the price of the privilege to travel over that particular highway, and it is a quid pro quo. It rests on the principle that he who receives the toll does or has done something as an equivalent to him who pays it. Every traveler has the right to use the turnpike as any other highway, but he must pay the toll." City of St. Louis v. Green, 7 Mo. App. 468, 476.

"Toll," as used in Comp. Laws, c. 77, § 20, relating to the establishment of the "rates, toll, or fare to be charged" by a street railway company, means a class of dues and exactions which are in the nature of fixed rights, and which cannot be lawfully exceeded. They are generally, if not universally, connected with some franchise which involves duties as well as privileges of a public or general nature. The right to receive fixed tolls is found in fairs, markets, mills, turnpikes, ferries, bridges, and many other classes of interests where the owner of the franchise is obliged to accommodate the public, and the public, in turn, are protected from extortion by an obligation to pay only regular dues. McKee v. Grand Rapids & R. L. St. Ry. Co., 1 N. W. 873, 876, 41 Mich. 274.

The word "toll" in Code, § 671, providing that where a judgment is entered against a corporation authorized to receive fare or toll the franchise of such corporation may be taken on execution, etc., means a tax paid for some use or privilege or other reasonable consideration. This is the definition given in the Century Dictionary, and the definitions in all other books are substantially the same. McNeal Pipe & Foundry Co. v. Howland, 16 S. E. 857, 860, 111 N. C. 615, 20 L. R. A. 743.

If a toll gatherer on a turnpike road exacts and receives from a traveler a sum greater than he is permitted by law to collect, it is not a collection of toll, but an extortion, so that an action to recover a penalty for it does not involve the legality of a toll, within the meaning of a constitutional provision allowing suits involving the legality of a toll to be brought in the district court. Brown v. Rice, 52 Cal. 489, 491.

Stallage.

"Toll," as applicable to fairs and markets, is defined by Lord Coke to be a reasonable sum of money due to the owner of the fair or market on sale of things tollable within the fair or market, or for stallage, picage, or the like. In Brook, Abridgment, it is said that by common law a man shall pay "toll" for nothing brought into a fair, but for things sold, but by custom he may pay for everything brought into the fair, and he shall pay for his place and his stand though he sell nothing. It may be said that in this case toll and stallage are different things, and unless the owner of the fair or market has the soil, either as a freehold or in possession, he cannot claim stallage. But where the crown grants to a person and his heirs that they may hold a market in a certain town, with all tolls or profits, and such grantee afterwards acquires the soil, he may claim stallage by virtue of the grant. Lockwood v. Wood, 6 Q. B. 31, 43.

Tax distinguished.

A "toll" is a demand of proprietorship, while a "tax" is a demand of sovereignty. City of St. Louis v. Western Union Telegraph Co., 13 Sup. Ct. 485, 487, 148 U. S. 92, 37 L. Ed. 390.

Tolls exacted under a statute for the use of an improved waterway are merely compensation for benefits conferred by which the floating of logs down a stream is facilitated. Tolls are the compensation for the use of another's property or of improvements made by him, and their amount is determined by the cost of the property or of the improvement and considerations of the return which such values or expenditures should yield. Taxes are levied for the support of the government, and their amount is regulated by its necessity, and there is no analogy between the imposition of taxes and the levying of tolls for the improvement of highways. Sands v. Manistee River Imp. Co., 8 Sup. Ct. 113, 123 U. S. 288, 31 L. Ed. 149.

Tonnage duty.

"Tolls," as exacted for passage through locks, are a compensation for the use of artificial facilities constructed, not an impost upon the navigation of the stream; and the ordinance of the government of the Northwest Territory, July 13, 1787, providing that the navigable waters leading into the Mississippi shall be forever free, does not prevent the state of Illinois from levying tonnage duties for a canal and dam used in improving the navigation of the Illinois river. Huse v. Glover, 7 Sup. Ct. 313, 315, 119 U. S. 543, 30 L. Ed. 487.

Trackage charges.

The term "tolls" in P. L. 112, imposing a certain tax on the gross receipts of a railroad company for the tolls and transportation, includes a sum which one railroad company receives from another as compensation for the use of its tracks by the latter company. Commonwealth v. New York, P. & O. R. Co., 22 Atl. 212, 213, 145 Pa. 200.

Transportation charges.

A "toll" is the tribute or custom paid for passage, not for carriage. It is always something taken for a liberty or privilege, not for a service. Boyle v. Philadelphia & R. R. Co., 54 Pa. (4 P. F. Smith) 310, 314; Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Sly, 85 Pa. (15 P. F. Smith) 205, 210; New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. v. Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, 15 Sup. Ct. 896, 898, 158 U. S. 431, 39 L. Ed. 1043; Geiger v. Perkiomen & R. Turnpike Road, 31 Atl. 918, 919, 167 Pa. 582, 28 L. R. A. 458.

"Toll" is a word applied to charges made for the use of a highway, but in railroad legislation it is very often used to express a charge for transportation. Lake Superior & M. Ry. Co. v. United States, 93 U. S. 442, 454, 23 L. Ed. 965.

Where the charter of a bridge company makes the bridge and approaches thereto a public thoroughfare or turnpike or highway, for use of which by vehicles and foot passengers it was authorized to charge reasonable toll, for the erection of which gates were established, the word "toll" was strictly applicable to the use of the highway, rather than compensation for transportation services which the bridge company might perform or be permitted to receive. Kentucky & I. Bridge Co. v. Louisville & N. R. Co. (U. S.) 37 Fed. 567, 616, 2 L. R. A. 289.

Congress in the legislative acts by which it has made donations of the public lands to the states in which they lie for the purpose of aiding in the construction of railroads has stipulated that the railroads so aided shall be public highways for the use of the government, free from all tolls or other charges of transportation of its property or troops. This reservation secures to the government only a free use of the railroad concerned, and does not entitle the government to have troops or property transported by the companies over their respective roads free of charge for transporting the same. "In coming to this conclusion we do not place any great stress upon the use of the word 'toll' as being a word peculiarly applicable to charges for the use of a highway, as contradistinguished from the charge for transportation which is more properly denominated as 'freight.' Whilst this is undoubtedly true, it must be conceded that, in the actual language of railroad legislation, the word 'toll' is very often used to express the charge for transportation also. Our opinion is based rather upon that marked distinction which the mind naturally makes, and which is so generally made in railroad legislation, between the road as a thoroughfare and the transaction of the carrier business thereon, whether by the railroad company itself or by other persons, and the manifest intent of Congress in the legislation under review to reserve only the free use of the road, and not the active service of the company in transportation." Lake Superior & M. R. Co. v. United States (U. S.) 12 Ct. Cl. 35, 54.

TOLL BRIDGE.

As real estate, see "Real Property."

TOLL COLLECTING COMPANY.

The term "toll collecting company," within the meaning of statutes taxing such companies, does not include a railroad company furnishing its own conveyances, carrying nothing but passengers, and charging a certain price as fares. "It cannot be fairly said to collect tolls at all. Tolls are collected from persons who pass or travel by their own conveyances over the roads or bridges of another." Jersey City & B. R. Co. v. Haight, 30 N. J. Law (1 Vroom) 447.

TOLLGATE.

"Tollgate," as used in Code, § 4918 (New Code, § 5751), requiring any person or body corporate privileged by act of Assembly to open and keep any tollbridge or tollgate, to keep the same in repair, means the road on which the gate is allowed to be erected, as the use of the word in such sense is a not uncommon figure of speech. Fayetteville & C. Turnpike Co. v. State, 83 Tenn. (15 Lea) 578, 580.

The words "turnpikes," "tollgates," and "tollbars," in the act relating to the taking of tolls, are used synonymously. Company of Proprietors of Northam Bridge & Roads v. London & S. Ry. Co., 6 Mees. & W. 423, 439.

"Tollgate" is synonymous with "turnpike gate," as used in a statute punishing the running of tolls. Barnes v. White, 1 C. B. 192, 214.

TOLL ROAD.

As street, see "Street."

A "toll road" is a public highway, differing from ordinary public highways chiefly in the fact that the cost of its construction in the first instance is borne by individuals or by a corporation having authority from the state to build it, and, further, in the right of the public to use the road after its completion, subject only to the payment of toll. Virginia Canon Toll Road Co. v. People, 45 Pac. 398, 399, 22 Colo. 429, 37 L. R. A. 711.

"Toll roads are in a limited sense public roads, and are highways for travel, but we do not regard them as public roads in the largest sense, since there is in them a private proprietary right. The private right which turnpike companies possess in their roads deprives these ways, in many essential parts, of the character of public roads. It seems to us that, strictly speaking, toll roads owned by a private corporation, constructed and controlled for the purpose of private gain, are not public roads, though the people have the right to freely travel them on the payment of the toll prescribed by law. They are, of course, public in a limited sense, but not in such a sense as are the public ways under full control for the state; for public ways, in the strict sense, are completely under legislative control. Elliott, Roads & S., p. 5." Board of Shelby County Com'rs v. Castetter, 33 N. E. 986, 987, 7 Ind. App. 309.

TOLL SERVICE.

The term "toll service," as used in relation to telephones, refers to that service which is rendered by placing at the disposal of the patron at the transmitting station and the one at the receiving station instruments connected by electric wires, by means of which the two are enabled to carry on a conversation, as distinguished from that telephone service accomplished by means of instruments placed in the residences or places of business of the patrons for their private and personal enjoyment and benefit, and which needs no agent or messenger to carry such service into execution, except the operator of the central office. Central Union Telephone Co. v. Swoveland, 42 N. E. 1035, 1039, 14 Ind. App. 341.

TOLL-THOROUGH.

"Toll-thorough" is a toll which is taken for passing over a highway in consideration of repair or other benefit done by the owner of the toll, but without any interest or claim in the toll. King v. Nicholson, 12 East, 330, 340.

A "toll-thorough" is a toll which is demanded by an express grant, by custom or prescription, on a public highway in a public port, or for the use of public property. It is termed "toll-thorough" because the party claiming it is presumed to have had no original right to the place where he demanded toll. The claimant must show not only his right to toll by custom, prescription, or grant, but must show some consideration for it, some burden on himself, some benefit to the public, and that he or those under whom he claims had once a right to the locus in quo which had been commuted for the toll, and this consideration must be applied to the precise spot where toll is claimed. Charles River Bridge v. Warren Bridge, 36 U. S. (11 Pet.) 420, 582, 9 L. Ed. 773, 938.

TOLL-TRAVERSE.

A "toll-traverse" is a charge originating in the liberty given to pass over the owner's soil. King v. Nicholson, 12 East, 330, 340.

"Toll-traverse" is a toll demanded for passing on or over the private property of the claimant, or using it in any other way, and is founded on the right which every man has to the exclusive enjoyment of what is exclusively his private property, its use by others being a sufficient consideration for the exaction of toll. Charles River Bridge v. Warren Bridge, 36 U. S. (11 Pet.) 420, 582, 9 L. Ed. 773, 938.

TOMB.

The word "tomb" signifies, among other meanings, a monument or tombstone erected in memory of the dead, so that a provision in a will that an executor should expend a certain amount for a tomb for testatrix does not lapse because the body of deceased could not be recovered and deposited in it, but such provision should be used for the erection of a suitable monument. Succession of Langles, 29 South. 739, 750, 105 La. 89.

TON.

See "Gross Ton."

A "ton" is a certain weight in pounds or a certain weight or space by which the burden of a ship is estimated. Reck v. Phoenix Ins. Co., 7 N. Y. Supp. 492, 54 Hun. 637.

A "ton" in weight and a ton in measurement are not the same thing. The expressions are not simply different terms to indicate the same idea. A ton in measurement is 40 cubic feet (McCulloch Commercial Dic tionary; Webster's Dictionary). A ton in weight is 2,240 pounds. Roberts v. Opdyke, 40 N. Y. 259, 262.

The word "ton," as applied to the measurement of vessels, has a certain definite meaning, well settled by custom and by the navigation laws of the United States, and it means 100 cubic feet of interior space. The Thomas Melville (U. S.) 62 Fed. 749, 751, 10 C. C. A. 619.

A "ton" is understood in commerce to mean twenty hundredweight, each hundred consisting of 112 pounds. Helm v. Bryant, 50 Ky. (11 B. Mon.) 64, 65.

The word "ton," as used in chapter 6 of title 34, relating to the collection of duties upon imports, being the chapter on appraisal, when used in reference to weight, shall be construed as meaning twenty hundredweight, each hundredweight being one hundred and twelve pounds avoirdupois. U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1941.

In Pennsylvania 2,000 pounds avoirdupois weight constitute a ton. Weaver v. Fegely, 29 Pa. (5 Casey) 27, 70 Am. Dec. 151.

Twenty hundredweight, consisting of 100 pounds each, constitute a ton. Pol. Code Idaho, 1901, § 611.

Twenty hundredweight constitute a "ton." Pol. Code, § 3215; Higgins v. California Petroleum & Asphalt Co., 120 Cal. 629, 631, 52 Pac. 1080, 1081.

By Sess. Acts 1841, p. 86 (Rev. Code 1845, p. 1077), a "ton" of hemp is 2,000 pounds avoirdupois, and cannot be shown to consist of a larger amount by evidence of custom. Green v. Moffett, 22 Mo. 529, 536.

As used in a contract for the purchase and sale of a certain number of tons of iron, the word "tons" should be construed in a suit at law to mean statute ton—2,000 pounds avoirdupois. Many v. Beekman Iron Co. (N. Y.) 9 Paige, 188, 195.

When parties contract for any material by weight, using terms that have come to us from the past with a different meaning, such as "ton," which had commonly been regarded as meaning 2,240 pounds, the mere fact that a state has undertaken to regulate weights and measures, and in discharge of such office has fixed the ton at 2,000 pounds, will not dispense with an obligation to furnish the old measure. When the ton is used to represent, for convenience or calculation, 2,000 pounds, the contract should, and usually does, so state it as per ton of 2,000 pounds, or per ton neat; but as coal and other cheap and heavy articles have never been sold by the pound as a unit for calculating its price, but by the ton, convenience of calculation has never required, nor has custom sanctioned, any reform, so called, or any change in the amount so represented by this unit. The Miantinomi (U. S.) 17 Fed. Cas. 254, 256.

In an action of trover by a mortgagee to recover certain wire, described in the mortgage as "one ton of wire," it may be shown that the parties did not mean a precise ton by weight, but the mass of wire stored in a certain place, which they denominated a ton. Barry v. Bennett, 48 Mass. (7 Metc.) 354, 361.

TONIC.

A "tonic" is defined to be any remedy which improves the tone or vigor or the muscular fibers generally. Among the drugs or preparations which are classed as tonics are weak alcoholic beverages in very moderate quantities. A preparation labeled as a tonic containing alcohol and the bitter principle of the hop in proportions that made it a mild tonic instead of an intoxicating beverage is a tonic as that term is defined by standard authorities. It is common knowledge that physicians frequently prescribe some kinds of beer as a tonic. The word "tonic" in itself signifies to the common understanding a preparation having medicinal qualities; and where the proprietor of such a preparation labeled his product "Rochester Tonic," and put it on the market as such, it is liable, under the War Revenue Act June 13, 1898, c. 448, 30 Stat. 448 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 2286], as a medicinal preparation or composition, to the tax named under that section. United States v. J. D. Iler Brewing Co. (U. S.) 121 Fed. 41, 42, 43, 57 C. C. A. 381.

TONNAGE.

See "Gross Tonnage"; "Net Tonnage"; "Registered Tonnage"; "Tax on Tonnage."

"Tonnage" is defined to be the cubical contents or burden of a ship in tons, or the amount of weight which one or several ships will carry. Reck v. Phoenix Ins. Co., 7 N. Y. Supp. 492.

The modern meaning of the word "tonnage" is given correctly in Wheaton's Law Dictionary (see Bouvier's Dictionary of Maritime Law): "The capacity of a ship or vessel; the duties paid on the tonnage of a ship or vessel, which are also called tonnage." Mayor of Washington v. Barnes (U. S.) 6 D. C. 230, 232.

A marine insurance policy, warranting that the insured vessel should not load more than the "registered tonnage," refers to the vessel's carrying capacity as stated in the ship's papers under which she was sailing at the date of the policy, and not to the registered tonnage as fixed by United States law, the vessel being a foreign one. Reck v. Phoenix Ins. Co., 29 N. E. 137, 130 N. Y.

160 (reversing Beck v. Phoenix Ins. Co., 16 Hun, 344, 345).

Tonnage is the capacity of a vessel to carry cargo, and a charter of a ship's "whole tonnage" transfers to the charterer only the space necessary for that purpose. The registered tonnage of a vessel, as regulated by the act of Congress, is intended as a safe standard of her capacity to carry cargo, and is usually less than her actual tonnage. Thwing v. Great Western Ins. Co., 103 Mass. 401, 405, 4 Am. Rep. 567 (citing Hoe v. Groverman, 5 U. S. [1 Cranch] 214, 236, 237, 2 L. Ed. 86; Ashburner v. Balchen, 7 N. Y. [3 Seld.] 262; Cuthbert v. Cumming, 10 Exch. 809, 814).

"Tonnage," as used in Const. U. S. art. 1, § 10, declaring that no state shall, without the consent of Congress, lay any duty on tonnage, means the duties paid on the tonnage of a ship or vessel, or on the capacity of a ship or vessel. Alexander v. Wilmington & R. R. Co. (S. C.) 3 Strob. 594, 595 (citing Bouvier).

"Tonnage" has long been an official term, intended originally to express the burden that a ship would carry in order that the various dues and customs which are levied on shipping might be levied according to the size of the vessel, or rather in proportion to her capacity of carrying burden; and hence the term, as applied to a ship, has become almost synonymous with that of size, and the word means the number of tons burden a ship or vessel will carry as estimated and ascertained by the official admeasurement and computation prescribed by the public authorities. State Tonnage Tax Cases, 79 U. S. (12 Wall.) 204, 225, 20 L. Ed. 370; Homan's Com. & Nav. Dict.; Wheeling, P. & C. Transp. Co. v. City of Wheeling, 99 U. S. 273, 284, 25 L. Ed. 412.

"Tonnage," as used in Laws N. Y. 1877, c. 315, regulating the rate of wharfage in New York and Brooklyn by the "tonnage" of the vessel, means the registered, and not the gross, tonnage of the ship. The Craigendoran (U. S.) 31 Fed. 87, 88.

TONNAGE DUTY.

A "duty on tonnage" is a duty or tax or burden imposed under the authority of the state, which is, by the law imposing it, to be measured by the capacity of the vessel, and is in its essence contribution claimed for the privilege of arriving and departing from a port of the United States. Cannon v. City of New Orleans, 87 U. S. (20 Wall.) 577, 581, 22 L. Ed. 417.

A "duty on tonnage" is a duty proportionate to the tonnage of vessels; a certain rate on each ton. As used in the federal Constitution it has a wider meaning, and includes any duty on the ship, whether a fixed sum upon its whole tonnage or a sum to be ascertained by comparing the amount of tonnage with the rate of duty. Southern S. S. Co. v. Port of New Orleans, 73 U. S. (6 Wall.) 81, 34, 18 L. Ed. 749.

A "duty of tonnage," within the strict definition of the term, is a tax graduated according to the capacity of the ship or vessel. Act March 31, 1869, authorizing the harbor masters to receive a percentage per ton on all vessels permitted to enter the waters of the bay of New York, or in the North river, within the limits of Jersey City and Hoboken, and load or unload or make fast to any wharf, was a duty on tonnage. Hackley v. Geraghty, 34 N. J. Law (5 Vroom) 332, 336.

A tonnage duty, as used in the federal Constitution prohibiting a state, without the consent of Congress, from levying "any duty of tonnage," is a duty on a vessel without any reference to the place where her owner resides, without regard to the jurisdiction within which the capital invested is owned. It is manifestly a tax on the boat as an instrument of navigation, and not a tax on the property of the citizens of the state. A state law, including steamboats as a portion of the property subject to taxation, is therefore not unconstitutional as imposing a tonnage duty. Perry v. Torrence, 8 Ohio, 521, 524, 32 Am. Dec. 725.

The term "duty of tonnage" was intended to mean that tax which all European and diverse free cities and ports were in the habit of levying on all vessels entering their ports in proportion to their tonnage, and this was what was known in the maritime and commercial world at the time of the adoption of the Constitution as a tonnage tax, or a duty on tonnage. A tonnage tax is also defined to be "a duty levied on a vessel according to the tonnage or capacity, without reference to where her owner resides. It is a tax on the boat as an instrument of navigation, and not a tax on the property of a citizen of the state, and the duty of tonnage which the Constitution prohibits the states from levying is any duty or tax on a ship, as such, without regard to the residence of her owner, whether it be a fixed sum on its whole tonnage, or a sum to be ascertained by comparing the amount of tonnage with the rate of duty when a ship, as an instrument of commerce, is required to pay a duty as a condition to her being allowed to enter or depart from a port or load or unload a cargo. The North Cape (U. S.) 18 Fed. Cas. 342, 344.

A tax upon vessels engaged wholly in the navigation of waters within the state, levied on such vessels, at the rate of a specific sum per ton of the registered tonnage, is a tax on the property of such vessels, and not a duty of tonnage, within the meaning of Const. U. S. art. 1, § 10, providing that no state shall, without the consent of Congress, lay any duty of tonnage. Lott v. Mobile Trade Co., 43 Ala. 578, 584.

Freight tax.

Tonnage duties are duties laid on the carrying capacity of vessels, the only means or instruments of distant commerce known at the time of the adoption of the federal Constitution, though doubtless the principle is applicable to railroad tonnage as a means of external commerce. The early act of Congress of July 20, 1790, regulating tonnage duties, provides that upon all ships or vessels which shall be entered in the United States from any foreign port or place there shall be paid the several and respective duties following, etc. The act of March 21, 1799, provides the rule for the measurement of the tonnage of vessels. The nature of the subject, the legislation, and practice of the government, and the well-known meaning of the terms used, render it clear that the act of 1864, imposing a tax on corporations for freight carried over their roads, is a tax on the business, and not a tonnage tax. Commonwealth v. Philadelphia & B. R. Co., 62 Pa. (12 P. F. Smith) 286, 297.

License tax.

The duty of tonnage which the Constitution prohibits the states from levying is a duty or tax on a ship as such, which she is required to pay as a condition of her being allowed to enter or depart from a port or load or unload cargo, either upon her tonnage, her property, or as a license to her officers or crew. Act March 24, 1899, § 10, authorizing the state oyster commission to fix the license tax imposed on boats entitled to engage in oyster planting in certain tidal water in the state according to the tonnage measurement of the boats, does not constitute a duty on tonnage, within the meaning of the federal Constitution. State v. Corson, 50 Atl. 780, 783, 67 N. J. Law, 178.

Lock tolls.

Tolls imposed according to tonnage for the use of locks and canals is not a "duty of tonnage," within the prohibition of the Constitution. Huse v. Glover, 7 Sup. Ct. 813, 315, 119 U. S. 543, 30 L. Ed. 487.

Wharfage fees.

A duty on tonnage is a duty on a vessel for the privilege of entering a port, and does not prohibit wharfage. Sweeney v. Otis, 37 La. Ann. 520, 521.

A "duty of tonnage," within the constitutional provision that no state shall, without the consent of Congress, lay any "duty of tonnage," is a charge, tax, or duty on a vessel for the privilege of entering a port; and though usually levied according to tonnage, and so acquiring its name, it is not confined to that method of rating the charge. It does not include a charge for wharfage. Parkersburg & O. R. Transp. Co. v. City of Parkersburg, 2 Sup. Ct. 732, 738, 107 U. S. 691, 27 L. Ed. 584 (quoted in City of St. Louis v. Consolidated Coal Co., 59 S. W. 103, 105, 158 Mo. 342).

A "duty on tonnage" is a tax or charge imposed on vessels engaged in importing merchandise into the ports of the United States. It is a commercial regulation exclusively, being a duty on the vessel levied for the privilege of entering our ports as carriers. An act authorizing the establishment of rates of "wharfage" and their collection through the agency of a harbor master is not in conflict with the Constitution. O'Conley v. City of Natchez, 9 Miss. (1 Smedes & M.) 31, 47, 40 Am. Dec. 87.

Wharfage fees, regulated by the tonnage of vessels, when imposed by municipal authorities, are not a "tonnage tax," within the meaning of Const. U. S. art. 1, § 10, par. 3, prohibiting any state from laying any duty of tonnage without the consent of Congress. Leathers v. Aiken (U. S.) 9 Fed. 679, 681.

TOOK.

The word "took" in a charge that another took certain property is slanderous, as importing a felony, if spoken and understood as a charge of larceny. Bornman v. Boyer (Pa.) 3 Bin. 515, 519, 5 Am. Dec. 380.

The word "took" in a charge that another took money which had been stolen does not per se constitute a charge of larceny. Justice v. Kirilin, 17 Ind. 588, 589.

A charge that another "took corn" is not itself actionable, as importing a felony, as such words may be used equally well to import a mere trespass; but when the words are used in connection with other language charging the taking of corn out of a crib, and that the person taking the corn looked around to see if any person saw him, the words are actionable as importing a larceny. Jones v. McDowell, 7 Ky. (4 Bibb) 188.

The words, "I believe you took it," when spoken of and to another, are not actionable per se as imputing larceny, but they may be slanderous as having such meaning when considered in connection with extrinsic circumstances. Alcorn v. Bass, 46 N. H. 1024, 1025, 17 Ind. App. 500.

The words, "took my pocketbook from my pocket," do not import a charge of larceny, and therefore, when standing alone, they are not per se slanderous. Bartow v.

Brands, 15 N. J. Law (3 J. S. Green) 248, 250.

TOOK A RECESS.

"Took a recess," as used in reference to a board of county supervisors, which, not having finished the business pending before it, took a recess from time to time, is equivalent to "adjourn." The object of an adjournment to a given time and of a record thereof is to give to persons having business before the board notice of the time when they may have a hearing, as well as to retain the power of the board to act during the remainder of the term by showing that jurisdiction so to do is still claimed. These objects are as well attained by the announcement that the board takes a recess until a specified hour or day as by the use of the term "adjourn." Ex parte Mirande, 14 Pac. 888, 890, 73 Cal. 365.

The words "took, stole and carried away," in an instruction that defendant is guilty of grand larceny if she stole, took, and carried away the property, is bad in failing to state the nature of the taking, as the words are not as particular as the words used in a statute which requires that a taking must be wrongful and with a felonious intent in order to constitute a sufficient indictment. State v. Campbell, 18 S. W. 1109, 108 Mo. 611.

TOOLS—TOOLS OF TRADE.

See "Common Tools of Trade"; "Farming Tools and Utensils"; "Mechanical Tools"; "Necessary Tools"; "Track Tools"; "Working Tools." As fixtures, see "Fixture."

Barbers' chairs.

Within an act exempting from attachment and levy of execution such suitable tools as are necessary for upholding life, the chair in which a barber placed his customers, operated by direct application of manual force, is as much a tool as the blacksmith's anvil or vice, the shingle maker's shaving horse, the wood sawyer's sawhorse, or the photographer's head rests. Allen v. Thompson, 45 Vt. 472, 474.

A barber's chair and mirror, when used by him in his business, are exempt as being tools of a mechanic used in his occupation. Terry v. McDaniel, 53 S. W. 732, 733, 103 Tenn. 415, 46 L. R. A. 559; Fare v. Cooper, (Tex.) 34 S. W. 341.

Bicycle.

"Tools," as used in Rev. St. 1895, art. 2397, providing that tools, apparatus, and books belonging to any trade or profession of a debtor shall be exempt from execution, does not include a bicycle used by an architect and building superintendent, though useful and convenient in the prosecution of his business. As there used, the word only includes such tools as properly belong to and are essential to the conducting of the business. For instance, the printing press, type, cases, etc., are tools belonging to, and are exempt to, a printer; the awl, last, etc., to a shoemaker; the forge, anvil, tong, hammers, etc., to the blacksmith; but the word does not include every convenience that might be beneficial in carrying on a particular business. Smith v. Horton, 46 S. W. 401, 402, 19 Tex. Civ. App. 28.

Boat and fishnet.

A boat and net are exempt as tools of the trade of a fisherman. Sammis v. Smith (N. Y.) 1 Thomp. & C. 444, 446.

Buggy and harness.

A single man, who is a land, loan, and insurance agent, cannot claim a buggy and harness which he uses in his business as exempt from execution as "tools and apparatus" belonging to his trade and profession. Cates v. McClure, 66 S. W. 224, 27 Tex. Civ. App. 459.

"Tools and team," within the meaning of a statute exempting from execution the tools and team of a debtor, includes a buggy wagon used by a physician in visiting his patients. Van Buren v. Loper (N. Y.) 29 Barb. 388, 389.

"Tools of his occupation," within the meaning of Gen. Laws, c. 224, § 2, exempting the tools of a debtor's occupation from attachment, includes a physician's wagon and harness used by him in riding to visit his patients, and reasonably necessary for his practice, though they do not come within the strict definition of the term "tools." Richards v. Hubbard, 59 N. H. 158, 47 Am. Rep. 188.

Building.

The "tools and instruments" exempt from execution by Code 1873, § 3072, means the tools or instruments used or handled by the mechanic, and does not include the building or place where the trade is pursued. Thus, the building in which a photographer carries on his business is not exempt, even though it is personal property. Holden v. Stranahan, 48 Iowa, 70, 71.

Camera.

The term "tools of his occupation," within the meaning of a statute exempting to a debtor the tools of his occupation, to a certain value, does not include a daguerreotype apparatus which the owner has ceased to use for the taking of likenesses, and is using only to teach the art to another with a view to the sale of the chattel. Norris v. Hoitt, 18 N. H. 198, 198.

Cheesemaking articles.

Articles of property used by the owner, a woman, and by her sister, in making cheese, such as cheese vats, cheese presses, curd knives and the like, are "tools and implements or instruments," within the meaning of the exemption laws. Fish v. Street, 27 Kan. 270, 272.

Commercial books and office fixtures.

"Tools and instruments," within the meaning of the statute exempting from execution the tools and instruments necessary for the exercise of a trade or profession by which the debtor gains a living, includes the commercial books and counting house and furniture of the merchant, and an iron chest therein in which his books and papers are kept. Farmers' & Merchants' Bank v. Franklin, 1 La. Ann. 393, 394.

Cornet.

Under Gen. St. c. 133, § 32, cl. 5, exempting from attachment a debtor's tools and implements of trade necessary for carrying on his trade or business, where a debtor earned his living partly by working as a tinner and partly as a musician, playing on his cornet at balls and parties, his cornet was a tool of his trade, and exempt. Baker v. Willis, 123 Mass. 194, 195, 25 Am. Rep. 61.

Crucible.

"Tools," as used in Vermont statutes making it a misdemeanor to have in one's possession any tool for the purpose of counterfeiting coins, etc., does not include a crucible used as a pot for melting lead. State v. Bowman, 6 Vt. 594, 596.

Dray wagon.

Rev. St. § 2335, exempting from execution all implements of husbandry and "all tools, apparatus, and books belonging to any trade or profession," includes a wagon owned by a drayman and used by him in his business. Cone v. Lewis, 64 Tex. 331, 333, 53 Am. Rep. 767.

Farm implements.

Implements of husbandry used in tilling the land are not within St. 1805, c. 100, exempting the tools of a debtor from attachment and execution. Dailey v. May, 5 Mass. 313, 314.

"Tools," as used in Pamph. Laws, c. 2804, § 1, providing that tools of the occupation of a debtor to the amount of $30 shall be exempt from attachment, means, "such implements of husbandry or of manual labor as are usually employed in and are appropriate to the business of the several trades or classes of the laboring community and according to the wants of their respective employment or profession, whether farmer, mechanic, manufacturer, or, in fact, any artisan or laborer who may require the use of such helps to obtain his living. In the country, farming or gardening is, or ought to be, a part of a man's business, and the soundest policy, as well as the language of the statute, forbids the taking of any of the tools so necessary to all good husbandry." Hence the plow, wheels, axletree, etc., harrow, and drag used by a farmer are "tools of his occupation," within the meaning of the statute. Wilkinson v. Alley, 45 N. H. 551, 552.

"Tools," as used in a statute exempting from attachment such suitable apparel, bedding, tools, etc., as may be necessary for upholding life, should be construed to include such farm tools as are used by hand, and to include hoes, axes, pitchforks, shovels, spades, scythes, snaths, cradles, and other tools of that character; but it does not include machinery or implements used by oxen and horses, as carts, plows, harness, mowers, and reapers. Garrett v. Patchin, 29 Vt. (3 Williams) 248, 249, 70 Am. Dec. 414.

"Tools of his occupation," within the meaning of a statute exempting to a debtor the tools of his occupation, includes his team, wagon, sled, and harness, if he is engaged in the business of farming. They are included within the term as much as the plow, cartwheels, and chains of a farmer. Rice v. Wadsworth, 59 N. H. 100.

Furniture.

"Tools, implements, and fixtures," within the meaning of a statute exempting from execution tools, implements, and fixtures necessary for carrying on the trade or business of a debtor, includes a clock, stove, screen, pitcher, and table cover belonging to a milliner, if the jury find them necessary for carrying on the business. Woods v. Keyes, 96 Mass. (14 Allen) 236, 237, 92 Am. Dec. 766.

A mirror is a necessary tool to a milliner. Wilkinson v. Alley, 45 N. H. 551, 552.

Harness.

In Black's Law Dictionary it is said that "the usual meaning of the word 'tool' is an instrument of manual operation; that is, an instrument to be used and managed by the hand instead of being moved and controlled by machinery." In English's Law Dictionary we find the following definition of the word "tool"; "An implement used by the hand in working. A hand instrument necessary to one's trade. According to Bouvier, this word, as used in exemption laws, 'includes any instrument necessary for the prosecution of trade'; and a set of harness does not fall within the words "common tools of trade," as used in the Georgia statute exempting such tools of trade from execution. Kirksey v. Rowe, 40 S. E. 990, 114 Ga. 893, 88 Am. St. Rep. 65.

Horse.

"Tools and instruments," within the meaning of the statute exempting from execution the tools and instruments necessary for the exercise of the trade or profession by which the debtor gains his living, does not include the horse of a physician. His surgical instruments, those for the preparation of medicines usually employed by country practitioners, and possibly, under the dictum in Milton's Case, 2 Rob. (La.) 81, his medical library, are protected by the Code; but we cannot go further, and treat as tools and instruments of his profession all other things that contribute to its convenient exercise. Hanna v. Bry, 5 La. Ann. 651, 655, 52 Am. Dec. 606.

Lamp, etc., of jeweler.

Under Gen. St. pp. 473, 474, § 3, providing that the necessary tools and implements of any person, used and kept for the purpose of carrying on his trade or business, shall be exempt from execution, etc., a lamp and other articles kept by a watchmaker and jeweler are exempt, provided such articles are necessary for his use in carrying on the business of making and repairing watches and jewelry. Bequillard v. Bartlett, 19 Kan. 382, 386, 27 Am. Rep. 120.

Joists.

A joist which workmen are placing in a building does not come within the term "tools." Griffiths v. New Jersey & N. Y. R. Co., 25 N. Y. Supp. 812, 5 Misc. Rep. 320.

Lathe.

"Tools or implements," within the meaning of Code Civ. Proc. § 690, subd. 4, exempting from execution the tools or implements of a mechanic necessary to carry on his trade, includes a turning lathe, which is easily turned by one man, and such as is ordinarily used by mechanics. In re Robb, 33 Pac. 890, 99 Cal. 202, 37 Am. St. Rep. 48.

Law books.

Law books are common tools of trade. Lenoir v. Weeks, 20 Ga. 596, 597.

Tools and instruments, within the meaning of Code Prac. art. 641, exempting the tools and instruments necessary for the exercise of the trade or profession of the debtor from seizure, being intended to encourage such trade or profession by enabling the debtor to sustain himself and family by his own industry, includes the books of professional men. The lawbooks of a lawyer are perhaps not any less necessary to the proper exercise of his profession than the tools of a mechanic are to the latter, and enable him to carry on his trade. Lambeth v. Milton (La.) 2 Rob. 81.

Logging tools.

"Tools and implements," within the meaning of exemption statutes exempting tools and implements when necessary to carry on the debtor's business, includes a logging capstan and cable and tools used in logging by one engaged as a farmer, if necessary to be used in clearing and improving his farm. State v. Creech, 51 Pac. 363, 18 Wash. 186.

Machines.

"Tools or implements," within the meaning of the statute exempting from execution the tools and implements of a debtor, include various machines for making boots, owned by the debtor and used in his shop, although he employs four or five men to help him. Daniels v. Hayward, 87 Mass. (5 Allen) 43, 44, 81 Am. Dec. 731.

Comp. St. p. 208, § 1, exempting from execution tools necessary for upholding life, does not include a portable machine called a "billy and jenny," used for spinning and manufacturing cloth. Kilburn v. Demming, 2 Vt. 404, 405, 21 Am. Dec. 543.

The statute exempting tools for the exercise of a trade or profession from execution cannot be made to apply to the multifarious machinery and implements constituting an extensive factory, and requiring the attendance and skill of a large number of operatives. Boston Belting Co. v. Ivens, 28 La. Ann. 695, 696.

"Tools," as used in Rev. St. c. 114, § 88, exempting the tools of any debtor from execution, etc., does not comprehend what in popular language are known as "machines." Knox v. Chadbourne, 28 Me. (15 Shep.) 180, 178, 48 Am. Dec. 487.

A machine for shaving and splitting leather, operated either by hand, steam, or water, costing $250, and weighing from 600 to 900 pounds, operated by turning a crank, and, when worked by hand, requiring two men to work it, and which had been fastened to the floor by cleats when in operation, is not a "tool necessary for upholding life," within the Vermont statute exempting such tools from attachment and execution, such apparatus being a machine. Henry v. Sheldon, 35 Vt. 427, 429, 82 Am. Dec. 644.

"Tools of trade," in Tariff Act Oct. 1, 1890, par. 686, includes machines used in the manufacture of gloves and imported by a glove manufacturer, which he himself, his father, and his two brothers had worked in Germany, intended to transplant his business in the United States, and to manufacture gloves in the same way. In re Lindner (U. S.) 66 Fed. 723.

St. 1855, c. 264, which exempts from levy on execution the tools and implements, materials, stock, and fixtures of the debtor necessary for carrying on his trade or business, does not include machinery, materials, stock, and fixtures of a paper mill. The statute above cited is not applicable to persons engaged in and conducting large and extended manufacturing operations, requiring the co-operation of many persons in various parts of the work to be done, and a heavy outlay and expenditure for the procurement of machinery indispensable to its accomplishment. Smith v. Gibbs, 72 Mass. (6 Gray) 298, 300.

Mechanic's tools.

Mechanic's tools used by a farmer in repairing his farming implements are exempt as tools of trade. Garrett v. Patchin, 29 Vt. (3 Williams) 248, 249, 70 Am. Dec. 414.

Mill saw.

St. 1821, c. 95, exempting the tools necessary for a mechanic, etc., does not include a mill saw which is not worked by hand or muscular power, but is part of a mill propelled by water. Batchelder v. Shapleigh, 10 Me. (1 Fairf.) 135, 136, 25 Am. Dec. 213.

Patterns.

A tool is any instrument, such as a hammer, saw, plane, file, and the like, used in the manual arts to facilitate mechanical operation; any instrument used by the craftsman or laborer at his work; any instrument used for service; and, as used in an insurance policy designating the risk as on "tools used in the manufacture of boots and shoes," includes patterns used for making boots and shoes. Adams v. New York Bowery Fire Ins. Co., 51 N. W. 1149, 1151, 85 Iowa, 6.

"Tools," as used in a policy of fire insurance issued by defendants on plaintiff's fixed and movable machinery, engine, lathes, and tools, means instruments of manual operation—that is, instruments to be used and managed by the hand, instead of being moved and controlled by machinery—and includes all patterns used in moulding castings, which from their size and shape admit of being applied and managed by the hands of man; and they are none the less tools for the reason that sand is pressed and compacted around the pattern, for it is still an instrument managed directly by the hand for the purpose of performing one of the processes of manufacture. Lovewell v. Westchester Fire Ins. Co., 124 Mass. 418, 419, 26 Am. Rep. 671.

Piano.

A piano is a tool necessary to a music teacher. Amend v. Murphy, 69 Ill. 337, 339.

Pool table.

In construing the word "tools" in exemption laws, "a pool table in a saloon is held not to be a tool, upon this ground; that the saloon could run without a pool table, and a pool table could be run without a saloon, but not very successfully. Goozen v. Phillips, 12 N. W. 889, 890, 49 Mich. 7.

Printing press.

A printing press and types and other instruments used in printing are not tools, and entitled as such to exemption from sale on execution under Vermont Statutes. Spooner v. Fletcher, 3 Vt. 133, 136, 21 Am. Dec. 579.

A printing press owned by a practical printer, editor, and publisher of a newspaper, and necessary to carry on his trade or business as a printer, is not a "tool," within the meaning of Code, § 468, exempting from taxation tools of any mechanic necessary to carrying on his trade. Frantz v. Dobson, 2 South. 75, 76, 64 Miss. 631, 60 Am. Rep. 68.

St. 1805, c. 10, providing that the tools of any debtor necessary for his trade or occupation should be exempted from attachment and execution, cannot be construed to include printing types and forms of a printer. The word "tool" is not understood, either in its strict meaning or popular use, as designating complicated machinery, which in order to produce any useful effect must be worked by combining several distinct parts or separate pieces, the aid of more than one hand being necessary to perform the operation, all which is required in the use of a printing apparatus. Nor can the several parts be denominated "tools," as they cannot be used separately, but, like the ax and its handle, must be united to accomplish any work. The press and forms may with as much propriety be denominated "tools" as the types. All are necessary component parts of the machinery for printing. Danforth v. Woodward, 27 Mass. (10 Pick.) 423, 427, 20 Am. Dec. 531; Buckingham v. Billings, 18 Mass. 82, 85.

Exemption Act (Comp. Laws 1879, c. 38), § 3, subd. 8, provides that necessary tools and implements of any mechanic or other person used and kept for the purpose of carrying on his trade or business, to the extent of $400, shall be exempt, etc. Held that, though the word "tools" alone did not include printing press and printing materials, such presses and materials were clearly within the meaning of "implements," as the term was used to extend the term "tools" in the statute referred to. Bliss v. Vedder, 7 Pac. 599, 601, 34 Kan. 57, 55 Am. Rep. 237.

"Tools," within the meaning of Connecticut statutes exempting tools of a person from taxation, means such tools as are necessary for upholding life, and may include a printing press, cases, types, etc., and such apparatus necessary to uphold life. Patten v. Smith, 4 Conn. 450, 454, 10 Am. Dec. 166; Davidson v. Hannon, 67 Conn. 312, 314, 34 Atl. 1050, 34 L. R. A. 718, 52 Am. St. Rep. 282.

"Tools," as used in Const. art. 2, § 32, providing for exemption of household furniture, beds and bedding, family library, arms, carts, and wagons, farming implements, tools, neat cattle, work animals, swine, goats, and sheep, not to exceed in value in the aggregate the sum of $500, means instruments of manual operation, particularly such as are used by farmers and mechanics, and is not to be understood, either in strict meaning or popular use, as designating complicated machinery, which in order to produce any useful effect must be worked by combining several distinct parts or separate pieces, the aid of more hands than one being necessary to perform the operation, all which is required in a printing apparatus. Nor can the several parts be designated "tools," as they cannot be used separately, but, like the ax and its handle, must be united to accomplish any work. The press and forms with as much propriety could be designated "tools" as the types. All are the necessary component parts of the machinery for printing; besides, types cannot be used as tools of trade by a printer if he is stripped of the other parts of his printing apparatus; so that the exemption from attachment of the types alone would not enable him to pursue his trade, and thereby earn his subsistence, which was the object of the statute. Oliver v. White, 18 S. C. 235, 241.

"Tools," as used in Code, § 797, exempting from taxation the tools of any mechanic, not exceeding $300 in value, should be construed to include the press, types, composing stones, and other implements necessary for a printer to carry on his business. It does not include the costly machinery in use in large printing establishments, such as power presses operated by steam, but the ordinary hand press of a printer should be included. Smith v. Osburn, 5 N. W. 681, 682, 53 Iowa, 474.

2 Pasch. Dig. art. 5487, providing that all tools and apparatus belonging to any trade or profession shall be exempt from execution, is to be construed as including the printing press, types, cases, etc., of the publisher of a newspaper, which are essential to the conduct of the business. Green v. Raymond, 58 Tex. 80, 83, 44 Am. Rep. 601.

"Tools or implements of trade," within the meaning of a statute exempting all tools or implements of trade from execution, includes the press and type of a practical printer, which are necessarily used by him and his journeymen in the publication of a weekly newspaper. Sallee v. Waters, 17 Ala. 482, 486.

"Tools or apparatus" within the meaning of a statute exempting the tools and apparatus of a debtor from forced sale, includes a press and paper cutter owned by a job printer, and necessary for his business. St. Louis Type Foundry v. Taylor (Tex.) 35 S. W. 691, 692.

Rifle.

A rifle gun is not excepted from the sale under execution under St. 1839, as a tool, unless perhaps it appears that the owner is a hunter or forester. Choate v. Redding, 18 Tex. 579, 581.

Safe.

Sayles' Civ. St. art. 2337, exempting from execution a tool or apparatus, belonging to any trade or profession, includes an iron safe used by an insurance agent to store his policies, etc. Betz v. Maier, 33 S. W. 710, 712, 12 Tex. Civ. App. 219.

Code Civ. Proc. § 690, subd. 4, exempting from execution the tools or implements of a mechanic or artisan necessary to carry on his trade, includes a safe used by a jeweler and watchmaker, where evidence showed that a safe was necessary to the profitable conduct of his business, and that customers would not leave their watches to be repaired unless one were used. In re McManus' Estate, 25 Pac. 413, 87 Cal. 292, 10 L. R. A. 567, 22 Am. St. Rep. 250.

Sewing machine.

The terms "tools, implements, and fixtures," in Gen. St. c. 133, § 32, exempting tools, implements, and fixtures from execution, includes a sewing machine. Rayner v. Whicher, 88 Mass. (6 Allen) 292, 294.

"Tools and instruments," in a statute which exempts the tools and instruments of any mechanic, miner, or other person used and kept for the purpose of carrying on his trade, includes two sewing machines kept by a tailor and personally used in his trade, if reasonably necessary therefor. Cronfeldt v. Arrol, 52 N. W. 857, 50 Minn. 327, 36 Am. St. Rep. 648.

Sign.

The phrase "tool or implement of trade," in the statute of March 7, 1797, authorizing the levy of execution on the goods or chattels of a debtor, excepting tools, does not include a wooden boot hung up at the door of a boot and shoe maker's shop; the same not being a tool of his trade, but merely a symbol thereof. Wallace v. Barker, 8 Vt. 440, 441.

Sled.

A sled used by the debtor in drawing wood and timber cut from his land, to market for sale, is exempt from attachment as a "tool of his occupation." Parshley v. Green, 58 N. H. 271, 272.

"Tools of plaintiff's occupation," within the meaning of a statute exempting such tools from execution, includes a sled used by the debtor in drawing wood and timber cut from his land, to market for sale, but does not include a wagon used only for convenience or pleasure. Parshley v. Green, 58 N. H. 271, 272.

Storekeeper's equipment.

Articles necessary in carrying on a mercantile business are not "tools and implements," within St. c. 171, § 34, cl. 5, so as to be exempt from taxation under such statute. Desmond v. Young, 53 N. E. 151, 173 Mass. 90.

The use of the words "tools and implements," as used in Rev. St. 1898, § 2982, exempting the tools, implements, and stock in trade of any mechanic, merchant trader, or other person used to carry on his trade or business, not exceeding $200, should be construed to cover such articles as are usually used in, and are reasonably necessary to carry on, the trade or business of a merchant, not exceeding the value of $200, actually kept for that purpose. Therefore a merchant may select a safe, showcases, and like articles as tools and implements to the amount allowed, in lieu of stock in trade. Cunningham v. Britson, 77 N. W. 740, 742, 101 Wis. 378.

In construing a statute exempting from execution or attachment "the tools and implements of any mechanic, miner, or other person used and kept for the purpose of carrying on his trade or business," the court said "it would be a very strained construction to say that tools and implements were necessary to a merchant in the transaction of his business, and specially to include within the meaning of this act, under that head, such articles as desks and counters, jars, paper, boxes, barrels, and scales, and I think cannot be so held." Grimes v. Bryne, 2 Minn. 89, 105 (Gil. 72, 88).

The tools or implements, materials, stock, and fixtures of a debtor necessary for carrying on his trade or occupation, which are exempted from execution by St. 1855, c. 264, do not include the stock of goods, scales and measures, horse, wagon, and harness of a shopkeeper in the country. The clause in this section which exempts from attachment the tools and implements of the debtor has never been so construed as to embrace that class of persons who are engaged merely in the business of buying and selling articles of merchandise. On the contrary, it has always been considered as having been intended specially for the benefit of those to whom, on account of their peculiar pursuits and avocations, tools and implements are essential to make their labor available, and to enable them to complete the work which they undertaken to perform. Willson v. Elliot, 73 Mass. (7 Gray) 69, 70.

Surgical instruments.

"Tools," as used in a statute exempting tools from execution, includes the surgical instruments of a physician. Robinson's Case (N. Y.) 3 Abb. Prac. 466, 467.

Typewriter.

A typewriter is not exempt from execution as a tool or apparatus belonging to the profession of a physician, though he uses it in correspondence and advertising his business. Massie v. Atchley, 60 S. W. 582, 583, 28 Tex. Civ. App. 114.

Wagon.

Acts 1842, exempting from execution the tools and implements of any mechanic necessary to the carrying on of his trade, does not include a wagon. Morse v. Keyes (N. Y.) 6 How. Prac. 18, 21.

The term "tools, implements, materials, stock, or fixtures," necessary for carrying on a debtor's business, which are exempted from execution in the statute, does not include a wagon with patent couplings attached, used by the owner in carrying on his business of selling patent couplings. Gibson v. Gibbs, 75 Mass. (9 Gray) 62.

Watch and chain.

Gen. St. c. 66, § 279, exempting from execution the "tools or instruments" of any mechanic or other person used and kept for the purpose of carrying on his trade, cannot be construed to include a watch and chain of a cigarmaker, for they are not instruments of such person for carrying on his trade, for the trade is one which necessarily involves the employment of no one besides himself. Rothschild v. Boelter, 18 Minn. 361, 362 (Gil. 331, 332).

TOON.

"Toon," as used by a testator in devising all his interest in real estate described to be "60 acres, Sc. 25, toon 7," etc., means "town." Chambers v. Watson, 14 N. W. 839, 60 Iowa, 336, 46 Am. Rep. 70.

TOP.

"Top," as the term is used in the mining law, refers to that part of a lode which comes nearest to the surface. Stevens v. Williams (U. S.) 23 Fed. Cas. 44, 46.

"Top of a vein," as used in an act of Congress providing that when a title or patent and the side and end lines of a mining claim cover the "top" or apex "of a vein" of mineral matter the party pursuing the vein in a downward direction may follow the vein as long as he can find it, and so long as it is the same vein, means the highest end or termination of the vein, and this is so even if at any intermediate point or points where the vein is continuous it rises higher than such highest end, it being essential to such top or apex that there be no vein continuing beyond it. It must be the end of the vein which approaches nearest the surface. Stevens v. Williams (U. S.) 23 Fed. Cas. 40, 43.

"Justice Goddard, a jurist of experience in mining law, in his charge to the jury in the case of Iron Silver v. Louisville, defines 'top' or 'apex' as the highest or terminal point of a vein where it approaches nearest to the surface of the earth, and where it is broken on its edge so as to appear to be the beginning or end of the vein. Chief Justice Beatty, of Nevada, who is mentioned in the report of the public lands commission of 1879-80 as one of the ablest jurists who has administered mining law, in his letter to that commission says, after defining dip or force of strike, the top or apex of any part of a vein is found by following the line of its dip up to the highest point at which vein matter exists in the fissure. According to this definition, the top or apex of a vein is the highest part of a vein along its entire course. If the vein is supposed to be divided into sections by vertical planes at right angles to the strike, the top or apex of each section is the highest part of a vein between the planes that bound the section; but if the dividing planes are not vertical, or not at right angles, to a vein which departs at all from a perpendicular in its downward course, then the highest part of a vein between such planes will not be the top or apex of the section which they include. Report Public Lands Commission, 399. The word 'top,' while including apex, may also include a succession of points; that is, a line so that by the top of a vein would be meant a line connecting a succession of such highest points or apices, thus forming an edge." Duggan v. Davey, 26 N. W. 887, 901, 4 Dak. 110.

TOP AND BOTTOM DICE.

The words "top and bottom dice," applied to a game, signifies no class of acts which can be known by the public or the courts. The words do not inform one as to what class of acts they are which constitute top and bottom dice, and are not sufficiently definitive to create a crime; being words which do not convey a fixed or ascertainable meaning in law or in English. A law is a rule of action prescribed. A word which has no fixed meaning cannot constitute a rule of action, for the connotation is not definite, nor does it prescribe either to the public or the courts what acts are or are not criminal." Harland v. Territory, 13 Pac. 453, 457, 3 Wash. T. 131.

TOP BUGGIES WITH POLES.

The words "top buggies with poles," in a contract for the purchase of top buggies with poles, have a meaning understood by the trade, which must be adopted in enforcing the contract, and therefore evidence that the words mean a common grade of buggies is admissible. Louis Cook Mfg. Co. v. Randall, 17 N. W. 507, 510, 62 Iowa, 244.

TOPPED.

A herd of cattle is said to be "topped" when the best cattle are picked out, leaving only the inferior ones. Griffith v. Bergeson, 88 N. W. 451, 115 Iowa, 279.

TORMENT.

In laws relating to cruelty to animals the word "torment" includes every act, omission, or neglect whereby unjustifiable physical pain, suffering, or death is caused or permitted. Code N. O. 1883, § 2490; Rev. St. Me. 1883, p. 911, c. 124, § 49; Ann. St. Ind. T. 1899, § 1298. Every act, omission, or neglect whereby unnecessary or unjustifiable pain or suffering is caused, permitted, or allowed to continue when there is a reasonable remedy or relief. Rev. St. Wyo. 1899, § 2287; Bates' Ann. St. Ohio 1904, § 3721; Mills' Ann. St. Colo. 1891, § 117.

The term "torment" does not per se include the mere fact of driving a sick, sore, lame, or disabled horse, and the driving of such a horse directly to its stable is not an offense, or driving it for exercise, or driving it carefully, in a manner proportioned to its condition, where it has become disabled, lame, or sick on the road. Stage Horse Cases (N. Y.) 15 Abb. Prac. (N. S.) 51, 64.

TORNADO.

The words "tornado" and "hurricane" are synonymous, and mean a violent storm, distinguished by the vehemence of the wind and its sudden changes. A hurricane is a very high wind. So that an allegation in an answer denying that the loss was caused by a tornado or hurricane, but stating that it was caused by a very high wind, admits that it was caused by a tornado or hurricane.

Queen Ins. Co. v. Hudnut Co., 35 N. E. 397, 398, 8 Ind. App. 22 (citing Webster's Dict.).

"A 'tornado' is defined by Webster as a violent gust of wind, or a tempest distinguished by a whirling, progressive motion, usually accompanied by thunder, lightning, and torrents of rain, and commonly of short duration and small breadth; a hurricane. Other dictionaries give substantially the same definition, and that it is generally accompanied by thunder and lightning and rain or hail, and appears to have an electric origin, so that whether a loss was caused by a tornado or the lightning accompanying it is a matter for the jury. Spensley v. Lancashire Ins. Co., 11 N. W. 894, 897, 54 Wis. 433.

TORT.

See "Maritime Tort"; "Personal Tort."

Action and judgment for tort as property, see "Property."

Action for as civil action, see "Civil Action—Case—Suit—etc."

Generally speaking, a "tort" is a wrong, and obviously a tortious act is not more than a wrongful act; but, in the language of the books, a tortious act consists of the commission or omission of an act by one without right, whereby another receives some injury, directly or indirectly, in person, property, or reputation. Hayes v. Massachusetts Mut. Life Ins. Co., 18 N. E. 322, 325, 125 Ill. 626, 1 L. R. A. 303.

"Tort" may be defined to be an injury or a wrong committed with or without force to the person or property of another, and such injury may arise by either the nonfeasance, malfeasance, or misfeasance of the wrongdoer. Gindele v. Corrigan, 22 N. E. 516, 517, 129 Ill. 582, 16 Am. St. Rep. 292.

While a tort, perhaps, has never been accurately defined, and, from its nature, may be incapable of an exact definition, the nearest approach to it, it is believed, has been made by Sir Frederick Pollock in summing up his normal idea of it, which is as follows: "Tort is an act or omission (not being merely the breach of duty arising out of a personal relation or undertaken by contract) which is related to harm suffered by a determinate person in one of the following ways: (a) It may be an act which, without lawful justification or excuse, is intended by the agent to cause harm, and does cause the harm complained of. (b) It may be an act in itself contrary to law, or an omission of specific legal duty, which causes harm not intended by the person so acting or omitting. (c) It may be an act or omission causing harm which the person so acting or omitting did not intend to cause, but might and should with due diligence have foreseen and prevented. (d) It may, in special cases, consist merely in not avoiding or preventing harm which the party was bound absolutely, or within limits, to avoid or prevent." Galveston, H. & S. A. Ry. Co. v. Hennigan (Tex.) 76 S. W. 452, 453.

The term "tort" has a signification somewhat similar to wrong, and is an unlawful act injurious to another, independent of contract. Torts may be committed with force, as a trespass, which may be an injury to the person, such as assault, battery, and imprisonment; or they may be committed without force. Torts of this latter kind are to the absolute or relative rights of persons, or to personal property in possession or reversion. These injuries may be either by nonfeasance, malfeasance, or misfeasance. Philadelphia & Havre de Grace Steam Towboat Co. v. Philadelphia, W. & B. R. Co. (U. S.) 19 Fed. Cas. 474, 475.

A person commits a tort who does some act forbidden by law, if that act causes another substantial loss beyond that suffered by the rest of the public. City Trust, Safe Deposit & Surety Co. of Philadelphia v. American Brewing Co., 67 N. E. 62, 63, 174 N. Y. 486.

A tort may be either (1) a direct invasion of some legal right of the individual; (2) the infraction of some public duty by which special damage accrues to the individual; (3) the violation of some private obligation by which like damage accrues to the individual. Civ. Code Ga. 1895, § 3807; Reid v. Humber, 49 Ga. 207, 208.

"Torts" may be divided into two general classes: The first, designated as "property torts," embracing all injuries and damages to the property, real or personal; the second, known as "personal torts," including all injuries to the person, whether to reputation, feelings, or the body. Mumford v. Wright, 55 Pac. 744, 748, 12 Colo. App. 214.

As chose in action.

See "Chose in Action."

Damage necessary.

In view of the law, a wrong without resulting damages is not a tort; and this is true of a fraud, whether inhering in a contract or not. Carpenter Paper Co. v. News Pub. Co., 87 N. W. 1050, 1051, 63 Neb. 59.

To constitute a tort, two things must concur—a wrongful act committed by the defendant, and proximate legal damage to the plaintiff. Trow v. Thomas, 41 Atl. 652, 654, 70 Vt. 580.

To constitute a tort two things must concur—actual or legal damage to the plaintiff, and a wrongful act committed by the defendant. Wright v. Chicago & N. W. R.

Co., 7 Ill. App. (7 Bradw.) 483, 445; Sprague v. Heaps, Id. 447, 448.

As private wrong.

A private wrong is a tort, and a tort is defined as a private or civil wrong or injury. Tomlin v. Hildreth, 47 Atl. 649, 651, 65 N. J. Law, 438.

A tort is a private wrong sustained by some person or body of persons. Gorman v. Budlong, 49 Atl. 704, 706, 23 R. I. 169, 55 L. R. A. 118, 91 Am. St. Rep. 629.

A tort is defined to be a civil or private wrong or injury. It consists of injuries of omission or commission, done to individuals. Every illegal obstruction in a highway is a nuisance, and a nuisance is a tort. This is the rule when one owns property which involves injury to the property or other right or interest of his neighborhood. Merrill v. City of St. Louis, 83 Mo. 244, 255, 53 Am. Rep. 576 (citing 1 Hilliard, Torts, 577).

As wrong independent of contract.

A tort, in its legal sense, is a wrong independent of contract. Bouv. Dict. Mobile Life Ins. Co. v. Randall, 74 Ala. 170, 176; International Ocean Telegraph Co. v. Saunders, 14 South. 148, 151, 32 Fla. 434, 21 L. R. A. 810; Clark v. Gates, 87 N. W. 941, 942, 84 Minn. 381; Civ. Code Ga. 1895, § 3807. This broad definition, when correctly understood, is entirely consistent with the well-settled general proposition that in certain relations duties are imposed, the breach of which is regarded as a tort, though the relations themselves are formed by contract, and the contract may cover the same ground. Haohle v. Allegheny Heating Co., 5 Pa. Super. Ct. 21, 24.

"Tort" denotes an injury inflicted otherwise than by a mere breach of contract. Barkley v. Williams, 64 N. Y. Supp. 318, 319, 30 Misc. Rep. 687; Jones v. Hunt, 12 S. W. 832, 833, 74 Tex. 657.

A tort is defined to be any wrong not consisting in mere breach of contract, for which the law undertakes to give to the injured party some appropriate remedy against the wrongdoer. Denning v. State, 55 Pac. 1000, 1002, 123 Cal. 316 (citing Cooley, Torts, p. 2).

The word "tort" means nearly the same as the expression "civil wrong." It denotes an injury inflicted otherwise than by a mere breach of contract, or, to be more nicely accurate, a tort is one's disturbance of another in rights which the law has created, either in the absence of contract or in consequence of a relation which a contract had established between the parties. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Spinks, 30 S. E. 968, 969, 104 Ga. 692.

The essence of a tort consists in the violation of some duty to an individual, which duty is a thing different from the mere contract obligation. Shirk v. Mitchell, 36 N. E. 850, 853, 137 Ind. 185 (citing Rich v. New York Cent. & H. R. R. Co., 87 N. Y. 382).

A tort is a breach of a duty which the law, in distinction from mere contract, has imposed, yet the imposing of it may have been the cause of the contract, or because of it and something else combining, when otherwise it would not have created the duty. In such a case commonly the party injured by nonfulfillment of the duty may proceed against the other for its breach, or for the breach of the contract, at his election. Western Union Tel. Co. v. Taylor, 84 Ga. 408, 418, 11 S. E. 396, 8 L. R. A. 189.

Ordinarily the essence of a tort consists in the violation of some duty due to an individual, which duty is a thing different from the mere contract obligation. When such duty grows out of relations of trust and confidence, as that of the agent to his principal, or the lawyer to his client, the ground of duty is apparent. But where no such relation flows from the contract, and still a breach of its obligation is made the principal means of inflicting on another an injury, the question whether such invasion is actionable as a breach of the contract only or as a tort leads to a difficult search for a distinguishing test. A breach of a contract may be so planned and intended and interwoven with fraud as to become a tortious act. Rich v. New York Cent. & H. R. R. Co., 87 N. Y. 382, 390.

We have been unable to find any accurate and perfect definition of a tort. Between actions plainly ex contractu and those as clearly ex delicto there exists what has been termed a "borderland," where the lines of distinction are shadowy and obscure, and the tort and the contract so approach each other and become so nearly coincident as to make their practical separation somewhat difficult. Moak, Underh. Torts, 23. The text writers either avoid a definition entirely, or frame one plainly imperfect, or depend upon one which they concede to be inaccurate, but hold sufficient for judicial purposes. Ordinarily, the essence of a tort consists in the violation of some duty due to an individual, which duty is a thing different from the mere contract obligation. When such duty grows out of relations of trust and confidence, as that of the agent to his principal, or the lawyer to his client, the ground of the duty is apparent, and the tort is, in general, easily separable from the mere breach of contract. But where no such relation flows from the constituted contract, and still a breach of its obligation is made the essential and principal means, in combination with other and perhaps innocent acts and conditions, of inflicting another and different injury, and accomplishing another and different purpose, the question whether such invasion of a right is actionable as a breach of contract only, or also as a tort, leads to a somewhat difficult search for a distinguishing test. Rich v. New York Cent. & H. R. R. Co., 87 N. Y. 882, 390.

A tort is a private personal wrong, as distinguished from a wrong to the public or crime. A tort is further distinguished from a contract (1) in that the party may be arrested on process and imprisoned on the judgment; (2) in that there is no right of contribution between the several defendants for a joint wrong; (3) joint tort feorsors or wrongdoers are severally liable; (4) at common law the action does not survive, but abates on the death of the party. A tort may grow out of or be coincident with the contract, and in such case it must clearly have all the necessary elements of a tort to be followed by such serious consequences. Van Oss v. Synon, 56 N. W. 190, 191, 85 Wis. 661.

A breach by a railroad company of an executory contract, into which it was under no legal duty of entering, to furnish the other contracting party with transportation from one point to another, is not a tort, and does not give rise to an action ex delicto. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Spinks, 30 S. E. 968, 969, 104 Ga. 692.

Breach of marriage promise.

A breach of a marriage promise is not a tort. Malone v. Ryan, 14 R. I. 614, 618.

Diversion of water course.

The overflow of land by a millpond is a tort. Running out a dam into a waterway of a navigable river, giving a new direction to the current, washing a neighbor's land away, is also a tort. Act March 3, 1887, c. 373, 24 Stat. 552 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 507], which gives federal courts jurisdiction of actions against the government for claims upon contracts or for damages in cases not sounding in tort, does not give them jurisdiction of an action against the government for an alleged wrongful diversion of a water course, since that is an action sounding in tort. Mills v. United States, (U. S.) 46 Fed. 738, 747, 12 L. R. A. 673.

Libel and slander.

O. & W. Dig. art. 1100, gives justices jurisdiction of all suits and actions for "torts, trespasses, and other injuries," where the amount claimed exceeds, etc. Held, that such phrase does not include actions for libel and slander. Engelking v. Von Wamel, 26 Tex. 469, 471.

Negligence or malfeasance.

The term "tort" includes wrongs suffered in consequence of the negligence or malfeasance of others, when the remedy at common law was by an action on the case. Holmes v. Oregon & C. R. Co. (U. S.) 5 Fed.

75, 77; Mills v. United States (U. S.) 46 Fed. 738, 747, 12 L. R. A. 673.

The term "tort," when used in reference to admiralty jurisdiction, is not confined to wrongs or injuries committed by direct force, but it includes wrongs suffered in consequence of the negligence or malfeasance of others, where the remedy in common law is by an action on the case. Jervey v. The Carolina (U. S.) 66 Fed. 1013, 1016; Smith v. Burnett, 10 App. D. C. 469, 482; John Spry Lumber Co. v. The C. H. Green, 43 N. W. 576, 578, 76 Mich. 320, 327; Leathers v. Blessing, 105 U. S. 626, 630, 26 L. Ed. 1192; Philadelphia, W. & B. R. Co. v. Philadelphia & H. de G. Steam Towboat Co., 64 U. S. (23 How.) 209, 215, 16 L. Ed. 433.

Causing harm by negligence is a tort. One of the definitions of a tort is an act or omission causing harm which the person so acting or omitting did not intend to cause, but might and should with due diligence have foreseen and prevented. Bigby v. United States, 23 Sup. Ct. 468, 472, 188 U. S. 400, 47 L. Ed. 519 (citing Pollock, Torts, 1, 19).

TORT SOUNDING IN EXEMPLARY DAMAGES.

A tort that sounds in exemplary damages is where some right of person or of property is injured maliciously, violently, wantonly, or with a reckless disregard of social or civil obligations. Samuels v. Richmond & D. R. Co., 14 S. E. 943, 944, 35 S. C. 493, 28 Am. St. Rep. 883.

TORTIOUS.

The word "tortious" is a synonym of the word "unlawful." Milligan v. Brooklyn Warehouse & Storage Co., 68 N. Y. Supp. 744, 745, 34 Misc. Rep. 55.

TORTURE.

"Torture" is defined to be torment judicially inflicted; pain by which guilt is punished or confession is extorted; anguish; extreme pain; anguish of body or mind. State v. Pugh, 15 Mo. 509, 511.

An indictment charging a defendant with killing by feloniously, unlawfully, willfully, and with express malice aforethought, casting the deceased into a certain fire then and there burning, and by means of the flames thereof the said deceased instantly died, charges a killing by torture, within the meaning of Laws 1891, p. 150, making killing by means of torture murder in the first degree. Territory v. Vialpando, 42 Pac. 64, 65, 8 N. M. 211.

In the laws relating to cruelty to animals, the word "torture" includes every act.

omission, or neglect whereby unjustifiable physical pain, suffering, or death is caused or permitted. Code N. C. 1883, § 2490; Pen. Code N. Y. 1903, § 669; Ann. St. Ind. T. 1899, § 1298; Rev. St. Me. 1883, p. 911, c. 124, § 48; Gen. St. Minn. 1894, § 6542. Every act, omission, or neglect whereby unnecessary or unjustifiable pain or suffering is caused, permitted, or allowed to continue, when there is a reasonable remedy or relief. Bates' Ann. St. Ohio 1904, § 3721; Mills' Ann. St. Colo. 1891, § 117; Rev. St. Wyo. 1899, § 2287.

The torture alluded to in the statute forbidding the torturing of any animal must consist of some violent, wanton, and cruel act, necessarily producing pain and suffering to the animal. Tying brush or boards to a horse's tail is not necessarily a torture inflicted on the horse. State v. Pugh, 15 Mo. 509, 511.

The term "torture" does not per se include the mere fact of driving a sick, sore, lame, or disabled horse, and the driving of such a horse directly to its stable is not an offense, or driving it for exercise, or driving it carefully, in a manner proportioned to its condition, where it has become disabled, lame, or sick on the road. Stage Horse Cases (N. Y.) 15 Abb. Prac. (N. S.) 51, 64.

TOTAL.

The word "total" means all; the whole. East Texas Fire Ins. Co. v. Blum, 13 S. W. 572, 576, 76 Tex. 653.

TOTAL DESTRUCTION.

"Total destruction of a building," within the meaning of a fire insurance policy, must mean the complete destruction of the injured property by fire, so that nothing of value remains of it, as distinguished from a "partial loss," where the property is damaged, but not entirely destroyed. This does not mean that the materials of which the building was composed were all utterly destroyed or obliterated, but that the building, though some part of it may be left standing, has lost its character as a building, and instead thereof has become a broken mass, or so far in that condition that it cannot properly and longer be designated as a building. Corbett v. Spring Garden Ins. Co., 155 N. Y. 389, 390, 50 N. E. 282, 41 L. R. A. 318. Where the cost of repairing a building exceeds one-half of the value of the destroyed building, the question whether it was a total destruction is for the jury. Corbett v. Spring Garden Ins. Co., 58 N. Y. Supp. 148, 149, 40 App. Div. 628.

"Total destruction," within the meaning of a fire policy, providing that a total destruction shall terminate the lease, does not include a mere destruction of a partition in an insured building, and the burning out of the windows of the building. Einstein v. Levi, 49 N. Y. Supp. 674, 676, 25 App. Div. 565.

TOTAL DISABILITY.

See, also, "Wholly Disabled."

Total disability must of the necessity of the case be a relative matter, and must depend largely upon the occupation and employment in which the party insured is engaged. One can readily understand how a person who labors with his hands would be totally disabled only when he cannot labor at all, but the same rule would not apply to the case of a professional man, whose duties require the activity of the brain, and which is not necessarily impaired by serious physical injury. If a person engaged in the general practice of medicine and surgery is unable to go to his business, enter his office, and make calls upon any of his patients, but is confined to the bed, and is only enabled to exercise his mind on occasional application to him for advice, he may be said to be "totally disabled." Wolcott v. United Life & Accident Ins. Ass'n, 8 N. Y. Supp. 263, 264, 55 Hun, 98.

The meaning of the phrase "total disability" in an accident policy is not that the insured must have been disabled so as to prevent him from doing anything whatsoever pertaining to his occupation, but that he must have been disabled only to that extent that he could not do any and every kind of business pertaining to such occupation. He might be able to do a part, and not be able to do all, and, because he was not able to do all, be deemed to be wholly disabled from doing any and every kind, provided, of course, that he was so disabled as to be prevented from doing substantially all the necessary and material things in such occupation requiring his own exertions in substantially his customary and usual manner of so doing. He might be able to do, personally, minor and trivial things not requiring much time or physical labor, and through others, under his direction, do the heavier things requiring physical exertion, which in the ordinary performance of his duties he had heretofore done personally, and yet, because of inability to do the heavier and more material things personally, be said to be wholly disabled. Commercial Travelers' Mut. Acc. Ass'n v. Springsteen, 55 N. E. 973, 977, 23 Ind. App. 657.

A total disability is one which prevents insured from following an occupation whereby he can obtain a living; and, in determining whether such a disability exists, both his mental and physical capabilities must be considered. McMahon v. Supreme Council, Order of Chosen Friends, 54 Mo. App. 463, 472.

The words "totally disabled," as used in an accident policy, do not mean a state of absolute helplessness. The insured might be able to walk, might be able to ride on the cars to his physician's office, and still have been entirely incapacitated for work or business. If he is so incapacitated, we think he is totally disabled, within the meaning of the policy. Mutual Ben. Ass'n v. Nancarrow, 71 Pac. 423, 424, 18 Colo. App. 274.

The words "totally disabled from the prosecution of his usual employment," in an accident insurance policy, mean wholly disabled from doing substantially all kinds of his accustomed labor to some extent. A disability that prevents his doing as much in a day's work as before is not total, but one that entirely prevents his doing certain portions of his accustomed work is total, though there are other portions that he is able to do. Sawyer v. United States Casualty Co. (Mass.) 8 Am. Law Reg. (N. S.) 233, 235.

An accident policy insured against death or total disability from bodily injuries effected through external, violent, and accidental means. The total disability was defined as follows: "If said member shall sustain bodily injuries by means as aforesaid, which shall, independently of all other causes, immediately and wholly disable and prevent him from the prosecution of any and every kind of business pertaining to the occupation under which he receives membership." Plaintiff stated his occupation in the contract to be that of "retired," the term "gentleman" or equivalent being evidently omitted by clerical error, and in an action on the policy testified that he had no occupation except to amuse himself; that his income was derived from investments; that he had a shop at his house where he sometimes amused himself, and was a director in a wagon company, and at times used some of its machinery in connection with his amusement. While operating a buzzsaw at the wagon shops, he received a severe and painful wound on the back of the hand, which deprived him of the use of it for some time. Held, that the injury was not covered by the policy, as plaintiff was not totally disabled. Knapp v. Preferred Mut. Acc. Ass'n, 53 Hun. 84, 6 N. Y. Supp. 57.

The words "total disability," as used in a contract of insurance, do not mean that the insured will indemnify on account of loss sustained by the assured being partially disabled from some kinds of business. Lyon v. Railway Pass. Assur. Co., 46 Iowa, 631, 634.

Where an accident policy provides for compensation for the period of total disability only, the insured cannot recover for a disability which did not prevent him from the prosecution of any and every kind of business pertaining to his occupation. Saveland

v. Fidelity & Casualty Co., 30 N. W. 237, 239, 67 Wis. 174, 58 Am. Rep. 863.

Where an accident policy provided for indemnity for injuries which would disable the insured "from prosecuting any and every kind of business pertaining to his occupation, an assured might recover on proof of an injury and showing that he was in the real estate business, and that he went to his office every day for a short time, but was unable to do any kind of work, at least a fair interpretation being, not that he must be so disabled as to prevent him from doing anything, but that he must be wholly disabled so as to prevent him from doing any and every kind of business pertaining to his occupation. Turner v. Fidelity & Casualty Co., 70 N. W. 898, 899, 112 Mich. 425, 38 L. R. A. 529, 67 Am. St. Rep. 428.

There can be no recovery for total disability where the insured was able, during the whole period for which he claimed indemnity, to transact, and always did transact, some parts or some kinds of business pertaining to his occupation, and to some extent attended to all the duties of every kind connected with his business. Spicer v. Commercial Mut. Acc. Co., 4 Pa. Dist. R. 271, 276.

Evidence that the insured in an accident policy had been disabled for a period of eight weeks, during four of which he had been at his place of business and performed light work, though not attending to his regular duties, did not show that he was totally disabled but for four weeks. McKinley v. Bankers' Acc. Ins. Co., 75 N. W. 670, 671, 106 Iowa, 81.

A policy holder, whose regular duties were to buy goods of agents, and sell them to the people, and repair articles, such as chairs and tables, and who also trimmed caskets and made picture frames, was totally disabled when by an accident he was so injured that he could not walk without crutches for eight or ten months after the accident, and was not able to engage in any manual labor for more than a year thereafter. Baldwin v. Fraternal Acc. Ass'n, 46 N. Y. Supp. 1016, 1018, 21 Misc. Rep. 124.

An insurance policy providing for payment of a weekly indemnity during the continuance of total disability does not mean that the party shall not have the physical power, perhaps, to do something, even if he, in doing it, suffers great bodily pain. If he was disabled to that extent that whatever he did caused him suffering, and compelled him to stop in a short time, it may be properly described as total disability. Hohn v. Interstate Casualty Co., 72 N. W. 1103, 1108, 115 Mich. 79.

The loss of the left arm alone does not constitute a total disability. Smith v. Su- preme Lodge of Order of Select Friends, 61 Pac. 416, 62 Kan. 75.

An injury to the hand, so that it became useless as a hand, was an immediate, continuous, and total disability. Lord v. American Mut. Acc. Ass'n, 61 N. W. 293, 294, 89 Wis. 19, 28 L. R. A. 741, 46 Am. St. Rep. 815.

TOTAL INABILITY TO LABOR.

"Total inability to labor" does not confine the capability of the member's earning capacity to the same employment as that in which he was engaged at the time of becoming incapacitated, but requires such member to engage in any work or employment for which he is fitted, or which he is capable of performing. Baltimore & Ohio Employees' Relief Ass'n v. Post, 15 Atl. 885, 891, 122 Pa. 579, 2 L. R. A. 44, 9 Am. St. Rep. 147.

TOTAL LOSS (In Fire Insurance).

See "Absolute Total Loss"; "Actual Total Loss"; "Constructive Total Loss." See, also, "Total Destruction"; "Wholly Destroyed."

"Total loss," when applied to a building, means totally destroyed as a building—that is, that the walls, although some portion of them remain standing, are unsafe to use for the purpose of rebuilding, and would have to be torn down and a new building erected throughout. There can be no total loss of a building so long as a remnant of the structure left standing above the foundation is reasonably and safely adapted for use (without being taken down) as a basis on which to restore the building to the condition in which it was immediately before the fire; and whether it is so adapted depends on the question whether a reasonably prudent owner of a building uninsured, desiring such a structure as the one in question was before the fire, would, in proceeding to restore the building, utilize such standing remnant as a basis. Northwestern Mut. Life Ins. Co. v. Rochester German Ins. Co., 88 N. W. 265, 267, 85 Minn. 48, 56 L. R. A. 108.

A building is a total loss where the remnant is inconsiderable, compared with the part entirely destroyed, and does not constitute a sufficient basis to restore the burned building. A brick building is a total loss where three of its walls are entirely destroyed by fire, and none of the joists, floors, or windowsills are left, though a portion of the fourth wall was used in the construction of a new building on the site of the old, over the protest of the constructors, who considered it unsafe. The foundation of a building is not within the contemplation of the parties to an insurance contract, and hence the question of injury to the foundation should not be considered by the jury in reaching a conclusion as to the total loss. Murphy v. American Cent. Ins. Co., 54 S. W. 407, 25 Tex. Civ. App. 241.

There can be no total loss of a building, within the meaning of an insurance policy, so long as the remnant of the structure standing is reasonably adapted for use as a basis from which to restore the building to the condition in which it was before the injury. Royal Ins. Co. v. McIntyre, 37 S. W. 1068-1074, 90 Tex. 170, 35 L. R. A. 672, 59 Am. St. Rep. 797.

"Total loss," as employed in a policy, is undoubtedly to be understood in its natural and usual sense, and where property was valued at $3,900, and goods to the value of some $70 were saved, the loss was total. Singleton v. Boone County Home Mut. Ins. Co., 45 Mo. 250, 254.

If the materials of which the building was made have been destroyed by fire, so as to leave what remains of no material value as a building, though it may have value as salvage, there is a total loss, but if the remaining part of the building can, by repairing it, be restored to the former condition of the original just before the fire, then the loss is a partial loss. Hartford Fire Ins. Co. v. Bourbon County Court (Ky.) 72 S. W. 739, 740.

Loss of specific character.

Where a building is so injured by fire as to lose its specific character as a building, it is a "total loss," within the terms of an insurance policy, though some of the walls are standing, and some of the material is not destroyed. Hamburg-Bremen Fire Ins. Co. v. Garlington, 18 S. W. 337, 66 Tex. 103, 59 Am. Rep. 613.

"Total loss," as used in Ky. St. § 700, providing that fire insurance companies in case of total loss shall be liable for the value of the property as fixed in the face of the policy, when applied to a building, does not mean that the materials of which the building was composed were all totally destroyed and obliterated. It is not necessary that all of the parts and materials composing the building should be absolutely and physically destroyed, but the inquiry always is, does the insured building, after the fire, still exist, preserving substantially its identity, or has it become so broken and disintegrated that it cannot be designated as the structure which was insured? There may be a total loss, within the meaning of the statute, even though some parts of the building may remain standing after the fire. Palatine Ins. Co. v. Weiss, 59 S. W. 509, 510, 109 Ky. 464.

The phrase "total loss," when applied to the subject of insurance, does not contemplate the entire annihilation or extinction of the property insured; neither does it require than any portion of the property remaining after loss shall have no value for any purpose whatever; but it does mean only the destruction of the property insured to such extent as to deprive it of the character in which it was insured. Although some portion of the building may remain after the fire, yet if such portion cannot be reasonably used to advantage in the reconstruction of the building, or will not, for some purpose, bring more money than sufficient to remove the ruins, such building is, in contemplation of law, a total loss. Liverpool & L. & G. Ins. Co. v. Heckman, 67 Pac. 879, 881, 64 Kan. 388.

The term "total loss," in Rev. St. art. 2971, making the amount of an insurance policy a liquidated demand against the insurer in case of the total loss of the property, does not mean the utter destruction of the materials that enter into the construction of an insured house, but that the building has lost its specific character and identity as a house. The insurance was not against the destruction of the materials, but of the house, and, if the total value is destroyed as a house, appellant was liable, although portions of the walls were standing. Royal Ins. Co. v. McIntyre (Tex.) 34 S. W. 669.

With reference to loss of insured property, "total loss" does not mean an absolute extinction, and in an insurance on a building the question in estimating loss is not whether all the parts and materials composing the building are absolutely or physically destroyed, but whether, after the fire, the thing insured still exists as a building. Williams v. Hartford Ins. Co., 54 Cal. 442, 450, 35 Am. Rep. 77.

"Total loss," as applicable to a building, means not that the materials of which it was composed were utterly destroyed or obliterated, but that the building, though some part of it may remain standing, has lost its identity and specific character as a building, and instead thereof has become a broken mass, or so far in that condition that it cannot be properly any longer designated as a building. When that has occurred, then there is a total destruction or loss. A total loss does not mean an absolute extinction. Oshkosh Packing & Provision Co. v. Mercantile Ins. Co. (U. S.) 31 Fed. 200, 204.

The term "total loss," within the meaning of the valued policy law (Rev. St. 1889, § 5897), includes a loss of a building by fire, although a portion of the wall and the foundations remain, when such remaining portions cannot be utilized at less expense than to build anew. In this case the court approved an instruction that "by a total loss is meant that the building has lost its identity and specific character as a building, and become so far disintegrated that it cannot be properly designated as a building, although some part of it may remain standing." In Havens v. Germania Fire Ins. Co., 27 S. W. 718, 123 Mo. 403, 26 L. R. A. 107, 45 Am. St. Rep. 570, the court in banc defined a total loss, within the meaning of a similar section, when applied to a building, to mean "totally or wholly destroyed as a building, although there is not an absolute destruction of all its parts. It matters not that some debris remains which may be useful or valuable for some purpose." O'Keefe v. Liverpool, L. & G. Ins. Co., 41 S. W. 922, 923, 140 Mo. 558, 39 L. R. A. 819.

"Total loss" of a building, within the meaning of a fire insurance policy insuring against such loss, means the complete destruction of the insured property, so that nothing of value remains, and so that, though the materials of which the building was composed be not utterly destroyed or obliterated, and though part of the building be left standing, it has lost its character as a building, and has become instead a broken mass. The term does not mean an absolute extinction, it not being necessary that all the parts and materials composing the building are absolutely and physically destroyed; but the inquiry always is whether, after the fire, the thing insured still exists as a building. Corbett v. Spring Garden Ins. Co., 50 N. E. 282, 283, 155 N. Y. 389, 41 L. R. A. 318.

Loss causing condemnation.

The term "total loss," in the law of fire insurance, applies to an injury to a building by fire to such an extent as to make it insecure and a menace to life, resulting in its condemnation by the proper authorities, and the denial by such authorities of the right to repair the building. Monteleone v. Royal Ins. Co., 18 South. 472, 47 La. Ann. 1563, 56 L. R. A. 784.

Where a wooden building within the fire limits is injured to such an extent that it cannot be repaired or rebuilt under the law, it is a total loss, within the meaning of an insurance policy. Hamburg-Bremen Fire Ins. Co. v. Garlington, 18 S. W. 337, 66 Tex. 103, 59 Am. Rep. 613.

TOTAL LOSS (In Marine Insurance).

"Total loss," as the term is used in the law of marine insurance, is of two kinds: "First, it signifies the total destruction of the thing insured; and, secondly, such damage to the thing insured that, though it may specifically remain, has rendered it of little or no value to the owner." Livermore v. Newburyport Marine Ins. Co., 1 Mass. 264, 279.

"Total loss," as used in a marine insurance policy, means that the ship was actually lost by a peril of the sea, or any peril covered by the policy, or that the ship sustained damage to such an extent that she could not be repaired, or that she was irreparable in the place where she was injured, or that it was impracticable to repair her, because the necessary materials and workmen could not be secured, or that it would be physically impossible to repair her except at an enormous cost. Moss v. Smith, 9 C. B. 94, 102, 103.

"In the English practice, a ship is a total loss when she has sustained such extensive damage that it would not be reasonable or practicable to repair her." The other measure of practice which the courts have adopted is this: If the ship, when repaired, will not be worth the sum which it would be necessary to expend upon her, the repairs are, practically speaking, impossible, and it is a case of total loss. The American rule recognizes the same principle, but fixes upon a different amount of expense as giving the right to abandon. If the expenses of repairing will exceed half the value of the ship when repaired, she is considered a total loss, according to the American authorities, and may be abandoned. On the occurrence of a stranding resulting in permanent destruction, the voyage is lost by a peril insured against, and the master thereupon becomes the agent of the cargo owners, and must act as the facts of the case require. These facts and his abandonment create a total loss, and the subsequent recovery of the vessel or a portion of the goods by extraordinary exertions does not alter this result. The chief question has been whether there must be an actual, total, physical loss of the thing insured, whether there must be demolition or an annihilation, or whether a destruction of all value to the owner, and hence a total loss to him, is sufficient. The current of authorities, both in this country and in England, as well as the conclusion of elementary writers, is in favor of the doctrine of constructive loss. Especially is this the rule where the voyage is broken up by the destruction of the vessel. Wallerstein v. Columbian Ins. Co., 44 N. Y. 204, 217, 4 Am. Rep. 664.

Emerigon says that a loss is total by submersion where there is no permanent vestige of the ship. But what is a vestige? If it is that which affords the means of recovery and restoration, whether visible or not, then such submersion, in his view, would not be a total loss. A ship may be wholly under water and out of sight, and yet perfectly within the control of the owner. There may be buoys and cables attached to her, by the aid of which she may be raised and removed as effectually as if above water. It certainly would not be sufficient, to avoid a total loss, to show that the damaged hulk of a vessel insured has been raised and brought in; but the same consideration would apply to a vessel greatly damaged by perils of the sea, though she remains afloat. To repel the claim for a total loss, it must appear that the ship remains a good and sound vessel, capable, after reasonable repairs, of performing voyages and carrying cargoes; but whether she is so or not does not depend upon the single circumstance of submersion. Sewall v. United States Ins. Co., 28 Mass. (11 Pick.) 90, 94, 95.

Abandonment.

Where a thing insured subsists in specie, an abandonment is necessary in order to create a total loss, and if, upon the happening of peril which suspends the voyage of a ship insured, and induces the necessity of repairs, the owners choose to make it a total loss, they should abandon to the insurers. Martin v. Crockatt, 14 East, 465, 466; Bell v. Nixon, 1 Holt, N. P. 423.

Where a thing insured subsists in specie, and there is a chance of its recovery, there must be an abandonment to the insurer in order to make it a total loss. Tunno v. Edwards, 12 East, 488, 490, 491.

A ship may be abandoned for a total loss, though the loss is less than half its value. Da Costa v. Newnham, 2 Term R. 407; Parsons v. Scott, 2 Taunt. 363; Peele v. Merchants' Ins. Co. (U. S.) 19 Fed. Cas. 98, 103 (citing Milles v. Fletcher, 1 Doug. 231).

"A total loss," says Chancellor Kent (3 Comm. p. 413), "may arise either by the total destruction of the thing insured, or, if it specifically remains, by such damages to it as render it of little or no value. * * * In such cases the insured may abandon all his interest in the subject insured and all his hope of recovery to the insurer, and it falls upon him to pay as for a total loss." Natchez & N. O. Packet & Navigation Co. v. Louisville Underwriters, 11 South. 54, 55, 44 La. Ann. 714.

A vessel loaded with a number of barrels of flour was by accident sunk and destroyed, and the cargo damaged. There was no actual abandonment. As soon as practicable after the accident, and after the captain's protest, the flour was shipped to New Orleans, the nearest and best place for the sale of such damaged cargo. If the insured had been present at the time the injury occurred, there can be no doubt but what he would have made the abandonment. Under such circumstances, therefore, it was right for the court to calculate the damage as upon a total loss. Portsmouth Ins. Co. v. Brazee, 16 Ohio, 81, 87.

Capture.

"Total loss," as used in a marine insurance policy, construed to include a capture by one belligerent from another, as well as a detention or embargo by a foreign friendly power; and a detention occasioned by an arrest at sea of a neutral by a belligerent vessel may also amount to a total loss. Rhinelander v. Insurance Co. of Pennsylvania, 8 U. S. (4 Cranch) 29, 42, 2 L. Ed. 540.

A "total loss" of a subject of maritime insurance does not necessarily suppose the actual destruction of the thing insured, but such loss may exist when the thing is in safety, but is for the time being lost to the owner or taken from his free use and possession. Such are the common cases of loss by capture by embargoes and by restraints and detentions of princes. On the other hand, the mere occurrence of such accidents does not constitute a total loss, if in point of fact the peril has passed away at the time of the abandonment. Peele v. Merchants' Ins. Co. (U. S.) 19 Fed. Cas. 98, 103.

Complete physical extinction.

Total loss of the value to the owner of a vessel and cargo is equivalent to a total physical loss. In an action upon a marine policy for the recovery of an actual total loss, the insured must therefore establish the physical extinction of the property insured, or the extinction of its value arising from the perils insured against. Young v. Pacific Mut. Ins. Co., 34 N. Y. Super. Ct. (2 Jones & S.) 321, 331.

"Total loss," within the rule that the application of a bottomry bond is terminated by the total loss of the vessel, cannot happen if the ship exists in specie, although she may be so much injured on the voyage as not to be worth repairing and bringing to the ultimate place of departure. The doctrine of constructive total loss is not applicable to contracts of bottomry. Delaware Mut. Safety Ins. Co. v. Goosler, 96 U. S. 645, 657, 24 L. Ed. 863 (citing Abb. Shipp. [11th Ed.] 126).

Within the meaning of a policy on freight insuring a vessel and cargo against a total loss, a total loss of the subject of an insurance is where by the perils insured against it is destroyed or so injured as to be of trifling or no value to the insured, for the purpose and use for which it was intended. In the technical sense of the words "total loss," and for every beneficial purpose in which a contract of insurance can be employed, a ship foundered or burned at sea, or wrecked or broken upon the land, so as to be past relief or repair, is, specifically and as a vessel, totally destroyed, and such an event is a total loss; and, when it has happened from a peril insured against, it is a loss for which the underwriter is liable, notwithstanding a salvage—and a very considerable salvage—remaining. Willard v. Millers' & Manufacturers' Ins. Co., 24 Mo. 561, 564, 565.

The words "total loss," as used in a policy of insurance insuring a ship, her cargo and freight, against a total loss only, in their technical sense mean a ship foundered and burned at sea, or wrecked or broken on the land, so as to be past relief and repair, and, as a vessel, totally destroyed, and such an event is a total loss; and so, when it has happened from a peril insured against, it is a loss for which the insurer is liable, notwithstanding the salvage—and a very considerable salvage—remaining, and notwithstanding any restriction the policy may contain as being expressed to be an insurance against a total loss only, or as containing an exception or warranty on the part of the insured against average or partial losses. Insurance was on a ship, her cargo and freight, against a total loss only. The ship was cast ashore, the cargo was saved, and the vessel afterwards got off and carried into a safe harbor, where the master, not having funds to repair her, which, however, might have been done at less than half her value as agreed in the policy, sold her and the cargo to defray salvage and expenses incurred in attempts to preserve and secure her. In such a case the assured was not entitled to recover on the policy as for a total loss. Murray v. Hatch, 6 Mass. 465, 475.

Incapability of repair.

When an injury to an insured vessel can be repaired at an expense less than her value when repaired, the insured cannot recover for a total loss without abandoning to the underwriters. Smith v. Manufacturers' Ins. Co., 48 Mass. (7 Metc.) 448, 453.

A vessel is a "total loss," within the meaning of an insurance policy, when it becomes of no use or value as a ship to the owner, and is as much so as if the vessel had gone to the bottom of the sea, or had been broken to pieces, and the whole or a greater part of the fragments had reached the shore as a wreck; and his loss is considered total where a prudent owner would not have repaired. Irving v. Manning, 6 C. B. 391, 419.

The term "total loss," within the rule that the owner may abandon to the insurer in case of total loss, includes damage to the vessel by any of the perils of the sea on the voyage insured which cannot be repaired at the port to which such vessel proceeds after the injury without expenditure of money to an amount exceeding half the value of the vessel at that port after such repairs. Patapsco Ins. Co. v. Southgate, 30 U. S. (5 Pet.) 604, 618, 8 L. Ed. 243.

In marine insurance a ship is a total loss when she has sustained such extensive damage that it would not be reasonably practicable to repair her. Corbett v. Spring Garden Ins. Co., 50 N. E. 282, 284, 155 N. Y. 389, 41 L. R. A. 818.

If either a ship or voyage be lost, there is a total loss within the terms of the policy, but where the extent of a loss was found to be 48 per cent. of the vessel only, and the vessel performed her voyage, but on her arrival was not worth repairing, there was no "total loss," within the policy. Cazalett v. St. Barbe, 1 Term R. 187, 190, 191.

Loss exceeding half value.

In order for insured to recover for a total loss, the injury to the thing insured must have exceeded 50 per cent. Thornely v. Hebson, 2 Barn. & Ald. 513, 519; Marine Ins. Co. v. Tucker, 7 U. S. (3 Cranch) 357, 379, 2 L. Ed. 466.

The term "total loss," within the meaning of a marine policy on a vessel, embraces damages to the vessel by any perils of the sea on the voyage insured which cannot be repaired at the port to which such vessel proceeds after the injury without an expenditure of money to an amount exceeding half the value of the vessel at that port after such repairs. Patapsco Ins. Co. v. Southgate, 30 U. S. (5 Pet.) 604, 618, 8 L. Ed. 243.

Seizure and detention.

"Total loss" is of two kinds: First, it signifies the total destruction of the thing insured; and, secondly, such damage to the thing insured, though it may specifically remain, as renders it of little or no value to the owner. A seizure and detention of a vessel and cargo, and the interruption thereby of the voyage insured by a policy of marine insurance, may be constructively a total loss, at the election of the insured. The insured is not obliged to abandon, though to be entitled to recover as for a total loss he must abandon to the insurers the effects and voyage insured. Livermore v. Newburyport Marine Ins. Co., 1 Mass. 264, 275.

Stranding.

The mere stranding of a vessel is not ipso facto a total loss which will authorize an abandonment of the vessel; but it is always a question of evidence in such cases whether the stranding be attended with such circumstances as to produce a total loss, either because it is followed by shipwreck or other destruction of the property, or because the vessel cannot be set afloat, or because she cannot be repaired at the place of the peril for want of materials or workmen. Patrick v. Commercial Ins. Co. (N. Y.) 11 Johns. 9, 13.

Cargo.

The term "total loss," as applied to cargo, requires that the goods be annihilated; and thus, if certain coffee insured arrives in specie, it is not a total loss, though the value of the coffee be entirely destroyed. Wallerstein v. Columbian Ins. Co., 26 N. Y. Super. Ct. (3 Rob.) 528, 536.

"Total loss," as the term is used in a policy, means actual destruction of the entire subject-matter of the insurance. Thus, if goods of one kind in one ship are insured, by one description and valuation, against total loss only, the total loss of some of them, though in separate packages, is considered but a partial loss of one entire subject of insurance, and give no right to recover against the insurer as for a total loss of that part. In all cases where part of a cargo has been treated as a distinct subject of insurance, the goods lost have been either of a different kind from those saved, or were valued or described by packages or otherwise so as to distinguish them. Pierce v. Columbian Ins. Co., 96 Mass. (14 Allen) 320, 321.

The term "total loss," as it is used in a marine policy against total loss of a cargo, means a destruction in specie; so that while some of the component elements of parts of the cargo may remain, still there is a total loss if the thing insured, in the character or description by which it was so insured, is destroyed. Thus, a machine is a total loss, though parts of it are recovered and tendered to the insured. Great Western Ins. Co. v. Fogarty, 86 U. S. (19 Wall.) 640, 643, 22 L. Ed. 216.

There may be a total loss of cargo without an actual annihilation of it, and when something is obtained from it in the nature of salvage. Williams v. Kennebec Mut. Ins. Co., 31 Me. 455, 461-463.

The doctrine of total loss respecting perishable articles may be thus briefly stated: If the article, or any part of it, arrives at the port of destination in specie, or can, with the exercise of reasonable diligence and care, be carried there in that condition, although it may be worthless there, there can be no total loss. If, by reason of the perils insured against, no part of it can be carried to the port of destination in specie, the loss is total. Where potatoes arrived at the port of distress, and all but a few on the top were greatly injured by sea water, or, to use the word of the witness, were "mush," there was a total loss. Williams v. Kennebec Mut. Ins. Co., 31 Me. 455, 461-463; Hugg v. Augusta Ins. & Banking Co., 48 U. S. (7 How.) 595, 605, 12 L. Ed. 834.

The total loss which in the law of marine insurance will authorize the insured to abandon the projected adventure and throw the loss on the underwriter may arise from the mere deterioration of a cargo by any of the perils insured against, if the deterioration be ascertained at an intermediate port of necessity, short of the port of destination. In such case, although the ship be in a capacity to perform the voyage, yet if the voyage be not worth pursuing, or the thing insured be so damaged and spoiled as to be of little or no value, the insured has the right to abandon the projected adventure and throw upon the underwriter the unprofitable and disastrous subject of insurance. It has therefore been held that if a cargo be damaged in the course of the voyage, and it appear that what has been saved is less in value than the amount of the freight, it is a clear case of total loss. It does not, however, appear that the exact quantum of damage which shall authorize an abandonment as for a total loss has ever become the direct subject of adjudication in the English court. The celebrated treatise Le Guideon, c. 7, art. 1, considers that a damage exceeding the moiety of the value of the thing insured is sufficient to authorize an abandonment. This rule has received some countenance from more recent elementary writers, and from its public convenience and certainty has been adopted as the governing principle in some of the most respectable commercial states of the Union, and perhaps is now so generally established as not to be easily shaken. Marcadier v. Chesapeake Ins. Co., 12 U. S. (8 Cranch) 39, 47, 3 L. Ed. 481.

In speaking of insurance against total loss of cargo, it was held that the insurer could not be liable when a cargo, or a part of it, had been sent on by the insured, and reached the port of destination. Washington, J., says: "If the property arrive at the port of discharge reduced in quantity or value to any amount, the loss cannot be said to be total in reality, and the insured cannot treat it as total, and demand an indemnity for partial loss. There is no instance where the insured can demand as for a total loss that he might not have declined an abandonment and demand a partial loss. But if the property insured be included within the memorandum, he cannot under any circumstances call upon the insurer for a partial loss, and consequently he cannot elect to turn it into a total loss." Morean v. United States Ins. Co., 14 U. S. (1 Wheat.) 219, 224, 4 L. Ed. 75.

The term "total loss," in a marine policy covering a total loss of the cargo insured, consisting of hides, does not include a loss of the hides, consisting of many thousand in number, by the sinking of a lighter, when all the hides save 800 are recovered. Blays v. Chesapeake Ins. Co., 11 U. S. (7 Cranch) 415, 418, 3 L. Ed. 389.

"A constructive total loss of a ship is not a constructive total loss of the cargo, if the cargo arrives safely at the port at which it may be sold or transhipped." Taber v. China Mut. Ins. Co., 131 Mass. 239, 251.

TOUCH.

The general principle is that if the covenant relate to the mode of enjoying the leased lands, whether for the benefit of the reversion, or of other lands of the lessor, or of a business conducted elsewhere by him, it is a covenant which in the language of the old cases touches or concerns the demised premises. American Strawboard Co. v. Haldeman Paper Co. (U. S.) 83 Fed. 619, 625, 27 C. C. A. 634.

The word "touching," as used in a bill of exceptions stating that a party offered in evidence sundry documents, letters, and other papers, touching the premises in question and matters in dispute, means simply "mentioning." Gratz v. Gratz (Pa.) 4 Rawle, 411, 431.

In maritime law.

The word "touch" and its derivatives is in a sense a nautical phrase. It is defined thus: "To come or to attain to; to arrive at; to reach; as, to touch their natal shore." And its use is illustrated as follows: "To touch at; arrive at; or come to this state; as in sailing. 'The next day we touched at Sidon.' Acts, xxxvii, 3." The word "touching," as used in Act May 6, 1882, c. 126, § 3, 22 Stat. 59 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1307], relating to the touching of vessels having Chinese laborers on board at any port of the United States, is used to signify the opposite of "stay." Calling at a port for orders is a plain case of touching at such port. In re Moncan (U. S.) 14 Fed. 44, 46.

Where a vessel makes irregular and transient visitation to a port in course of her voyage to various ports, she is said to touch at each of the ports which she visits. A vessel plies between two places; she may touch at many. San Francisco v. Talbot, 63 Cal. 485, 487.

Liberty to touch at certain ports, when given in a marine policy, imports that such liberty is based upon a purpose to be accomplished by entering such ports, which is to be inferred from the character of the voyage, and by the cargo and the circumstances and nature of the adventure; and a reasonable delay at the authorized port, to accomplish such purpose, is not a deviation. Arnold v. Pacific Mut. Ins. Co., 78 N. Y. 7, 19.

A marine policy giving the vessel "liberty of touching at Cape Verde Island for stock" on her outward voyage should be construed to only authorize a stopping for the purpose of provisioning the vessel with live stock, such as is usual on a voyage and may be procured at the cape. Maryland Ins. Co. v. Le Roy, 11 U. S. (7 Cranch) 26, 31, 3 L. Ed. 257.

A marine policy giving the insured the right to touch at a certain port does not justify trading at such port, and hence trading will be a deviation which will avoid the policy. United States v. The Paul Shearman (U. S.) 27 Fed. Cas. 467, 469.

Arrival distinguished.

See "Arrive—Arrival"

TOUCHING PATENT RIGHTS.

"Touching patent rights," as used in Rev. St. U. S. § 699, giving appellate jurisdiction to the Supreme Court in any case touching patent rights, means a case in which the validity and the infringement of a patent are controverted, though the action be only upon a contract by which the plaintiff licensed the defendant to make and sell a patented article, and not a suit for infringing the plaintiff's patent. St. Paul Plow Works v. Starling, 8 Sup. Ct. 1327, 127 U. S. 876, 32 L. Ed. 251.

A suit against a patentee for specific performance of a contract alleged to have been made between defendant and complainant, by which the latter was to have the right to make and use the patented article and to enjoin defendant from interfering with such use, is not a suit "touching patent rights," within the meaning of the statute giving the federal courts jurisdiction of such suits. Marsh v. Nichols, Shepard & Co., 11 Sup. Ct. 798, 802, 140 U. S. 344, 35 L. Ed. 418.

TOUS MES EFFETS.

"Tous mes effets" means "all or the whole of my effects and property," and, as used in the will of a French alien, was sufficient to pass the entire residuary estate of the testator to the beneficiary under the clause; and the fact that such words were introduced by the words "my carriage and horses included" was not for the purpose, and did not have the effect, of restricting or qualifying the former terms, but resulted only from the testator's anxiety that those articles should pass under the general term. Ennis v. Smith, 55 U. S. (14 How.) 400, 409, 14 L. Ed. 472.

TOW.

Towboat as common carrier, see "Common Carrier."

To tow means to drag a vessel forward in the water by means of a rope attached to another vessel, and implies that the act is done by those on board of the latter. Webst. Dict.; Falconer, Marine Dict. The tug simply furnishes the means of traction to the canal boat, which must be steered or navigated by those on board of her. "Navigating" does not mean "towing." Rev. St. U. S. § 4251 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 2929], providing that "no canal boat without masts or steam power, which is required to be registered, licensed, or enrolled, shall be subject to be libeled in any United States court for the wages of any person who may be employed on board thereof, or in navigating the same," does not apply to a claim for towing such a canal boat. Ryan v. Hook (N. Y.) 34 Hun, 185, 191.

TOWAGE.

See "Extraordinary Towage."

"Towage" service is aid rendered in the propulsion of a vessel, irrespective of any circumstances of peril. The H. B. Foster (U. S.) 11 Fed. Cas. 948; The Princess Alice, 3 W. Rob. 138.

In The Reward, 1 W. Rob. 174, 177, it was said by Dr. Lushington: "I apprehend that mere towage service is confined to vessels that have received no injury or damage, and that mere towage reward is payable in those cases only where the vessel receiving the service is in the same condition she would ordinarily be in without having encountered any damage or accident. It is distinguished from salvage, which implies some degree of danger and some need of extraordinary assistance." The Athenian (U. S.) 3 Fed. 248, 249. Also quoted and approved in McConochie v. Kerr (U. S.) 9 Fed. 50, 53; The Alaska (U. S.) 23 Fed. 597, 607; The Cache-mire (U. S.) 38 Fed. 518, 521.

Towage service may be described as the employment of one vessel to expedite the voyage of another, when nothing more is required than the accelerating her progress, and it is confined to vessels that have received no injury or damage. Towage, like pumping or steering, making sail, or any other ship work, may occur in the ordinary course of navigation, or may be a means of salvage; and whether it is to be paid for according to a quantum meruit, or at an agreed price, or by wages, or by a salvage compensation, must depend upon the circumstances under which it is performed. The Plymouth Rock (U. S.) 9 Fed. 413, 416.

Salvage distinguished.

There are two species of agreements which may be entered into by a vessel whose usual occupation is to tow vessels from one place to another. One is where she meets with a vessel disabled, and undertakes for any sum agreed on to bring the vessel from one port to another, or to a place of safety. That may be called an extraordinary towage. "Ordinary towage" is that which takes place for the purpose of expediting a vessel on her voyage, either homeward or outward. The Kingaloch, 28 Eng. Law & Eq. 596, 597.

Towage is not salvage, and, when considered by itself, is never compensative except on the principle of paying according to its worth for work and labor performed; that is to say, in legal phrase, it is paid for on the basis of quantum meruit pro opere et labore. The Egypt (U. S.) 17 Fed. 359, 370.

Salvage, as distinguished from towage, simply implies some degree of danger and need of assistance generally. The Athenian (U. S.) 3 Fed. 248, 249.

There is no generic difference between towage and salvage. In the absence of a contract, the towing of a vessel in peril or disabled is salvage. Baker v. Hemenway (U. S.) 2 Fed. Cas. 463.

As distinguished from towage salvage simply implies some degree of danger and need of assistance generally. The mere fact that a vessel is aground is enough to show that she is in a situation to have a salvage service. The Athenian (U. S.) 3 Fed. 248, 249.

TOWARD.

"Toward" means "in the direction to; with direction to; in a moral sense, with regard to; regarding; with ideal tendency to; nearly." Webst. Dict. As used in the statute which makes the killing of a human being, by a person who is provoked by the use of insulting language toward a female relative, manslaughter, it does not require that the insulting language should be addressed to the female personally, but any insulting language in the presence of the relative with reference to the female is sufficient. Hudson v. State, 6 Tex. App. 565, 576, 82 Am. Rep. 598.

A testator in bequeathing a certain sum in trust to his grandchildren, but providing that the income thereof should be applied towards their education and support, in the discretion of their fathers, assumes that the father would be charged with the burden, and signifies that the income from the trust fund was designed to assist in the discharging of the burden. Dixon v. Bentley, 25 Atl. 194, 195, 50 N. J. Eq. (5 Dick.) 87.

The word "toward," as used in the statute making it unlawful for any person over the age of ten years, with or without malice, purposely to point or aim any pistol or firearm at or toward any other person, means in the direction of. One who angrily seeks another sheltered in his own dwelling, and purposely points a gun at the dwelling house door, telling the occupant to come out and threatening to shoot him, is amenable under this statute. Lange v. State, 95 Ind. 114, 115.

TOWN.

See "County Town"; "Incorporated Town"; "School Town."
Any town, see "Any."

It may be said that the term "town" now includes almost every character of municipal government from a city to a village, including places which are governed by a commission with some municipal governmental powers, and designated by such a title; and, if the functions of these different municipalities are similar, this term "town" would seem to include them all. Herrman v. Town of Guttenberg, 43 Atl. 703, 704, 62 N. J. Law, 605 (citing Long Branch Police, Sanitary & Improvement Commission v. Dobbins, 40 Atl. 599, 61 N. J. Law, 659).

"Town," as used in Act March 22, 1895, providing that the inhabitants of any district lying wholly in one county, and having a population exceeding a certain number, may become incorporated as a city, but such district shall not include any territory already within the limits of any incorporated city or town, means every species of municipal corporation above the grade of townships. Stout v. Borough of Glen Ridge, 35 Atl. 913, 914, 59 N. J. Law, 201.

"Towns," as used in Act April 20, 1886 (Laws 1886, p. 243), relating to the construction of sewers by towns, must be accepted in its broad, generic sense, embracing the whole range of bodies corporate, less than counties, established for local government. Brown's Estate v. Town of Union, 40 Atl. 632, 633, 62 N. J. Law, 142.

"Towns," as used in Const. art. 4, § 7, par. 11, providing that the Legislature shall not pass private local or special laws regulating the internal affairs of towns and counties, includes all municipalities, from townships up. Burnet v. Dean, 46 Atl. 532, 535, 60 N. J. Eq. 9 (citing Van Riper v. Parsons, 40 N. J. Law [11 Vroom] 1; Pell v. City of Newark, Id. 550).

In the historic case of Van Riper v. Parsons, 40 N. J. Law (11 Vroom) 1, the word "town" was given a significance broad enough to include every municipality in the state, including cities. In Pell v. City of Newark, Id. 550, Chief Justice Beasley, speaking for the Court of Errors and Appeals, said that the word "towns," standing in its generic sense, embraced townships as well as cities, "and all other places corporate established for local government of the same grade as these, and also those of an inferior order, if any such there be." In Banta v. Richards, 42 N. J. Law (18 Vroom) 497, Mr. Justice Dixon, speaking for the court, said: "The word used in the law throughout is 'town.' This is a word of varying significance. * * * But so uncertain is this term 'town' that a construction that rested upon the word alone would be quite unsatisfactory." And the opinion held, in conclusion, that townships were not included among towns in the act under consideration. In Brown v. New York & N. J. Telephone Co., 49 N. J. Law (20 Vroom) 624, 9 Atl. 754, the same learned jurist said: "The import of the word 'town' in our legislation is so variable that its signification in any particular enactment must largely depend upon the occasion and purpose of the law;" holding in conclusion that in the statute under consideration "the word 'town' should receive an interpretation broad enough to include all such places, whether they were formally styled 'towns,' 'townships,' 'boroughs,' or 'villages.'" In Stout v. Borough of Glen Ridge, 35 Atl. 913, 59 N. J. Law, 201, Mr. Justice Magie said: "It is undeniable that the word 'town' has been used in our legislation in different senses;" concluding that in the act under review it included every species of municipal corporation below that of city and above that of township. In Brown's Estate v. Town of Union, 40 Atl. 632, 62 N. J. Law, 142, Mr. Justice Van Syckel held that "the word 'towns' embraced the whole range of bodies corporate, less than counties, established for local government." And in Long Branch Police, Sanitary & Improvement Commission v. Dobbins, 61 N. J. Law, 659, 40 Atl. 599, in the opinion of the Court of Errors and Appeals, delivered by Judge Nixon, it was said arguendo: "If Long Branch is not a village, it certainly is a town." Bliss v. Woolley, 52 Atl. 835, 838, 68 N. J. Law, 51.

The word "town" is generic, comprehending cities. It was so held in the case of Flinn v. State, 24 Ind. 286. In Obit. Bl. top pages 81, 82, the word "town" is defined as follows: "The word 'town' or 'vill' has indeed, by the alteration of times and language, now become a generic term, comprehending in it the several species of cities, boroughs, and common towns." Where towns are vested with the power of local self-government, cities are also included under such designation and entitled to local self-government. State v. Denny, 21 N. E. 274, 278, 118 Ind. 449, 4 L. R. A. 65.

The word "town" is ambiguous. It may mean either a corporation, or simply a collection of people, independent of the fact of incorporation. A town is a collection of people, and it may be either an incorporated or an unincorporated town; so that in the title to alter and amend the several acts incorporating the town of S., and conferring upon the town of S. a municipal government, if the expression "town" was used in the sense of a corporation of that name, the purpose of the act might be simply to change the laws in reference to that corporation without changing the character of the corporation. On the other hand, if the town referred to in the title is simply a collection of people within the territory commonly known as the "town of S.," then any legislation having the effect of conferring upon these people a municipal government, whether that government be a town or a city government, would be authorized by the title. Sessions v. State, 41 S. E. 259, 260, 115 Ga. 18.

The term "town" signifies an aggregation of inhabitants and a collection of occupied dwellings and other buildings; and in a private action to abate a nuisance, where it is necessary to aver the existence or nonexistence of other property than plaintiff's, an allegation that the premises alleged to be injured are in a certain town gives rise to the presumption that there are other inhabitants and owners of property therein. Siskiyou Lumber & Mercantile Co. v. Rosel, 121 Cal. 511, 513, 53 Pac. 1118, 1119.

The legal municipal corporations in Ohio are cities, villages, and hamlets; but with utter propriety of language it may be said there are, all over the state, towns, both incorporated and unincorporated. And it is very evident that the Legislature in this act (Laws 1891; 88 Ohio Laws, p. 95), providing that all market houses, squares, etc., belonging to any town, etc., shall be exempt from taxation, was not speaking with reference to the legal classification of municipal corporations, so as to require terms of legal precision, but was making general provisions, applicable to towns in the popular sense. In strictness, there has been no municipality in this state for a long time legally known as a "town," yet all the while there are and have been aggregations of houses and inhabitants known as "towns," and the line that marks the size of an aggregation of this kind so as to include or exclude it from the general term "town" is not, and never has been, well drawn. City of Toledo v. Yeager, 8 Ohio Cir. Ct. R. 318, 323, 6 O. C. D. 273, 276.

Any municipal subdivision of a county, less than a city, is included within either of the terms "town" and "village," as is clearly apparent from the legislation of the state from the adoption of Rev. St. 1887, to the present. Our interpretation of these statutes is borne out by Town of Enfield v. Jordan, 119 U. S. 680, 7 Sup. Ct. 358, 30 L. Ed. 523. Brown v. Village of Grangeville, 71 Pac. 151, 152, 8 Idaho, 784.

A town is a civil and political corporation established for municipal purposes. Inhabitants of Milford v. Godfrey, 18 Mass. (1 Pick.) 91, 97.

"Town" is a generic word. Of the genus, cities and boroughs are species. New York & L. R. R. Co. v. Drummond, 46 N. J. Law (17 Vroom) 644, 646.

As any collection of houses.

The word "town" was originally from the Anglo-Saxon "tun," "an inclosure," and meant a collection of houses inclosed by a wall. When used in the title of an act for the incorporation of towns and villages it will be presumed to have been used in its ordinary acceptation as meaning an aggregation of houses and inhabitants more or less compact. Territory v. Stewart, 23 Pac. 405, 406, 1 Wash. St. 98, 8 L. R. A. 106.

The dictionaries tell us that the word "town" signifies any walled collection of houses. Johnson. But that is its antique meaning. By modern use it is said to be applied to an undefined collection of houses or habitations, also to the inhabitants, emphatically to the metropolis. Again, a town is any collection of houses larger than a village, or any number of houses to which belongs a regular market, and is not a city. Johnson; Webster; Ogilvie. In New York and New England, towns are political units of territory into which the county is subdivided, and answer politically to parishes and hundreds in England, but are vested with greater powers of local government. In Maryland and most of the southern states, the word "town" is used in a broad sense to include all collections of houses, from a city down to a village. In Delaware the counties are subdivided into hundreds; the words "town" and "village" being indiscriminately applied to collections of houses. Town of Enfield v. Jordan, 7 Sup. Ct. 358, 361, 119 U. S. 680, 30 L. Ed. 523.

"Town," as used in Pen. Code, § 415, providing that every person who runs a horse race or fires a gun or pistol upon any of the public highways of any incorporated town shall be punished by a certain fine, etc., is used in the sense of a collection of dwellings, such as constitute a village (unincorporated). Ex Parte Foley, 62 Cal. 508, 511.

"Town," as used in Act April 29, 1897, entitled "An act to compile the several acts incorporating the town of Shelbyville, and the several acts amendatory thereto, into one act, and to amend the same, and repeal the acts in conflict with this act," will be construed in the ordinary and colloquial sense of a collection of houses occupied by people, referring to the county town of that name as such, and not as the name of a corporate entity. Cooper v. Town of Shelbyville (Tenn.) 57 S. W. 429, 434.

On the trial of an indictment against the turnpike trustees for erecting a gate within the town of T., the judge directed that the word "town" was to be taken in its popular sense of a collection of houses, and that they were to consider whether the spot where the gate stood was so surrounded by houses that the inhabitants might fairly be said to dwell together; the fact of the houses being separated by gardens not preventing them from lying together. Reg. v. Cottle, 3 Eng. Law & Eq. 474.

"Town," as used in 3 & 4 Vict. c. 36, a local and personal act creating trustees of certain turnpike roads which were described by definite points as some in the town of T., and which act was to be in operation for 31 years, and declared that it should not be lawful for the trustees to continue or erect any turnpike or tollgate roads across the said roads in the towns of T. and W. or in any other town, must be understood in a public sense as a congregation of houses, and not of the town as it existed at the passing of the act. Reg. v. Cottle, 16 Q. B. 412, 421.

In considering a statute of New Jersey declaring that "nothing in this act contained shall be construed to extend to narrowing, widening, or altering any street in any of the cities, towns, or villages in this state," etc., the chancellor said: "In giving a construction to this section of the act, some difficulty may occur in defining what the act means by 'town' and 'village.' The word 'town' is not here used as synonymous with 'township.' The whole state is divided into counties, and the counties subdivided into townships; so that, if we construe 'town' to mean the 'township,' the whole act would be defeated. It was obviously the intention of the Legislature to protect the established streets in the settled towns and villages of the state from the operation of the act. Certainly, no one can contend for a more liberal definition of the term 'town' than that of a collection of two or more inhabited dwelling houses. The mere fact of 50 or 100 acres of land being mapped out into streets and building lots cannot make a town." Holmes v. Jersey City, 12 N. J. Eq. (1 Beas.) 299, 304, 305.

"The terms 'plantation,' 'town,' and 'township' seem to have been used in the early colonies of Massachusetts almost indiscriminately to indicate a cluster or body of persons inhabiting near each other, and when they became designated by name certain powers were conferred upon them by general orders and laws, such as to manage their own prudential concerns, to elect deputies, and the like, which in effect made them municipal corporations, and no formal acts of incorporation were granted until long afterwards." Commonwealth v. City of Roxbury, 75 Mass. (9 Gray) 451, 485.

The word "town" does not necessarily include only that part of an aggregation of dwelling houses which is within the corporate limits, but usually has reference merely to a geographical location, without regard to the corporate limits. An agreement to locate a college at a certain town does not necessarily mean within the corporate limits of the town, as contradistinguished from that town lying beyond the corporate limits. Rogers v. Galloway Female College, 44 S. W. 454, 456, 64 Ark. 627, 39 L. R. A. 636.

The word "town," as used in Sayles' Ann. St. art. 541a, allowing towns and plantations to incorporate for school purposes only, means a collection of inhabited houses. The word carries with it the idea of a considerable aggregation of people living in close proximity. A town population is distinguished from a rural population, which is understood to signify a population scattered over the district engaged in agricultural pursuits or some other occupation requiring some considerable territory for its support. Therefore a tract of land containing 28 square miles, not more than 2 of which are covered by a town, can be incorporated for school purposes only. State v. Edison, 76 Tex. 302, 18 S. W. 263, 7 L. R. A. 733.

As a civil division of territory.

A town, under the township organization system of the state of Illinois, is a civil subdivision of a county, being created as a subordinate agency in the administration of the general state and local government; the distinction between such a town and other chartered municipal corporations proper, sometimes denominated "towns," being that a chartered town or village is given corporate existence at the request or by the consent of the inhabitants thereof, for the interest, advantage, or convenience of the locality and its people, while a town under township organization is created almost exclusively with a view to the policy of the state at large, for purposes of political organization and as an agency of the state and county, to aid in the civil administration of affairs pertaining to the general administration of the state and county government, and is imposed upon the territory included within it without consulting the wishes of the inhabitants thereof. People v. Martin, 53 N. E. 309, 312, 178 Ill. 611; Phillips v. Town of Scales Mound, 63 N. E. 180, 182, 195 Ill. 853.

The word "town," philologically considered, is a change in the orthography and pronunciation of the Anglo-Saxon word "tun," from the verb "tyan," meaning to inclose; and "town," therefore, means an inclosure. It was used to denote a garden inclosed by a hedge, or a collection of houses inclosed by a wall. Zell's Popular Encyclopedia and Johnson's New Universal Encyclopedia. Its general and customary usage in England, as denoting a collection of houses or hamlets between a village or city, or its stricter legal or civil meaning, as denoting a civil corporation of larger territory, which might include a village or city, are somewhat foreign to the use of the word, and the civil and territorial subdivision or organization which it is used to signify in this country. Its first use in this country was to define the original or primary civil or governmental organizations of the early colonists of New England, who knew by bitter experience the oppressive tyranny of imperial law, and who desired, above all things, to be governed not only by laws made by themselves in primary assembly, but having a limited and local application to their wants in small and independent communities. It can be seen that in the very nature and uses of such a local government the town must be, first, of limited territorial extent; second, of compact and contiguous territory; third, its boundary must be clearly defined and continuous; and, fourth, it should embrace within its government only those having a unity or similarity of interests. In New England, towns having been the first local civil governments, and antecedent to the formation of counties, the counties were made by a consolidation of its towns. In the western states, however, when an organic law is first made for the government of the whole territory, or a constitution is formed for the whole state, counties are formed first, and towns within them afterwards; but the same original idea and meaning of the town remain the same, and that is "a subdivision of a county," as defined in Johnson's New Universal Encyclopedia, and "subdivision of a county, as a parish is part of a subdivision of a diocese." "In popular usage, in America, the whole territory within certain limits." Imperial Dict. Webster defines town as "an inclosure; the whole territory within certain limits." In Abbott's Law Dictionary it is defined as "a walled place or borough." Finch, 80. All these definitions of "town" are strangely expressive of compactness, adjacency, and contiguity, such as "inclosure," "whole territory within certain limits," "defined portion of the state," and "a subdivision of a county." A town, in its name and uses, conveys the very idea of locality, vicinity, vicinage, and convenience. A town is a subdivision, in the singular; not subdivisions, or many subdivisions, in the plural. Aside from these definitions, all of which appear to be conclusive of the question, there is much force in the general and almost invariable usage, in this country at least, in the organization of towns and counties, as in precincts, districts, cities, and villages, in forming them of adjacent and contiguous territory. Chicago & N. W. Ry. Co. v. Town of Oconto, 6 N. W. 607, 608, 50 Wis. 189, 36 Am. Rep. 840.

Every borough or city, says Tomlinson, is a town. Tom. Law Dict. The greater necessarily includes the lesser, for a city begins as a village, extends into a town, and afterwards becomes a city by incorporation or otherwise, for there are cities that were never incorporated. Co. Litt. 109, with Hargrave's Notes, 2, 3. The word "town," according to Blackstone, has by alteration of times and language become a general term, comprehending under it the several species of cities, boroughs, etc.; and he adds, "A city is a town incorporated." 1 Bl. Comm. 114. In common parlance the word is frequently applied to cities, as "leaving town," "coming to town," "out of town," etc. In the state of New York they have the political division of towns, cities, and incorporated villages, and that that particular political division is what is meant by the word "town" may in a given case be apparent from the purpose of the statute. Board of Com'rs of Public Charities and Correction of City of New York v. McGurrin (N. Y.) 6 Daly, 349, 355.

Towns, in Maine, as in the other New England states, are territorial divisions into which the territory of the state is divided by the Legislature for political purposes for the more convenient and effectual administration of certain functions of political government. The inhabitants of the particular territory are made a political agency, and political duties and liabilities for purposes of administration are imposed upon them, even without their consent. They are not a voluntary association. They cannot escape the duties and burdens imposed except by a removal of themselves and their property from the town territory. It is clear that such agencies are subject to such duties and liabilities only as are expressly or by necessary implication imposed upon them by the Legislature to effectuate the purpose of their creation. The powers of a town over the inhabitants and property within its territory are correspondingly limited to such as are necessary for the efficient discharge of those duties and liabilities; and even these limited powers are to be exercised upon the citizen and his property only with such precautions and in such manner as may be prescribed by the state. Lovejoy v. Inhabitants of Foxcroft, 40 Atl. 141, 142, 91 Me. 367.

"Towns" are only political subdivisions of the state made for the convenient administration of the government. They are component parts of the state, and, aggregately taken, are the state (Wooster v. Plymouth, 62 N. H. 208), constituting a portion of the sovereign power of the state. A municipal corporation is therefore not subject to a right of action against itself unless the right is conferred by statute in the exercise of the entire control over municipalities with which the Legislature is invested by the Constitution. Davis v. Town of Rumney, 38 Atl. 18, 19, 67 N. H. 591.

Towns in Connecticut and in other New England states differ from trading corporations, and even from municipal corporations elsewhere. They are territorial corporations into which the state is divided by the Legislature for political purposes, and for the convenient administration of government. They have only those powers which have been expressly conferred on them by statute, or which are necessary for conducting municipal affairs, and are what are known as "quasi corporations." In Connecticut, Massachusetts and Maine, by common law or immemorial usage the property of any inhabitant might be taken on execution on a judgment against the town. The town could not make a contract, or authorize any officer or agent to make one in its behalf, except by vote in a town meeting duly notified or warned. Town of Bloomfield v. Charter Oak Bank, 7 Sup. Ct. 865, 869, 121 U. S. 121, 30 L. Ed. 923 (citing Atwater v. Inhabitants of Town of Woodridge, 6 Conn. 223, 228, 16 Am. Dec. 46; McLoud v. Selby, 10 Conn. 390, 27 Am. Dec. 689; Beardsley v. Smith, 16 Conn. 368, 41 Am. Dec. 148; 5 Dane, Abr. 158; Chase v. Merrimack Bank, 36 Mass. [19 Pick.] 564, 569, 31 Am. Dec. 163; Gaskill v. Dudley, 47 Mass. [6 Metc.] 546, 39 Am. Dec. 750; Adams v. Wiscasset Bank, 1 Me. [1 Greenl.] 361, 10 Am. Dec. 88; Fernald v. Lewis, 6 Me. [6 Greenl.] 264; Hopkins v. Town of Elmore, 49 Vt. 176; Gen. Laws N. H. 1878, c. 239, § 8; Reynolds v. Inhabitants of New Salem, 47 Mass. [6 Metc.] 340; Third School Dist. in Stoughton v. Atherton, 53 Mass. [12 Metc.] 105; Moor v. Newfield, 4 Me. [4 Greenl.] 44; Dill. Mun. Corp. §§ 28-30, 266-268).

"Town" is defined by Laws 1890, c. 569, § 2, as a municipal corporation comprising the inhabitants within its boundaries, and formed for the purpose of exercising such powers and discharging such duties of the local government and the administration of public affairs as have been or may be conferred or imposed on it by law, and will not be held to continue in existence detached, overlooked, shreds of territory destitute of inhabitants, which were left when the town was organized into a city and a town. Town of Watervliet v. Town of Colonie, 50 N. Y. Supp. 487, 490, 27 App. Div. 394.

"Town," as used in Const. art. 11, § 3, providing that laws may be passed providing for organization for municipal and other town purposes, denotes what is conveniently spoken of as the "New England town"—that is, a portion of the state bounded by geographical lines to which to a greater or less extent the power of self-government is committed. State v. Sharp, 6 N. W. 408, 27 Minn. 38.

A town is not a business or a charitable organization. It is simply a political organization, created as a convenient agent for the performance of certain governmental duties and purposes. Its powers are almost entirely political, and are properly limited to its duties. It has only such control over the citizen and his money or property as is expressly granted to it and is necessary to the performance of its duties to the public. Indeed, a town is only a trustee for the public. It does not own the money in its treasury, nor the municipal property generally, but holds them in trust for the public, and subject to public control through the Legislature. Thorndike v. Inhabitants of Camden, 19 Atl. 95, 82 Me. 39, 7 L. R. A. 463 (citing Dill. Mun. Corp. § 61; Meriwether v. Garrett, 102 U. S. 472, 26 L. Ed. 197).

Towns are political subdivisions formed for the purpose of aiding in carrying on the government of the state. In laying out highways by their selectmen, they act as mere instrumentalities of the government for the benefit of the public. Lynch v. Town of Rutland, 29 Atl. 1015, 66 Vt. 570 (citing State v. Town of Burlington, 36 Vt. 521; Welsh v. Village of Rutland, 56 Vt. 228, 48 Am. Rep. 762; Bates v. Same, 62 Vt. 178, 20 Atl. 278, 9 L. R. A. 363, 22 Am. St. Rep. 95; Buchanan v. Town of Barre, 66 Vt. 129, 28 Atl. 878, 23 L. R. A. 488, 44 Am. St. Rep. 829; School Dist. No. 1 of Weybridge v. Town of Bridgeport, 63 Vt. 383, 22 Atl. 570),

Towns are quasi corporations, and in their characteristic qualities radically differ from trading and commercial corporations as to the liability arising from acts of agents. And in some essentials towns differ from ordinary municipal corporations, whose chartered powers are conferred at the request of the inhabitants, and to effectuate in some degree and to some extent purposes not public or governmental. Public duties and obligations are cast upon towns by the legislative power without reference to the will of the inhabitants of the town. Every inhabitant of the town is a member of the quasi corporation, and his individual property may be levied upon to satisfy executions against the town. Turney v. Town of Bridgeport, 12 Atl. 520, 521, 55 Conn. 412 (citing Webster v. Town of Harwinton, 32 Conn. 131; White v. Town of Stamford, 37 Conn. 578, 586; Town of East Hartford v. American Nat. Bank, 49 Conn. 539, 553).

As an estate.

In Ireland, it is frequent to describe the lands of great estates, even in their settlements, as "towns." The word appears to be a common and known description, and, in a description in ejectment of a "town and tenement," the words were synonymous terms. Cottingham v. Rex, 1 Burr. 623, 629.

As incorporated towns.

The word "town" shall be construed to mean an incorporated town containing a population of less than 5,000. Code Va. 1887, § 5 [1 Code Va. 1904, p. 8, § 5, subd. 16].

"Town," as used in Act June 15, 1883, authorizing the corporate authorities of towns, cities, and villages, and county boards, to issue licenses to sell liquors, means incorporated towns, and does not include a town created under a township organization. People v. Town of Thornton, 57 N. E. 841, 845, 186 Ill. 162.

"Town," as used in Laws 1895, c. 172, requiring the corporate authorities of any "village, town, or city" to establish voting precincts convenient for the inhabitants, refers to an incorporated municipality. Stemper v. Higgins, 37 N. W. 95, 97, 38 Minn. 222.

A "town," in its popular sense, has been defined to be a congregation of houses so reasonably near each other that the inhabitants thereof might be fairly said to dwell together. Reg. v. Cottle, 16 Q. B. 412; Elliott v. South Devon Ry. Co., 2 Exch. 724; Directors v. Blackmore, L. R. 4 H. L. Cas. 610. Bishop says that the meaning of the word "town" varies more or less with the connection and subject. It may include cities or incorporated villages, or a mere congregation of dwelling houses not incorporated. Bish. St. Cr. § 299a. As used in the statute imposing a privilege tax on a private boarding house in a town, it may include an incorporated as well as an unincorporated town. Murphy v. State, 5 South. 626, 627, 66 Miss. 46.

"Town," as used in Sess. Laws 1885, p. 199, § 22, providing that contested elections of town and precinct officers shall be tried before the county court, means a municipal corporation—an incorporated town—and does not apply exclusively to certain territorial subdivisions, called "townships," into which counties in some states are divided. 'Town' is the generic term, used in this country as embracing all kinds of municipal corporations which have the right to make police rules or regulations and control persons and things within certain specified limits. State v. Glennon, 3 R. I. 276; Van Riper v. Parsons, 40 N. J. Law (11 Vroom) 1." In the popular sense of the word, a "town" is a congregation of houses so near to one another that the inhabitants may fairly be said to dwell together. 2 Rap. & L. Law Dict. 1282. "Any collection of houses which is larger than a village and not incorporated as a city. Webst. Dict." County Court of Garfield County v. Schwarz, 22 Pac. 783, 13 Colo. 291.

"Town," as used in Laws 1899, c. 11, § 51, imposing an annual license tax on the business of buying and selling fresh meat from offices, stores, stalls, or vehicles in cities and towns, applies only to incorporated towns, and not to an unincorporated locality having a population of from 2,000 to 4,000 people, and lying about a mile beyond the corporate limits of a town. In New England and some other states a town means always a township. State v. Green, 35 S. E. 462, 463, 126 N. C. 1032.

Code 1880, § 1047, providing that any person who may be injured by the locomotive or cars of a railroad company, while such cars are running at a greater rate of speed than six miles an hour through any city, town, or village, shall have a right of action, etc., refers to an incorporated city, town, or village; and the statute applies to all violations of its terms within the legal or corporate limits of such city, town, or village, without regard to the irregular and variable lines of settlement and improvement of such city. Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. Jordan, 63 Miss. 458, 461.

In the construction of statutes the word "town" shall extend and be applied to any place incorporated, or whose inhabitants are required to pay any tax, and shall mean that city, town, ward, or place in which the subject-matter referred to is situate, or in which the persons referred to are residents, unless from the context a different intention is manifest. Pub. St. N. H. 1901, p. 63, c. 2, § 5.

The word "town" may include an incorporated town. Rev. St. Utah 1898, § 2498; Code Iowa 1897, § 48, subd. 18.

As a municipal corporation.

See, also, "Municipal Corporation"; "Municipality."

In New York towns are municipal bodies created by the statute. They have no original powers or rights, nor any rights except such as the statute gives them. In this respect they differ widely from the towns of Massachusetts and some of the New England states, which are original corporate bodies existing by the agreement of the inhabitants, and in some cases before the state or colony itself came into being. People v. Burrell, 35 N. Y. Supp. 608, 610, 14 Misc. Rep. 217.

Town Law, § 2, defines a "town" as a municipal corporation comprising the inhabitants within its boundaries, and formed for the purpose of exercising such powers and discharging such duties of local government and the administration of public affairs as have been or may be conferred or imposed on it by law. Lyth v. Town of Evans, 68 N. Y. Supp. 356, 358, 33 Misc. Rep. 221.

The word "town," as used in Sess. Laws 1885, p. 199, § 22, providing that "contested elections of town and precinct officers shall be tried before the county court as hereinbefore provided for the trial of contests of county officers, so far as the same is practicable," etc., refers to a municipal corporation—an incorporated town. County Court of Garfield County v. Schwarz, 22 Pac. 783, 784, 13 Colo. 291.

Parochial character.

St. 4 Geo. I, c. 1, providing that whenever a parish is created within a town, that part of the town which has not undergone the change shall ipso facto become a parish and be the first or principal parish, shows that towns originally were both of a municipal and parochial character; and it has been held that on this account towns might, even before the establishment of a parish within their boundaries, separate these characters, and have distinct meetings of town and parish in relation to the subjects which appertain to each. Inhabitants of Milford v. Godfrey, 18 Mass. (1 Pick.) 91, 98.

"Town," as used in Priv. St. 1815, c. 115, § 6, requiring the trustees of the municipal fund in B. to apply the interest of the fund to the support of the ministry in B. in such way and manner as the inhabitants thereof in regular town meeting should direct, is construed in a limited sense, as referring to its parochial character only, in which capacity alone it was interested in the fund. Richardson v. Brown, 6 Me. (6 Greenl.) 355, 359.

Recording plat.

Recording a plat of land laid out as a town does not constitute the place a town, within the statutes of Oregon prohibiting the establishment of tollgates within the limits of any town, whether incorporated or not, but houses and inhabitants are necessary to constitute a town. Milarkey v. Foster, 6 Or. 378, 381, 25 Am. Rep. 531.

In this country there is no precise legal definition of the term "town," but a place containing one store doing business to the amount of $4,000 per annum, a dwelling house for two families, a population of two families, numbering in all six persons, cannot be called a "town," in the popular sense of the term, though the owner of the land platted it into lots, blocks, and streets, and filed a plat with the county clerk. Clements v. Crawford County Bank, 40 S. W. 132, 133, 64 Ark. 7, 62 Am. St. Rep. 149.

Borough or village.

See, also, "Village."

A village and a town are not identical. A village is ordinarily less than a town, and more occupied by agriculturists; yet the two cannot be definitely distinguished by the size of the place or employment of the inhabitants. A statute that the word "town" may include cities as well as incorporated villages is a clear implication that it does not include unincorporated villages. Truax v. Pool, 46 Iowa, 256, 257.

The word "town" may include a village. V. S. 1894, § 4223; Code W. Va. 1899, p. 134, c. 13, § 17, subd. 21; Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 1176; Gen. St. Minn. 1894, § 1511; Peck v. Weddell, 17 Ohio St. 271; Rev. St. Mo. 1899, § 4160.

"Town," as used in the title of an act relative to municipal corporations, is synonymous with "village," as used in the body of the act, so as to render the title sufficiently descriptive of the matter contained in the act. Chicago, St. L. & N. O. R. Co. v. Town of Kentwood, 22 South. 192, 49 La. Ann. 931.

The terms "town" and "village" are, within the meaning of the law, synonymous. Martin v. People, 87 Ill. 524; Phillips v. Town of Scales Mound, 195 Ill. 353, 63 N. E. 180; Town of Enfield v. Jordan, 119 U. S. 680, 686, 7 Sup. Ct. 358, 30 L. Ed. 523. And hence the fact that in some of the proceedings for the organization of a village it was designated as a town, and that the village adopted the name of the town of C., does not invalidate the proceedings. People v. Pike, 64 N. E. 393, 394, 197 Ill. 449.

"Town," as used in 3 Gen. St. pp. 3458, 3461, pars. 9, 24, giving telephone companies the right to set their poles on public roads and highways of the state, provided no poles shall be placed in any streets of an incorporated town, etc., should be construed as broad enough to include municipalities formally styled "townships, boroughs, or villages," where the public highways were in fact streets as distinguished from country roads. Inhabitants of Summit Tp. v. New York & N. J. Telephone Co., 41 Atl. 146, 147, 57 N. J. Eq. 123; Broome v. Same, 9 Atl. 754, 49 N. J. Law (20 Vroom) 624.

The term "town corporate" does not necessarily mean a city or town having exclusive jurisdiction. A borough may be a town corporate, within the licensing Act 9 Geo. IV, c. 61, § 1, though it has no separate court of quarter sessions. Brown v. Nicholson, 5 O. B. (N. S.) 468, 479.

"Towns," as used in a statute referring to incorporated towns, can be construed to include boroughs. The word "towns" in a statute is inexplicit in meaning, and must be interpreted by the context, or, that failing, by the necessity and occasion of the law. Walling v. Borough of Deckertown, 44 Atl. 864, 865, 64 N. J. Law, 203.

"Town," as used in Act March 22, 1895, (P. L. p. 551), providing that the inhabitants of any district lying wholly in one county, having a population exceeding 5,000, not including any territory within the limits of any incorporate city or town, may become a body corporate, cannot be construed to include boroughs. Borough of Glen Ridge v. Stout, 33 Atl. 858, 58 N. J. Law, 598.

City.

The word "town" may include a city. Rev. Laws Mass. 1902, p. 89, c. 8, § 5, subd. 23; Pub. St. R. I. 1882, p. 77, c. 24, § 8; Code Iowa 1897, § 48, subd. 16; Rev. St. Utah 1898, § 2498; Gen. St. Minn. 1894, § 255, subd. 14; Id. § 1511; Rev. St. Me. 1883, p. 59, c. 1, § 6, subd. 17; V. S. 1894, 19, 4223; Mills' Ann. St. Colo. 1891, § 4185, cl. 9; Rev.

St. Wis. 1898, § 4971; Pub. St. N. H. 1901, p. 528, c. 27, § 2; Code W. Va. 1899, p. 134, c. 13, § 17; Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 1176.

Any considerable collection of dwelling houses, especially as distinguished from the adjacent country, is a town; but "town" and "city" are not, as a matter of law, synonymous, the difference between the two consisting in size and population. Wight & Wesslosky Co. v. Wolff, 87 S. E. 395, 112 Ga. 169.

According to lexicographers there is no marked distinction between a city and a town, the former being more important than the latter. Heard v. State, 39 S. E. 118, 113 Ga. 444.

The word "town" is used to designate any collection of houses larger than a village. A town may consist of 20 houses or of 20,000. A city is even called a town. Glasgow v. City of St. Louis, 15 Mo. App. 112, 123.

"Town," as used in Sess. Laws 1885, p. 199, § 22, which provides that contested elections of town and precinct officers shall be tried before the county court, cannot be construed to include cities. Booth v. County Court of Arapahoe County, 33 Pac. 581, 18 Colo. 561.

"Town" is used to designate either a place where there are a number of adjacent occupied dwellings, or as a municipal corporation organized under various statutes of different states; but in either sense it includes a city, unless used in some connection which shows that a different meaning was intended, and is so used in St. 1867-68, p. 507, § 70, providing that all the swamp and overflowed salt marsh and tide lands within two miles of any town or village are excluded from the provisions of the act. Klauber v. Higgins, 49 Pac. 466, 467, 117 Cal. 451 (citing Board of Com'rs of Public Charities and Correction of City of New York v. McGuerrin [N. Y.] 6 Daly, 349; 1 Coke, Inst. 116; In re Road in Milton, 40 Pa. 300; Peck v. Weddell, 17 Ohio St. 271; State v. Glennon, 3 R. I. 276).

"Town," as a generic term, embraces all such primary municipal corporations as incorporated cities and villages; and, independently of any statutory provision, it has become a well-settled rule of construction that the term "town," when used in a general statute, may include cities, unless the contrary appears from the whole statute to have been the intent of the Legislature. Odegard v. City of Albert Lea, 23 N. W. 526, 527, 83 Minn. 351.

The term "town" is generic, and includes cities, and will be so construed under Act March 3, 1859, entitled "An act for the protection of sidewalks in towns and villages," etc. City of Indianapolis v. Higgins, 40 N. E. 671, 674, 141 Ind. 1.

The word "town" is generic, and includes cities. State v. Craig, 31 N. E. 352, 132 Ind. 54, 16 L. R. A. 688, 32 Am. St. Rep. 237; McFarland v. Gordon, 41 Atl. 507, 508, 70 Vt. 455; Flinn v. State, 24 Ind. 236, 287.

"Town," as used in P. L. 1895, p. 506, authorizing the inhabitants of any town, borough, or township, or part thereof, containing a population exceeding 5,000 inhabitants, to incorporate as a city, is used in its restricted sense to designate a particular species of municipality, and not in a generic sense. It is not permissible for another city to reorganize under this enactment. City of Dover v. Grey, 42 Atl. 674, 62 N. J. Law, 647; Attorney General v. City of Dover, 40 Atl. 640, 641, 62 N. J. Law, 40.

In its narrowest sense, "town" denotes something other than a city, but in its broader scope it comprehends such a municipality. Lord Coke in 1 Inst. 116, says that "a town is a genus, and a borough is a species." Bouvier's definition of the word "city" is a town incorporated by that name. Van Riper v. Parsons, 40 N. J. Law (11 Vroom) 1, 4.

Rev. St. c. 19, § 120, provides that if any damage happen to any person, his team or other property, by reason of the insufficiency or want of repairs in any bridge of any town of the state, the person sustaining such damage shall have a right to sue for and recover same against such town. Held, that the word "town" does not include cities. Beaudette v. City of Fond du Lac, 40 Wis. 44, 45.

The word "town," in a statute giving a lien upon real property for labor done and material furnished by serving a notice in writing upon the town clerk of the town where real property is situated, does not include the city of Brooklyn, which is not one of the civil divisions of the state known as a "town," and has no officer known as a "town clerk," or who performs similar duties to those assigned to the clerks of the several towns throughout the state, and therefore the statute does not apply to the city of Brooklyn. Rafter v. Sullivan (N. Y.) 13 Abb. Prac. 262, 263.

The word "towns," as used in Rev. St. c. 19, § 120, imposing upon towns a liability for damages resulting from the insufficiency of highways, are applicable to the city of Milwaukee, since section 126 expressly declares that all the provisions of the chapter shall be applicable to all parts of the state except where special provisions inconsistent therewith are made in respect to particular towns, counties, cities, or municipalities. No such inconsistent provisions exist in the charter of Milwaukee. Kittredge v. City of Milwaukee, 26 Wis. 46, 48.

District.

The word "town" may be construed to include districts unless such construction would be repugnant to the provisions of any act specially relating to the same. Rev. St. Wis. 1898, § 4971; Gen. St. Minn. 1894, § 255, subd. 14.

The word "town," as used in Const. art. 2, c. 1, providing that each town then incorporated, though it did not have 150 ratable polls, might elect one representative, etc., includes districts. Hill v. Selectmen of Easthampton, 4 N. E. 811, 813, 140 Mass. 381.

Same—School district.

School districts, being organized distinctly from each other and from the town in which they are located, and being authorized to establish and maintain their own high schools, are "towns," within Laws 1801, c. 89, § 9, making a town which did not maintain high schools of its own liable for the tuition of children residing therein and attending high schools therein or in any other town or city in the state. Union School Dist. v. School Dist. No. 20, 52 Atl. 850, 851, 71 N. H. 269.

Inhabitants.

Act 1852, No. 172, § 1, providing that the town of Jackson in a certain parish should be exempt from the payment of parish taxes, should be construed to mean the inhabitants of the town as well as the property of that corporation. Parish of East Feliciana v. Levy, 4 South. 309, 310, 40 La. Ann. 332.

Plantation.

The word "town" includes plantations, unless otherwise expressed or implied. Rev. St. Me. 1883, p. 59, c. 1, § 6, subd. 17; Parker v. Williams, 77 Me. 418, 422, 1 Atl. 183, 139.

Township.

See, also, "Township."

The word "town" may mean "township." Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 1176; Gen. St. Minn. 1894, § 1511; Gen. St. Kan. 1901, § 7342, subd. 17.

Const. 1865, art. 11, declaring that the General Assembly shall not authorize any county, city, or town to become a stockholder in, or to loan its credit to, any company, association, or corporation, unless two-thirds of the qualified voters of such county, city, or town, at a regular or special election to be held therein, shall assent thereto, should be construed to include townships, which are only geographical subdivisions of a county. "A township is a different thing from a town under the organic laws of Missouri. It has no power by itself to make independent contracts or to become bound in its separate capacity. The law has not vested it with that power. It forms an integral part of the county, and the county, to a certain extent, controls and acts for it."

Harshman v. Bates County, 92 U. S. 569, 573, 23 L. Ed. 747.

The word "town," as found in the statutes, is not always used in the same sense. In Rev. St. 1874, p. 1067, § 5, providing that counties adopting the township system for the management of county affairs should be divided into towns, a town is a species of a municipal corporation, and constitutes an integral part of the county; and such towns are clearly interwoven with the management of the county affairs, and generally embrace a township, according to government surveys. Martin v. People, 87 Ill. 524, 528.

"Town," as used in a stipulation not to resume business in the same town, may, by local usage, mean the town and its vicinity. The legal signification of the word is a collection of houses; yet, quite commonly in the United States, it is used to denote the whole territory within certain limits, and as synonymous with the word "township." Steyer v. Dwyer, 31 Iowa, 20, 21.

The word "town" is sometimes employed to designate a township, but the term "incorporated town" is seldom, if ever, employed to embrace such a body. Harris v. Schryock, 82 Ill. 119, 121.

"Town" as used in Supp. Revision, p. 652, § 12, requiring a water company to obtain the consent of a town before laying pipes under its streets, should be construed to include townships. Inhabitants of Township of Saddle River v. Garfield Water Co. (N. J.) 32 Atl. 978, 979 (citing Broome v. New York & New Jersey Telephone Co., 49 N. J. Law [20 Vroom] 624, 9 Atl. 754); Inhabitants of Township of Franklin v. Nutley Water Co., 32 Atl. 381, 383, 53 N. J. Eq. (8 Dick.) 601.

"Towns," as used in Act April 4, 1891 (P. L. 1891, p. 417), entitled "An act respecting the election and term of office of the clerk and collector or receiver of taxes in certain towns, boroughs, and townships," cannot be construed to include townships which are governed by special charters conferred by legislative enactment. Goldberg v. Dorland, 28 Atl. 599, 600, 56 N. J. Law, 364.

The term "towns" stands as a generic designation, embracing townships as well as cities, and all other places corporate, established for local government of the same grade as these, and also those of an inferior order, if any such there be, as used in Const. art. 4, § 7, par. 11, prohibiting special legislation regulating the internal affairs of towns, etc. Pell v. City of Newark, 40 N. J. Law (11 Vroom) 550, 555.

The word "town" is a word of varying signification. In the legislation of the state of New Jersey it is often and commonly employed to designate places incorporated for local government under special act, but not clothed with all the powers usually conferred on cities. The word seems to denote this class in P. L. 1877, p. 198, enabling towns and townships to obtain a water supply; and in P. L. 1877, p. 222, authorizing the purchasing of steam fire engines in incorporated towns; and in P. L. 1878, p. 247, providing for the election of assessors and collectors in towns and villages. In this sense it excludes both cities and townships. Sometimes it is employed in a broad, generic sense, embracing both townships and cities, and the whole range of bodies corporate, less than counties, established for local government. Banta v. Richards, 42 N. J. Law (13 Vroom) 497, 498.

"Towns," as used in Const. art. 4, § 7, declaring that the Legislature shall not pass private, local, or special laws regulating the internal affairs of towns and counties, is a generic term, embracing within its meaning cities as well as townships and boroughs. Sutterly v. Court of Common Pleas of Camden County, 41 N. J. Law (12 Vroom) 495, 496 (citing Pell v. City of Newark, 40 N. J. Law [11 Vroom] 71, 29 Am. Rep. 266; Id., 40 N. J. Law [11 Vroom] 550).

The word "town," as used in Pub. Laws 1887, p. 8, creating traction companies, and giving them the power to enter into contract with any passenger railway company to construct and operate motors for the traction of the cars of said company, and naming boroughs, towns, and cities, does not mean a borough or a city, but a township. Philadelphia & West Chester Turnpike Co. v. Philadelphia & D. C. R. R., 5 Pa. Dist. R. 306, 308.

Unincorporated territory.

The popular use and meaning of the word "town," is a large, closely populated place, whether incorporated or not, as distinguished from the country or from rural communities. The legal as well as the popular idea of a town or city in this country, both by name and use, is that of oneness, community, locality, vicinity; a collective body, not several bodies; collective body of inhabitants; that is, a body of people collected or gathered together in one mass, not separated into distinct masses, and having a community of interest, because residents of the same place, not different places; hence locality, not localities, vicinity, vicinage, near, adjacent, not remote. City of Denver v. Coulehan, 20 Colo. 471, 479, 39 Pac. 425, 427, 27 L. R. A. 751.

The word "town," as employed in a statute in relation to fencing and operating railroads, means a collection of houses larger than a village and smaller than a city, and has no reference to territory incorporated as a town under the township organization.

Cleveland, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Green, 65 Ill. App. 414, 417.

In considering the validity of an execution sale made under a statute which required notice of the sale to be posted up in two of the most public places in the town in which the property was situated, the court said: "The word 'town,' as used in the statute on this subject, may be held to mean a place, the inhabitants of which are required to pay a tax. It can admit of no doubt that an unincorporated place, as this was at the time of the sale, having inhabitants and established territorial limits corresponding in extent to the general territorial character of towns, and included among towns in the general law for the apportionment of the public taxes, and required by law to pay its share of the said tax, must be a place, the inhabitants of which are required to pay a tax, within the meaning of the statute establishing this rule of construction, and therefore to be considered a 'town,' within the meaning of the act prescribing the mode of proceeding in the sale of an equity or right of redemption on execution." Russell v. Dyer, 40 N. H. 173, 184, 185.

In determining whether the term "town" or "city," within the meaning of Const. art. 16, § 15, providing that the homestead not in a town or city shall consist of not more than 200 acres of land, and that the homestead in a city, town, or village shall consist of lot or lots, embraces a certain tract of land, the fact of incorporation or not is not of controlling influence, and will not of itself determine that the land is or is not within the limits of a city or town. Posey v. Bass, 14 S. W. 156, 77 Tex. 512. The property in question may be within the corporate limits of a town or city, and still be a rural homestead, within the meaning of the Constitution, or it may be actually within the limits of a town or village not incorporated, and be an urban homestead in its character. Wilder v. McConnell, 45 S. W. 145, 146, 91 Tex. 600.

The condition and powers of so-called "unincorporated places" have been gradually approximating those of towns, so that under Rev. St. c. 1, § 4, providing that the word "town" may be construed to extend and be applied to any place incorporated, or the inhabitants of which are required to pay any tax," it may well be doubted if any substantial difference now exists between them. Bow v. Allenstown, 34 N. H. 351, 374, 69 Am. Dec. 489.

Ward.

The term "town," in Const. art. 8, § 5, providing that no town shall be divided in the formation of assembly districts, does not include city wards. People v. Broome, 20 N. Y. Supp. 470, 472, 66 Hun. 335.

The word "town" may be construed to include wards, unless such construction would be repugnant to the provisions of any act specially relating to the same. Rev. St. Wis. 1898, § 4971. See, also, Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 1176; Pub. St. N. H. 1901, p. 63, c. 2, § 5; Gen. St. Minn. 1894, § 1511.

Under the statute providing that the word "town," whenever used in any act, may be construed as meaning a city, ward, or district, unless such construction would be repugnant to the provisions of any act specially relating to the same, a justice of the peace of a ward of the city of Fond du Lac, which adjoins the town of that name, has jurisdiction of an appeal from the determination of the supervisors of the town in proceedings to lay out a highway, the statute requiring that such appeal be taken to a justice of the town or of an adjoining town. State v. Goldstucker, 40 Wis. 124, 130.

TOWN BOARD.

The words "town board" import the town board of supervisors, unless otherwise clearly indicated. Rev. St. Wis. 1898, § 4972.

TOWN CHARGES.

Other necessary town charges, see "Other."

TOWN CLERK.

"Town Clerk" is defined in 2 Bouv. Law Dict. 1127, in this wise: "A principal officer, who keeps the records, issues calls for town meetings, and performs generally the duty of secretary to the political organization." The town clerk, then, from the very nature of his duties, must be the officer of the town council to receive papers intended for it, and to see that such papers are presented to it, and a notice to the town clerk of injuries received, given by the party injured, and required in order to sustain a claim against a town for negligence, is properly served on such clerk. Seamons v. Fitts, 42 Atl. 863, 866, 21 R. I. 236.

The words "town clerk," in statutes, may mean the clerk of the town, ward, or city to which the subject-matter referred to belongs or in which it is situate. Pub. St. N. H. 1901, p. 64, c. 2, § 28.

The words "town clerks" may be construed to include city clerks. Pub. St. R. I. 1882, p. 77, c. 24, § 8.

TOWN COLLECTOR.

See "Collector."

TOWN COMMONS.

"Town commons" is land which is the property of the town, and remains common and for public use generally. Cutts v. Hussey, 15 Me. 237, 239.

TOWN COUNCIL.

The words "town council" and the words "board of trustees," when used in relation to municipal corporations of Colorado, have practically the same meaning, and it is immaterial which form is used as the style of the enacting clause of an ordinance. People v. Chipman, 71 Pac. 1103, 1109, 81 Colo. 90.

The words "town councils" may be construed to include boards of aldermen. Pub. St. R. I. 1882, p. 77, c. 24, § 8.

TOWN ELECTION.

A special town meeting is not a town election, within Laws 1892, c. 680, § 86, as amended by Laws 1895, c. 810, requiring the town clerk to prepare ballots for any town meeting for the election of town officers, as no officer can be elected at such a meeting, and the phrase "town election," therefore, can only refer to the annual town meeting at which officers are elected. People v. Sackett, 44 N. Y. Supp. 593, 595, 15 App. Div. 290.

In statutes relative to elections, the term "town election" shall apply to any meeting held for the election of town officers by the voters, whether for a full term or for the filling of a vacancy. Rev. Laws Mass. 1902, p. 105, c. 11, § 1.

TOWN GOVERNMENTS.

The words "town governments," in Const. art. 11, § 4, providing that the Legislature shall establish a system of county and town governments, "were used to designate town organizations in their general features like those of other states, where town governments had been established when the Constitution was adopted. Under the system of town government in New England it has been the practice, by notice designating the questions to be presented, for the selectmen to call meetings of the voters of the town, which are presided over by a moderator and restrained by rules intended to secure orderly proceedings, at which the propriety and expediency of proposed measures may be considered, adopted, or rejected. The matters of local interest are discussed in the town meeting before they are passed on. 'The marked and characteristic distinction,' says Chief Justice Shaw, in Warren v. City of Charlestown, 68 Mass. (2 Gray) 84, 101, 'between a town organization and that of a city, is that in the former all the qualified voters meet, deliberate, act, and vote, whereas under a city government this is all done by their representatives.' " Ex parte Wall, 48 Cal. 279, 320, 17 Am. Rep. 425.

TOWN HOUSE.

"Town house" is defined to be a house or building in which is transacted the public business of a town, and as used in a devise, in which the testator gave certain lands to a town on condition that they shall not be used for any other purpose than as a place for a town house for said inhabitants, would include a building which had been erected for the purpose of a town house, the basement of which was used for a jail, though it appears that the town has rented temporarily portions of the building, which it had no occasion to use for the time being. French v. Inhabitants of Quincy, 85 Mass. (3 Allen) 9, 11.

TOWN LAWS.

A name used, in the portion of England conquered by the Danes, to indicate local laws which were enacted by the inhabitants of townships. Such laws were also called "by-laws." Board of Health v. City of Yonkers, 24 N. Y. Supp. 625, 626, 71 Hun, 149.

TOWN LOTS.

The terms "town or city lots," as used in the Constitution in the homestead clause, cannot be construed to embrace farm lots purchased from the town or city and used for farming purposes, when lying beyond the limits of the plan of the town and city proper; and this, though they may be included in the jurisdictional limits of the town or city. Rogers' Adm'r v. Ragland, 42 Tex. 422.

"Town lots" include all city and village lots, and all fractions and parts thereof. Cobbey's Ann. St. Neb. 1903, § 10407.

TOWN MEETING.

See "Annual Town Meeting."
As an election, see "Election."

A town meeting was originally a meeting of the town electors at one place for the election of town officers and for the transaction of other town business. In course of time it was found inconvenient to have the election at one place and compel all the voters of the town who desired to participate to vote at one place, and that resulted in a number of the towns being divided into election districts for the convenience of the voters. The elections were held on one day, and the town officers met at a subsequent day to canvass the result of the election of the several election districts, and also to transact such other business as might be brought before them. The latter day, the day when the town officers meet, has still retained the name of "town meeting" in such towns, though the actual election of the town officers takes place at a prior day; but, as used in Laws 1893, c. 344, § 1, providing that there shall be elected at the annual town meeting in each town, etc., means the meeting at which the ballots are cast, and not the day the town officers canvass the returns. In re Foley, 28 N. Y. Supp. 608, 609, 8 Misc. Rep. 57.

The words "town meeting" have a definite and well-settled meaning, as used in Rev. St. 1874, c. 139, art. 6, § 1, reciting that the annual "town meeting" in the respective towns, for the election of town officers and the transaction of the business of the town, shall be held, etc., and are uniformly used to describe the annual meetings of the electors of the town for the purpose of electing township officers and transacting such business as the electors are by law authorized to transact at special meetings of the electors for such purposes, called pursuant to law. The words "town meeting" and the word "election" are not convertible terms. There may, it is true, at a town meeting, be nothing but an election, but there may be more. The theory of such a meeting is that the corporate body of the town is present for the purpose of transacting, and competent to transact, all the corporate business of the town not specially delegated to certain individual officers. Chicago & I. R. Co. v. Mallory, 101 Ill. 583, 588.

"A 'town meeting' is a deliberative body, and acts as such in determining all matters that may lawfully be determined by it, as any other deliberative body, except in the election of certain officers of the town, and except as to matters which, by express law, the question to be determined by the electors of town is required to be determined by a vote or ballot." State v. Racine County Sup'rs, 36 N. W. 399, 403, 70 Wis. 543 (citing State v. Davidson, 32 Wis. 114, 121).

The term "town meetings," in a strict sense, does not include meetings for the election of national, state, district, and county officers. Commonwealth v. Smith, 132 Mass. 289, 292.

The words "town meeting," as used in Pub. Laws, May 29, 1884, c. 447, providing that any town may at any town meeting abolish all the school districts therein, means any meetings, or meeting, in which the electors of a town may vote to express their opinions or desires on the question, and therefore a town divided into school districts cannot legally vote in district meetings on the question of abolishing its school districts. Comstock v. Lincoln School Committee, 17 R. I. 827, 828, 829, 24 Atl. 145.

TOWN OFFICER.

"Town or village officers," as used in Const. art. 10, § 2, providing that all city, town, and village officers shall be elected by the electors of such cities, towns, and villages, or some division thereof, or appointed by such authorities thereof as the Legislature shall designate for that purpose, means all those who are appointed or elected for cities, towns, or villages, and must reside and perform the duties of their offices within their respective localities, such as mayor, recorder, alderman, and the like. In re Whiting (N. Y.) 2 Barb. 513, 517.

In statutes relative to elections, the term "town officer" shall apply to any person to be chosen at a town meeting. Rev. Laws Mass. 1902, p. 105, c. 11, § 1.

A justice of the peace is not a "town officer." He is a branch of the judiciary, and his office and the tenure thereof are secure from legislative interference or control. People v. Keeler (N. Y.) 25 Barb. 421, 427.

"Town officers," as used in Const. art. 10, § 2, declaring that all town and village officers whose election is not provided for by such Constitution shall be elected by the electors of such towns or villages, etc., includes town collectors. People v. McKinney, 52 N. Y. 374, 380.

Though an agent for building a road is not, perhaps, in strictness a "town officer," yet a warrant for a town meeting to choose all necessary town officers is sufficient to authorize the choice of an agent to build the road, as the article in this form gives sufficient notice that one of the objects of the meeting is to choose the persons to transact the business of the town, and that under it not only the usual town officers may be chosen, but any committees or agents whose services may be required. Baker v. Shephard, 24 N. H. (4 Fost.) 208, 212.

TOWN ORDER.

A "town order," when payable to order and indorsed, is not, in the purview of the law, regarded as commercial paper in the hands of bona fide indorsees for value, so as to exclude evidence touching the legality of its inception; and whoever receives such orders is subject to the same defense that would be good against the payee. Emery v. Inhabitants of Mariaville, 56 Me. 315, 317 (citing Willey v. Inhabitants of Greenfield, 30 Me. [17 Shep.] 452; Sturtevant v. Inhabitants of Liberty, 46 Me. 459).

TOWN PAUPER.

A town pauper is one who is supported by the town. A state pauper is one who is supported to some extent at least by the state. Town of Marlborough v. Town of Chatham, 50 Conn. 554, 557.

TOWN POUND.

"It has been held that, by the grant or exception in a deed of conveyance of a town pound, the land on which it stands is conveyed or excepted, not as an appurtenance, but as parcel." Johnson v. Rayner, 72 Mass. (6 Gray) 107, 110 (quoting Wooley v. Inhabitants of Groton, 56 Mass. [2 Cush.] 805).

TOWN SCHOOLS.

"Town schools," as used in Rev. St. c. 15, § 12, providing that towns shall have power to grant and vote money for the support of town schools, should not be limited to merely those schools which the towns are required to support under a penalty for refusal or neglect to do so, but to include other schools, in addition to those required by law to be supported by the town, in which the higher branches of knowledge were taught. Cushing v. Inhabitants of Newburyport, 51 Mass. (10 Metc.) 508, 512.

TOWN SERGEANTS.

The words "town sergeants" may be construed to include city sergeants. Pub. St. R. I. 1882, p. 77, c. 24, § 8.

TOWN SITE.

"Town site," as used in the statutes of Colorado, and in the states and territories of the West generally, means that portion of the public domain which is segregated from the great body of government land by the proper authority and procedure as a site for a town, and will not be held to apply to an unincorporated town or city. Rice v. Colorado Smelting Co., 66 Pac. 894, 895, 28 Colo. 519.

TOWN TREASURER.

The words "town treasurers" may be construed to include city treasurers. Pub. St. R. I. 1882, p. 77, c. 24, § 8.

TOWN WAY.

"Town way," as used in the statutes relating to such ways, means a way which was originally laid out by the selectmen of the town. Inhabitants of Blackstone v. Worcester County, 108 Mass. 68.

"Town way," as used in Pub. St. c. 112, § 125, which provides that a highway or town way may be laid across a railroad previously constructed, etc., means a highway which is laid out by proceedings in which a town or city has original jurisdiction. Boston & A. R. Co. v. City of Boston, 2 N. E. 943, 140 Mass. 87.

"Town ways" are roads within the territorial limits of a particular town. Inhabitants of Waterford v. Oxford County, 59 Me. 450, 452.

Highway distinguished.

Town ways, in the Massachusetts system of public ways, are distinguished from highways, in that the latter "are laid out and may be altered or discontinued by the authorities having jurisdiction throughout the county, such as the county court, the court of general sessions, and, in modern times, the county commissioners, while the former are laid out and may be altered or discontinued by the selectmen with the approval of the town. In other respects they are alike, and equally parts of the system of public ways." Butchers' Slaughtering & Melting Ass'n v. City of Boston, 30 N. E. 94, 139 Mass. 290.

TOWNSHIP.

A township is generally spoken of as a municipality or municipal corporation; but, strictly speaking, every political subdivision of the state organized for the administration of civil government is a quasi corporation. Rathbone v. Hopper, 45 Pac. 610, 57 Kan. 240, 34 L. R. A. 674.

"Township," as used in Act April 16, 1870, relating to the building of a bridge across a stream which runs between two townships, means the several municipal divisions of a county. City of Wilkes-Barre v. Luzerne County (Pa.) 14 Luz. Leg. Reg. 183.

"Townships" in South Carolina are mere territorial subdivisions of land, with no public duty or function whatever, and no corporate or public purpose, so that an act declaring them corporations, and permitting them to subscribe to a railroad, is unconstitutional. Atlantic Trust Co. v. Town of Darlington (U. S.) 63 Fed. 76, 82.

"Townships" are a class of municipalities by themselves, and have no very important differences, unless it be the difference in population; otherwise, they are as generally alike as possible. The fact that a township is governed by a special charter, while other townships, the same class of municipalities, alike in all respects, are governed and regulated by general laws, does not place it in a class by itself. Goldberg v. Dorland, 28 Atl. 599, 600, 56 N. J. Law (27 Vroom) 364.

Townships, though possessing some corporate functions and attributes, "are primarily political subdivisions, agencies in the administration of civil government, and their corporate functions are granted to enable them to perform their public duties. They are denominated in the books and known to the law as "quasi corporations," rather than corporations proper. Per Brewer, J., in Beach v. Leahy, 11 Kan. 23, 29 (cited in Knowles v. Board of Education, 7 Pac. 561, 566, 33 Kan. 692).

"Townships, though they are regarded as municipal corporations in the general sense of that term, stand on a plane altogether different from that occupied by cities and villages. The latter are possessed of a much higher order of corporate existence than the former, and differ from them in many particulars. They are in law and in fact as distinct from one another as any two artificial beings could be, whatever their supposed resemblances may be. This is equally so with respect to their organization and jurisdiction. In the exercise of the powers conferred on them, they act wholly independently of each other, even where their jurisdiction extends over the same people and territory." Dolese v. Pierce, 16 N. E. 218, 220, 124 Ill. 140.

Townships exist only for the purpose of a general politic government of the state. All the powers with which they are intrusted are the powers of the state, and all the duties with which they are charged are duties of the state. Travelers' Ins. Co. v. Oswego Tp. (U. S.) 59 Fed. 58, 64, 7 C. C. A. 669.

"The terms 'plantation,' 'town,' and 'township' seem to have been used in the early colonies of Massachusetts almost indiscriminately to indicate a cluster or body of persons inhabiting near each other, and, when they became designated by name, certain powers were conferred upon them by general orders and laws, such as to manage their own prudential concerns, to elect deputies, and the like, which in effect made them municipal corporations, and no formal acts of incorporation were granted until long afterwards." Commonwealth v. City of Roxbury, 75 Mass. (9 Gray) 451, 485.

Where a township trustee was also a trustee for the school township, and executed a contract wherein he described himself as the trustee for the township, he will be deemed to have meant the civil, not the school, township. Jackson Tp. v. Home Ins. Co. of Columbus, Ohio, 54 Ind. 184, 186.

The word "township," in Revision, § 824, which provides that notice of the presentation of a petition for the establishment of a road must be posted in three public places in every township through which the road passes, means townships as organized and defined by the state law and the congressional townships created by a federal enactment. McCollister v. Shuey, 24 Iowa, 362, 367.

The word "township," in Pub. Acts 1887, No. 200, providing that all highway labor and all money taxes assessed and collected within any township for highway purposes shall be expended within the limits of the township on which the same may be assessed, and in the act of 1889, re-enacting this clause in practically the same language, was evidently construed by the Legislature as meaning "surveyed townships." Manistee Lumber Co. v. Springfield Tp., 92 Mich. 277, 279, 52 N. W. 468.

A township is a governmental agency to which is intrusted the care and superintendence of highways within its boundaries, and upon which is imposed the duty of repairing them and keeping them in order and removing obstructions, with power to levy and expend taxes for these purposes. In short, as to all matters pertaining to highways, a town is to the extent of these powers and duties a representative of the state, and a civil action to abate a public nuisance constituting an obstruction to a highway and to enjoin its maintenance may be maintained by a town in its own name. Hutchinson Tp. v. Filk, 44 Minn. 536, 537, 47 N. W. 255.

The word "township," as used in Revenue Act 1869, § 88, providing that the tax collector shall receive county warrants in payment of county taxes, and the orders or warrants, that may be payable on presentation, of any township, town, or city, for their taxes, is not to be taken in its literal sense; for, if it is, the provision that the orders or warrants of a township shall be received for its taxes has no meaning and can have no effect, since townships have neither taxes nor power to draw orders or warrants, and have no corporate capacity whatever. Without construing the word "township" to mean school district, the intention of the Legislature that the provision should apply to trustees' orders, as well as other orders and warrants, is very clear, because the reason for making them receivable for the school tax is as apparent and strong as for making county warrants receivable for county taxes, or city or town warrants for city or town taxes. Wallis v. Smith, 29 Ark. 354, 356.

The words "precinct," "township," and "school district," in an act relative to taxation, are held not to include municipal corporations. Union Pac. Ry. Co. v. Ryan, 2 Wyo. 408, 418.

All towns, villages, or cities having a population of 1,000 inhabitants or over are hereby declared "townships" for the purpose of the act relating to assessors. Wilson's Rev. & Ann. St. Okl. 1903, § 6721.

Boroughs.

"Township" includes a borough, as used in Act Feb. 17, 1859, providing that, on petition of the taxpayers of any township or school district, special auditors might be appointed to revise the accounts of the township or school district affairs. In re Borough of Frackville, 94 Pa. 56, 58. See, also, McLorinan v. Overseers of Poor of Bridgewater Tp., 10 Atl. 187, 189, 49 N. J. Law (20 Vroom) 603.

Cities.

Act April 6, 1866 (P. L. 206), provides that any person or persons who shall have resided in any township in the state for a period of 10 years shall be considered legally settled in the township. Held, that the word "township" was used in such act in its general and extended sense, to include cities, boroughs, and wards. McLorinan v. Ryno, 10 Atl. 189, 49 N. J. Law (20 Vroom) 608.

The cities of the state of Kansas are townships, within the meaning of the Constitution and statutes, for the purposes of the election of justices of the peace; and such officers, although elected within a city, are not strictly city officers. Their official duties are not limited to the boundaries of the cities in which they are elected, nor by the provisions of the charters or ordinances of the city in which they reside. Their civil and criminal jurisdictions are coextensive with their counties, except as otherwise provided by law. State v. Parry, 33 Pac. 956, 52 Kan. 1, 21 L. R. A. 669.

The words "counties and townships," in Const. art. 13, § 12, providing that the Legislature shall provide for the establishment of a library in each township, and that all the fines collected in the several counties and townships for any breach of the penal laws shall be exclusively applied to the support of such libraries, includes all the municipal divisions of the state; and hence fines collected in the city of Detroit must be shared with the country towns of the county. Wayne County v. City of Detroit, 17 Mich. 390, 401.

Whenever the word "township" is used in the act relating to the drain commissioner, it shall be construed to mean "city," as the case may be. Comp. Laws Mich. 1897, § 4313.

The word "townships," as used in the act relating to the erection and preservation of bridges, shall be deemed to include cities and incorporated villages, both in their relation to each other and to townships. Comp. Laws Mich. 1897, § 4140.

Fractional townships.

Const. art. 10, § 2, provides that organized counties shall not be reduced to less than 16 townships, as surveyed by the United States, unless the act providing therefor be submitted to and ratified by the people of the counties. By act of the Legislature a new county was organized from two other counties, one of which had remaining 13 whole and 4 fractional townships; the latter containing 100 sections only. The court said: "Now, as surveyed by the United States, each of these fractional townships is treated and described as a separate and independent township, as much as those which are not fractional, and in describing land within them it would not be necessary to describe the township as fractional. We are therefore all of the opinion that these fractional townships are to be treated as whole townships under this provision of the Constitution." Rice v. Ruddiman, 10 Mich. 125, 135.

Precincts and wards.

"Township" includes wards, as used in How. St. § 1008, subd. 1, providing that all goods, wares, etc., employed in the business of the mechanical arts in any township other than where the owner resides shall be taxed in the township where the same may be, if he only hire or occupy a store, mill, etc., therein. Comstock v. Grand Rapids, 20 N. W. 623, 628, 54 Mich. 641.

"Township," as used in the freeholders' act, giving townships authority to raise money to construct and repair bridges, is by the expressed provisions of the act defined to include precinct and ward. Whitall v. Gloucester County Board of Chosen Freeholders, 40 N. J. Law (11 Vroom) 302, 304. See, also, McLorinan v. Overseers of the Poor of Bridgewater Tp., 10 Atl. 187, 189, 49 N. J. Law (20 Vroom) 603.

The word "townships," as used in Laws 1897, c. 87, § 12, relating to the erection of public schools, and providing that townships in counties under the commissioner system shall petition to the commissioners of such county for that purpose, is used to designate political units of counties not under township organization, and should be construed as though the word "precincts" had been used, into which units counties are divided, instead of the word "townships." Union Pac. R. Co. v. Howard County (Neb.) 92 N. W. 579, 580.

The words "township" and "precinct" shall each include the other, and shall also include "towns" in counties under township organization. Cobbey's Ann. St. Neb. 1903, § 10,408.

Town.

See, also, "Town."

A "township" is a governmental corporation of very limited powers, through which the state operates for the construction and repair of the highways. The township cannot be regarded as bound, as between it and the creators of nuisances, to be on guard through its officers, few in number, with limited statutory duty and authority, for the purpose of protecting all the public roads of the township against wrongdoers, who through the negligent use of their own property injure the public highway. The township is a political subdivision of the territory of the state. It is organized by the state as a body politic and corporate, composed of its inhabitants, for the convenient exercise of portions of the sovereign power. It is a mere agency of government, with limited powers and duties. The organization is involuntary, and the duties and liabilities of the corporation are statutory. The officers of the corporation are special public agents. Such subdivisions as townships are instrumentalities of government, and exercise authority given by the state, and are no more liable for the acts or omissions of their officers than the state. Pittsburgh, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Iddings, 62 N. E. 112, 115, 28 Ind. App. 504.

The word "town" often means "township," but "township" never means "town," in the sense of a platted village or town site. The court will take judicial notice of the fact that a township, whether used in the sense of a municipal division of a county or of a township, according to government survey, has no subdivision known as "blocks." That term is applied only to the subdivisions of a platted town, village, or city. Herrick v. Morrill, 83 N. W. 849, 850, 87 Minn. 250, 5 Am. St. Rep. 841.

A township is a different thing from a town in the organic law of Missouri; the latter being an incorporated municipality, and the former only a geographical division of the county. Harshman v. Bates County, 92 U. S. 569, 573, 23 L. Ed. 747.

The term "townships" in a statute authorizing villages, cities, and townships to issue bonds in aid of railroads, does not include an incorporated town. Welch v. Post, 99 Ill. 471, 473.

The word "township," in Rev. St. c. 21, § 15, relating to cemeteries, and enacting that any city, village, or township may acquire lands for cemetery purposes by condemnation, is not used as being merely descriptive of the government subdivision of land. "The act in regard to cemeteries authorizes a township to acquire lands by condemnation. A mere governmental, geographical subdivision of land, not organized in a corporate or quasi corporate capacity, cannot institute or prosecute a condemnation proceeding. Consequently, if the word 'township,' as used in the act, confers authority upon one of the component subdivisions of a county, called into being by the act on township organization (3 Starr & C. Ann. St. p. 3916, authorizing the division of a county into towns, so that they shall conform to the townships according to the government survey, and enacting that the town shall be named in accordance with the express wish of the inhabitants), then the word 'township' is meaningless as used in the act in regard to cemeteries. It was evidently the intention of the township organization act to create townships whose corporate names should be towns, and that they should sue and be sued in and by such names. We are of the opinion that the Legislature intended to use the words 'town' and 'township' synonymously in referring to the political divisions of the county." The word "township" in the cemetery act being used in the sense of the word "town," the power to condemn for cemetery purposes is conferred by the statute on towns. Phillips v. Town of Scales Mound, 83 N. E. 180, 181, 195 Ill. 353.

TOWNSHIP EXPENSES.

"The term 'township expenses' is usually applied to the ordinary expenses of township government, and, as commonly used, would not cover many sums which it might be proper, and even necessary, that the township should raise for local purposes, as, for instance, school taxes, or a tax to pay a judgment against the township." Upton v. Kennedy, 36 Mich. 215, 220.

TOWNSHIP ORGANIZATION.

By "township organization" is meant the township system, by which a county is subdivided into townships or towns. Each of these towns constitutes a body corporate. The purely local affairs are intrusted to the town, to the town meetings of the several towns, or to township officers selected by the towns, while the general affairs of the county are conducted by a board constituted of the various township supervisors. The essential feature of township government lies in the application of the principle of local self-government. Van Horn v. State, 64 N. W. 365, 367, 46 Neb. 62.

TOWNSHIP TRUSTEE.

The "township trustee" is a public officer, having no private right or interest in the highways within the town; the duties enjoined upon him by law with reference to the highways being the duties which he owes to the public as its officer. Their duties are supervisory in their nature, and they are not bound as officers to perform manual labor in the maintenance of the highways. Being an officer of the township, he is a special public agent, and for his acts the township is not liable. Pittsburgh, C. C. & St. L. Ry. Co. v. Iddings, 62 N. E. 112, 115, 28 Ind. App. 504.

TOWN'S POOR.

"Town's poor," as used in a town record, reciting "Voted the rest of the town's poor that are not provided for be left to the care of the selectmen to dispose of," in its natural sense and unexplained, means the poor whom the town is permanently bound to support. It does not include persons receiving temporary relief. Inhabitants of West Bridgewater v. Inhabitants of Wareham, 138 Mass. 305, 307.

TOYS.

Broadly defined, a "toy" is an article mainly intended for the amusement of children. The fact that the word is so broadly defined does not warrant the conclusion that anything chiefly used to describe the object designed to amuse children is to be classified as a "toy." Metal thread, known as tinsel, tinsel thread, lametta, etc., but never as a toy, is not dutiable as a toy, under Tariff Act Oct. 1, 1890, merely because it is used almost exclusively for decorating Christmas trees. Wanamaker v. Cooper (U. S.) 69 Fed. 465, 466.

"Toys," as used in Tariff Act Oct. 1, 1890, par. 436, includes music boxes, small in size, of inferior quality, playing less than six tunes, not musically accurate, wound up with a key permanently affixed to the outside of the box, easily operated by a child, and costing 8.35 francs or less each. Jacot v. United States (U. S.) 65 Fed. 415, 418, 12 C. O. A. 666.

Slightly made magic lanterns, not sufficiently substantial to be used by mature persons, but rather by children, are dutiable as "toys," under Tariff Act Aug. 27, 1894, c. 349, § 1, par. 321, 28 Stat. 533. Borgfeldt v. United States (U. S.) 124 Fed. 457.

"Toys," as used in Tariff Act Oct. 1, 1890, par. 430, include slides designed for use in magic lanterns for the amusement of children. In re Borgfeldt (U. S.) 65 Fed. 791.

The term "toys," used in the tariff act, is to receive the signification ordinarily attributed to it in common usage, unless evidence shows that it has a different trade signification; but it is held that if decorated china earthenware is bought, sold, and used under the name of "toys," it is to be so classified for duty, whether the articles are used for playthings for children or for household purposes. Zeh v. Cadwalader (U. S.) 42 Fed. 525, 527.

TP.

"Tp.," as used in a deed of land described as "sections 22 and 28, Tp. 79, R. 13, Poweshiek County," is not uncertain or indefinite as to the location of the land. It is a contraction in almost universal use in describing lands, and everybody understands it to mean "township." Ottumwa, C. F. & St. P. Ry. Co. v. McWilliams, 32 N. W. 315, 316, 71 Iowa, 164.

TRACING.

"Tracing" is a mechanical copy or fac simile originally produced by following its lines with a pen or pencil through a transparent medium called "tracing paper." Chapman v. Ferry (U. S.) 18 Fed. 539, 540.

TRACK.

See "Railroad Track"; "Street Railroad Tracks."

TRACK TOOLS.

"Track tools," as used in Tariff Act March 3, 1883, schedule 2, making track tools dutiable at a certain rate, includes steel picks, spike hammers, or mauls, for driving spikes, and clawed bars used in the construction of railway tracks. Procter v. Spalding (U. S.) 26 Fed. 610.

TRACKAGE.

Under Sp. Laws 1874, c. 1, subc. 4, § 11, providing that the common council shall have power and authority to grant the right of way upon, over, and through any of the public streets, highways, alleys, public grounds, or levees of the city of St. Paul to any railway company, upon such limitations as they may prescribe by ordinance, the common council is only authorized to grant the right of "trackage," which is the right to construct and operate railroad tracks on and over the public grounds within the city, but not to occupy and use such grounds as a site for depots, freight houses, or other buildings. City of St. Paul v. Chicago, M. & St. P. Ry. Co., 65 N. W. 649, 63 Minn. 330, 34 L. R. A. 184.

TRACT.

See "No Tract of Land"; "Separate Tracts or Parcels."

"Tract," in its common signification, does not imply anything as to the size of the parcel of land. Cade v. Larned, 27 S. E. 166, 167, 99 Ga. 588.

"Tract," as used in Act March 8, 1871, providing that the board of managers of the geological survey should, on application of at least five owners of separate lots of land included in any tract of land in the state which is subject to overflow from freshets, or which is usually in a low, marshy, boggy, or wet condition, are authorized to examine such tract and adopt a system of drainage, for the same may well embrace a district or large section of the same class of land described in the act and lying in a body. In re Application for Drainage of Lands between Lower Chatham and Little Falls, 35 N. J. Law (6 Vroom) 497, 508.

The word "tract" was used at common law to designate "that land which lies between ordinary high-water mark and low-water mark." Andrus v. Knot, 8 Pac. 763, 12 Or. 501.

The term "tract" means any contiguous quantity of land in the possession of, owned by, or recorded as the property of the same claimant, person, or company. Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 1176; Ballinger's Ann. Codes & St. Wash. 1897, § 1658; Rev. St. Tex. 1895, art. 5064.

The word "tract," when used in the revenue act shall be construed to include, not only the land itself, whether laid out in town or city lots or otherwise, with all things contained therein, but also all buildings, structures, and improvements, and other permanent fixtures, effects of every kind thereon, and all rights and privileges belonging or in any wise pertaining thereto, except where the same may be otherwise denominated by this act. Hurd's Rev. St. Ill. 1901, p. 1494, c. 120, § 292, subd. 12.

TRACT DIVIDED INTO LOTS.

The term "tract divided into lots," in Limitation Act 1872, § 5 (McClell. Dig. 732) providing, upon the question of adverse possession, as against true title, that whenever it shall appear that the occupant or those under whom he claims entered into possession of premises under claim of title, exclusive of any other right, founding such claim upon a written instrument as being a conveyance of the premises in question, or upon the decree or judgment of a competent court, and that there has been a continued occupation and possession of the premises included in such instrument, decree, or judgment for seven years, the premises so included shall be deemed to have been held adversely, except that, where the premises so included consist of a tract divided into lots, the possession of one lot shall not be deemed a possession of any other lot of the same tract, does not include a 40 of land. Kendrick v. Latham, 6 South. 871, 874, 25 Fla. 819.

TRACTION ENGINE.

A traction engine is a locomotive engine for drawing heavy loads upon common roads, or over arable land, as in agricultural operations, and is so used in 2 Hill's Ann. Laws, § 4139, providing that it shall be unlawful for any person to drive any steam traction or portable engine over any bridge without taking certain precautions for the safety of the bridge. Toedtemeler v. Clackamas County, 54 Pac. 954, 955, 34 Or. 66.

TRADE.

See "Coasting Trade"; "Coastwise Trade"; "Foreign Trade"; "Lawful Trade"; "Payable in Trade"; "Useful Trade."

All other trades, see "All Other." Apparatus of, see "Apparatus." Other trade, see "Other."

"Trade" means the craft or business which a person has learned and which he carries on as a means of livelihood; a purchase or sale; a bargain; specifically, in politics, a deal; the exchange of commodities for other commodities or for money; the business of buying and selling, or dealing by way of sale or exchange; commerce; traffic. In re Master Granite & Blue Stone Cutters' Ass'n of Philadelphia, 23 Pa. Co. Ct. R. 517, 520.

"Trade," as used in a contract guarantying milling machinery to make flour to satisfy the trade of the party to whom it is sold, means the trade in and around the place where the mill is situated. It would mean that the character of the flour should be such as would fairly and reasonably enable the purchaser to compete with other mills whose flour might be sold or used in that part of the country. Knowlton v. Oliver (U. S.) 28 Fed. 516, 518.

A chattel mortgage covenanting that the mortgagor would not "trade or exchange" any of the property mortgaged without the written consent of the mortgagee, and that in case he did the property so obtained should be held and taken in place of that disposed of, clearly indicates the giving of one article and the receiving of another, whether the article be money or what is ordinarily understood to be a chattel, and cannot be construed to require the mortgagor to substitute other like animals for animals which have died or articles used or consumed by the mortgagor. Hulsizer's Adm'rs v. Opdyke (N. J.) 13 Atl. 669. See, also, Hulsizer v. Opdyke (N. J.) 7 Atl. 879.

As any business for profit.

"Trade," as used in Const. art. 5, § 3, authorizing the Legislature to tax "trades, professions, franchises, and income," is employed in its broadest signification, and comprehends, not only all who are engaged in buying and selling merchandise, but all whose occupation or business it is to manufacture and sell the products of their plants, and includes in this sense any employment or business embarked in for gain or profit. State v. Worth, 21 S. E. 204, 205, 116 N. C. 1007.

As buying and selling.

"Trade" is defined by Jacob in his Law Dictionary to mean mutual traffic, by selling or the exchange of articles, between members of the same community. Bouvier, in his Law Dictionary, defines "trade" as any sort of dealings by way of sale or exchange. Hence an agreement between dealers fixing the retail price of coal was an agreement in restraint of trade. People v. Sheldon, 21 N. Y. Supp. 859, 861, 66 Hun, 590.

In a lease of a house there was a covenant, with a clause of forfeiture, not to use or exercise the trade of a butcher, baker, slaughter man, tobacco pipe maker, tobacco pipe burner, soap maker, sugar baker, dyer, distiller, coffee house keeper, tanner, or any offensive trade. Held, that the word "trade" meant only some business conducted by buying and selling, and hence the lease was not forfeited by the use of the house as a private lunatic asylum. Wetherell v. Bird, 2 Adol. & El. 161.

"Trade" as used in the title of Acts 1897, c. 94, reciting it to be "An act for the prohibition and punishment of those transactions and combinations calculated to lessen competition in trade or to influence prices of commodities," includes dealings in both imported and domestic commodities. State v. Schlitz Brewing Co., 59 S. W. 1033, 1039, 104 Tenn. 715, 78 Am. St. Rep. 941.

"Trade," as used in Pen. Code, § 211, providing that it shall be unlawful for any person to open on Sunday for the purpose of trade, or sale of goods, wares, and merchandise, any shop, store, or building, or place of business whatever, will not be held to mean pursuing a trade or exercising a trade, such as that of a barber, but trading in goods. Dooly v. Russell, 38 Pac. 1000, 1001, 10 Wash. 195.

Trade "in its broadest signification, includes, not only the business of exchanging commodities by barter, but the business of buying and selling for money or commerce and traffic generally." Hence the sale of land is a trade. May v. Sloan, 101 U. S. 231, 237, 25 L. Ed. 797.

The charter of a bank of the United States, declaring that it should not directly or indirectly "deal or trade" in anything except bills of exchange, gold or silver bullion, or in the sale of goods really and truly pledged for money loaned, and not redeemed in due time, does not prohibit the corporation from purchasing promissory notes, but only denotes what may or may not be bought and sold by the bank. Bank of United States v. Norton, 10 Ky. (3 A. K. Marsh.) 422, 425.

Act Cong. April 10, 1816, c. 44, incorporating the Bank of the United States, and providing that it shall not directly or indirectly "deal or trade" in anything except bills of exchange, gold or silver bullion, or in the sale of goods really and truly pledged, for money loaned and not redeemed in due time, did not intend to prohibit purchases generally, but prohibited buying and selling for the purposes of gain. It meant to interdict the bank from doing the ordinary business of a trader or merchant in buying and selling goods for profit, and the words "deal" and "trade" were used in contradistinction to purchases made for the accommodation or use of the bank or resulting from its ordinary banking operations. Fleckner v. United States Bank, 21 U. S. (8 Wheat.) 338, 351, 5 L. Ed. 631.

As commerce or traffic.

"Trade" has been defined as the exchange of commodities for other commodities or for money; the business of buying and selling; dealing by way of sale or exchange. "Commerce" has a broader meaning. It consists of intercourse and traffic, and includes the transportation of persons and property and the navigation of public waters for that purpose. United States v. Cassidy (U. S.) 67 Fed. 698, 705; In re Grand Jury (U. S.) 62 Fed. 840, 841; United States v. Coal Dealers' Ass'n (U. S.) 85 Fed. 252, 265; United States v. Debs (U. S.) 64 Fed. 724, 749.

In ordinary language the word "trade" is employed in three different senses: First, in that of the business of buying and selling; second, in that of an occupation generally; and, third, in that of a mechanical employment, in contradistinction to agriculture and the liberal arts. Ordinarily, when we speak of "trade," we mean commerce or something of that nature; when we speak of "a trade," we mean an occupation, in the more general or the limited sense. As used in a statute seeking to make unlawful combinations to create or carry out "restrictions in trade," the word is used as the mere equivalent of commerce or traffic. Queen Ins. Co. v. State, 24 S. W. 397, 400, 86 Tex. 250, 22 L. R. A. 483; United States v. Patterson (U. S.) 55 Fed. 605, 639.

The words "commerce" and "trade" are not synonymous. Commerce relates to dealings with foreign nations, while trade, on the contrary, means mutual traffic among ourselves, or the buying, selling, or exchange of articles between members of the same community. People v. Fisher (N. Y.) 14 Wend. 9, 15, 28 Am. Dec. 501; Hooker v. Vanderwater (N. Y.) 4 Denio, 349, 353, 47 Am. Dec. 258.

The word "trade" properly means traffic in merchandise. Where a witness testified that "the whole trade was canceled by agreement of the parties," it was held that he meant the bargain which he had made with the other parties to the agreement. Barrett v. Barron, 13 N. H. 150, 161.

In construing the word "trade" as used in a policy of insurance on the cargo of a vessel, reciting that "there are goods on board contraband war, and that the insurance is not against illicit trade with the Spaniards, but is understood to cover the property under whatever papers the vessel may sail," the court said: "The obvious and most usual sense in which the word 'trade' is implied is to express traffic, commerce, exchange, dealing, not the voyage or destination of a ship, although sometimes the term may be allowed that meaning, when the voyage or destination is named from the use or purpose to which it leads or is designed." Higginson v. Pomeroy, 11 Mass. 104, 112.

As occupation or profession.

One of the definitions of "trade" given by Webster is the business a man has learned by which he earns his livelihood. Woodfield v. Colzey, 47 Ga. 121, 124.

One of the legal definitions of "trade" is a way of living. It is an honest and a lawful occupation. Beale v. Beck (U. S.) 2 Fed. Cas. 1111, 1114.

The word "trade" has a secondary sense, by which almost any occupation is called a man's trade; as in the proverb, "Two of a trade can never agree." In re Smith (U. S.) 22 Fed. Cas. 394, 395.

"Trade, business, or calling," as used in Laws 1892, c. 602, requiring any person intending to conduct the "trade, business, or calling" of a plumber, etc., to submit to examination before engaging in the business, etc., are synonymous, and have relation to the mechanical employments; one's trade, etc., being that business which he has learned and fitted himself to follow. People v. Warden of City Prison, 39 N. E. 686, 689, 144 N. Y. 529, 27 L. R. A. 718.

"Trade," as used in a will requiring the beneficiaries to have some useful trade, should be construed in the broad sense of special occupation or profession, rather than in the ordinary sense of mechanical employment, and therefore bookkeepers, typewriters, and school teachers have a trade, within the meaning of the will. Colby v. Dean, 49 Atl. 574, 575, 70 N. H. 591.

Making of contracts.

"Trade or calling," as used in Code 1849, c. 196, § 16, providing that every free person found on a Sabbath day laboring at a "trade or calling," except in household or other work of necessity or charity, should forfeit a certain sum for each offense, cannot with propriety be said to include bargain making, contract making, or covenant making, in the common or technical meaning of the words "trade" or "calling," as distinguished from other trades or callings. It is true that persons more or less frequently make contracts in the course of their usual transactions, but the making generally of contracts, without reference to particular transactions, is not a trade or calling. Raines v. Watson, 2 W. Va. 371, 401.

Contracting.

Code Or. p. 211, exempting from execution tools and implements used by a person engaged in any "trade, occupation, or profession," does not include the business of a building contractor. In re Whetmore (U. S.) 29 Fed. Cas. 921.

Dentistry.

"Trade," as used in a statute exempting from execution the tools of a mechanic necessary for carrying on his "trade," cannot be construed to include dentistry. The term "trade" is defined by Webster to denote the business or occupation which a person has learned and which he carries on for procuring subsistence or for profit, particularly a mechanical employment, distinguished from the liberal arts and learned professions and from agriculture. It is manifest that a pursuit requiring a correct knowledge of the anatomy and physiology of a part of the human body, as well as mechanical skill in the use of the necessary instruments, cannot be properly denominated a "trade." Whitcomb v. Reid, 31 Mass. 567, 569, 66 Am. Dec. 579.

Farming.

It is exceedingly doubtful whether farming can be called a "trade," within the true meaning of the statute providing that, where a minor shall serve an apprenticeship in any lawful trade for seven years in a town, he shall thereby gain a settlement therein. Inhabitants of Leeds v. Inhabitants of Freeport, 10 Me. (1 Fairf.) 356, 359.

"Trade comprehends every species of exchange or dealing, either in the produce of land, manufactures, or bills, or in money; but it is chiefly used to denote the barter or purchase and sale of goods, wares, or merchandise, either by wholesale or retail. A profession, on the other hand, is said to be that of which one professes knowledge; the occupation, if not mechanical or agricultural, or the like, to which one devotes one's self; the business which one professes to understand or to follow as one's business. Neither of these words is equivalent to 'occupation' in its general sense. Therefore I do not think a farmer or a carpenter could be taxed as such, though one trading or dealing in the products of either might be liable as a trader." State v. Hunt, 40 S. E. 216, 217, 129 N. C. 686, 85 Am. St. Rep. 758.

Fishery.

The word "trade," as used in Act Cong. Feb. 18, 1793, c. 8, § 32, relating to the transferring of licensed vessels to be employed in any other trade than that for which they are licensed, is used in a broader sense as equivalent to occupation, employment, or business, whether manual or mercantile. Wherever any occupation, employment, or business is carried on for the purpose of profit, or gain, or a livelihood, not in the liberal arts or learned professions, it is constantly called a "trade." Thus, we speak of the art, mystery, or trade of a housewright, a shipwright, a tailor, a blacksmith, and a shoemaker; and it is in this extended sense, that the word is used in this section. Therefore the cod fishery is a trade, within the meaning of the section, and so is the mackerel fishery. The Nymph (U. S.) 18 Fed. Cas. 506, 507, affirming Id. 509, 511.

Furnishing water to city.

Act April 14, 1853, as amended by Act April 30, 1855, authorizing the formation of corporations for the purpose of engaging in any "species of trade or commerce," foreign or domestic, includes a corporation organized for the purpose of furnishing a city with water. People v. Blake, 19 Cal. 579, 594.

Household service.

Household service in a city, town, or village may perhaps be said to be a sort of "trade or mystery," which may require apprenticeship; for it will require time and attention to make an expert waiter, and one so instructed will receive wages 10 times above that of an untaught servant. Commonwealth v. Van Lear (Pa.) 1 Serg. & R. 248, 252.

Insurance.

"Trade," as used in Sess. Laws 1889, c. 257, entitled "An act to declare unlawful trusts and combinations in restraint of trade products," should be construed to include the business of insurance. The commercial meaning of the word "trade" refers to the business of selling or exchanging some tangible substance or commodity for money, or business of dealing by way of sale or exchange in commodities. This may possibly be the most common signification which is given to the term; but it is not the only one, nor the most comprehensive meaning in which the word is properly used. In the broader sense it is any occupation or business carried on for subsistence or profit. Anderson's Dictionary of Law gives the following definition: "Generally equivalent to occupation, employment, or business, whether manual or mercantile; any occupation, employment, or business carried on for profit, gain, or livelihood, not in the liberal arts or in the learned professions." In Abbott's Law Dictionary, the word is defined as "an occupation, employment, or business carried on for gain or profit." Among the definitions given in the Encyclopædic Dictionary is the following: "The business which a person has learned and which he carries on for subsistence or profit; occupation; particularly employment, whether manual or mercantile, as distinguished from the liberal arts or the learned professions and agriculture." A like definition of the word is given in the Imperial Dictionary. Rapalje & Lawrence's Law Dictionary gives the restrictive definition of traffic, commerce, or exchange of goods for value, goods, or money. Bouvier limits the meaning to commerce, traffic, and of mechanics. The definition given by Webster is the act or business of exchanging commodities by barter, or by buying and selling for money; commerce; traffic; barter. This author, however, gives the more enlarged meaning of the word as well, as follows: "The business which a person has learned and which he engages in for procuring subsistence or for profit; occupation; especially mechanical employment, as distinguished from the liberal arts, the learned professions, and agriculture; as we speak of the trade of a smith, of a carpenter, or mason, but not of the trade of a farmer or lawyer, or a physician." The broader signification given to the word by most of the lexicographers would fairly embrace and cover the business of insurance. In re Pinkney, 27 Pac. 179, 47 Kan. 89.

The word "trade" embraces within its meaning commercial traffic, and it also has a limited and a restricted significance, which applies to mechanical pursuits; but in its broad and general sense it covers and embraces all occupations in business, with the possible exception of the learned professions and those that pertain to liberal arts and the pursuit of agriculture. In The Nymph (U. S.) 18 Fed. Cas. 506, Judge Story says: "The word is often, and, indeed, generally, used as equivalent to occupation, employment, or business, whether manual or mercantile. Whenever any occupation, employment, or business is carried on for the purpose of profit or gain or livelihood, not in the liberal arts or learned professions, it is constantly called a 'trade.'" As used in Sayles' Civ. St. art. 2337, it includes the business of an insurance agent, so as to entitle him to the exemption therein provided for. Betz v. Maler, 33 S. W. 710, 12 Tex. Civ. App. 219 (citing Queen Ins. Co. v. State, 24 S. W. 397, 86 Tex. 250, 22 L. R. A. 483; 26 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 226; The Eliza, 11 U. S. [7 Cranch] 113, 3 L. Ed. 286; Chartered Mercantile Bank v. Wilson, 3 Exch. Div. 108; In re Pinkney, 47 Kan. 89, 27 Pac. 179; May v. Sloan, 101 U. S. 231, 25 L. Ed. 797).

Interstate commerce.

The word "trade," in its usual sense, refers to the business of selling or exchanging some tangible substance or commodity for money, or the business of dealing by way of sale or exchange in commodities. In a broader sense it is any occupation or business carried on for subsistence or profit, but does not mean interstate commerce. State v. Phipps, 31 Pac. 1097, 1098, 50 Kan. 609, 18 L. R. A. 657, 34 Am. St. Rep. 152.

Keeping meat market or grocery.

"Trade or business," as used in Gen. St. c. 133, § 32, exempting from execution the "tools, implements, and fixtures necessary for carrying on trade or business," applies to such as mechanics, artisans, handicraftsmen, and others whose manual labor and skill afford means of earning their livelihood, and does not include those merely engaged in the business of buying and selling merchandise, nor to exempt the weights and measures, horses and carriages, or other articles used by them in their trade, and so does not apply to one engaged in keeping a meat market and grocer's shop. Wallace v. Bartlett, 108 Mass. 52, 54.

Manufacturing.

"Trade," as defined by Bouvier, embraces any sort of dealings by way of sale or exchange; commerce; traffic. Under Rev. St. c. 8, § 14, providing that all personal property employed in "trade" shall be taxed in the town where so employed on the 1st day of April, fire wood, pulp wood, and kiln wood, aggregating several hundred cords, and 200 piles cut from a tract of wild land and conveyed to a landing at the shore, on the tract, there to remain until sold in small quantities or by the whole lot to local or other parties as might thereafter be found expedient, were employed in trade. Gower v. Inhabitants of Jonesboro, 21 Atl. 846, 847, 83 Me. 142.

Where the business of a mill was the manufacture of lumber for sale, it falls within the legitimate definition of "trade"; so that logs intended for manufacture in that mill, and which were in fact manufactured there, which had been cut and hauled to the landing and were in transit to the mill, may fairly be considered as employed in the trade or business of that mill on that day, within the meaning and purpose of the statute providing that personal property employed in trade shall be taxed in the town where it was employed on the 1st day of April. Inhabitants of Farmingdale v. Berlin Mills Co., 45 Atl. 39, 40, 93 Me. 333 (citing Gower v. Inhabitants of Jonesboro, 83 Me. 142, 145, 21 Atl. 846).

The court, in Atwood v. De Forest, 19 Conn. 513, said: "By the word 'trade' as used in Gen. St. § 1164, exempting the implements of a debtor's trade from attachment, means the business of a mechanic, strictly speaking, as the business of a carpenter, blacksmith, silversmith, printer, or the like; and it was not intended to include the business of a manufacturer, any more than it was intended to extend to the business of a merchant or farmer." Davidson v. Hannon, 34 Atl. 1050, 67 Conn. 312, 84 L. R. A. 718, 62 Am. St. Rep. 282.

Mining.

"The working of a mine under a bare mining right has been uniformly construed by courts of equity as a species of trade. Hence the legal relations existing between two or more persons interested in such right is that of a qualified partnership." Smith v. Cooley, 2 Pac. 880, 882, 65 Cal. 46.

Real estate business.

"Trade," as used in Laws 1870, c. 29, authorizing the formation of co-operative associations for the purpose of trade, will be construed to include the buying and selling of real estate. Finnegan v. Noerenberg, 53 N. W. 1150, 1151, 52 Minn. 239, 18 L. R. A. 778, 38 Am. St. Rep. 552.

Saddle and harness making.

The term "trade," within the meaning of the statute exempting from sale on execution all tools belonging to any trade, includes the combined business of saddle and harness making. Nichols v. Porter, 26 S. W. 859, 7 Tex. Civ. App. 802.

Selling liquor without license.

"Trade," as used in Tayl. St. p. 1550, § 32, exempting from execution the stock in trade, etc., of any person, used and kept for the purpose of carrying on his "trade or business," means lawful trade or business, and hence does not apply to a person engaged in the sale of intoxicating liquors without a license. Walsch v. Call, 32 Wis. 159, 161.

Sheet metal working.

"Trade," as used in Act April 29, 1874, § 2 (P. L. 73), authorizing a corporation to be created for the encouragement and protection of trade and commerce, should be construed in its popular sense, and includes particular trades, as well as trade in general. In popular understanding, roofing and sheet metal working is as plain a description of a trade as carpentering, or bricklaying, or mason work, or any other occupation belonging to the class of trades. In re Roofing & Sheet Metal Contractors' Ass'n of Philadelphia, 49 Atl. 894, 200 Pa. 111.

Single transaction.

The statute of limitations, excepting the "trade of merchandise between merchant and merchant" from the operation of the statute, does not include a joint purchase of goods, where one of the purchasers takes the whole goods and agrees to account to the other for his share of them, or proceeds, if any, and to charge no commission in case of sale; and hence the lapse of the stipulated time was a bar to an action on an account against the party who had received and sold the goods. Murray v. Coster (N. Y.) 20 Johns. 576, 582, 11 Am. Dec. 333.

Transportation of merchandise.

"Trade," as used in a statute exempting from attachment the implements of the debtor's trade, means the business of a mechanic, strictly speaking, as the business of a carpenter, blacksmith, silversmith, printer, or the like, and does not include one engaged in the transportation of merchandise; for that cannot be said to be the business of a mechanic, either by definition of the books or by the common understanding and speaking of man, so as to exempt the horse, carts, and harness used in such business of transportation from attachment. Enscoe v. Dunn, 44 Conn. 93, 99, 26 Am. Rep. 430.

TRADE FIXTURES.

See "Barroom Fixtures."
As fixtures, see "Fixture."

"Trade fixtures" is a term usually used to describe property which a tenant has placed on rented real estate to advance the business for which the realty is leased, and may, as against the lessor and those claiming under him, be removed at the end of the tenant's term. Herkimer County Light & Power Co. v. Johnson, 55 N. Y. Supp. 924, 928, 37 App. Div. 257.

The casing in an oil or gas well and the derrick and other appliances used in drilling and operating it are "trade fixtures," and can be removed by the owner or lessee during the term of the lease. Shellar v. Shivers, 38 Atl. 95, 96, 171 Pa. 569.

A substantial dynamo house, built by a lessee on a solid stone foundation on land leased for use in the operation of an electric lighting plant, and a boiler house of rough lumber upon sills laid on stone or blocks, and a shaft house or shed constructed for the most part of lumber from buildings on the premises, as well as two dynamos placed in the dynamo house, are accessory to the trade, and hence "trade fixtures," subject to removal by the lessee on the termination of his lease. Brown v. Reno Electric Light & Power Co. (U. S.) 55 Fed. 229, 231.

A frame building used as a lumber office and as a place for the workmen of a lessee to sleep, and erected by such lessee, and also a bridge built of stringers, with plank nailed thereto, to give access to the office, are "trade fixtures," within the meaning of Civ. Code, § 1019, providing that a tenant may remove from the demised premises during his term anything affixed thereto for purposes of trade, etc. Security Loan & Trust Co. v. Willamette Steam Mills Lumbering & Mfg. Co., 34 Pac. 321, 322, 99 Cal. 636.

A building erected by a tenant on the leased land, in fulfillment of a covenant in the lease, a breach of which would have forfeited it, and which the tenant under the terms of the lease has no right to remove, is not a "trade fixture," on which the lessee can execute a chattel mortgage to secure a creditor. Deane v. Hutchinson, 2 Atl. 292, 40 N. J. Eq. (13 Stew.) 83.

TRADE-MARK.

Right to, as franchise, see "Franchise."

A trade-mark "is the name, symbol, figure, letter, form, or device adopted and used by the manufacturer or merchant in order to designate the goods that he manufactures or sells, and to distinguish them from those manufactured or sold by another, to the end that they may be known in the market as his, and thus enable him to secure such profits as result from a reputation for superior skill, industry, or enterprise." Moorman v. Hoge (U. S.) 17 Fed. Cas. 715, 718 (quoting Upton, Trade-Marks, p. 9); Albany Perforated Wrapping Paper Co. v. John Hoberg Co. (U. S.) 102 Fed. 157, 158 (citing Upton, Trade-Marks, p. 9, c. 1); United States v. Borgfeldt (U. S.) 123 Fed. 193, 197 (quoting Abb. Law Dict.); Leldersdorf v. Flint (U. S.) 15 Fed. Cas. 280, 281 (citing McLean v. Fleming, 96 U. S. 245, 24 L. Ed. 828); Hostetter v. Fries (U. S.) 17 Fed. 620; Hazleton Boiler Co. v. Hazleton Tripod Boiler Co., 28 N. E. 248, 249, 137 Ill. 231; Candee v. Deere, 54 Ill. 439, 456, 5 Am. Rep. 125; Burke v. Cassin, 45 Cal. 467, 469, 478, 13 Am. Rep. 204; Munro v. Smith, 8 N. Y. Supp. 671; Shaver v. Shaver, 6 N. W. 188, 189, 54 Iowa, 206, 37 Am. Rep. 194; Parkland Hills Blue Lick Water Co. v. Hawkins, 26 S. W. 389, 391, 95 Ky. 502, 44 Am. St. Rep. 254; Larrabee v. Lewis, 67 Ga. 561, 563, 44 Am. Rep. 735; Rogers v. Taintor, 97 Mass. 291, 297.

"Mark" means to make a visible sign on something; to affix a significant mark; to draw, cut, fasten, brand; to affix an indication to; to attach one's name or initials to. A "trade-mark," therefore, consists of the use in trade of such a mark placed upon goods manufactured by a particular person and placed in market with such marks for sale and trade. Adams v. Helsel (U. S.) 31 Fed. 279, 280.

"Trade-marks" are symbols by which men engaged in trade and manufacturing become known in the marts of commerce, and by which their reputation and that of their goods are extended and published. They are the means by which manufacturers and merchants identify their manufactures and merchandise. Trade-Mark Cases, 100 U. S. 82, 87, 25 L. Ed. 550.

A trade-mark is a particular sign or symbol, which by exclusive use becomes recognized as the distinguishing mark of the owner's goods, and for the protection of which the aid of equity may be invoked. Schneider v. Williams, 14 Atl. 812, 814, 44 N. J. Eq. (17 Stew.) 891 (citing 2 High. Inj. § 1063).

"Trade-mark" is the right which a person has to use a certain name for articles which he has manufactured, so that he may prevent another from using it, because the mark or name denotes that articles so marked were manufactured by a certain person, and no one else can have the right to put the same name on his goods and then represent them to have been manufactured by the person whose mark it is. Osgood v. Allen (U. S.) 18 Fed. Cas. 871, 873.

A trade-mark has been defined as an arbitrary symbol affixed by a manufacturer or merchant to a vendible commodity. The principal purpose of a trade-mark is to guaranty the genuineness of a product. It is, in fact, the commercial substitute for one's own autograph. In all ages it has been used to denote origin, and thus protect the purchaser, as well as the vendor. Gowans v. Ahlborn Bros. (Pa.) 4 Kulp, 81, 84.

A trade-mark is something used on salable articles to designate them as the articles made by A., and to distinguish them from similar articles made or sold by B. Hygeia Distilled Water Co. v. Hygeia Ice Co., 40 Atl. 534, 540, 70 Conn. 516.

The right which a manufacturer has in a trade-mark is everywhere recognized. The mark may consist of a name or a device, or a particular arrangement of words, or such words with some device of greater or less novelty, which has been applied to a manufacture to designate the goods as made by a particular person. When a manufacturer has thus distinguished the goods he makes by a peculiar device, so that they may be known in the market as his, he thereby acquires the right to whatever profits may result from his superior skill, knowledge, or honesty of process. A legal right to the use of a trade-mark springs from its usefulness to point out the original ownership of the article to which it is affixed, or to give notice to the public who is the producer. Solis Cigar Co. v. Pozo, 26 Pac. 556, 557, 16 Colo. 388, 25 Am. St. Rep. 279.

A trade-mark is defined to be a particular label or sign, indicating to those who wish to give the person using it their patronage that the article is made or sold by him or by his authority, or that he carries on business at a particular place. Glen & Hall Mfg. Co. v. Hall (N. Y.) 6 Lana. 158, 160.

"The function of a trade-mark is to indicate to the public the origin, manufacture, or ownership of articles to which it is applied, and thereby secure to its owner all benefit resulting from his identification by the public with the article bearing it." Dennison Mfg. Co. v. Thomas Mfg. Co. (U. S.) 94 Fed. 651, 656.

The office of a trade-mark is to point out distinctly the origin or ownership of the article to which it is affixed, or, in other words, to give notice as to who was the producer. Deering Harvester Co. v. Whitman & Barnes Mfg. Co. (U. S.) 91 Fed. 376, 378, 83 C. C. A. 558.

The general rule laid down as to the selection of a trade-mark in the case of Delaware & H. Canal Co. v. Clark, 80 U. S. (13 Wall.) 322, 20 L. Ed. 581, is as follows: "The office of a trade-mark is to point out distinctively the origin or ownership of the article to which it is affixed, or to give notice who was the producer. This may be done in many cases by a name, mark, or device well known, but not previously applied to the same article. An exclusive use can never be exclusively claimed of words in common use previously as applied to similar articles." The law accords to the manufacturer the exclusive right to an arbitrary name, as designating an article to which he is the first to apply it. Dr. Jaeger's Sanitary Woolen System Co. v. Le Boutillier, 24 N. Y. Supp. 890, 894, 5 Misc. Rep. 78.

A trade-mark indicates the source, origin, or ownership of an article of merchandise on which it is placed. Caswell v. Davis, 58 N. Y. 223, 17 Am. Rep. 233. This means that the mark is calculated to distinguish the articles which bear it from those of other makers or vendors. It need not indicate any particular person as maker, manufacturer, or vendor, or give the name or address of either. When the mark has become recognized by purchasers as a distinctive designation of a particular manufacturer, maker, or seller of a certain quality of goods, it will be a sufficient indication of the origin or ownership, within the rule requisite to its protection as such, though purchasers may not, from the words or otherwise, be able to tell who is the particular maker or seller of the article. Its value is in its employment, marking the goods on which it is placed. This gives it the character of property. It is, then, a symbol of reputation or good will. State v. Bishop, 81 S. W. 9, 11, 128 Mo. 373, 29 L. R. A. 200, 49 Am. St. Rep. 569.

A trade-mark is a mere notice, an arbitrary mark or sign, put on an artificial product, whereby any person interested in the information may be assured as to the origin of said product. Such mark is a means for rendering more pronounced, distinctive, and valuable that species of property known as the good will of the business. A manufacturer, for instance, may use as a trade-mark a word arbitrarily selected. In so doing he acquires no property in the word as such. His right attaches to the peculiar and added function of the word in identification of his product by reason of its use. Royal Baking Powder Co. v. Raymond (U. S.) 70 Fed. 376, 380.

In the strict sense of the term, a trade-mark is applicable only to a vendible article upon which it is in some manner fixed or represented as a symbol, to indicate the origin or ownership of the article on which it is placed. But the same rules for protection against infringements are extended to names applied to other callings, or to places of business, as to technical trade-marks. Koehler v. Sanders, 122 N. Y. 65, 72, 25 N. E. 235, 236, 9 L. R. A. 576 (citing Howard v. Henriques, 5 N. Y. Super. Ct. [3 Sandf.] 725).

Broadly defined, a trade-mark is a mark by which the wares of the owner are known in trade. Its object is twofold: First, to protect the party using it from competition with inferior articles; and, second, to protect the public from imposition. Shaw Stocking Co. v. Mack (U. S.) 12 Fed. 707, 710.

A trade-mark is a word, symbol, or device by which the wares of an owner are known in trade. Its object is, first, to protect the party using them from competition with inferior articles, and, second, to protect the public from imposition. The trade-mark brands the goods as genuine, just as the signature to a letter stamps it as authentic. Kipling v. G. P. Putnam's Sons (U. S.) 120 Fed. 631, 635, 57 C. C. A. 295.

A trade-mark is a mark or device attached by the manufacturer and seller of goods to the merchandise produced by him, in order to distinguish it from a like class of merchandise produced by others, and the right to the exclusive use of such mark accrues, not because he was the originator of the same, but because he has applied it to goods of his manufacture, and they have acquired a reputation in connection with such mark. Dr. Jaeger's Sanitary Woolen System Co. v. Geo. Le Boutillier, 15 N. Y. St. Rep. 117, 119.

"It is not necessary that a trade-mark should on its face show the origin, manufacture, or ownership of the article to which it is applied. It is sufficient that by association with such articles in trade it has acquired with the public an understood reference to such origin." Denniston Mfg. Co. v. Thomas Mfg. Co. (U. S.) 94 Fed. 651, 656.

A trade-mark may consist of a token, letter, sign, or seal; and names, ciphers, monograms, pictures, and figures may be used, and numerals united. Shaw Stocking Co. v. Mack (U. S.) 12 Fed. 707, 711.

Any device, figure, or inscription which seems to indicate the personal origin of the goods may be adopted as a trade-mark. McVey v. Brendel (Pa.) 29 Wkly. Notes Cas. 1, 5, 6.

Mere words may become valid trade-marks, when they are merely arbitrary, or are indicative of origin or ownership in the original proprietor. Burton v. Stratton (U. S.) 12 Fed. 696, 699, 700.

"A trade-mark is intended to designate the origin of the particular article to which it is affixed, or to which it specially refers, and it gives notice to the world who the producer of that article was. A name may be used for this purpose, or a certain mark or peculiar device may be employed, provided they have not theretofore been appropriated by others for the same purpose. But the right to select such names and marks is governed by certain rules and limitations, which has been announced by the court." Coffman v. Castner (U. S.) 87 Fed. 457, 81 C. C. A. 55.

A "trade-mark" may consist in a name, or an emblem or device, used to indicate the nature, quality, or identity of an article of commerce, whether it consists of an article that any one is at liberty to fabricate, compound, or vend, or which originated with, or the exclusive right to manufacture or vend which is under the protection of a patent or otherwise in, the person or proprietor by whom the trade-mark was devised. It may exist where the name of the article and of the proprietor are so blended together that the right to the use of the name is indispensable to the use of the trade-mark, or may consist of the name alone of the manufacturer or proprietor, or may exist where the article fabricated is so made or shaped that the peculiar form of it is designed to and does serve as a trade-mark, as in case of a sewing machine, the iron framework of which was so constructed as to represent and form the two initial letters of the proprietor's name. Hegeman v. Hegeman (N. Y.) 8 Daly, 1, 4.

The mere name of a person, firm, or corporation cannot be a lawful trade-mark; but such name, accompanied by a mark sufficient to distinguish it from the same name when used by other persons, may be a lawful trade-mark. A mark or device, distinguished from other marks, when used in connection with a particular article, may designate, by association in the minds of purchasers and dealers, etc., the origin or ownership of such article as being in a particular manufacturer, and thus be a lawful trade-mark. Smith v. Reynolds (U. S.) 22 Fed. Cas. 634, 636.

In general a man may adopt for a trade-mark whatever he chooses; but, when he asserts and seeks to enforce exclusive right therein, it becomes necessary to ascertain whether it is just to others that this be permitted. If the name, device, or designation is purely arbitrary or fanciful, and has first been brought into use by him, his right to the exclusive use of it is unquestionable. But the mere designation of a quality as nourishing, applied to an article of drink, cannot be appropriated as a trade-mark. Neither can any general description, by words in common use, of a kind of article or of its nature or qualities. Insurance Oil Tank Co. v. Scott, 33 La. Ann. 946, 951, 39 Am. Rep. 286.

In discussing whether the word "insurance," as applied to an illuminating oil, is capable of constituting a legal trade-mark, the court says that, while insurance may by some process of association of ideas suggest the notion of safety, it is not synonymous with "safe," nor can it be said to describe any possible quality of oil, as the word is a noun substantive, not grammatically applicable to the description of the qualities of things, and concludes that it may properly become a trade-mark. Insurance Oil Tank Co. v. Scott, 33 La. Ann. 946, 951, 39 Am. Rep. 286.

A manufacturer, operating under the style of the "Perfection Mattress Company," and producing a mattress well known to the trade as the "Perfection Mattress," after he has sold out such business, may be restrained from carrying on a rival business, manufacturing mattresses exactly similar to the Perfection mattress, under the label of "Kyle Perfection Mattress," though such mattress was not protected by patent, since his purchaser had a right to the exclusive use of the term "Perfection Mattress," both as a trade-mark and under the sale of the good will of the Perfection Mattress Company. Kyle v. Perfection Mattress Co., 28 South. 545, 546, 127 Ala. 39, 50 L. R. A. 628, 85 Am. St. Rep. 78.

A symbol does not become a trade-mark until it is actually stamped on or otherwise becomes affixed to the goods to be sold. St. Louis Piano Mfg. Co. v. Merkel, 1 Mo. App. 305, 310.

Statutory definitions.

A trade-mark is a mark used to indicate the maker, owner, or seller of an article of merchandise, and includes, among other things, any name of a person or corporation, or any letter, word, device, emblem, figure, seal, stamp, diagram, brand, wrapper, ticket, stopper, label, or other mark, lawfully adopted by him, and usually affixed to an article of merchandise to denote that the same was imported, manufactured, produced, sold, compounded, bottled, packed, or otherwise prepared by him; and also a signature or mark used or commonly placed by a painter, sculptor, or other artist upon a painting, drawing, engraving, statue, or other work of art, to indicate that the same was designed or executed by him. Pen. Code N. Y. 1903, § 366.

The word "trade-mark" as used in defining offenses relating thereto, includes every description of word, letter, device, emblem, stamp, imprint, brand, printed ticket, label, or wrapper, usually affixed by any mechanic, manufacturer, druggist, merchant, or tradesman, to denote any goods to be goods imported, manufactured, produced, compounded, or sold by him, other than any name, word, or expression generally denoting any goods to be of some particular class or description. Pen. Code Cal. 1903, § 353; Pen. Code Idaho 1901, § 4952.

The term "trade-mark," as used in provisions in the Penal Code punishing the forging and counterfeiting of trade-marks, etc., includes every description of word, letter, device, emblem, stamp, imprint, brand, printed ticket, label, or wrapper, usually affixed by any mechanic, manufacturer, druggist, merchant, or tradesman, or by any association or union of workmen, to denote any goods to be goods imported, manufactured, produced, compounded, or sold by him, or by such association or union of workmen, other than any name, word, or expression generally denoting any goods to be of some particular class or description. Rev. St. Utah 1898, § 4485.

The term "trade-mark," as used in the title on trade-marks, includes every description of word, letter, device, emblem, stamp, imprint, brand, printed ticket, label, or wrapper, usually affixed by any mechanic, manufacturer, druggist, merchant, tradesman, association, or union, whether incorporated or unincorporated, to denote any goods to be goods imported, manufactured, produced, compounded, or sold by him, or by such association or union, other than any name, word, or expression generally denoting any goods to be of some particular class or description. Rev. St. Utah 1898, § 2720.

The phrase "trade-mark," as used in the chapter relating thereto, includes every description of word, letter, device, emblem, stamp, imprint, brand, printed ticket, label, or wrapper, usually affixed by any mechanic, manufacturer, druggist, merchant, or tradesman to denote any goods to be imported, manufactured, produced, compounded, or sold by him, other than any name, word, or expression generally denoting any goods to be of some particular class or description, or the designation or name of any mill, hotel, factory, or other business. Pol. Code Mont. 1895, § 3160.

The phrase "trade-mark," as used in the chapter relating to trade-marks, includes every description of word, letter, device, emblem, stamp, imprint, brand, printed ticket, label or wrapper usually affixed by any mechanic, manufacturer, druggist, merchant, or tradesman to denote any goods to be goods imported, manufactured, produced, compounded or sold by him, other than any name, word, or expression generally denoting any goods to be of some particular class or description, and also any name or names, marks, or devices branded, stamped, engraved, etched, blown, or otherwise attached or produced upon any cask, keg, bottle, vessel, siphon, can, or other package used by any mechanic, manufacturer, druggist, merchant, or tradesman to hold, contain, or inclose the goods so imported, manufactured, produced, compounded, or sold by him, other than any name, word, or expression generally denoting any goods to be of some particular class or description. Pol. Code Cal. 1903, § 3196.

Color.

Trade-mark implies form, rather than color, and it consists of some peculiar name, symbol, figure, letter, or device whereby one manufacturer distinguishes his goods from like goods sold by other persons, and does not include color apart from a name or device. Fleischmann v. Starkey (U. S.) 25 Fed. 127, 128.

Commercial mark distinguished.

The distinction between a "trade-mark" and a "commercial mark" in the civil law of France is pointed out by Pouillet, Marques de Fabrique, § 6, where he says: "A trade-mark is not a commercial mark. * * * The trade-mark is especially or peculiarly the mark of the manufacturer, of him who creates the product, who manufactures it. The commercial mark is that of the dealer, of him who, receiving the product of the manufacturer, sells it to the consumer." La Republique Francaise v. Schultz (U. S.) 57 Fed. 37, 41.

Geographical name.

A geographical name cannot be appropriated for use as a trade-mark, and hence no one can acquire the right to the use of the name "Pocahontas" as descriptive of the locality or character of gold mines in what is known as the "Great Pocahontas Gold Field" of Virginia. Coffman v. Castner (U. S.) 87 Fed. 457, 460, 31 C. C. A. 55.

There can be no "trade-mark" in one's name or in a geographical name. Sterling Remedy Co. v. Spermine Medical Co. (U. S.) 112 Fed. 1000, 1003, 50 C. C. A. 657.

In selecting a trade-mark, the manufacturer or dealer must avoid words—e. g., geographical names—which are descriptive of the local origin of the goods, if other persons have the right to deal in goods of similar origin. When it has become generally known in the trade that this symbol or word has been taken by one dealer or manufacturer to indicate his goods, he acquires a title to it for that purpose, and no one else can use it, even innocently. Cady v. Schultz, 32 Atl. 915, 916, 19 R. I. 193, 29 L. R. A. 524, 61 Am. St. Rep. 763.

A person cannot by means of a trade-mark monopolize the name of the place where the article is manufactured. Burton v. Stratton (U. S.) 12 Fed. 696, 700.

Words which describe the place of manufacture of an article, and which do not designate, either expressly or by association, the personal origin of the product, cannot be used as a trade-mark. Pepper v. Labrot (U. S.) 8 Fed. 29, 39.

The term "trade-mark" has been in use from a very early date, and generally speaking means a distinctive mark of authenticity, through which the products of particular manufacturers or the vendible commodities of particular merchants may be distinguished from those of others. And the general rule is thoroughly established that words that do not in and of themselves indicate anything in the nature of origin, manufacture, or ownership, but are merely descriptive of the place where an article is manufactured or produced, cannot be monopolized as a trade-mark. Elgin Nat. Watch Co. v. Illinois Watch Case Co., 21 Sup. Ct. 270, 273, 179 U. S. 665, 45 L. Ed. 365 (citing Delaware & H. Canal Co. v. Clark, 80 U. S. [13 Wall.] 311, 20 L. Ed. 581; Brown Chemical Co. v. Meyer, 139 U. S. 540, 11 Sup. Ct. 625, 35 L. Ed. 247; Columbia Mill Co. v. Alcorn, 150 U. S. 460, 14 Sup. Ct. 151, 37 L. Ed. 1144.

Label distinguished.

A trade-mark may sometimes in form serve as a label, but it differs from a mere label in such cases, in that it is not confined to a designation of the article to which it is attached, but by words or design is a symbol or device which, affixed to a product of one's manufacture, distinguishes it from articles of the same general nature manufactured or sold by others, thus securing to the producer the benefits of any increased sale by reason of any peculiar excellence he may have given to it. Higgins v. Keuffel, 11 Sup. Ct. 731, 732, 140 U. S. 428, 35 L. Ed. 470.

Method of arrangement.

A trade-mark must be something other than and separate from the merchandise itself, and hence a peculiar method of arranging soap in a box is not a trade-mark which can be legally registered. Davis v. Davis (U. S.) 27 Fed. 490, 492.

A trade-mark is not an invention. It does not relate to or affect processes of manufacture or mechanical combinations. It is a sign or mark by which the manufactured articles produced by one person or firm or maker are distinguished from those produced by rival manufacturers. It must be distinctive, and indicate the personal, as distinguished from the geographical, origin of the article to which it is applied. The fact that a manufacturer has adopted a particular style of bottle does not prevent a rival from using a bottle of the same style, if the bottle is sold to the public generally; and the mechanical arrangement of bottles in boxes in which they are packed by a manufacturer cannot be claimed as a trade-mark. Hoyt v. Hoyt, 143 Pa. 623, 638, 639, 22 Atl. 755, 13 L. R. A. 343, 24 Am. St. Rep. 575.

Name descriptive of nature, kind, or quality.

There can be no trade-mark in a name descriptive of quality. Sterling Remedy Co. v. Spermine Medical Co. (U. S.) 112 Fed. 1000, 1003, 50 C. C. A. 657.

In Filley v. Fassett, 44 Mo. 176, 100 Am. Dec. 275, it was said the books are full of authorities establishing the proposition that any contrivance, design, device, name, symbol, or other thing may be employed as a trade-mark, which is adapted to accomplish the object proposed by it; that is, to point out the true source and origin of the goods to which said mark is applied, or even to point out and designate a dealer's place of business, distinguishing it from the business locality of other dealers. The mark, however, must possess the requisite characteristics, pointing out the source and origin of the goods, and not be merely descriptive of the style, quality, or character of the goods themselves. Nicholson v. Wm. A. Stickney Cigar Co., 59 S. W. 121, 122, 158 Mo. 158.

A name merely descriptive of an article of trade, of its qualities, ingredients, or characteristics, cannot be employed as a trade-mark, and the exercise of it be entitled to legal protection. Coffman v. Castner, 87 Fed. 457, 460, 31 C. C. A. 55.

Any symbol or device not previously appropriated and affixed by a manufacturer to his own product to distinguish it from articles of the same general nature manufactured or sold by others, and thus secure to himself the benefits of increased sale by reason of any peculiar excellence he may have given to it, is a trade-mark. The symbol or device thus becomes a sign to the public of the origin of the goods to which it is attached, and an assurance that they are the genuine article of the original producer. But in the exercise of the right to establish a trade-mark there are certain limitations which must be observed. No property can be acquired in any word, mark, or device which denotes merely the nature, kind, or quality of an article. Appeal of Laughman, 18 Atl. 415, 417, 128 Pa. 1, 5 L. R. A. 599.

A trade-mark may consist of some novel device, arbitrary character, or fancy word, applied without special meaning, which by use and reputation comes to serve a special purpose. Such words and devices are held to indicate sufficiently the true source and origin of the goods to which the trade-mark is applied, without particular addition of the name of the manufacturer or dealer. Words, however, which are merely descriptive of the kind, nature, character, or quality of the goods, cannot be exclusively appropriated and protected as a trade-mark. Title to a trade-mark is acquired and retained by appropriation and use. Listman Mill Co. v. William Listman Milling Co., 60 N. W. 261, 262, 88 Wis. 334, 43 Am. St. Rep. 907.

"A trade-mark does not embrace a name alone, when it is applied to designate, not the article of a particular maker or seller, but the kind or description of the thing which is being sold." Leclanche Battery Co. v. Western Electric Co. (U. S.) 23 Fed. 276, 277.

The tendency of the later decisions in this country has been to narrow the use of the term "trade-mark" to its proper significance as an arbitrary symbol affixed by a manufacturer or merchant to a vendible commodity, and to exclude from use as such symbol words merely descriptive or generic, or merely expressive of quality, and also to exclude from designation as such labels, advertisements, signs, and the form, size, and general appearance of package of merchandise. The words "liver medicine," being purely descriptive, cannot be appropriated as a trade-mark. The name "Simmons" cannot be appropriated as a trade-mark, when it has become merely descriptive of medicine prepared under the formula of a Dr. Simmons, and is used by many people in connection with such medicine. C. F. Simmons Medicine Co. v. Mansfield Drug Co., 23 S. W. 165, 175, 93 Tenn. 84.

A trade-mark is a symbol arbitrarily selected by a manufacturer or dealer and attached to his wares to indicate that they are his wares. In selecting such a device he must avoid words merely descriptive of the article or its qualities, or such as have become so by use in connection with known articles of commerce. Cady v. Schultz, 32 Atl. 915, 916, 19 R. I. 193, 29 L. R. A. 524, 61 Am. St. Rep. 763.

Name of periodical.

A trade-mark, as applied to a periodical for publication, is somewhat different from the mark, name, or symbol by which the products of a particular merchant may become known. Names, however, which are ordinarily used to make periodicals, magazines, and newspapers known to the public, are governed by the same general principles which apply to a trade-mark actually affixed to an article of manufacture and sale, and adopted to denote origin and ownership. Forney v. Engineering News & Publishing Co., 57 Hun, 588, 10 N. Y. Supp. 814; Commercial Advertiser Ass'n v. Haynes, 26 App. Div. 279, 49 N. Y. Supp. 938; Social Register Ass'n v. Howard (U. S.) 60 Fed. 270. A property right in a name to a periodical undoubtedly exists, and no one has a right to use that name in connection with a similar publication. Gannett v. Ruppert (U. S.) 119 Fed. 221, 222.

Trade-name distinguished.

The trade-name differs from the trade-mark in this: that one appeals to the ear more than to the eye. N. K. Fairbank Co. v. Luckel, King & Cake Soap Co. (U. S.) 102 Fed. 327, 331, 42 C. C. A. 376.

The use of a trade-name is in some respects different from that of a trade-mark. The latter usually relates to the thing sold, while in addition to this the former includes the source from which it comes and the individuality of the maker, both for protection and trade, and for avoiding confusion in business affairs, as well as for securing to him the advantage as any good reputation which he may have gained. The law of trade-mark is designed chiefly for the protection of the public; that of a trade-name for the protection of the party entitled thereto. A case, therefore, in regard to trade-name, is of somewhat broader scope than one relating to a trade-mark. Armington v. Palmer, 42 Atl. 308, 311, 21 R. I. 109, 43 L. R. A. 95, 79 Am. St. Rep. 786.

A trade-name is of a different character from a trade-mark. It is descriptive of the manufacturer or dealer himself as much as his own name is, and frequently, like the names of business corporations, includes the name of the place where the business is located. If attached to goods, it is designed to say plainly what a trade-mark only indicates by association and use. The employment of such a name is subject to the same rules which apply to the use of one's name of birth or baptism. Two persons may bear the same name, and each may use it in his business, but not so as to deceive the public and induce customers to mistake one for the other. The use of one's own name is unlawful, if exercised fraudulently to attract custom from another bearer of it. Trade-marks, properly so called, may be violated by accident or ignorance. The law protects them, nevertheless, as property. Names which are not trade-marks, strictly speaking, may be protected likewise, if they are taken with fraudulent intention, and if they are so used as to be likely to affect such intention. Cady v. Schultz, 32 Atl. 915, 916, 19 R. I. 193, 29 L. R. A. 524, 61 Am. St. Rep. 763.

The trade-name of an established enterprise is regarded as of importance, and the right to its exclusive use generally recognized. It is not in the nature of a trade-mark, and of necessity is closely connected with the good will. It is the designation by which the company is known and addressed by its patrons. Millsbaugh Laundry v. First Nat. Bank, 94 N. W. 262, 263, 120 Iowa, 1.

TRADE-MARK MEDICINE.

"Trade-mark medicine" must be held to be medicine as to which a similar monopoly to that of patent and proprietary medicines has been secured, by the use of a trade-mark or trade-name under which it is prepared and sold. Examples are to be found in such medical compounds, familiar on account of the extensive way in which they are advertised, as Castoria, Peruna, St. Jacob's Oil, and a hundred others. Johnson & Johnson v. Rutan (U. S.) 122 Fed. 993, 998.

TRADE-NAME.

Trade-mark distinguished, see "Trade-Mark."

TRADER—TRADESMAN.

See "Itinerant Dealer or Trader."

A "trader" is a dealer in buying or selling, or barter. Brown Mfg. Co. v. Deering, 35 W. Va. 255, 258, 13 S. E. 383 (citing Webst.).

A trader is one who makes it his business to buy merchandise or goods and chattels, and to sell the same for the purpose of making profit. In re Surety Guarantee & Trust Co. (U. S.) 121 Fed. 73, 74, 56 C. C. A. 654.

A trader is defined in Bouvier's Law Dictionary as one who makes it his business to buy merchandise or goods and chattels and to sell the same for the purpose of making a profit. The word is defined in Black's Law Dictionary as one whose business it is to buy and sell merchandise or any class of goods, deriving a profit from his dealings; and the weight of authority seems to be that the proper description of the business of a trader includes both buying and selling either goods or merchandise or other goods ordinarily the subject of traffic. In re New York & W. Water Co. (U. S.) 98 Fed. 711, 713 (citing Sutton v. Wheeley, 7 East, 442, Wakeman v. Hoyt [U. S.] 28 Fed. Cas. 1350, 1351, In re Chandler [U. S.] 5 Fed. Cas. 447, In re Smith [U. S.] 22 Fed. Cas. 395, Love v. Love [U. S.] 15 Fed. Cas. 996, 999, and quoted in Re Pacific Coast Warehouse Co. [U. S.] 123 Fed. 749, 750).

The usual meaning of "trader" is "one who buys and sells goods; one who makes it his business to buy merchandise, goods, and chattels, and sell the same for the purpose of making a profit." In re Minnesota & A. Const. Co. (Ariz.) 60 Pac. 881, 884.

In Re New York & W. Water Co. (U. S.) 98 Fed. 711, it was held that the business of a trader includes both buying and selling goods or merchandise which are ordinarily the subject of traffic. Thus a company which agrees to sell diamonds on the installment plan, giving the purchaser the option to take the diamonds or a sum of money on completion of the payments, and which had never purchased, owned, or delivered any diamonds, is not engaged in trading pursuits.

In re Tontine Surety Co. (D. C.) 116 Fed. 401, 402.

A trader is one engaged in trade or commerce; one who makes a business of buying and selling, or of barter; a merchant. One who was engaged in a general mercantile business was a trader, within Code, c. 100, § 13, providing that "if any person shall transact business as a trader, with the addition of the words 'factor,' 'agent,' and 'company,' and fail to disclose the name of his principal or partner," all of the property, stock, or choses in action acquired or used in such business shall be liable for the debts of such person. Morris v. Clifton Forge Grocery Co., 32 S. E. 997, 998, 46 W. Va. 197.

Where a stock of goods was set apart as an exemption, and the head of the family, without an order of court, continued to carry on a mercantile business, and sold the goods, and bought other goods with the proceeds, and still others on credit extended by merchants who had notice of the exemption, the head of the family is not, and cannot be as such, a "trader" within the meaning of the insolvent trader's act (Civ. Code, §§ 2716, 2722). Powers v. Rosenblatt, 38 S. E. 969, 113 Ga. 559.

One who bought and sold lumber, bought clay and made and sold bricks, and received and sold mowing machines on commission, was a "trader." Huston v. Goudy, 37 Atl. 881, 882, 90 Me. 128.

The word "tradesmen," as used in Pub. Laws 1891, relating to preferences for services, means persons who work at a trade, and probably also includes in the general phrase all the various kinds of skilled labor which are not specifically named in the earlier part of the act; but, in order to entitle a tradesman to the preference of the act, he must be hired, and not carry on an independent business. Steininger v. Butler, 17 Pa. Co. Ct. R. 97, 99.

Auctioneer.

A licensed auctioneer, going from town to town in a public stagecoach, and sending goods by public wagons, and selling the same on commission, by retail, or by auction at the different towns, is a "trading person," within the meaning of St. 50 Geo. III, c. 41, § 6, and must take out a hawker's and peddler's license. Rex v. Turner, 4 Barn. & Ald. 520.

Baker.

A person whose occupation is that of a baker, and who buys flour which he converts into bread, and then sells the bread to daily customers, is to be deemed a "tradesman," within the meaning of Bankr. Act 1867, § 29, and therefore not entitled to a discharge, where he has kept no books of account whatever. In re Cocks (U. S.) 5 Fed. Cas. 1154.

Clerk.

A clerk who had, within a few weeks before his bankruptcy, bought a carriage and sleigh, two pair of horses, a harness, and some cigars, and sold them again, but who had shown no intention to trade generally, and had not bought for the purpose of selling again, was not a "tradesman," within Bankr. Act 1867, § 29. In re Rogers (U. S.) 20 Fed. Cas. 1104.

Cigarmakers' union.

A cigar makers' international union which neither makes nor sells cigars, but directs its attention to cigar makers and seeks to promote the mental, moral, and physical welfare of its members, is not a "trader," and can have no distinctive trade-mark. McVey v. Brendel (Pa.) 29 Wkly. Notes Cas. 1, 5, 6.

Common carrier.

A trader, within the meaning of the bankruptcy act, does not include the business of a common carrier. Mining comes nearer to trading than does the business of a carrier, but a mining company has generally been held to be excluded from the scope of the bankruptcy act. In re Elk Park Min. & Mill. Co. (U. S.) 101 Fed. 422; In re Keystone Coal Co. (U. S.) 109 Fed. 872. A theatrical company has been held not susceptible of bankruptcy. In re Oriental Society (U. S.) 104 Fed. 975. Nor is a water company which buys and sells water as a part of its regular business. In re New York & W. Water Co. (U. S.) 98 Fed. 711. A saloon is excluded. In re Chesapeake Oyster & Fish Co. (U. S.) 112 Fed. 960. And a club. In re Fulton Club (U. S.) 113 Fed. 997. Almost directly in point is the decision of the District Court of the Eastern District of Pennsylvania in Philadelphia & L. Transp. Co. (U. S.) 114 Fed. 403. In re H. J. Quimby Freight Forwarding Co. (U. S.) 121 Fed. 139, 140.

Contractor.

One who contracts with a railroad company to grade and build its road is not, by virtue of such contract and his acts under it, a "trader," within Bankr. Act 1867 (14 Stat. 536) § 39, and the suspension of his commercial paper is not, therefore, an act of bankruptcy. The most usual meaning of trader is one who buys and sells goods. In a writ, or deed, or indictment, it would not be regular to describe one as a trader, whose business it was to build or undertake works upon the land of other people. Bouvier, in his Law Dictionary, defines "trader" as one who makes it his business to buy merchandise or goods and chattels, and to sell the same for the purpose of making a profit. The word "trader" is the exact equivalent of the phrase "any person using the trade of merchandise in gross or by retail." In re Smith (U. S.) 22 Fed. Cas. 394, 395.

Dealer.

A "trader" is one engaged in trade or in the business of buying and selling, and the term is synonymous with "dealer." State v. Barnes, 85 S. E. 605, 606, 126 N. C. 1063.

Farmer.

If a man exercise a manufacture from the produce of his own land as a necessary or general mode of reaping or enjoying that produce and bringing it advantageously to market, he is not a "trader," though he buy the necessary ingredients and materials to fit it for market. But where the produce of the land is merely the raw material of a manufacture, and used as such, and not according to the usual mode of enjoying the land—in short, where the produce of the land is an insignificant article in comparison with the whole expense of the manufacture—there he ought to be considered as a trader. Wells v. Parker, 1 Term R. 84, 38.

In Rev. St. § 5110, forbidding a discharge in bankruptcy to certain classes of persons, if the applicant has not kept proper books of account, the word "tradesman" should not be deemed to include all persons who buy and sell, but persons habitually in a business of buying and selling, such as is usually understood to require keeping books of account. As this section is penal, it should be confined to persons clearly within its objects and policy. A discharge should not be refused to a farmer because he occasionally bought stock or produce to sell again, and did not keep systematic books. In re Cote (U. S.) 6 Fed. Cas. 614, 615.

The words "trader" and "tradesman," are not synonymous, and as used in the bankrupt law ("trader," in the provision relative to stopping payment of commercial paper; and "tradesman," in that requiring keeping books of account) they denote somewhat different vocations. "Trader" may mean any one who makes a business of trading; but "tradesman" should be limited to shopkeeper, one who keeps a building for trading, and does not include one whose business was farming, and buying and selling live stock, though it may extend to a working artisan or mechanic. In re Ragsdale (U. S.) 20 Fed. Cas. 1334.

Furniture dealer.

Where a bankrupt, for a year before filing his petition, was engaged in the business of buying and selling furniture on his own account, having a shop where his goods were displayed and sold, he was a "merchant or tradesman," under Bankr. Act 1867, § 29, requiring a merchant or tradesman to keep proper books of account in order to be entitled to a discharge in bankruptcy. In re Newman (U. S.) 18 Fed. Cas. 96, 97.

Live stock dealer.

A bankrupt, who is engaged in farming and trading live stock, is not a "tradesman," within the meaning of Rev. St. U. S. § 5110, providing that a merchant or tradesman shall not be discharged in bankruptcy who has failed to keep proper books of account. Primarily, the word "tradesman" means one who trades, as does also the word "trader," and they have been treated by courts in many instances as synonymous. But in their general application and usage they describe different vocations. By "tradesman" is usually meant a shopkeeper. Such is the definition given the word in Burrill's Law Dictionary. It is used in this sense by Adam Smith. He says (Wealth of Nations): "A tradesman in London is obliged to hire a whole house in that part of the town where his customers live. His shop is on the ground floor." Dr. Johnson gives the same meaning. In re Ragsdale (U. S.) 20 Fed. Cas. 175.

One who is engaged in farming and trading live stock may be designated as a "trader." Primarily the words "trader" and "tradesman" mean one who trades, and they have been treated by the courts to be in many instances as synonymous, but in their general application and usage they describe different vocations. By "tradesman" is usually meant a shopkeeper. In re Ragsdale (U. S.) 20 Fed. Cas. 175.

"Trader," as used in the bankrupt act, relating to bankruptcy of a manufacturer and trader, embraces a wide field of operation. It is of no consequence in what one may trade. The only question is, does he buy and sell articles which are subject to trade and commerce. In re Cowles (U. S.) 6 Fed. Cas. 672. Selling horses or other stock, or the products of a farmer, does not constitute him a trader, within the meaning of the act. If a farmer buys horses or other stock, or products of another farmer to sell again, and this constitutes a part of his business, he then becomes a trader, and subjects himself to the provisions of the bankrupt act. In re Kenyon, 1 Utah, 47, 49 (citing In re Chandler [U. S.] 5 Fed. Cas. 447).

A person who in the course of a few months is engaged with another in purchasing 100 cattle, and sells them to the proprietor of an establishment for canning beef, in pursuance of a previous contract with such proprietor, is a "trader," within the meaning of that term in Rev. St. c. 70, § 44, relating to insolvency, requiring a trader to keep a cash book. A trader is one who sells goods substantially in the form in which they are bought. Any general definition of the word "trader" would fail to suit all cases. Each case has its peculiarities. We are to look to the object to be attained by the requirement that the trader shall keep a cash book. Sylvester v. Edgecomb, 76 Me. 499, 500.

"Tradesman," as used in Rev. St. U. S. § 5110, providing that a merchant or tradesman should not be discharged in bankruptcy who had not kept books of account, cannot be fairly stretched to mean "trader," in the large sense of the old bankrupt law, and does not include a farmer who occasionally bought and sold horses, cattle, and hay. In both England and the United States, the word "tradesman" has most often been used as synonymous with "shopkeeper," and not seldom as a person who supplies daily or occasional wants, as a butcher or baker, or even a plumber or carpenter, whether he keeps a shop or not. But in both countries it is a signification much more restricted than that given to "trader" in the old bankrupt law. The word might in many connections be used in the sense of any man who trades, but it is doubtful if that is at the present time its usual signification, and whether it has that meaning in the section in question. The meaning of "tradesman" is substantially the same as "shopkeeper." In re Cote (U. S.) 6 Fed. Cas. 614, 615.

Persons who are engaged in buying and selling cattle, butchering, and farming some, their business amounting to from $2,000 to $3,000 a year, the bulk of which was in the buying and selling and butchering of the cattle, and the farming merely incidental, are "tradesmen," within the meaning of the bankrupt law, denying the right of discharge of tradesmen who do not keep proper books of account. In re Bassett (U. S.) 8 Fed. 266, 269.

Livery stable keeper.

"Trader," as used in Insolvent Law 1878, § 42, which declares that the debtor shall not be discharged if, being a merchant or trader, he does not after the passage of the act keep a cash book and other proper books of account, includes a livery stable keeper. Groves v. Kilgore, 72 Me. 489, 490.

A person who keeps in a stable horses belonging to other persons, and feeds such horses with food which he buys, and receives pay for the food which such horses consume, in the amount paid for keeping the horses on livery, and sells the food, is a merchant or tradesman within Rev. St. U. S. § 5110, subd. 7, in respect to the discharge of a bankrupt. In re Odell (U. S.) 18 Fed. Cas. 574.

A trader is a person engaged in buying and selling articles of merchandise, and does not include a livery stable keeper. Hall v. Cooley (U. S.) 11 Fed. Cas. 217, 218.

Lumber dealer.

We have found no American decisions directly upon the point as to what constitutes a trader within the bankruptcy act, but the decisions are numerous under the English bankrupt act of 1825. Under that act a person engaged in the manufacture and sale of lumber would be regarded as a trader. The commercial definition of a trader is one who makes it his business to buy merchandise or things ordinarily the subjects of commerce and traffic. In re Cowles (U. S.) 6 Fed. Cas. 672, 674.

Manager of steamer.

Rev. St. § 5110, cl. 7, providing that no bankrupt, being a "merchant or tradesman," shall be discharged from his debts who has not kept proper books of account, cannot be construed to include a person superintending the running of a steamer, and who, as treasurer of the corporation owning her, received and disbursed the moneys earned by the steamer. In re Merritt (U. S.) 7 Fed. 853, 854.

Manufacturer.

An insolvent debtor, who for several years prior to his petition in insolvency was engaged in purchasing small parcels of timber lands and timber growth, cutting and removing timber there, or manufacturing the same at his mill into staves and headings, constructing the materials into barrels, the business involving the employment of several men, and a capital of $1,800, is a "trader," within the meaning of the insolvent law, and not entitled to a discharge unless he has kept books of account. In re Merryfield, 18 Atl. 891, 892, 80 Me. 233.

"Trader," as used in Revenue Act 1877, c. 156, § 12, providing that any trader carrying on the business of buying or selling goods, wares, or merchandise, of whatever name or description, shall pay a certain privilege tax, means one who sells goods substantially in the form in which they are bought; the difference between the sums paid and received constituting the profit of the business. A trader is one engaged in trade, or in the business of buying and selling. One who carries on the business of buying timber and converting it into lumber for sale is not a trader, but rather a manufacturer. State v. Chabourn, 80 N. C. 479, 481, 30 Am. Rep. 94.

The important fact, in determining whether a person is a "trader or merchant," within the meaning of Act 1878, § 42, declaring that a debtor should not be discharged if, being a "merchant or trader," he had not kept a cash book, is whether such person, being a seller, is also a buyer. To constitute a trader, it is not necessary that he should sell the articles in the same condition as when he bought them. A butcher who buys cattle and sells beef, a shoemaker who buys leather and sells shoes, a baker who buys his meal and sells bread, a brick-maker who buys his earth and sells bricks, a carriage maker who buys his material and sells carriages, are held to be traders within the bankrupt and insolvent laws. Groves v. Kilgore, 72 Me. 489, 490.

Act April 22, 1843, exempting from execution the "necessary tools of a tradesman," does not exempt the printing or stamping blocks of a printer of oilcloth, costing from $1,000 to $1,500, used in the business, requiring peculiar and extensive buildings, numerous workmen, and some capital. The word "tradesman," as here used, should be construed to mean the poor handicraftsman, whose needs it was intended to provide for, and not to extend to a person who is rather to be denominated as a "manufacturer." Richie v. McCauley, 4 Pa. (4 Barr) 471, 472.

A stair builder, who bought lumber and other materials, and by the labor of workmen employed by him wrought such materials into stairs for persons who gave him orders, and received as compensation from such persons a gross price for stairs delivered complete, was a "merchant or tradesman," within the meaning of the bankrupt act, relating to the keeping of books, and he was none the less a tradesman because he was also a manufacturer of the stairs, or because he did not resell the lumber and other materials in the same state in which he bought them. In re Garrison (U. S.) 10 Fed. Cas. 49.

The word "tradesman," as used in the federal bankrupt act, has a very limited signification. The English authorities hold that a man who owned land, or a man who rented land and held it for a term of years, and carried on the business of brickmaking as a means of realizing the profits to be derived from his land, is not a tradesman, and they have said that the act refers to smaller merchants or tradesmen, or a shopkeeper; and this was the meaning put upon the term by Lowell, J., in the case of In re Cote (U. S.) 6 Fed. Cas. 614, when he said that the term referred "only to the smaller class of merchants." In re Stickney (U. S.) 23 Fed. Cas. 77, 79.

The owner of timber lands, who cuts the trees and manufactures them into lumber for sale as means of realizing profit from his real estate, is not thereby rendered a "trader" under the bankruptcy laws; but where timber lands are purchased for the purpose of manufacturing and selling lumber, and in connection with the purchase of the land, were bought a large quantity of sawed lumber for sale, such purchasers become traders. Hall v. Cooley (U. S.) 11 Fed. Cas. 217, 218.

Merchant distinguished.

See "Merchant."

Miller.

One who in connection with a partner is operating a flouring mill, buying wheat, grinding it into flour, and selling it for a profit, and also operating a warehouse, receiving in store and buying and selling grain, is a "trader," under any definition of that somewhat indefinite term. Daniels v. Palmer, 29 N. W. 162, 164, 35 Minn. 347 (citing Newland v. Bell, Holt, N. P. 222; King v. Simmonds, 1 H. L. Cas. 754; In re Ryan [U. S.] 21 Fed. Cas. 105; In re Smith [U. S.] 22 Fed. Cas. 394; In re Elles, 5 Law Rep. 273; Wakeman v. Hoyt, Id. 309; Bouv. Law Dict.).

Oil land owner.

The owner of oil lands, who divides it into leaseholds and receives the rent in oil, is not a trader within Bankr. Act 1867 (14 Stat. 517). In re Woods (U. S.) 30 Fed. Cas. 529, 530.

Physician.

Code, § 2031, declaring that the accounts of merchants, tradesmen, and mechanics, which by custom become due at the end of the year, bear interest, etc., should be construed to include physicians, though the word "tradesmen" does not, perhaps, ordinarily cover physicians, but they have a trade, an art, a mystery. They usually give it a more dignified name, to wit, profession; but as time rolls on and new ways come in, we have professors of dancing and almost every other occupation. One of the definitions of "trade" given by Webster is the business a man has learned by which he earns his livelihood, which is within the true meaning of the word "tradesman." Woodfield v. Colzey, 47 Ga. 121, 124.

Saloon keeper.

The words "tradesmen or merchants," within Rev. St. § 5110, subd. 7, requiring merchants or tradesmen to keep proper books of account as a condition to a discharge in bankruptcy, includes a person whose only regular business is keeping a saloon and selling there for cash and on credit at retail liquors and cigars. In re Sherwood (U. S.) 21 Fed. Cas. 1285.

An innkeeper, or retail dealer of liquor, is a trader, within Bankr. Act 1867. In re Ryan (U. S.) 21 Fed. Cas. 105. But see, In re Chesapeake Oyster & Fish Co. (U. S.) 112 Fed. 960, 961.

Smuggler.

A smuggler may be a "trader," within St. 1 Jac. I, c. 15, § 2, as being a person who seeks his trade or living by buying and selling, although such buying and selling be illegal. Cobb v. Symonds, 5 Barn. & Ald. 516.

Speculator in grain and stocks.

"Merchant or tradesman," as used in Bankr. Act 1867 (14 Stat. 517), authorizing bankruptcy proceedings to be brought against a person, being a merchant or tradesman, although, according to the lexicons, generally meaning a person engaged in buying and selling, and therefore would include a person engaged in the business of buying and selling grain, yet such term could not be extended to include a person engaged in buying and selling stocks with a view to his own profit, to be made by the excess of the selling price over the buying price, where he kept no office, did not act as commission broker for others in buying and selling stocks, and his buying and selling was done through brokers, who purchased in their own names but for his account, they paying for the stocks with their own funds and the bankrupt being their debtor for the amounts paid; and yet a clergyman or a physician or a lawyer might carry on the same business in the same way in addition to his regular professional business, and no one would call him, in consequence thereof, a merchant or tradesman. In re Marston, 16 Fed. Cas. 857.

The words "merchant or tradesman" involve the idea of a dealing with merchandise in some form or other. In their ordinary and natural signification they do not include one who makes profits by buying and selling shares and speculation, whether for himself or for others. Such a person would not in ordinary parlance be said to be engaged in trade. In re Woodward (U. S.) 30 Fed. Cas. 542, 543.

A trader is one who makes it his business to buy merchandise, or goods and chattels, and to sell the same for the purpose of making a profit. A person who, outside his regular business, from time to time buys and sells mining stock, is not thereby made a trader. Ex parte Conant, 77 Me. 275, 277, 52 Am. Rep. 759.

Theatrical manager or society.

The Revised Statutes of the United States, relating to the keeping of proper books of account by a "merchant or tradesman," who becomes bankrupt, cannot be construed to include a theatrical manager, who had no other business, who bought costumes, machinery, etc., for use in his business, and also on a few occasions had sold some such property. In re Duff (U. S.) 4 Fed. 519, 521.

A "trader" is one who either sells, or buys and sells. The term does not include a theatrical society, which merely gives performances of one kind or another, to which the public are attracted by the skill of the performers, so that such a society cannot be adjudged an involuntary bankrupt under Bankr. Act July 1, 1898, § 4b, 30 Stat. 547, c.

541 [U. S. Comp St. 1901, p. 3423]. The skill of such performers is not sold. It is merely exhibited for hire. The fact that the society must buy scenery and stage appliances and furniture, which it may afterwards sell again, is of no importance. In re Oriental Soc. (U. S.) 104 Fed. 975.

Traveling salesman.

The term "clerk, laborer, or tradesman," in a statute giving a preference out of a fund raised by execution against his employer to a clerk, laborer, or tradesman, does not include a traveling salesman who sells on commission for a furniture manufacturer. Witmer v. Miller, 12 Pa. Co. Ct. R. 363, 364.

Trust company.

A trust company, engaged in buying and selling stocks, bonds, and other securities, is not a "trader" within the bankruptcy act. In re Surety Guarantee & Trust Co. (U. S.) 121 Fed. 73, 75, 56 C. C. A. 654.

TRADING.

The word "trading" may have meanings which vary with its different applications. In laws concerning navigation, every vessel carrying a cargo or passengers may, in general, be considered as trading. United States v. The Ohio (Pa.) 9 Phila. 448, 460.

A vessel licensed for fisheries is engaged in a "trade other than that for which she is licensed" when she takes on board goods with intent to transport them on an illicit voyage, such act constituting a trading. The Two Friends (U. S.) 24 Fed. Cas. 433, 434 (citing The Active v. United States, 11 U. S. [7 Cranch] 100, 3 L. Ed. 232).

"Trading, dealing, and trafficking" within the meaning of a statute providing that no person shall trade, deal, and traffic in this state as a peddler, hawker, or petty chapman in any foreign goods, wares, and merchandise, characterizes the act of carrying about and offering such goods for sale. Merriam v. Langdon, 10 Conn. 460, 471.

TRADING CAR.

Code 1880, § 585, imposing a tax for the privilege of running a trading car, cannot be construed to include a car which a railroad company runs over its track, supplied with provisions and clothing suitable for the wants of its employes, delivering such supplies to its laborers in payment of the wages due them, selling to no other persons, and not to the laborers, except in payment of wages. Vicksburg & M. R. Co. v. State, 62 Miss. 105, 107.

TRADING CORPORATION.

A trading corporation is a commercial corporation engaged in buying and selling.

The word "trading" is a much narrower word than "business," when applied to corporations, and, though a trading corporation is also a business corporation, a business corporation may properly be any corporation organized for the furtherance of private transactions. Dartmouth College v. Woodward, 17 U. S. (4 Wheat.) 518, 669, 4 L. Ed. 629; Adams v. Boston, H. & E. R. Co. (U. S.) 1 Fed. Cas. 90, 92.

Boarding stable.

A corporation, the principal business of which is conducting boarding stables wherein it boards horses for its customers, including the complete care of them, and also the care of wagons and carriages, harness, etc., is engaged principally in trading or mercantile pursuits, within Insolvency Act 1898, § 4b, and therefore may be adjudged an involuntary bankrupt. In re Morton Boarding Stables (U. S.) 108 Fed. 791, 794 (following In re Odell [U. S.] 18 Fed. Cas. 574).

Construction company.

A trader is one who buys and sells goods; one who makes it his business to buy merchandise, goods, and chattels, and sells the same for the purpose of making profit; so that a corporation organized to construct railroads, turnpikes, ditches, etc., which temporarily furnished its employes with groceries, clothing, etc., was not a person engaged in trading or mercantile pursuits, within the meaning of Bankr. Act July 1, 1898, c. 541, § 4, 30 Stat. 547 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3423]. In re Minnesota & A. Const. Co. (Ariz.) 60 Pac. 881, 884.

Educational institution.

The fact that an educational institution may acquire and convey property necessary to the accomplishment of its object, and may charge tuition for instruction, does not render it a business or trading corporation. McLeod v. Lincoln Medical College of Cotner University (Neb.) 96 N. W. 265, 268.

Hospital.

A private hospital conducted for profit is a trading corporation. In re San Gabriel Sanatorium Co. (U. S.) 95 Fed. 271, 273.

Laundry.

A corporation engaged in laundry business is not engaged in either trading or mercantile business, within the meaning of the bankruptcy act. In re White Star Laundry Co. (U. S.) 117 Fed. 570, 571.

Mining corporation.

A mining corporation is not a trading or manufacturing corporation, within the meaning of Bankr. Act July 1, 1898, c. 541, § 4b, 30 Stat. 547 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p.

3428], providing that a petition in involuntary bankruptcy may be maintained against corporations engaged principally in manufacturing, trading, or mercantile pursuits. In re Elk Park Min. & Mill. Co. (U. S.) 101 Fed. 422, 423.

A corporation engaged principally in buying and selling ore is engaged in trading, within the meaning of Bankr. Act July 1, 1898, c. 541, § 4b, 30 Stat. 547 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3423]. In re Chicago Joplin Lead & Zinc Co. (U. S.) 104 Fed. 67, 68.

Public warehouse.

A corporation conducting a public warehouse, in which it receives and stores grain and other merchandise for hire, issuing receipts therefor, is not engaged in trading or mercantile pursuits, and is not subject to be adjudged an involuntary bankrupt. In re Pacific Coast Warehouse Co. (U. S.) 123 Fed. 749.

Saloon and restaurant.

A corporation engaged in running a saloon and restaurant is not a mercantile or trading corporation, within Bankr. Act July 1, 1898, c. 541, § 4b, 30 Stat. 547 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3423], describing corporations which may be adjudged involuntary bankrupts. In re Chesapeake Oyster & Fish Co. (U. S.) 112 Fed. 960, 961.

Water company.

The business of a water company is not a trading or mercantile pursuit, although it is authorized to buy, sell, use, and deal in water for manufacturing purposes, within the meaning of Bankr. Act July 1, 1898, c. 541, § 4b, 30 Stat. 547 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3423]. In re New York & W. Water Co. (U. S.) 98 Fed. 711, 713.

TRADING PARTNERSHIP.

Wherever the business, according to the usual modes of conducting it, imports, in its nature, the necessity of buying and selling, the firm is then properly regarded as a trading partnership, and is invested with all the powers, and subject to all the obligations, incident to that relation. Dowling v. National Exch. Bank of Boston, 12 Sup. Ct. 928, 930, 145 U. S. 512, 36 L. Ed. 795; Schellenbeck v. Studebaker, 41 N. E. 845, 847, 13 Ind. App. 437, 55 Am. St. Rep. 240; Kimbro v. Bullitt, 63 U. S. (22 How.) 256, 268, 16 L. Ed. 313; Masterson v. Mansfield, 61 S. W. 506, 507, 25 Tex. Civ. App. 262; Randall v. Merideth, 13 S. W. 576, 582, 76 Tex. 669. If the partnership contemplates periodical or continuous or frequent purchases, not as incidental to the occupation, but for the purpose of selling again the thing purchased, either in its original or manufactured state, it is a trading partnership.

otherwise it is not. Huey v. Fish, 40 S. W. 29, 32, 15 Tex. Civ. App. 455 (citing Bates, Partn. 327); Randall v. Merideth, 13 S. W. 576, 76 Tex. 669; Phillips v. Stanzell (Tex.) 28 S. W. 900, 902; Masterson v. Mansfield, 61 S. W. 505, 507, 25 Tex. Civ. App. 262.

TRADING VOYAGE.

"Trading voyage," as used in shipping articles for a voyage from Boston to the Pacific, Indian, and Chinese Oceans or elsewhere on a trading voyage, points to a commerce by buying and selling on account of the original owners and shippers, and not to the intermediate transportation of cargoes and freight. The latter employment is usually denominated a "freighting," and not a "trading," voyage. Brown v. Jones (U. S.) 4 Fed. Cas. 404, 406.

TRADING WITH ENEMY.

"Trading," as used in reference to trading with an enemy, does not mean that signification of the term which consists in negotiation or contract, but the object, policy, and spirit of the rule is to cut off all communication or actual locomotive intercourse between individuals of the belligerent states. Negotiation of contract, therefore, has no connection with the offense. Intercourse inconsistent with actual hostility is the offense against which the operation of the rule is directed; and this definition may be substituted for that of trading with an enemy. A citizen of the United States who withdraws his property acquired before the war from the enemy's country after he has full knowledge of the war, without the permission of the government, is engaged in trading with the enemy, subjecting the property engaged therein to confiscation. The word "trading" is used in the sense of "negotium" or "negotiation." The Rapid, 12 U. S. (8 Oranch) 155, 162, 3 L. Ed. 520; Id. (U. S.) 20 Fed. Cas. 297, 300.

TRADITION.

Tradition is knowledge, belief, or practices transmitted orally from father to son or from ancestors to posterity. In re Hurlburt's Estate, 35 Atl. 77, 81, 68 Vt. 366, 85 L. R. A. 794.

The word "tradition," in reference to the admission of tradition or general reputation to prove boundaries, etc., in common sense and in law must mean that which is derived from the declarations of those who live or were living at a time, if not ancient, at least comparatively remote. Thus, evidence that a certain tree was understood to be a corner tree in 1886 is not admissible as a tradition. Westfelt v. Adams, 42 S. E. 823, 825, 131 N. C. 379.

The tradition or delivery is the transferring of the thing sold into the power and possession of the buyer. Civ. Code La. 1900, art. 2477.

TRAFFIC—TRAFFICKING.

"Traffic" is the buying of something from another or the selling of something to another. In re Cameron Town Mut. Fire Lightning & Windstorm Ins. Co. (U. S.) 96 Fed. 756, 757.

Traffic is either state or interstate traffic, according to its origin and destination. It is shipped by the consignor in the state where the consignee dwells, or it is not. If not, it is interstate traffic. Ft. Worth & D. C. Ry. Co. v. Whitehead, 26 S. W. 172, 173, 6 Tex. Civ. App. 595.

Webster defines the word "traffic" to mean "to sell; to buy; to trade; to pass goods and commodities from one person to another for an equivalent in goods or money." The meaning of such word is so well understood that, in a prosecution for keeping open a liquor saloon for "traffic" on Sunday, the charge of the court that, if the jury believed defendant kept a saloon open for the purpose of traffic on Sunday, he should be convicted, and that the term "traffic," as employed, has its usual and commonly accepted meaning, was sufficient without a further definition of the word. Levine v. State, 34 S. W. 969, 970, 35 Tex. Cr. R. 647.

"Trafficking in liquors" is defined by Laws 1896, c. 112, § 2, as meaning sales of liquor in quantities of less than five gallons. People v. Hamilton, 39 N. Y. Supp. 531, 536, 17 Misc. Rep. 11.

"Trafficking," as used in Laws 1896, c. 112, § 31, forbidding the trafficking in liquors without a liquor tax certificate, is equivalent to the word "sales," as used in the act of 1892 prohibiting sales of liquor without a license. People v. Hamilton, 39 N. Y. Supp. 531, 536, 17 Misc. Rep. 11.

"Trafficking, trading, and dealing" within the meaning of a statute providing that no person shall trade, deal, and traffic in this state as a peddler, hawker, or petty chapman in any foreign goods, wares, and merchandise, characterizes the act of carrying about and offering such goods for sale. Merriam v. Langdon, 10 Conn. 460, 471.

Deal synonymous.

The words "traffic in" are synonymous with the word "deal." Clifford v. State, 29 Wis. 327, 329.

Manufacture distinguished.

"Manufacture."

Employment of laborer.

Traffic is commerce; trade; sale or exchange of merchandise, bills, money, and the like; the passing of goods or commodities of one person to another for an equivalent in goods or money; and, as applied to interstate commerce, it is the sale of itinerant vendors, in one state, of the goods, wares, and merchandise of other states; and the regulation of sales of goods which are in another state for the purpose of introducing them into another state in which the negotiation is made. And the business of procuring labor contracts to be performed in another state cannot be properly denominated "traffic," labor not being an article of merchandise or a commodity. It is toll, mental and physical. Williams v. Fears, 35 S. E. 699, 701, 110 Ga. 584, 50 L. R. A. 685.

Sale by manufacturer.

The phrase "trafficking in intoxicating liquors," as used in the chapter relating to intoxicating liquors and cigarettes, means the buying or procuring and selling of intoxicating liquors otherwise than upon prescription issued in good faith by reputable physicians in active practice, or for exclusively known mechanical, pharmaceutical, or sacramental purposes; but such phrase does not include the manufacture of intoxicating liquors from the raw material, and the sale thereof at the manufactory, by the manufacturer, of the same in quantities of one gallon or more at any one time. Bates' Ann. St. Ohio, 1904, § 4364-16.

A manufacturer of intoxicating liquors, who carries on the business of selling them elsewhere than at the manufactory, is engaged in the traffic. Jung Brewing Co. v. Talbot, 53 N. E. 51, 59 Ohio St. 511.

Sale in original package.

Gen. Laws 1885, c. 296, § 4, making it criminal to "vend, sell, deal, or traffic" in intoxicating liquors, etc., without a license therefor, includes the sale of a keg of beer as an original package by the agent of a brewer, as the plain meaning of the words includes such sale. Pelts v. State, 32 N. W. 763, 68 Wis. 538.

Sale at wholesale.

"Traffic," as used in the schedule to the Constitution, § 18, which provides that "no license to traffic in intoxicating liquors shall be hereafter granted in this state, but the General Assembly may, by law, provide against evils resulting therefrom," includes the wholesale, as well as the retail, traffic in liquors. The word "traffic" has always had a well-understood meaning in the popular sense. It is the passing of goods or commodities from one person to another for an equivalent in goods or money, and a trafficker is one who traffics, a trader, a merchant. No limit as to amount is fixed in the section, and it is plainly as much traffic to deal in a given commodity by the wholesale as at retail. Senior v. Ratterman, 11 N. E. 321, 324, 44 Ohio St. 661.

Use by owner.

The word "traffic" is defined by Bouvier as "commerce, trade, sale, or exchange of merchandise, bills, money, and the like." Webster defines it as "commerce either by barter or by buying and selling trade." This word, like "trade," comprehends every species of dealing in the exchange or passing of goods and merchandise from hand to hand for an equivalent, unless the retaining may be expected. It signifies appropriately foreign trade, but is not limited to that. In Comp. St. c. 50, § 15, the term "traffic in intoxicating liquors" will be held to mean the sale or furnishing of liquors to third persons, and not the use thereof by the saloon keeper himself. Curtin v. Atkinson, 54 N. W. 131, 133, 36 Neb. 110.

TRAGEDY.

A tragedy is a dramatic representation. Commonwealth v. Fox (Pa.) 10 Phila. 204.

TRAILER.

"Trailer" is a term applied to a passenger coach attached to a grip car of a cable road, or to the car on an electric line containing the motive power. Steege v. St. Paul City Ry. Co., 50 Minn. 149, 150, 52 N. W. 393, 16 L. R. A. 379.

Trailing cars, which are excluded from Laws 1893, c. 63, requiring persons operating electric cars to provide each car with an inclosure to protect the employes from the inclemency of the weather, are such cars as are not operated or controlled by a power applied to motors attached to them, but which are merely drawn by cars equipped with motors. State v. Hoskins, 59 N. W. 545, 58 Minn. 35, 25 L. R. A. 759.

TRAIN.

See "Accommodation Train"; "Freight Train"; "Passenger Train"; "Wild Train."

The word "train," as used in the train railroad companies' act, entitled "An act to provide for the construction of train railways," is defined to be a continuous or connected line of cars or carriages on a railroad. Detroit City Ry. v. Mills, 48 N. W. 1007, 1009, 85 Mich. 634.

As used in a contract of sale of standing timber "with the right for his train, tram-road, wagons, and employes to enter on the lands and remove the timber," the word "train" refers to a railroad train, and implied the right to build the railroad on the land, and to cut and remove such timber as was reasonably necessary in clearing a right of way. Waters v. Greenleaf-Johnson Lumber Co., 20 S. E. 718, 719, 115 N. C. 648.

In construing the statute in reference to the liability of a railroad for injuries resulting by reason of the negligence of any person in the service of the employer who has the charge or control of any signal, switch, locomotive engine, or train, the court says the statute in referring to a signal, switch, locomotive engine, or train seems to contemplate the danger from a locomotive engine or train as a moving body, and to provide against the negligence of those who wholly or in part control its movements. The charge and control is of that whose characteristic is rapid and forceful motion. It relates to locomotive engines as a whole, and not to the individual parts which make up the train or engine. Thyng v. Fitchburg R. Co., 30 N. E. 169, 170, 156 Mass. 13, 32 Am. St. Rep. 425.

"Train," as used in St. 1887, c. 270, giving a right of action in certain cases for a personal injury caused by the negligence of any person in the service of the employer who has the charge or control of any locomotive, engine, or train upon a railroad, means a locomotive and one or more cars coupled together and run upon a railroad. Dacey v. Old Colony R. Co., 26 N. E. 437, 438, 153 Mass. 112.

An engine with cars attached, which were being pushed on a side track for cleaning purposes, is a "train," within St. 1887, c. 270, § 1, rendering a railroad company liable for injuries by reason of the negligence of one in control of a train thereof. Shea v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co., 53 N. E. 396, 173 Mass. 177.

Moving cars detached from engine.

"Train," as used in St. 1887, c. 270, § 1, cl. 8, providing that an employe of a railway company may recover for injuries due to the negligence of the person in charge or control of its trains, etc., generally signifies cars in motion, and a number of cars coupled together and moving from one point to another from an impetus imparted by a locomotive which had been detached constitutes a train, within the meaning of the statute. Caron v. Boston & A. R. Co., 42 N. E. 112, 113, 164 Mass. 523.

Single engine.

The word "train" is usually understood to consist of one or more engines with one or more cars attached for the purpose of being moved to another place. A single engine is not a train; yet it is a common practice to run them alone, and often for long distances, at high speed. Larson v. Illinois Cent. R. Co., 58 N. W. 1076, 1077, 91 Iowa, 81.

TRAMP.

The genus "tramp" in this country is a public enemy, and he is numerous and he is dangerous. He is a nomad, a wanderer on the face of the earth, with his hand against every honest man, woman, and child, in so far as they do not promptly and fully supply his demands. He is a thief, a robber, often a murderer, and always a nuisance. He does not belong to the working classes, but is an idler. He does not work, because he despises work. It is a fixed principle with him that, come what may, he will not work. He is so low in the scale of humanity that he is without that not uncommon virtue among the low—of honor among thieves. He will steal from a fellow tramp, if in need of what that fellow has, and will resort to violence when that is necessary. The tramp has therefore become a well-known, vicious class, which the state may enact laws concerning. State v. Hogan, 58 N. E. 572, 574, 63 Ohio St. 202, 52 L. R. A. 863, 81 Am. St. Rep. 626.

A tramp is a wandering, homeless vagabond, and the objection to an indictment for obtaining money by false pretenses that a person of ordinary care would not have loaned money to a stranger or tramp, is not good where the indictment alleged that the prosecuting witness had had important business with defendant, who had been introduced to him as a man of means and large property. Miller v. State, 73 Ind. 88, 92.

The word "tramp" indicates a foot traveler, a trampler; often used in a broad sense for a vagrant or wandering vagabond. The idea conveyed to the mind by the word is that simply of an idle, worthless fellow, who wanders about the country seeking to secure his living without toil. Because a man is a tramp, he is not necessarily dangerous. And hence the fact that tramps are caught stealing a ride upon a train is not sufficient to cause the employes on the train to suspect that they were carrying concealed weapons, so as to render the railroad company liable to passengers for injuries caused thereby. Savannah, F. & W. Ry. Co. v. Boyle, 42 S. E. 242, 244, 115 Ga. 836, 59 L. R. A. 104.

If a transient person roves from place to place, begging, living without labor or visible means of support, he shall be deemed a tramp. V. S. 1894, 4761.

All transient persons who rove about from place to place, begging, and all vagrants living without any labor or visible means of support, who stroll over the country without lawful occasion, shall be deemed tramps. Gen. St. Conn. 1902, § 1836.

Any person going about from place to place, begging, or subsisting upon charity, and for the purpose of acquiring money or a living, and who shall have no fixed place of residence or lawful occupation in the county or city in which he shall be arrested, shall be taken and deemed to be a tramp. P. & L. Dig. Laws Pa. 1894, vol. 2, col. 4781, § 15.

A tramp is any person, not blind, over 16 years of age, and who has not resided in the county in which he may be at any time for a period of 6 months prior thereto, who, (1) not having visible means to maintain himself, lives without employment; or (2) wanders abroad and begs, or goes about from door to door, or places himself in the streets, highways, passages, or public places to beg or receive alms; or (3) wanders abroad and lodges in taverns, groceries, alehouses, watch or station houses, outhouses, market places, sheds, stables, barns, or uninhabited buildings, or in the open air, and does not give a good account of himself. Crim. Code N. Y. 1903, § 887a.

The following described persons are declared to be tramps: All persons who shall come from any place without the state, or from any state, county, township, borough, or place within the state, and have no legal settlement in the places in which they may be found, and live idly and without employment, and refuse to work for the usual and common wages given to other persons for like work in the place where they then are, or shall be found going about from door to door, or placing themselves in the streets, highways, or roads, to beg or gather alms, and can give no reasonable account of themselves or their business in such place. Gen. St. N. J. 1895, p. 3681, § 1.

Under Code 1873, § 4130, defining vagrants, and Acts 23d Gen. Assem. c. 43, § 2, providing that no male person, 16 years of age or over, who is physically able to perform manual labor, and is a vagrant, within the purview of section 4130 of the Code, who is found wandering about practicing common begging, having no visible calling or business to maintain himself, and is unable to show reasonable effort, and in good faith, to secure employment, shall be deemed a tramp, all tramps are not, therefore, vagrants, and a police judge will not be entitled to the fees provided for in case of tramps for prosecutions against vagrancy. City of Des Moines v. Polk County, 78 N. W. 249, 252, 107 Iowa, 525.

Under Laws 1883, c. 342, § 1, declaring every male person over 16 years old, who is a vagrant within the meaning of Rev. St. 1543, to be a tramp, if he be without visible means of support, and be found drunk and disorderly or be found and arrested in a town in which he is not an actual inhabitant, and making such offense a felony, every tramp is a vagrant, and may still be arrested and punished as such, instead of for the higher offense. Johnson v. Waukesha County, 25 N. W. 7, 8, 64 Wis. 281.

TRAMP CORPORATION.

Tramp corporations are those companies which are chartered in one state without any intention of doing business therein, but operate entirely in other states. State v. Georgia Co., 17 S. E. 10, 12, 112 N. C. 34, 19 L. R. A. 485 (citing 25 Am. Law Rev. 352; 26 Am. Law Rev. 193).

TRAMWAY.

In the ordinary use of the word, "tramway" means a railroad or railway over which cars are operated; so that a platform which was used to carry away the lumber from a sawmill will not be held to be a tramway, in the absence of proof that the parties understood same to be a tramway, within the meaning of fire insurance policy containing a warranty that a continuous clear space shall be maintained between the property insured and any woodworking establishment, "tramways" excepted. Gough v. Jewett, 52 N. Y. Supp. 707, 709, 32 App. Div. 79.

TRANSACTION.

On a trial under Comp. St. §§ 1356, 1366, requiring every person who shall carry on any lottery, etc., to pay a license fee, and providing that any person who shall transact any business requiring a license fee, without first obtaining the same, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, the use in the charge of the word "transact" as the equivalent of "carry on" is not error, since the word "transact" should be construed as synonymous with "carry on," in view of sections 202, 204, providing that words and phrases are to be liberally construed and according to approved and common usage. Territory v. Harris, 19 Pac. 286, 287, 8 Mont. 140.

TRANSACTIONING BUSINESS.

See, also, "Carry on Business"; "Doing Business."

Pub. Laws N. Y. c. 281 (St. 1833), forbidding the "transaction of business" in the name of a partner not interested in the firm, means such business as is usually carried on by the firm with persons with whom they are accustomed to have business dealings. The evil sought to be remedied was the use of the name of one not interested in the firm to induce credit to be given and to impose on the public; hence the law was only meant to apply to dealings between the individual reasonably using the firm name and the persons transacting the business, connected in a general way with the usual course of business carried on by the firm, since it was only against fraud and imposition which might be practiced on innocent parties who dealt with the persons who transacted business in the name of a party not interested, or whose interest has ceased, that the statute was directed. A firm engaged in the millinery business, which executed a lease in the firm name after one of the partners were dead, was not "transacting business," within the meaning of the statute. Sparrow v. Kohn, 109 Pa. 359, 362, 58 Am. Rep. 726.

"Transaction of business," as used in reference to a foreign corporation, is not necessarily synonymous with the term "doing business." It does not necessarily mean that the main business of the corporation must be carried on in the state, or something in the nature of that business, or that capital must be employed in the state. And as used in the law requiring foreign stock corporations, having an office for transaction of business in the state, to keep a stockbook open for the inspection of stockholders, all that the statute requires is that something relating to the business of the corporation, or part of it, be carried on in the office. The transfer of stock is such a transaction of business. People v. Montreal & B. Copper Co., 81 N. Y. Supp. 974, 976, 40 Misc. Rep. 282.

Adjusting loss.

Laws 1853, c. 466, § 23, as amended by Laws 1875, c. 555, imposes a penalty on agents acting for foreign insurance companies without procuring a certain certificate. Held, that an agent of a foreign company, while in the state adjusting a loss, was not "transacting the business of fire insurance," within the meaning of such phrase in the statute, inasmuch as the adjustment of a loss is merely a means of ascertaining the amount of an admitted indebtedness, which action could not have been within the intent of the Legislature. People v. Gilbert (N. Y.) 44 Hun, 522, 524.

Bringing suit.

Civ. Code, § 567, enacts that no foreign corporation shall transact any business within the territory until it shall have filed a copy of its charter, appointed a resident agent, etc. Held, that in an action by a foreign corporation which had not complied with the statute it was not necessary for the corporation to allege compliance, inasmuch as the phrase "transact business" does not mean or include the exercise of a corporation's right to sue. American Buttonhole, Overseaming & S. M. Co. v. Moore, 8 N. W. 131, 134, 2 Dak. 280.

Under a statute (Laws 1864, p. 617) prohibiting a foreign corporation from transacting business in this state until it appoints a resident agent therein, it is held that the business which the corporation is prohibited from transacting is the regular business in which it is engaged, and that the maintaining of a suit in the state courts against a resident debtor is not transacting business therein, within the meaning of the statute. Orange Nat. Bank v. Traver (U. S.) 7 Fed. 146.

Filling unsolicited order.

"Transacting business in the state," within the meaning of the Laws of 1899, requiring foreign corporations transacting or soliciting business in Texas to obtain a permit, does not include the act of a corporation doing business in another state in shipping goods on an unsolicited order to a resident of Texas. Zuberlied Co. v. Harris (Tex.) 35 S. W. 403, 404.

Making contract.

The mere entering into a contract with a city for street lighting by a foreign corporation did not constitute "transacting business within the state," under the statute declaring that no foreign corporation shall transact business within the state until certain things have been done. Hogan v. City of St. Louis, 75 S. W. 604, 605, 178 Mo. 149.

Making contract or sale outside of state.

Comp. Laws, § 1683, provides that it shall not be lawful for any person or persons to act within the state as agent, or otherwise, in transacting or receiving applications for insurance, or in any manner to aid in transacting the business of fire and marine insurance for any foreign company without complying with certain provisions of the law. Held, that the making of a contract of fire insurance on a building situated in the state of Michigan, the insured being a Michigan corporation, but the contract having been made outside the state, was not "transacting business," within the phrase as used in the statute. Clay Fire & Marine Ins. Co. v. Huron Salt & Lumber Mfg. Co., 31 Mich. 346, 351, 354.

Act April 3, 1899, providing that any foreign corporation that may desire to "transact business in this state or solicit business in this state, or establish a general or special office in this state," shall be required to file a copy of its articles, does not apply to a sale of goods to a resident of Texas at the place of business of the corporation in a foreign state, where it is not stated that the parties contemplated shipping the goods from that state into Texas. Reed v. Walker, 21 S. W. 687, 688, 2 Tex. Civ. App. 92.

Making single loan.

"Transaction of business," within the meaning of Rev. St. p. 712, § 6, prohibiting the keeping of an office of discount and deposit for the transaction of business, is not shown by evidence that the cashier of a foreign corporation made a single loan of money on a borrower's check; it appearing that the transaction was an isolated one, and that the corporation kept no office for banking purposes in the state. Suydam v. Morris Canal & Banking Co. (N. Y.) 6 Hill, 217.

Purchasing note.

Hill's Ann. Laws, § 3276, providing that a foreign banking corporation, before transacting business in this state, must execute a power of attorney, and cause the same to be recorded in the county clerk's office, etc., was intended to prohibit foreign corporations from coming into the state for the purpose of transacting their ordinary corporate business, and does not apply to mere purchasing of a promissory note. Commercial Bank of Vancouver v. Sherman, 43 Pac. 658, 659, 28 Or. 573, 52 Am. St. Rep. 811.

TRANSACTION.

See "Binding Transaction"; "Illegal Transaction"; "Long Transactions"; "Personal Transaction."

A "transaction" is defined by Worcester as "the act of transacting or conducting any business; negotiation; management; a proceeding;" and by Webster as "that which is done; an affair." Sheehan v. Pierce, 23 N. Y. Supp. 1119, 1121, 70 Hun, 22.

A transaction is the doing or performing of any business or affair; and hence the delivery of a written instrument is part of a transaction, since it would be incomplete without the delivery. Kroh v. Heins, 67 N. W. 771, 774, 48 Neb. 691.

A transaction may not be confined to what is done in one day, or at one time, or at one place. Immediateness is tested not by closeness of time, but by logical relation. First Nat. Bank v. Wisdom's Ex'rs, 63 S. W. 461, 464, 111 Ky. 135.

A transaction is whatever may be done by one person which affects another person's rights, and out of which a cause of action may arise. Scarborough v. Smith, 18 Kan. 399, 406.

A transaction or compromise is an agreement between two or more persons, who, for preventing or putting an end to a lawsuit, adjust their differences by mutual consent, in the manner which they agree on, and which every one of them prefers to the hope of gaining, balanced by the danger of losing. Civ. Code La. 1900, art. 3071.

In reference to counterclaim.

By the Code of Civil Procedure defendant may plead as a counterclaim a cause of action which tends to diminish or defeat plaintiff's recovery, where it is a cause of action arising out of the contract or transaction set forth in the complaint or enacted with the subject of the action. Held, that the word "transaction" is broader than the word "contract," and, in case the defendant's cause of action arises out of the transaction out of which the plaintiff's transaction arose, it may be pleaded as a counterclaim; and hence defendant, in an action for the conversion of money obtained by him as agent for the sale of goods, under contract that such money should be paid directly by the purchaser to plaintiff, may set up that plaintiff had broken the contract, had conspired with others to deprive defendant of his rights, and that a balance was due to defendant. Ter Kulle v. Marsland, 31 N. Y. Supp. 5, 8, 81 Hun, 420 (cited in Deagan v. Weeks, 73 N. Y. Supp. 641, 642, 67 App. Div. 410).

Every contract may be said to be a transaction, but every transaction is not a contract. Deagan v. Weeks, 73 N. Y. Supp. 641, 642, 67 App. Div. 410 (citing Xenia Branch Bank v. Lee [N. Y.] 7 Abb. Prac. 372).

The word "transaction," used in Code Civ. Proc. § 501, providing that a counterclaim may be interposed when it arises out of the transaction set forth in the complaint as the foundation of plaintiff's claim, includes actions of tort. Deagan v. Weeks, 73 N. Y. Supp. 641, 642, 67 App. Div. 410; Heigle v. Willis, 3 N. Y. Supp. 497, 498, 50 Hun, 588.

In an action for assault and battery, defendant counterclaimed for the use of excessive force by the person assaulted, and it was contended that the successive assaults were not parts of the same transaction; but the court held that such assumption is unwarranted; that the word must be used in a very limited and technical sense in order to say that, as each party gains ascendancy in a continuous fracas, the one transaction terminates, and a new and separate one commences. Gutzman v. Clancy, 90 N. W. 1081, 1083, 114 Wis. 589, 58 L. R. A. 744.

The manifest purpose of the statutes allowing counterclaims in favor of a defendant against a plaintiff arising out of the same transaction is to allow parties to the same suit to settle in such suit, as far as convenient and practicable, all controversies arising out of the same contract or transaction set forth in the complaint; and the word "transaction" should not be construed to apply only to such transactions as are in the nature of contracts, if not strictly contracts. Pelton v. Powell, 71 N. W. 887, 888, 96 Wis. 473.

"Transaction," as used in the statement that a counterclaim must arise out of the same transaction set forth in the petition, means "the actual facts and circumstances from which the rights result and which are averred, not the mere form and manner in which the facts are averred, and includes all that is said and done in connection with a purchase and sale, or other trade or contract, and all that is said and done in connection with the perpetration of a fraud or cheat." Deford v. Hutchinson, 25 Pac. 641, 644, 45 Kan. 318, 11 L. R. A. 257.

The cause of action arising out of the contract or transaction set forth in the complaint as the foundation of plaintiff's claim, so as to authorize it to be set up as a counterclaim, implies that it arose out of some agreement or business affair between the parties. Thus, if A. were to sell to B. personal property, and falsely represent its condition or quality, in an action by A. for the price B. could set up the fraud as a counterclaim, it being easy in that case to see how B.'s claim arises out of the same transaction counted on by A.; but if B. had tortiously carried away A.'s property, and the latter at the same time committed a wrong against B., or obligated him in some way to pay B. a sum of money, it cannot be contended that that claim arises out of the same transaction constituting the foundation of A.'s claim for the trespass, which therefore cannot be set up. Loewenburg v. Rosenthal, 22 Pac. 601, 603, 18 Or. 178.

In reference to joinder of actions.

A transaction is something which has been transacted; that is, acted out to the end. This notion of completed action characterizes the word in the Latin language, from which, through the Normans, we have derived it, although we gain little assistance otherwise from these sources in determining its meaning, since both the Romans and the French have used it mainly as a judicial term to signify an agreement of parties in settlement of differences. Citing Dig. II, 15, "De Transactionibus"; Civ. Code France, art. 2044. So it is held that where the purchaser of machines claims they are not according to contract, and notifies the seller to take them away, and the seller agrees to take them back, but the purchaser forcibly prevents their removal, and continues to use them, all the acts and agreements of the parties in reference to the machines constitute one transaction, within the meaning of Gen. St. § 878, providing that several causes of action may be united in the same complaint if all are on claims arising out of the same transaction, etc. Craft Refrigerating Mach. Co. v. Quinn- plac Brewing Co., 29 Atl. 76, 77, 63 Conn. 551, 25 L. R. A. 856.

The word "transaction" is used in the statute in reference to the joinder of actions as authorized by Code, § 267, in the sense of the conduct of finishing up an affair, which constitutes, as a whole, the subject of an action. Cheatham v. Bobbitt, 24 S. E. 13, 14, 118 N. C. 343.

The word "transactions," as used in the statute relating to the uniting of several causes of action where they all arise out of the same transaction, or transactions connected with the same subject of action, means whatever may be done by one person which affects another's rights, and out of which a cause of action may arise. Scarborough v. Smith, 18 Kan. 399, 406.

"Transactions connected with the same subject-matter," as used in the statute authorizing joinder of causes of action, means that both causes of action set up in the complaint must proceed, in a general sense, from the same wrong. Thus one having a cause of action for injunction to restrain operation of a steam railroad on a highway is entitled to join an action for damages for personal injuries suffered while driving along a highway in consequence of his horse becoming frightened by the noise of the passing steam engine, since both claims arose from the same wrong or transaction, namely, the unlawful obstructing of the highway by the railroad; both actions being, therefore, "transactions connected with the same subject-matter of action." Lamming v. Gaulusha, 31 N. E. 1024, 135 N. Y. 239.

A right of action for slander and one for false imprisonment of plaintiff at the time the words were uttered cannot be united in one action, under Code Civ. Proc. § 484, as being causes arising "out of the same transaction," as neither was a transaction, in any proper sense of the word. De Wolfe v. Abraham, 45 N. E. 455, 456, 151 N. Y. 186.

Under Comp. Laws, § 4932, subd. 1, authorizing the joinder of causes of action arising out of the "same transaction or transactions connected with the same subject of action," the holder of a note secured by a trust deed may in one action seek to foreclose the trust deed, to set aside a prior foreclosure made by the trustee without plaintiff's knowledge or consent, to enjoin the county treasurer from issuing to a trustee a tax deed for the mortgaged premises, and to adjust the equities of the various parties. Bush v. Froelick, 66 N. W. 939, 940, 8 S. D. 853.

Transactions with decedents.

"Transaction" is defined by Webster as follows: "The doing or performing any business; management of any affair; perform-ence; that which is done; an affair; as the transactions of the exchange." It is defined in Anderson's Dictionary of Law to be "whatever may be done by one person which affects another's rights, and out of which a cause of action may arise." And the treating and prescribing for a patient during an illness of some months was a transaction with the patient which would prohibit the physician from testifying as to the services rendered such patient, as against his representative. Garwood v. Schlichenmaier, 60 S. W. 573, 574, 25 Tex. Civ. App. 176.

"Transaction," as defined by Webster, is the doing or performing of any business; the management of an affair. Effecting the novation of notes, whether by word of mouth or through written correspondence, is a "transaction," within Code Tenn. § 4565, prohibiting a party from testifying as to any "transaction with or statement by" a deceased person. Montague v. Thomason, 18 S. W. 264, 265, 91 Tenn. (7 Pickle) 168.

The term "transaction," as used in statutes relating to the admissibility of evidence in regard to transactions with deceased persons, has not been given a very definite meaning by the courts. Whatever may be done by one person which affects another's rights, and out of which a cause of action may arise, is a transaction. It is a broader term than "contract," for, while every contract is a transaction, every transaction is not a contract. But the courts have interpreted the term as the justice of each case seemed to demand, rather than by any abstract definition, as will be seen by the decided cases. The execution of a note by a deceased person, or the delivery of a letter or of property, is such a transaction with the deceased as to render the adverse party incompetent to testify to the same, under the statute. The word "transaction" means the doing or performing any business; the management of an affair. Cunningham's Adm'r v. Speagle, 50 S. W. 244, 246, 106 Ky. 278.

Rev. Code, § 2704, prohibiting the plaintiff in a suit against an administrator from testifying as to "transactions with or statements by a deceased party," does not apply to testimony of the plaintiff, in an action for trespass in taking plaintiff's tools, that he found such tools during the intestate's life in the shop of the latter, as it was not a personal transaction with deceased. Miller v. Clay, 57 Ala. 162, 164.

"Transactions or communications," as used in a statute prohibiting evidence as to "transactions or communications with deceased persons," mean "every variety of affairs which form the subject of negotiations or actions between the parties, and include every method by which one may derive impressions from the conduct or actions of another." Holliday v. McKinne, 22 Fla. 153.

The word "transaction," as used in Code Civ. Proc. § 329, relating to the competency of witnesses as to a transaction with decedent, embraces every variety of affairs the subject of negotiations, actions, or contracts between parties. Harte v. Reichenberg, 92 N. W. 987, 3 Neb. (Unof.) 820.

"Transactions and communications," as used in the Code of Civil Procedure, excluding certain witnesses from testifying to personal transactions or communications between themselves and the deceased person, means "every method by which one person can derive any impression or information from the conduct, condition, or language of another." Holcomb v. Holcomb, 95 N. Y. 316.

The mere fact that a witness had a conversation with a deceased person is not a transaction within the meaning of Code, § 399, prohibiting testimony as to a transaction or communication with a deceased person. Hier v. Grant, 47 N. Y. 278, 281.

A contract, whether express or implied by law, is a transaction; and, when one person testifies that he did work and labor for another generally, he must be taken as testifying to a "transaction," within the meaning of that word in Code, c. 130, § 23, prohibiting persons from testifying as to transactions between themselves and a decedent under certain circumstances. Poling v. Huffman, 37 S. E. 526, 529, 48 W. Va. 639.

TRANSCRIPT.

See "Complete Transcript."

Webster defines a transcript to be that which has been transcribed; a writing or composition consisting of the same words as the original; a written copy. In re Evingson, 2 N. D. 184, 190, 49 N. W. 733, 734, 33 Am. St. Rep. 768.

"Transcript" means, according to Webster: "First. A copy; a writing made from and according to an original; a writing or composition consisting of the same words with the original. Second. A copy of any kind." Mr. Anderson, in his Law Dictionary, defines a transcript to be: "First. A copy of an original record. Second. To copy or to copy officially." Mr. Bouvier defines a transcript to be a copy of an original writing or deed. Waitman v. Bowles, 58 S. W. 686, 690, 3 Ind. T. 294.

The word "transcript" suggests the idea of an original writing. The word, not only in its popular but legal sense, means a copy of something already reduced to writing. Worcester defines it as "a writing made from or after an original; a copy." Burrill defines it as "a copy, particularly of a record." Bouvier, "a copy of an original writing or deed." State v. Board of Equalization of Washoe County, 7 Nev. 83, 95.

The term "transcript," as it relates to an appeal, has been given a modified or different meaning from that which originally obtained. Instead of being a copy of the judgment roll or final record, it is now a certified copy of so much of the record as may be necessary to present intelligently the questions to be decided, which, as well as the abstract, must be accompanied with a copy of the judgment or decree appealed from, notice of appeal, etc. Backhaus v. Buells, 72 Pac. 976, 977, 43 Or. 558.

Hill's Ann. Laws, § 541, subd. 1, defines a transcript to be a copy of a roll or final record, or the pleading, orders, papers, and journal entries that constitute such roll or record, together with a copy of the notice on appeal. Tatum v. Massie, 44 Pac. 494, 495, 29 Or. 140.

A transcript of a judgment is a copy of the judgment; hence a duly certified copy of a judgment is a transcript thereof within the meaning of the statute which provides for the filing of transcripts of judgments. Hastings School Dist. v. Caldwell, 19 N. W. 634, 635, 16 Neb. 68.

A transcript is none the less sufficient as a transcript of a judgment because more is certified than the statute requires. Funk v. Lamb, 92 N. W. 8, 9, 87 Minn. 348.

The word "transcript," as used in Code, § 587, providing that county judges, justices of the peace and others upon request, and upon being paid the lawful fees thereof, shall furnish an authenticated transcript of their proceedings, implies that the document referred to shall be a copy of some original document; and the language, taken in connection with Comp. St. c. 20, relating to dockets required to be kept by county judges, refers to a transcript of the entries required to be made upon the docket, and does not require a transcript of all papers filed or of all evidence offered in the case. There is no authority, therefore, for a county judge to sign a bill of exceptions embodying affidavits used as evidence on motions to dissolve an attachment. Moline, Milburn & Stoddard Co. v. Curtis, 57 N. W. 161, 163, 38 Neb. 520.

Under Rev. Codes, § 417, specifying certain cases wherein the court may order a transcript of the shorthand notes, whether all the testimony is ordered transcribed, or only a portion thereof, alike it is denominated a "transcript," and it is the transcript which the party may file with the clerk. Kaeppler v. Pollock, 76 N. W. 987, 989, 8 N. D. 59.

The word "transcript," in Code Cr. Proc. arts. 181, 182, providing that if a party to a habeas corpus proceeding desires to appeal, and the case has been tried before a court in session, the record is made up by the clerk and certified to by him, just as in any other case, and that, if tried before a judge in vacation, the transcript may be prepared by any person under the judge's direction, and certified to by such judge, "embraces the proceedings which have been reduced to writing and properly authenticated, and a transcript of the statement of facts, if such is desired." Ex parte Malone, 33 S. W. 360, 361, 35 Tex. Cr. R. 297.

Act Cong. March 3, 1797, makes a transcript from the books of the treasury evidence in suits between the United States and receivers of public money. Held, that the whole accounts, as they appear in the books, the elements out of which the reported balance is found, together with all the proceedings which have been had concerning them, shall be certified and submitted to the court and jury, that it may be adjudged whether the sum or balance for which the suit is brought be fairly made up and is justly due. United States v. Patterson (U. S.) 27 Fed. Cas. 462, 463.

Act Cong. March 3, 1797, enacting that, in suits against delinquent revenue officers, a transcript from the books of the proceedings of the treasury shall be evidence, means substantially a copy. A copy from the books, and not of the books, shall be admissible in evidence. An extract from the books, a portion of the books, when authenticated to be a copy, may be given in evidence, while a garbled statement is not evidence, or a mutilated statement, wherein the debits shall be presented and the credits suppressed, or perhaps a statement of results only, it still seems to be clear that it is not necessary that every account with an individual, and all of every account, shall be transcribed, as a condition of the admissibility of any one account. The statement presented should be complete in itself, perfect for what it purports to represent, and give both sides of the account as the same stands upon the books. United States v. Gausson, 86 U. S. (19 Wall.) 198, 212, 22 L. Ed. 41.

Abstract distinguished.

An abstract of a record is a statement of the substantial contents thereof, and differs from a transcript, in that the latter is a copy of the record. Harrison v. Southern Porcelain Mfg. Co., 10 S. C. 278, 283.

A transcript is defined by the authorities to be a copy of an original record, and, under a statute which requires that a certified transcript of the judgment of a justice court is required to be filed in order to become a lien upon real estate, a mere abstract of the judgment rendered by the justice, instead of a certified copy thereof, is not a transcript, and does not create a lien. Such filing of a mere abstract of the judgment was an entire failure to meet the requirements of the statute in this respect, and amounted to nothing. The abstract fails to show upon its face that the judgment debtor was either served with process, appeared in court, or had any notice whatever of the commencement of the action, and does not even show that a complaint had been filed, or in fact show that the justice had any jurisdiction whatever to render a judgment. Dearborn v. Patton, 4 Or. 58, 61.

TRANSFER.

A transfer given by a street railway company is the evidence of the passenger's right to ride, and resembles in this respect a railroad company's ticket. Herbert v. Baltimore County Com'rs, 55 Atl. 876, 879, 97 Md. 639.

A transfer is a ticket given to passengers on street railroads who have paid the usual fare, entitling them to leave the car at a certain designated point, and, without further payment of fare, but upon presentation and delivery of the transfer check, pursue their travels upon the connecting line. It is part of the passenger's contract with the company that he may thus transfer to and ride upon the connecting road. It serves a two-fold purpose: First, to the passenger, as an evidence of his contract, by which he is entitled to continue his journey upon the connecting road; and, second, to the company, as a means of identification afforded to its conductors and servants, by which they may know that the passenger presenting the transfer is entitled to ride without further payment of fare. Ex parte Lorenzen, 61 Pac. 68, 69, 128 Cal. 431, 50 L. R. A. 55, 79 Am. St. Rep. 47.

"Transfers," as used in a contract authorizing a street railway to construct its tracks on condition of giving and accepting transfers to and from other railroads, means for the same fare, so that the railroad company did not comply with the contract when it required a fresh fare. Gaedeke v. Staten Island M. R. Co., 60 N. Y. Supp. 598, 605, 43 App. Div. 514.

A transfer ticket is a mere token to be used for the convenience of the road. It is not a contract between the road and the passenger. It is a statement by the initial conductor to the subsequent conductor of what the contract is, and what the passenger is entitled to, and, if it is not correct, the fault is not that of the road. Nor can passengers be required to verify the acts of the conductor, but they may presume that he acts correctly. The tickets or tokens are prepared by the company. They contain more or less of printed and other directions. Some passengers cannot read. Others are children. None of them have the time or opportunity, in the rush of travel, to scrutinize the ticket, and in many instances, if they did, they could not understand the devices used by the company. The passenger has the right to presume that the conductor has given him a proper ticket, and, if he make a mistake, it is the fault of the company, for which it is liable; and, if the passenger in good faith accept the ticket, he is not bound to stop and scrutinize it to see that no mistake has been made. Memphis St. R. Co. v. Graves, 75 S. W. 729, 730, 110 Tenn. 232.

TRANSFER.

See "Absolute Transfer"; "Fraudulent Transfer"; "Indirect Transfer"; "Legal Transfer"; "Voluntary Transfer"; "Chain of Transfer."

A transfer is an act or transaction by which property of one person is by him vested in another. This, without the use of some qualifying word, is the legal meaning of the term. Pearre v. Hawkins, 62 Tex. 434, 437 (citing Abb. Dict.; Bouv. Dict.; Webst. Dict.).

Transfer is an act of the parties or of the law by which the title to property is conveyed from one living person to another. Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 3508; Civ. Code S. D. 1903, § 915; Civ. Code Mont. 1895, § 1430; Civ. Code Cal. 1903, § 1039.

"The words 'transfer and assign' mean, in legal proceedings, if not otherwise restricted, a transfer by writing. The meaning of the words, of course, depends upon the connection in which they are used, and the subject to which they relate." Andrews v. Carr, 26 Miss. 577, 578.

"Transfer," when used in its ordinary sense, is applicable to real property, and is either synonymous with the word "sale," or imports something more than or subsequent to sale (selling being one mode of transferring property), and, as used in a lease, providing that the lease should be void if there should be a transfer of the property during the term, means a transfer of the title, and not a transfer of possession. Ober v. Schenck, 65 Pac. 1073, 1075, 23 Utah, 614.

A partition which merely severs the relation existing between tenants in common in the undivided whole, and vests title to a correspondent part in severalty, is not such a sale or transfer of title as will be affected by the statute of frauds. McKnight v. Bell, 19 Atl. 1036, 1037, 135 Pa. 358.

The phrase "to be transferred," in a devise to trustees of all testator's copyhold lands "to be transferred" to testator's son as soon as he shall attain the age of 21 years, means to deliver the land up to him. Player v. Nicholls, 1 Barn. & C. 336, 341.

Where a testator, after providing for the disposition of the income of certain property which was left in trust to his executors, directed them to pay, deliver over, and transfer, subject to such directions, all the rest and residue of his property to his children in equal shares, each child to come into possession and control at majority, the term "to pay and deliver over" is more appropriately applied to a disposition of personal estate, but the term "transfer" was obviously used with reference to the real estate, or such part of it as might be possible to transfer to the children in specie, and precludes the notion that testator intended, at all events and under all circumstances, to have the real estate converted into money. In re Thompson's Estate, 1 N. Y. Supp. 213, 215.

Testator made several small bequests, and then bequeathed and devised the residue of his estate to his executors in trust for his brother, sisters, and son; providing that the funds for his brother and sisters should be of a sufficient amount to yield a specified sum annually, and that the balance should be for the fund for his son, and giving the executors discretionary authority to sell the real property. He directed that the words "trust funds" should be construed to include real as well as personal property, and authorized the executors to retain, as part of the trust funds, any stocks, bonds, or other "investments whatever" which he had. On the death of the son the principal of his trust fund was to be transferred and paid by the executors to testator's next of kin, to whom he gave, devised, and bequeathed the fund accordingly. The executors were further authorized, in their discretion, to transfer and pay over to the son any portion of his trust fund, in which case the testator gave, devised, and bequeathed this to the son. Testator left sufficient personal property to pay all debts and bequests, and to create all the trust funds, except that of the son. Held, that the use of the word "transferred," in addition to the words "pay over," and the use of the word "devise," indicate that testator contemplated that at the time of the distribution there would be real estate to be transferred to those entitled thereto, and that he devised the same accordingly, and that the will did not operate as an equitable conversion of the real estate into personalty. In re Lee's Will, 83 N. Y. Supp. 299, 305, 85 App. Div. 295; In re Coolidge, Id.

5 U. S. Stat. 456, § 12, providing that all "assignments and transfers" of the right by such statute prior to the issuing of the patent for public lands under pre-emption laws shall be null and void, cannot be construed as meaning a conveyance with covenants for title, and with warranty, purporting to pass the fee simple of lands and tenements. The term "assignments and transfers" is used when applied technically to describe a transfer of an estate for years, or an equitable interest or a chattel. Franklin v. Kelley, 2 Neb. 79, 88.

The foreclosure of a mortgage on real estate, and the becoming absolute of the title in the mortgagee by the failure to redeem, constitute a transfer of the property, within the meaning of the statute which provides that real estate of any taxpayer shall be liable for office taxes for one year and afterward, until a transfer thereof. Waterbury Sav. Bank v. Lawler, 46 Conn. 243.

The term "transfer" means to convey or pass the right of one person over to another, unless the general meaning is restricted or limited by something accompanying it—as, for example, that the transfer was for a limited time or for a particular purpose; and where the petition showed that the holder of a Spanish grant of land had transferred the same to another, who petitioned to the commandant for permission to possess and build on the lot, and received such permission, and did so build, the word "transfer" was construed to indicate a conveyance of all interest in the land, and not that such transferee entered as a licensee. Innerarity v. Mims' Heirs, 1 Ala. 660, 669.

"Transfer," as used in Code 1873, § 1310, providing that no railroad terminating at or near the city of Council Bluffs shall make any transfer of freight, passengers, or express matter outside the limits of the state, etc., means the act of removing freight, passengers, and express matter, and is intended to cover the removal of cars, with their burdens, from one road to another, as well as the change of their burdens from the cars of one company to those of another. City of Council Bluffs v. Kansas City, St. J. & C. B. R. Co., 45 Iowa, 338, 24 Am. Rep. 773.

The word "transfer," in the provision of the statute for the voluntary dissolution of corporations, which declares void all transfers, etc., of the choses in action or other assets of a corporation seeking to avail itself of that statute, made in payment of or as security for a debt or for any other consideration, means a passing over to another of an existing right to the thing transferred, which right shall survive the transfer. It does not include the extinguishment or satisfaction of a chose in action, either by payment in full, or by part payment which is taken in full satisfaction. There is no meaning of the word "transfer" which carries the idea of an act of extinguishment, or any other idea than that of a passing over of a right of title or property in a thing from one to another. If the word is construed by its surroundings in the section, and they are all held to be ejusdem generis, which is a true rule of interpretation, the same result must follow. The associates of the word "transfers" are the words "sale, assignment, mortgage, and conveyance." Each of them has the meaning of a passing from one to another in whole or in part, absolutely, or upon conditions of an existing right which shall survive the act of passing over. Sands v. Hill, 55 N. Y. 18, 21, 22.

The word "transfer," as used in a contract of purchase of land, stipulating that a manufacturing company shall transfer its works to certain land, does not require that the identical buildings and machinery be removed. Hanna v. St. Joseph Land Co., 126 Mo. 1, 13, 28 S. W. 652.

By an instrument which would "have transferred or in any manner have affected" property, as used in the definition of forgery, is meant every species of conveyance or undertaking in writing which supposes a right in the person purporting to execute it to dispose of or change the character of property of every kind, and which can have such effect when genuine. Pen. Code Tex. 1895, art. 537.

In bankruptcy law.

"Transfer," as used in the bankruptcy act shall include the sale and every other and different mode of disposing of or parting with property, or the possession of property, absolutely or conditionally, as a payment, pledge, mortgage, gift, or security. U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 2430; In re Baker-Ricketson Co. (U. S.) 97 Fed. 489, 491; In re Doscher (U. S.) 120 Fed. 408, 413; In re Rome Planing Mill Co. (U. S.) 96 Fed. 812, 814; Pirie v. Chicago Title & Trust Co., 182 U. S. 438, 443, 21 Sup. Ct. 906, 45 L. Ed. 1171; Sherman v. Luckhardt, 70 S. W. 388, 389, 96 Mo. App. 320.

The Supreme Court, in the case of Pirie v. Chicago Title & Trust Co., 182 U. S. 438, 21 Sup. Ct. 906, 45 L. Ed. 1171, said "transfer" is defined to be not only the sale of property, but every other and different mode of disposing of and parting with property. All technicality and narrowness of meaning is precluded. The word is used in its most comprehensive sense, and is intended to include every means or manner by which property can pass from the ownership and possession of another, and by which the result forbidden by the statute may be accomplished; that is, a preference enabling the creditor to obtain a greater percentage of his debt than any other creditor or the same class. Thus a deposit of coin, legal tender notes, bank bills, indorsed checks, and drafts, to be placed to the credit of the depositor, and subject to his draft, amounts to a preference, which would have to be surrendered by the bank before it could prove the balance of its claims. In re Stege (U. S.) 116 Fed. 342, 344, 54 C. C. A. 116.

The payment of a debt in money is a transfer, within the meaning of such term as used in the bankruptcy act. In re Conhalm (U. S.) 97 Fed. 923, 925.

An order given by a bankrupt to certain creditors is a transfer. Marden v. Sugden, 52 Atl. 74, 75, 71 N. H. 274.

A payment of money is a transfer of property, within the meaning of Bankr. Act July 1, 1898, c. 541, § 60, 30 Stat. 562 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3445]. In re Sloan (U. S.) 102 Fed. 116, 117.

Payments by an insolvent on a running account, where new sales succeed such payments, do not constitute transfers of property, creating a preference, under Bankr. Act July 1, 1898, c. 541, § 60, 30 Stat. 562 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3445]. In re Sagor (U. S.) 121 Fed. 658, 659, 57 C. C. A. 412.

A transfer with intent to hinder, delay, or defraud creditors, within the meaning of the United States bankrupt act of 1867, which makes void any transfer of property, etc., "with intent to hinder, delay, or defraud creditors," is a transfer after the party making the transfer became bankrupt or insolvent, or made by him in contemplation of bankruptcy or insolvency. In re Dunham (U. S.) 8 Fed. Cas. 33, 34.

The words "conveyance, transfer, assignment, or incumbrance," as used in Bankr. Act July 1, 1898, c. 541, § 67e, 30 Stat. 564 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3449], providing that all conveyances, transfers, assignments, or incumbrances of his property, or any part thereof, made or given by a person adjudged a bankrupt within four months prior to the filing of a petition, with intent to hinder, delay, or defraud creditors, shall be void, applies to a transfer or incumbrance of property, real or personal, rather than to the payment of money upon a pre-existing debt. Blakey v. Boonville Nat. Bank (U. S.) 96 Fed. 267, 268.

The terms, "assignment, transfer or conveyance, directly, indirectly, absolutely or conditionally," in Gen. St. c. 118, § 89, forbidding any assignment, transfer, or conveyance, directly, indirectly, absolutely, or conditionally, by an insolvent debtor, with a view to prefer a creditor, includes a consignment of goods to be sold for or on account of the consignor; and therefore such a consignment is prohibited by the statute if the consignee is authorized by it to apply the avails of the sales to the payment of a pre-existing debt which the consignor owes him. Burpee v. Sparhawk, 97 Mass. 342, 344.

In conveyance of real estate.

The words "transfer" and "assign" are not the usual operative words in a conveyance of real estate, but are sufficient to transfer the title. Sanders v. Ransom, 20 South. 530, 531, 37 Fla. 457.

No particular form of words is necessary to effect a conveyance of real estate. Any words which denote the intention of the parties to a deed to transfer the title from one to the other are sufficient to make a conveyance. 2 Bl. Comm. 298; 4 Kent, Comm. 460; Bridge v. Wellington, 1 Mass. 219. The words "mortgage, assign over, and transfer," in a deed, are sufficient to pass the legal title and estate to the premises described therein. Gambrel v. Rose (Ind.) 8 Blackf. 140, 141, 44 Am. Dec. 760.

Where in certain instruments the operative words used are "transfer and sell," the instruments are sufficient and operative to convey the interest and title of the grantors in the property described. Whalon v. North Platte Canal & Colonization Co., 71 Pac. 995, 999, 11 Wyo. 313.

In a conveyance the word "convey" means to transfer the title or property. The word "convey" means to transfer the title from one person to another. It has the same legal effect as the word "grant," which has become a generic term applicable to the transfer of all classes of real property. In New York the operative word of conveyance is "grant," but Chancellor Kent says: "As other modes of conveyance operate equally as grants, any words showing the intention of the parties would be sufficient." The word, then, "convey," or "transfer," in a deed, is of equivalent signification and effect as "grant." And to construe a deed containing the words "have bargained, sold, and conveyed, and by these presents do bargain, sell, and convey," as a bargain and sale, is to ignore the word "convey," and give it no effect in the conveyance, which is executed with the formalities required by the statute. Lambert v. Smith, 9 Or. 185, 193.

In fraud of creditors.

A fraudulent transfer of property is a fraudulent disposition of it. Howard v. Caperton (Tex.) 3 Willson, Civ. Cas. Ct. App. § 313.

The word "transfer," as used in a statute making it a ground for attachment that the debtor has transferred his property in order to defraud creditors, means placing it in the hands of another under pretense of title. Hopkins v. Nichols, 22 Tex. 206, 210.

"Transfer," as used in Comp. Laws, c. 32, § 28, prohibiting the fraudulent sale, transfer, secretion, or disposal of property with intent to defraud creditors, means to transfer or pass over the right of the owner to another. A transfer is the act by which the owner could make over and deliver possession and control of it to another with intent to vest the real or apparent ownership of it in such other person. Herold v. State, 31 N. W. 258, 261, 21 Neb. 50.

8 Wds. & P.—18

Between husband and wife.

A "transfer" is defined to be the act by which the owner of a thing delivers it to another person, with the intent to pass the rights which he had in it to the latter. Under Gen. St. tit. 13, § 21, which provided that no sale or transfer by a husband of the personal property of his wife, or of his interest therein, should be valid, unless she should join with him in a written conveyance of the same, a pledge of furniture belonging to a married woman, and held by her husband as trustee for her under the statute, as security for a liability assumed by the pledgee for the husband, was not a transfer, within the meaning of the statute. Robertson v. Wilcox, 36 Conn. 426, 429.

In inheritance tax law.

"Transfer" means the present passing of property, without regard to whether the actual possession and enjoyment follow immediately or come at some future time. In re Hoffman's Estate, 143 N. Y. 327, 38 N. E. 311. The word "transfer," as used in the tax law, has its ordinary signification, and means the handing over or parting with property with intent to pass it, or certain rights in it, to another, who becomes the transferee. In re Gould's Estate, 156 N. Y. 423, 51 N. E. 287. Much confusion has apparently arisen because it has not always been borne in mind that the transfer taxed at the death of the testator is only a transfer which occurs at his death, not a future transfer which may take place, or because the present transfer with future enjoyment, and the future possible transferee, often unknown, have not always been so clearly distinguished. Therefore a contingent remainder is not subject to the transfer tax. In re Plum's Estate, 75 N. Y. Supp. 940, 942, 37 Misc. Rep. 466.

Prior to the amendment of tax law by chapter 76 of the Laws of 1899, the word "transfer" had been determined by the courts to have its ordinary legal signification, which is that the owner of a thing delivers it to another person with the intent of passing the rights which he has in it to the latter. In re Gould's Estate, 156 N. Y. 423, 428, 51 N. E. 287, 288. After the passage of the amendment, this definition was applied to it in re Vanderbilt's Estate, 66 App. Div. 27, 74 N. Y. Supp. 450, and resulted in making the amendment inoperative; it being reasoned that a transfer without a transferee was a thing impossible. The most recent decision of the Court of Appeals upon this subject is In re Brez's Estate, 172 N. Y. 609, 64 N. E. 958. The effect of these decisions is to hold that for the purposes of the act a transfer is the passing of the title of a valuable interest out of or from the estate of a decedent, though the transferee is not now ascertainable. In re Le Brun's Estate, 80 N. Y. Supp. 486, 487, 89 Misc. Rep. 516.

The word "transfer," in Tax Law, § 230, as amended by chapter 336, Laws 1890, providing that when property is transferred in trust or otherwise, and the estates of the transferees are dependent upon contingencies whereby they may be wholly or in part created, defeated, or extended, a tax shall be imposed upon such transfer at the highest rate which on the happening of such contingency will be possible, is used in its ordinary signification, namely, that the owner of the thing delivers it to another with the intent of passing the rights which he has in it to the latter. In re Vanderbilt's Estate, 74 N. Y. Supp. 450, 454, 68 App. Div. 27.

Where a testator bequeaths a legacy to a creditor in payment of his claim, and the creditor accepts it, it is a transfer, within the meaning of Laws 1892, c. 399, declaring that "a tax shall be and is hereby imposed on the transfer of any property . . . when the transfer is by will." In re Gould's Estate, 51 N. E. 287, 288, 156 N. Y. 423.

Any transfer of property made by will, whether such transfer is for the purpose of paying debts or as a gratuity, is a transfer, within the inheritance tax law. In re Rogers' Estate, 75 N. Y. Supp. 835, 837, 71 App. Div. 461.

The word "transfer" is defined in Laws 1892, c. 399 (section 22 of the act entitled "An act in relation to taxable transfers of property"), as to include the passing of property, or any interest therein, in possession or enjoyment, present or future, by inheritance, descent, devise, or bequest, grant, deed, bargain, sale, or gift. In re Hall's Estate, 34 N. Y. Supp. 616, 617, 88 Hun. 68; In re Hoffman's Estate, 38 N. E. 311, 312, 143 N. Y. 827.

Of insurance policy.

Where, in an action on a fire policy, the petition alleged that the policy had been transferred, assigned, and delivered to petitioner, the words "transferred and assigned" did not necessarily mean that the transfer was in writing, and the defendant had a right to know whether the purpose was to allege and prove an assignment or not. Hartford Fire Ins. Co. v. Amos, 25 S. E. 575, 98 Ga. 533; Amos v. Hartford Fire Ins. Co., Id.

The difference between the assignment of the interest of the assured in a life policy and the transfer or renewal to a third person of a policy is that the former is a contract between the assignor and the assignee only, while the latter is a contract to which the insurer is a party. Mutual Life Ins. Co. v. Allen, 138 Mass. 24, 27, 52 Am. Rep. 245.

Of insured property.

The term "transfer" or "termination of interest of insured" was used in a policy to render certain by a positive stipulation that the policies of the company should not be obligatory any longer than the property insured continued in the individual name in the policy as owner, and that by transfer of his interest the policy should be void. It is believed that the nullity they pronounce is generally understood as relating to cases where the insured has absolutely and permanently divested himself of all interest in the subject-matter of the insurance. Being, then, without any interest at the time of the loss, the insured has sustained no injury. Thus the policy becomes inoperative and void. Power v. Ocean Ins. Co., 19 La. 28, 29, 36 Am. Dec. 665.

A fire policy on merchandise, providing that it shall be void in case of any sale, alienation, transfer, or change of title in the property insured, construed not to include a mortgage on the property, since the giving the mortgage without a change of possession of the property did not constitute an alienation, sale, or transfer of title. Van Deusen v. Charter Oak Fire & Marine Ins. Co., 24 N. Y. Super. Ct. (1 Rob.) 55, 62, 1 Abb. Prac. (N. S.) 349, 358.

The execution of a mortgage on the insured premises has been held in the case of Commercial Ins. Co. v. Spankneble, 52 Ill. 53, 4 Am. Rep. 582, not to be a transfer or change of title prohibited by a clause in a policy. Aurora Fire Ins. Co. v. Eddy, 55 Ill. 213, 220.

Although a policy of insurance contained a clause prohibiting any transfer of the interest of insured, by sale or otherwise, without the consent of the insurer, yet a deed made by the insured, conveying the goods to the assignee in trust for creditors, will not render the policy void; the insured retaining the actual possession of the goods. Phoenix Ins. Co. v. Lawrence, 61 Ky. (4 Metc.) 9, 15, 81 Am. Dec. 521.

Under an insurance policy providing that if the insured property should be alienated by sale or otherwise, or if it should be transferred by any contract or change of ownership, the policy should be void, it was held that a contract for the sale of the property, under which no deed was made, and only a part of the purchase money paid, was not an alienation or change of ownership within the meaning of the policy. Hill v. Cumberland Valley Mut. Protection Co., 59 Pa. (9 P. F. Smith) 474, 477.

Within the meaning of the provision of an insurance policy issued to a partnership, that, "in case of any transfer or change of title in the property insured by this company, such insurance shall be void and cease," the dissolution of the partnership and a division of the goods so that each partner owned distinct portions was a change of title, and avoided the policy, though there was no sale from one to the other. Dreher v. Aetna Ins. Co., 18 Mo. 128, 134.

A policy of insurance, one of the conditions of which is that in case of any "sale, transfer, or change of title in the insured property the insurance shall be void," is avoided by a conveyance which is absolute in form, though given as security for a debt, merely; the words "transfer or exchange of title" being more comprehensive than the word "sale." Western Massachusetts Ins. Co. v. Riker, 10 Mich. 279, 281.

An insurance policy provided for an immediate termination of the risk if the property be sold or transferred, or any alienation or change take place in the title or possession, whether by legal process or judicial decree, or voluntary transfer or conveyance. It was held that the words "sold, transferred, or alienated," do not ordinarily include a sale upon execution, and the words "change in the title or possession" do not extend the meaning, and this would be the meaning were it not for the words "by legal process or judicial decree." But where, under a sale on execution, the owner of the land has full rights of possession and occupancy for 15 months after the sale, and for 12 months of that time he has an absolute right to redeem, so that neither possession nor title passes before the end of 15 months, sale on execution does not violate the provisions of the policy. Hammel v. Queen's Ins. Co., 11 N. W. 349, 355, 54 Wis. 72, 41 Am. Rep. 1.

The word "transfer," in a pencil memorandum on the back of an insurance policy, which provided that a transfer without the consent of the company indorsed thereon would be a violation thereof, was an important word, having a distinct meaning, and must be regarded as conveying notice that the property had been transferred. Batchelor v. People's Fire Ins. Co., 40 Conn. 56, 61.

Of mortgaged property.

Under the title, "An act to prevent the fraudulent transfer of personal property," a provision which makes it criminal to remove mortgaged property out of the county within which property was at the time of the execution of the mortgage is unconstitutional; it not being expressed in the title of the act. The title of the act is limited to the single purpose of preventing "the fraudulent transfer of personal property," and the word "transfer" is evidently used in its legal sense, and with reference to its legal meaning. In Bouv. Law Dict., the word is defined to be "the act by which the owner of a thing delivers it to another person with intent of passing the right he had in it to the latter." See, also, Winfield, Adjudged Words & Phrases. This being the meaning of the word, it cannot be said that the title expresses the subject of the act, for it cannot be successfully maintained that the removal of property from one county to another is a transfer of the property thus removed. Ex parte Thomason, 20 N. W. 312, 313, 16 Neb. 288.

The conveyance of a vessel, accompanied by a reconveyance by way of mortgage, does not work a transfer or termination of the mortgagee's interest, within the meaning of a marine policy providing it should be void if the insured transferred or terminated his interest without the consent of the insurer. Hitchcock v. Northwestern Ins. Co., 26 N. Y. 68, 69.

Of negotiable paper.

The word "transfer," in the judiciary act of March 3, 1887, c. 373, 24 Stat. 552, as amended by the act of August 13, 1888, c. 866, 25 Stat. 433 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 507], providing that no court shall have cognizance of any suit on a promissory note by an assignee thereof unless such suit might have been prosecuted in such courts if no assignment or transfer had been made, enlarges the scope of the word "assignment," and makes it cover every case in which title to negotiable papers, whose contents might be the subject of a suit, shall have become vested in a third party, whether by the acts of the parties or operation of law. United States Nat. Bank v. McNair (U. S.) 56 Fed. 323, 326.

The term "transfer," when applied to negotiable paper, is a general term, showing that the beneficial interest in the paper has passed to another, but not indicating in what manner the transfer has been made. It may be transferred either by indorsement, which has the technical meaning of writing on the back, or by delivery, or by independent writing, as a deed, etc.; the first mode passing to the transferee the legal title, and the last two the equitable interest in the paper. An averment that a note has been transferred by the payee to another without designation as to the mode of the transfer does not import that the legal title was transferred, and does not prevent the holder from showing that he is a holder by delivery. Montague v. King, 37 Miss. 441, 443.

Where a promissory note is transferred, and the collection of it is guaranteed by the payee in the following form, to wit, "This note is transferred and the collection of the same guaranteed to the holder hereof," the term "transferred and its collection guaranteed" should be construed as an assignment only of the note, and not as a commercial indorsement; and hence the makers can make any defense to a suit commenced by an assignee that could have been made to a suit if commenced by the payee, notwithstanding the assignee may take the note before due, and without knowledge of any infirmity in the note. Omaha Nat. Bank v. Walker (U. S.) 5 Fed. 399, 402.

A general authority in a stock note to "use, transfer, or hypothecate" the pledged property does not authorize a sale by the pledgee before maturity of the note. Ogden v. Lathrop, 31 N. Y. Super. Ct. (1 Sweeny) 643, 651.

Of stock.

In Sands v. Hill, 55 N. Y. 18, 22, Folger, J., says: "There is no meaning of the word 'transfer' which carries the idea of an act of extinction, or any other idea than that of the bearing over of a right or title in a thing from one to another." And where the articles of a joint-stock association provide that the death of a stockholder or the transfer of the stock shall work a dissolution, the word is not used in the technical sense of changing the name of the owner on the books of the company, but in a sense of a change of ownership in the property. Lane v. Albertson, 79 N. Y. Supp. 947, 954, 78 App. Div. 607.

Where the act incorporating a corporation authorizes the corporation to establish such by-laws as should appear necessary for the government of the corporation or the regulation of its concerns, and the by-laws provided that no transfer of any share should be valid until received for record by the clerk, who should enter on the transfer the time he received it, which should bear date accordingly, a sale or pledge of a share, accompanied by a letter of attorney to make the transfer, is of no avail to convey a title until the transfer is received for record by the clerk. Oxford Turnpike Co. v. Bunnel, 6 Conn. 552, 558.

The word "transfer," in Companies' Consolidation Act 1845, § 14, providing that any shareholder may sell and "transfer" all or any of the shares, and that such transfer shall be by deed duly stamped, etc., includes a conveyance by deed of the shares of a corporation included within the purview of the act, made in consideration of 10 shillings and natural love and affection, though such transaction is not a sale. Copeland v. Northeastern Ry. Co., 6 Bl. & Bl. 277, 281.

Of vessel.

The giving by the owner of a stipulation for the value of his interest in a vessel and her freight, under admiralty rule 54, without a judicial determination of such value after a hearing of the persons interested, is equivalent to a transfer of his interest in the vessel and her freight to a trustee for the benefit of claimants, under Rev. St. § 4285 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 2944]. Morrison v. District Court of United States, 13 Sup. Ct. 246, 247, 254, 147 U. S. 14, 37 L. Ed. 60.

TRANSFER BY INDORSEMENT.

The term, "transfer by indorsement," when used in reference to bills of exchange or promissory notes, means not only the making of the written indorsement on the instrument, but also includes the delivery of the instrument. Clark v. Sigourney, 17 Conn. 511, 523.

TRANSFER IN CONTEMPLATION OF INSOLVENCY.

See "Contemplation of Insolvency."

TRANSFER SERVICE.

The test of distinction between "transportation service," relatively to loaded freight cars, for which a railway company can lawfully charge tonnage rates and "switching or transfer service," for which it is restricted to a fixed charge per car, is not whether the movement of the cars involves the use of a portion of the company's main line or that of another, for there may be a transportation service over one or more spur tracks of the same company, if the contract of affreightment requires no movement over other tracks or lines of railway, whereas a switching or transfer service is one which precedes or follows a transportation service, and applies only to a shipment on which legal freight charges have already been earned or are to be earned. Dixon v. Central of Georgia Ry. Co., 35 S. E. 369, 371, 110 Ga. 173.

TRANSFERABLE.

See "Not Transferable."

TRANSFERABLE AT THE BANK.

Where a banking corporation issued a certificate that a certain person had standing to his credit on the books of the bank 10 shares of the capital stock thereof, "which are transferable at the bank in person or by attorney," the words "transferable at the bank" meant "transferable only at the bank," and also implied that an act of transfer was to be done at the bank under the cognizance of the officers of the bank. Williams v. Mechanics' Bank (U. S.) 29 Fed. Cas. 1376, 1377.

TRANSFERABLE BY DELIVERY.

The words "transferable by delivery," as used in Act June 4, 1879, making it embezzlement for any banker to receive on deposit, while insolvent, "any money, check, draft, bill of exchange, stocks, bonds, or other valuable thing which is transferable by delivery," qualify the words "other valuable thing" only, and it follows that the receiving on deposit of any check, draft, or bill of exchange, whether transferable by delivery or by indorsement, is within the meaning of the statute. American Trust & Sav. Bank v. Gueder & Paeschke Mfg. Co., 37 N. E. 227, 229, 150 Ill. 336.

TRANSGRESSIVE TRUST.

Trusts which transgress the rule against perpetuities are called "transgressive trusts." Pulitzer v. Livingston, 36 Atl. 635, 637, 89 Me. 359 (citing Fearne, Rem. 538, note).

TRANSIENT.

The Century Dictionary defines the word "transient" to mean (1) passing across, as from one thing or person to another; (2) passing with time; of short duration; not lasting; temporary; one who or that which is temporary; a transient guest. Commonwealth v. Townley, 7 Pa. Dist. R. 413, 415.

Webster defines the word "transient," "Not lasting; not permanent; of short duration." A doctor renting an office by the year, and keeping regular office hours at certain times, at a certain place, on three days of the week, is not indictable for keeping a transient office. Com. v. Townley, 7 Pa. Dist. R. 413, 416.

In poor laws.

"Transient persons," within the statute relating to paupers, means such persons in a town who have not come to reside, and who intend to return to a former residence at some future time. Town of Jamaica v. Town of Townshend, 19 Vt. 287, 271.

The phrase "transient person," in the statute relative to paupers, was not to be taken as literal, but as contradistinguished from those who "come to reside in the town." Danville v. Putney, 6 Vt. 512, 518.

"Transient," as the term is used in a statute relating to the cost of supporting transient persons in distress, means visitors, travelers, etc. The term cannot strictly be said to denote transition from place to place, and therefore apply merely to persons in an intermediate stage of a journey between two termini, though the word "transeo," from which "transient" is derived, means literally to go over—the participle of the verb "transiens" (going over)—not stationary, but by no means implies, by strict inference, that there are no termini in the transit. "Transeo" but seems to be the opposite of "resideo," which is to remain, to dwell, to continue; and therefore a "transient person" does not exactly mean a person on a journey from one known place to another, but, rather, a wanderer ever on the tramp. Middlebury v. Whaltham, 6 Vt. 200, 202; Rockingham v. Springfield, 9 Atl. 241, 243, 59 Vt. 521.

A transient person in a town, so as not to be a charge upon that town if he comes to want therein, is one who is on his passage from the place where his operations and plans center, through the town in which the misfortune befalls him, with an abiding purpose of presently returning to such place. An unmarried man engaged in peddling, who has no home, is not a transient in a town where he is taken sick and comes to want, but resides therein. Town of Londonderry v. Town of Landgrove, 29 Atl. 256, 66 Vt. 284.

A woman whose husband is poor, who has resided in a town for 10 years or more, and is living therein in a house that such husband has hired, and who is taken sick in said town at the house of another, who is the husband of such woman's aunt, and who is so sick that she cannot be removed without endangering her life, and the husband, who is also soon after taken sick and confined at the same house, and who are both relieved and supported by the husband of such woman's aunt, are "transient persons," within the meaning of Gen. St. c. 20, § 13, making the town liable for the support of such persons suddenly taken sick, etc. The liability of the town depends not on the person's settlement, nor on his transiency, as distinguished from the permanency of having come to reside, but only on his being confined by disability at some house that is not his home. Goodell v. Town of Mt. Holly, 51 Vt. 423, 427.

The word "transient" is the opposite of "resident." The latter describes a person at rest in a town, while the former describes him in his passage through or across it. As used in Rev. Laws, § 2818, relating to the recovery for the support of a "transient pauper," it does not include one who has bought a house and lot in a town, and supported his family there for a time before he becomes indigent. Town of New Haven v. Town of Middlebury, 21 Atl. 608, 610, 63 Vt. 399.

"Transient person," as used in Act 1797, relating to the legal settlement of a pauper who is a transient person, is not to be understood in a strict, literal sense. It includes all who do not have a legal settlement in a town, and those who have come into a town to reside, but have not gained a settlement therein. It has become settled by repeated decisions that a person confined in jail is a transient person. A person who goes into a town other than that in which his family resides, to work, and does actually work on a contract for labor, is a transient person. Town of Bristol v. Town of Rutland, 10 Vt. 574, 576.

A transient person, within the statute relating to paupers, is one abiding in a place, having the right to return to some other place when the term of service is completed, and having also the present and continuing intention to do so. Town of Berlin v. Town of Worcester, 50 Vt. 23, 26.

A person who went to a town in May for the purpose and with the intention of hiring out in the vicinity for the season, and to leave the state in the fall, and which purpose and intention were not changed so long as he remained in such town, is not a transient person, within the meaning of Gen. St. c. 20, § 13, making the town liable for the support of transient persons, etc. Town of Pittsford v. Town of Chittenden, 44 Vt. 382, 385.

A transient person, within the meaning of the poor laws, is one who does not come to a town to reside or dwell there, and does not include a person who comes into a town and resides in a family a few days as a servant, hired for no definite time, and who is taken sick, such person being a resident. Middlebury v. Waltham, 6 Vt. 200, 203.

TRANSIENT MERCHANT.

The occupation of the itinerant or transient merchant, or the mode of conducting it, closely resembles the business of hawkers and peddlers, and the methods generally practiced by them in disposing of their goods and wares. The transient merchant has no office or place of business, but migrates from town to town, remaining only long enough to dispose of his stock of goods. He is usually a stranger in the community where he offers his goods and makes his sales, and is often wholly irresponsible. Levy v. State, 68 N. E. 172, 175, 161 Ind. 251.

In construing an ordinance licensing transient merchants, it is held the term "transient merchant" does not refer to the residence of the individual. It more properly relates to the character of business carried on by him. City of Ottumwa v. Zekind, 64 N. W. 646, 95 Iowa, 622, 29 L. R. A. 734, 58 Am. St. Rep. 447.

A person who, as agent, merely solicits orders for goods for his principal, whether by sample or otherwise, is not a transient merchant, trader, or dealer. City of Wausau v. Heideman, 96 N. W. 549, 550, 119 Wis. 244.

The ordinary meaning of the term "transient dealer," or "trader" is one who goes from place to place carrying goods for the purpose of selling, trading, or dealing in the same, as distinct from one who does the same kind of business without traveling about. City of Wausau v. Heideman, 96 N. W. 549, 550, 119 Wis. 244.

The terms "itinerant merchant" or "transient vendor of merchandise," in a municipal ordinance requiring itinerant merchants and transient vendors of merchandise to take out a license, do not include an employé of a foreign firm, who solicits and takes orders for the sale of coffee, tea, and spices to be delivered on a future day to householders for their own consumption, although the orders are taken and the goods delivered and paid for within the limits of the city. City of Waterloo v. Heely, 81 Ill. App. 310, 315.

The term "transient vendor," within the meaning of the Elgin City ordinance prohibiting such merchants from pursuing their vocation within the city limits without a license, and defining itinerant merchants or transient vendors as including every person who goes from one city or village to another, stopping only a limited time in each, for the purpose of selling goods, wares, or merchandise, does not include a person who goes from place to place soliciting orders for the enlargement and framing of pictures, to be paid for on delivery if satisfactory. Twining v. City of Elgin, 38 Ill. App. 356, 357.

TRANSIT.

See "In Transit"; "Stoppage in Transitu."

"Transit," as used in Acts N. D. 1890, c. 188, § 32, providing that the charge for the inspection of grain shall be and constitute a lien on the grain so inspected, and when such grain is in transit the charges shall be treated as advance charges to be paid by the common carrier in whose possession the same is at the time of inspection, means the transit which must occur in getting the grain into the public warehouses of the state, and has reference solely to the intrastate and not to interstate transit. Great Northern R. Co. v. Walsh (U. S.) 47 Fed. 406, 408.

"Transit," as the term is used with reference to the right of stoppage in transitu, is not confined in its meaning to the passage of the goods through the country, but includes their situations in every stage, from the time of passing out of the control and possession of the vendor into that of the vendee. The accident of place is not a material circumstance, but the immediate relation of the parties to the goods is rather to be considered. Sutro v. Hoile, 2 Neb. 186, 195.

TRANSITORY ACTION.

"Transitory actions" are personal actions brought for the recovery of money or personal chattels, whether they sound in tort or in contract. 1 Chit. Pl. 273. All actions ex delicto to the person or to personal property, in which a mere personality is recoverable, are, as a general rule, by the common law, transitory in their nature. Such actions have their foundation in the supposed violations of rights which, in contemplation of law, have no locality, and for which the right to compensation is recognized by the laws of all countries, and rest upon the rule of international comity, that every nation may rightfully exercise jurisdiction over all persons within its limits in respect to matters purely personal. Story, Conf. Laws, § 542. Personal injuries are transitory in their nature. The test as to whether an action is transitory or local is not, as a general proposition, the subject causing the injury, but the object suffering the injury. McLeod v. Connecticut & P. R. Co., 58 Vt. 727, 733, 734, 6 Atl. 648.

A transitory action is defined by Black as one founded upon a cause of action not necessarily referring to or arising in any particular locality, and hence an action for damages from an explosion of nitroglycerin while in the hands of a carrier, claimed to have been caused by the negligence of defendant, who shipped it, in failing to notify the carrier of the nature of the package in which it was shipped, is an action in its nature personal and transitory, and may be brought wherever the defendant can be found and served with process—the gravamen of the action being the negligence of the defendant—and is not affected by the fact that there is a claimed injury to real estate, it being only one element of the damages. Barney v. Burnstenbinder (N. Y.) 64 Barb. 212, 215.

Transitory actions are such personal actions as seek only the recovery of money or personal chattels, whether they sound in tort or contract. They are universally founded on the supposed violation of rights which in contemplation of law have no locality. Judge Gould, in his work on Pleadings, c. 3, § 112, says it will be found, as a general proposition, that actions ex delicto, in which a mere personality is recoverable, are by common law transitory. An action for personal injuries is transitory. Ackerson v. Erie R. Co., 81 N. J. Law (2 Vroom) 309, 312.

Personal actions, whether sounding in tort or in contract, are, in general, transitory actions, and the matter may be laid to have taken place in the county where the action is to be tried, without any reference to the place where the thing really happened. Accordingly, under a declaration in slander, which alleged the words to have been spoken at G., in the county of M., the plaintiff was allowed to prove, as a substantive cause of action, that the words were spoken at D. in C. There is an exception to this rule where the place is matter of description. Lister v. Wright (N. Y.) 2 Hill, 320, 321.

When the action of covenant is founded on contract between the parties and their executors or administrators, it is transitory, and may be sued as such. Lienow v. Ellis, 6 Mass. 331, 332.

An action on the case against a railroad company for killing stock on its track, by reason of the company's failure to keep the adjoining fence in repair, is transitory, and not local, either by the common law or the statute. Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. Swearingen, 33 Ill. 289.

An action for a foreign injury is to be regarded as transitory. Smith v. Bull (N. Y.) 17 Wend. 323, 326.

An action of debt for escape is a transitory action. Jones v. Pemberton, 7 N. J. Law (2 Halst.) 350, 351.

Transitory actions are actions of a transitory character. They follow the party wherever he is to be found. McIntire v. McIntire (D. C.) 5 Mackey, 344, 350.

At common law, transitory actions might be brought in any county, and are those personal actions which might have arisen in any county—actions in assumpsit or contract, which seek nothing more than the recovery of money or personal chattels. Educational Soc. of Denomination Called Christians v. Varney, 54 N. H. 376, 377.

When a cause of action could only have arisen in a particular place or county, it is local, and the venue should be laid therein, as in real actions, mixed actions, waste, or ejectment. Worster v. Winnipiseogee Lake Co., 25 N. H. (5 Fost.) 525, 530.

Actions may be maintained in the courts of New Jersey by a Pennsylvanian to recover a debt or damage for personal injury. A Pennsylvania plaintiff may sustain an action in the court in New Jersey against a corporation chartered by the latter state for consequential injuries done to plaintiff's real property lying in Pennsylvania, caused by a canal located in New Jersey; the action being transitory. Rundle v. Delaware & R. Canal (U. S.) 21 Fed. Cas. 6, 11.

Trover is a transitory action, and an action for the conversion of timber is not made local by being brought against the original trespasser who cut the trees, notwithstanding the fact that the statute makes actions for trespass on land and the injury to land local. Greeley v. Stilson, 27 Mich. 153, 155.

Actions against railroad companies for personal injuries are transitory in their nature. South Florida R. Co. v. Weese, 13 South. 436, 440, 32 Fla. 212.

Local action distinguished.

Actions are deemed transitory where the transactions on which they are founded might have taken place anywhere, and local where their cause is in its nature necessarily local. Livingston v. Jefferson (U. S.) 15 Fed. Cas. 660, 664; Condon v. Leipsiger, 55 Pac. 82, 17 Utah, 498; McGonigle v. Atchison, 7 Pac. 550, 552, 33 Kan. 726. Thus actions for injury to real estate are generally local, and can be brought only where the real estate is situated, while actions for injuries to persons or to personal property, or relating thereto, are generally transitory, and may be brought in any county where the wrongdoer may be found. McGonigle v. Atchison, 7 Pac. 550, 552, 33 Kan. 726.

An action is transitory where the transactions on which the action is founded might have taken place anywhere, and the test of whether an action is local or transitory depends on the subject-matter which sustained the injury, and not on the subject causing the injury. Mason v. Warner, 31 Mo. 508, 510.

TRANSLATE—TRANSLATION.

To translate is to give the sense or equivalent of, as a word, expression, or an entire work, in another language or dialect. Stand. Dict. 1917. Hence to explain by clearer terms, or to express in a different form or style of language. Id. Generally speaking, a translation need not consist of transferring from one language into another. It may apply to the expression of the same thoughts in other words of the same language. As applied to a state Constitution, a translation into a foreign language, is not a copy thereof. Rasmussen v. Baker, 7 Wyo. 117, 140, 50 Pac. 819, 825, 38 L. R. A. 773.

TRANSMIT—TRANSMISSION.

"Transmit," as used in a will giving land to the decedent's brother and other land to his niece, providing that they should hold their respective shares independently of all others—he independently of his wife, and she of her future husband when she should marry—and "transmit" that share, respectively, to their children, if they should have such, free from all incumbrances and debts, is not to be given its literal meaning, so that the will vests merely a life estate in the niece, remainder in her children. Shannon v. Bonham, 60 N. E. 951, 953, 27 Ind. App. 369.

The word "transmit," as used in the provision that illegitimate children shall be capable of transmitting inheritance on the part of the mother in like manner, etc., implies, in connection with "inheritance," the transmission of an estate by descent either from the illegitimate child or through him. Garland v. Harrison (Va.) 8 Leigh, 368, 394.

The term "transmitting estates," as used in a statute providing that bastards shall be capable of inheriting from and through their mother, and of transmitting estates, must be construed so as to exclude the father and pass the entire estate to the mother, since the brothers and sisters could only inherit through the father. The language is not clear, but the general purpose of all such statutes changing the common law in this respect is to give the reciprocal right of inheritance to both the bastard and his mother, and the statute of this state seems to intend to make the blood of the bastard heritable only on the part of the mother, but fully so in that respect. Ford v. Boone (Tex.) 75 S. W. 353, 354.

Of letter.

A letter deposited in an office is, in every reasonable sense, transmitted, whether the person addressed resides in the same place or at a different one. The parties in both cases avail themselves of the services of the same public agent, acting under the same official responsibility. The only difference is that in one case the letter is put into a mail bag, and in the other into a box for delivery. Stanton v. Kline, 11 N. Y. (1 Kern) 196, 199.

Of telegram.

To "transmit" means to send from one person to another; to communicate. The undertaking of a telegraph company, when it receives a dispatch for transmission, is not only to transmit it over the wires, but, when it arrives at the place of destination, there to write it out and deliver it to the person addressed, for, under Rev. St. 1899, § 4160, providing that words and phrases shall be taken in the plain or ordinary and usual sense, the court must give to the word "transmit" its ordinary meaning. Parker v. Western Union Tel. Co., 87 Mo. App. 553, 559 (quoting Cent. Dict.; Webst. Dict.; Worcest. Dict.).

"Transmission of message" means its transmission from the telegraph office or station at which it is received to the one to which it is sent. Stamey v. Western Union Tel. Co., 18 S. E. 1008, 1010, 92 Ga. 613, 44 Am. St. Rep. 95.

The transmission of a telegram includes its delivery, and failure to deliver a telegram, under Rev. St. 1881, § 4176, penalizing a failure to transmit a message, means a failure to transmit it. Western Union Tel. Co. v. Gougar, 84 Ind. 176, 179.

TRANSMUTATION.

"Transmutation," while it is sometimes defined as the change from one species into another—the change from one nature, form, or substance into another—could not have misled the jury when used in an instruction that a sale, in law, is the transmutation of personal property from one person to another for a price; it having been used in the sense of “change” or “exchange.” State v. Smith, 32 Pac. 927, 928, 51 Kan. 120.

TRANSPORT—TRANSPORTATION.

Transported in same direction, see “Same Direction.”

Webster defines “transport” as to carry or convey from one place to another; again, to remove from one place to another; and throughout all the deviations of the word “transport” we find the same part of the definition—to remove. Columbia Conduit Co. v. Commonwealth, 90 Pa. 307, 309.

“Transported,” as used in a waybill describing merchandise as transported from one place to another, is equivalent to “carried,” but is distinct from the idea of forwarding. Ogdensburg & L. C. R. Co. v. Pratt, 89 U. S. (22 Wall.) 123, 133, 22 L. Ed. 827.

“Transport,” as used in Act July 6, 1812, § 2, providing that if any citizen of the United States, or person inhabiting the same, shall transport or attempt to transport, over land or otherwise, in any wagon, cart, sleigh, boat, or otherwise, naval or military stores, arms or munitions of war, or any articles of provision, from the United States to Canada, the thing by which the articles are transported, with the articles themselves, shall be forfeited, and the person so transporting shall forfeit a certain sum and be guilty of a misdemeanor, means, in its ordinary acceptance, to carry, to convey, in some one of the enumerated vehicles. Hence the driving of living fat oxen on foot is not a transportation thereof, within the meaning of the statute. United States v. Sheldon, 15 U. S. (2 Wheat.) 119, 120, 4 L. Ed. 199.

“Transportation,” in the sense of Acts 1888, c. 875, entitled “an act to prevent the transportation of people of color upon railroads or in steamboats,” means asportation; a taking out of the possession of the owner, without his privity and consent without the animus revertendi. Wilson v. State, 21 Md. 1, 9.

The term “transportation” includes all instrumentalities of shipment or carriage. Cobbeys Ann. St. Neb. 1903, § 10047; Code Iowa 1897, § 2122; Gen. St. Minn. 1894, § 379b; U. S. Comp. St. 1801, pp. 3154, 3206; Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 3012; Interstate Commerce Commission v. Brimson, 14 Sup. Ct. 1125, 154 U. S. 447, 38 L. Ed. 1047.

Tugs engaged in towing freight or passenger vessels through the canal, or passing through the canal on their return trip, are not used for the transportation of freight and passengers, within a statute authorizing a canal company to charge tolls upon all boats, vessels, steamboats, and other craft used for the transportation of freight or passengers. Sturgeon Bay & L. M. Ship Canal & Harbor Co. v. Leathem, 45 N. E. 422, 423, 164 Ill. 239.

“Transportation” implies the taking up of persons or property at some point, and putting them down at another. A tax, therefore, fixed by the state upon such receiving and landing of passengers and freight, is a tax upon their transportation—that is, upon the commerce between the states involved in such transportation—so that such tax is an encroachment upon the powers of Congress. Gloucester Ferry Co. v. Pennsylvania, 5 Sup. Ct. 826, 828, 114 U. S. 196, 29 L. Ed. 158.

The word “Transportation,” in the name of a company, does neither bind nor expressly authorize it to run trains on its road. Black v. Delaware & R. Canal Co., 22 N. J. Eq. (7 O. E. Green) 130, 411.

Where a company was incorporated for the purpose of establishing and conducting lines of steamboats, vessels, and stages between certain points for the conveyance of passengers and transportation of merchandise, the language of the charter did not include the making by such company of a contract for the breaking of ice and towing vessels through the track thus broken. Pennsylvania, D. & M. Steam Nav. Co. v. Dandridge (Md.) 8 Gill & J. 248, 319, 29 Am. Dec. 543.

Extradition and deportation distinguished.

Strictly speaking, “transportation, extradition, and deportation,” although each has the effect of removing a person from a country, are different things and for different purposes. Transportation is by way of punishment of one convicted of offense against the laws of the country. Extradition is the surrender to another country of one accused of an offense against its laws, there to be tried, and, if found guilty, punished. Deportation is the removing of an alien out of the country simply because his presence is deemed inconsistent with the public welfare, and without any punishment being imposed or contemplated, either under the laws of the country out of which he is sent, or under those of the country to which he is taken. Fong Yue Ting v. United States, 13 Sup. Ct. 1016, 1020, 149 U. S. 698, 37 L. Ed. 905.

Handle distinguished.

Within the meaning of Dispensary Act 1895, forbidding the transportation of alcoholic liquors, and providing a penalty for handling and transporting liquors in the nighttime, the terms "transporting" and "handling" are not equivalent words, and do not mean the same thing. "Transporting" means to carry, bear, or convey from one place or country to another, while handling is the act of touching, moving, or managing with the hand. It is clear that there may be a handling of alcoholic liquors, which could not with any appropriateness be described as the transportation thereof. For example, pouring liquor from a blind-tiger jug at night might be punished under section 37, as a handling of contraband liquors in the nighttime, but that could hardly be called a transportation of liquor, however transporting the effect might be. State v. Pickett, 25 S. E. 46, 47, 47 S. C. 101.

As trade.

See "Trade."

TRANSPORTATION COMPANY.

A corporation engaged in the business of transporting petroleum by means of pipes is a transportation company, within Act April 24, 1874, § 4, providing a certain tax on every railroad company, transportation company, etc. Columbia Conduit Co. v. Commonwealth, 90 Pa. 307, 309.

TRANSPORTATION SERVICE.

The test of distinction between transportation service, relatively to loaded freight cars, for which a railway company can lawfully charge tonnage rates, and switching or transfer service, for which it is restricted to a fixed charge per car, is not whether the movement of the cars involves the use of a portion of the company's main line, or that of another, for there may be a transportation service over one or more spur tracks of the same company if the contract of affreightment requires no movement over other tracks or lines of railway, whereas a switching or transfer service is one which precedes or follows a transportation service, and applies only to a shipment on which legal freight charges have already been earned or are to be earned. Dixon v. Central of Georgia Ry. Co., 35 S. E. 369, 371, 110 Ga. 173.

TRAP.

The word "trap," within the meaning of the rule that a landowner will be liable for injuries sustained by a trespasser because of a trap placed by the landowner on his land, would include any very dangerous construction or condition designedly arranged to do injury, but a particular danger resulting from a lack of care will not be understood as a trap where it is not easily discoverable. Moffatt v. Kenny, 54 N. E. 850, 851, 174 Mass. 811.

TRAVAIL

"Travail," as used in Pub. St. c. 85, § 16, providing that, on prosecutions for bastardy, accusations made in time of travail by the mother of the child as to its father may be received in evidence, embraces the time from when the pains of labor commence, up to and including the time of delivery. Scott v. Donovan, 26 N. E. 871, 153 Mass. 378.

TRAVEL—TRAVELER—TRAVELING.

See "Sue Labor and Travel."

"Traveling," in a large sense, means going from one place to another. White v. Beazley, 1 Barn. & Ald. 166, 171.

"Travel" has no precise or technical meaning, when used without limitation; but its primary and general import is to pass from one place to another, whether for pleasure, instruction, business, or health. L. B. Price Co. v. City of Atlanta, 31 S. E. 619, 623, 105 Ga. 358 (citing Lockett v. State, 47 Ala. 42, 45).

Persons belonging to the army and navy, who have no permanent residence they can call home, are regarded as "travelers or wayfarers," when stopping at public inns or hotels; and to make them chargeable as mere boarders it must be shown that an explicit contract had been made which deprived them of the privileges and rights which their vocation confers upon them as passengers or travelers. Hancock v. Rand, 94 N. Y. 1, 6, 46 Am. Rep. 112.

"Person traveling," as used in Code, art. 319, punishing the offense of carrying weapons, but exempting persons traveling, would not include one who had stopped in a town and engaged in a game of cards. He was not then traveling, and was not engaged in any business connected with his journey. Stilly v. State, 11 S. W. 458, 27 Tex. App. 445, 11 Am. St. Rep. 201.

The privilege of carrying concealed weapons, given by Code, § 4109, to a person traveling, commences when he sets out on a journey, and continues until he reaches home on his return. Coker v. State, 63 Ala. 95, 96.

A fugitive from justice is not a "person traveling," within Code, art. 319, punishing the carrying of weapons, except by a person traveling. Shelton v. State, 11 S. W. 457, 27 Tex. App. 443, 11 Am. St. Rep. 200.

As determined by distance.

A traveler is one who travels in any way; the distance not being material. L. B. Price Co. v. City of Atlanta, 31 S. E. 619, 623, 105 Ga. 358.

The term "traveling," in a statute prohibiting the carrying of concealed weapons, but making an exception in favor of persons traveling, does not include the return to his home after night from his place of business of a person who resides in the country contiguous to the city and town in which he has the place of business, and to which he is in the habit of going and returning daily. Eslava v. State, 49 Ala. 355, 357.

"Traveling," as used in the statute providing that a person traveling or setting out on a journey may carry concealed weapons, etc., means something more than the mere passing from place to place. The traveling must be, as is the setting out on a journey, such as is without the ordinary habits, business, or duty of the person, to a distance from his home and beyond the circle of his acquaintances. The original signification of "travel" was a day's travel. It is now applied to a travel by land from place to place without restriction of time. The terms "traveling" or "setting out on a journey," do not include the return of a person in a wagon from the county seat of one county to his home in another; the two points being about 20 miles apart. Gholson v. State, 53 Ala. 519, 521, 25 Am. Rep. 652.

The words "traveling or setting out on a journey," in Code Ala. 1876, § 4109, are used in their popular sense, and it is impossible to lay down any independent rule or determined distance which will unerringly characterize the act as a journey or the actor as a traveler. Much must depend on the circumstances of each particular case. Leaving the neighborhood of one's immediate friends and going among strangers, and possibly the purpose and object had in view, are circumstances to be weighed and considered in determining whether the person was traveling or setting out on a journey, so as to excuse the carrying of weapons concealed about the person. While there may be cases so plain that the presiding judge might as a matter of law instruct the jury that the defendant was or was not traveling or setting out on a journey, the fact that defendant was setting out by railroad to go to a place in another county, distant by railroad 40 miles and by dirt road 20 miles, is not sufficient to authorize the court to instruct the jury that it was not a setting out on a journey within the meaning of the statute. Wilson v. State, 68 Ala. 41, 42.

A person in Texas, en route with a herd of cattle to a market in Kansas, is a "traveler," within Pen. Code, art. 319, permitting travelers to carry firearms. Rice v. State, 10 Tex. App. 288, 289.

The phrase "persons traveling" includes a person going from the place where he has been temporarily residing to his home in another county. Campbell v. State, 28 Tex. App. 44, 11 S. W. 832.

Where defendant went to a city 60 miles distant, taking with him his pistol, and was arrested on the train which he had boarded for home, he was a "person traveling," within the exception of Pen. Code, art. 319, prescribing punishment for the carrying of arms. Impson v. State (Tex.) 19 S. W. 677.

A person leaving home at 4 o'clock in the morning to go 17 miles on a trading expedition, returning in the evening of the same day, cannot be regarded as traveling, so as to entitle him to carry a pistol. Goss v. State (Tex.) 40 S. W. 725.

A traveler is one who travels in any way—one who makes a journey or who goes from place to place; so that a person going a distance of 35 miles and return, occupying parts of two days, is a traveler, within the statute allowing travelers to carry weapons. Bain v. State, 44 S. W. 518, 38 Tex. Cr. R. 635.

Within the meaning of a statute providing that "every person, not being a traveler, who shall wear or carry any pistol, etc., or any other dangerous or deadly weapon concealed," shall be fined, one who was extensively engaged in the stave business, having stave yards at various places in the county in which he resided and an adjoining county, and traveled from his residence in a buggy to and from these several places in attending to his business, and was so engaged three-fourths of the time, was a traveler. The word "traveler" has no very precise or technical meaning when it is used without any limitation. Its primary and general import is to pass from place to place, whether for pleasure, instruction, business, or health. The length of the journey or its continuance does not destroy the character of the occupation. Burst v. State, 89 Ind. 133, 135.

A person going from his home by rail to a town 15 miles distant in an adjoining county to attend a political meeting, having no other business, and returning home from such meeting, is not engaged in travel outside ordinary habits, business, or duties, and at such a distance from home as takes him beyond the circle of his acquaintance among strangers with whose habits and character he is not familiar, and hence is not a "traveler," so as to be entitled to carry a deadly weapon, under Burns' Rev. St. 1901, § 2069, punishing the carrying of such weapons by others than travelers. The word "traveler," when used in a broad sense, designates one who travels in any way; distance not being material. It is clear that the Legislature did not use the word in this sense, for such signification would destroy the very purpose for which the section was enacted, by licensing, rather than suppressing, the practice of carrying concealed weapons. State v. Smith, 61 N. E. 506, 157 Ind. 241, 87 Am. St. Rep.

205 (citing Bishop, St. Crimes, § 788a; Bouv. Law Dict. [Rawle's Rev. Ed.] p. 1134; 5 Am. & Eng. Enc. of Law [2d Ed.] 743; Gholson v. State, 53 Ala. 519, 25 Am. Rep. 652; McGuirk v. State, 64 Miss. 209, 1 South. 103; Hathcote v. State, 55 Ark. 181, 183, 185, 17 S. W. 721; Davis v. State, 45 Ark. 359).

"Traveling," as used in the English statute, making horses let to hire for traveling liable to post duty, applies to a horse which was hired in London to go to Richmond and back, to return the same day, the distance being 20 miles, but does not apply to one used to go 10 or 12 miles into the country and back the same evening, or where it is to be used for an hour or two for an airing, or where it is to be used in riding many miles into the country and back the same day. Ramdeen v. Gibbs, 1 Barn. & C. 319, 326.

"Traveler," as used in St. 18 & 19 Vict. c. 118, § 2, requiring houses for the sale of fermented liquor to be closed from 3 to 5 o'clock on Sunday afternoons, except that refreshments may be furnished to "travelers," does not apply to one who goes to a place a short distance from his home merely for the purpose of taking refreshment; but one who goes to an inn for refreshment in the course of a journey, whether of business or of pleasure, is a "traveler," within the meaning of the statute. Taylor v. Humphreys, 10 C. B. (N. S.) 429, 435.

"Webster defines a traveler as one who travels in any way. Distance is not material. A townsman or neighbor may be a traveler, and therefore a guest at an inn, as well as he who comes from a distance or from a foreign country." Walling v. Potter, 35 Conn. 183, 185.

Dwellers and inhabitants of a city no larger than St. Paul in 1872, who changed their dwelling places from one part of the city to another, are not "travelers," within the meaning of the rule as to an innkeeper's liability to travelers. Lusk v. Belote, 22 Minn. 468, 470.

A traveler "is one who travels in any way. Distance is not material. A townsman or neighbor may be a traveler, and therefore a guest at an inn, as well as he who comes from a distance or from a foreign country. If he resides at an inn, his relation to the innkeeper is that of boarder; but if he resides away from it, whether far or near, and comes to it for entertainment as a traveler, and receives it as such, paying the customary rates, he should be subjected to all the duties of a guest, and entitled to all the rights and privileges of one. In short, any one away from home, receiving accommodation of an inn as a traveler, is a guest, and entitled to hold the innkeeper responsible as such." Pullman Palace Car Co. v. Lowe, 44 N. W. 226, 227, 28 Neb. 239, 6 L. R. A. 809, 26 Am. St. Rep. 325.

The term "traveling," when used in its ordinary sense, does not have reference to moving about from street to street or house to house in the city or its suburbs. The word, in a contract for the employment of a traveling salesman, was construed not to have such meaning. Kochmann v. Baumeister, 63 N. Y. Supp. 503, 504, 49 App. Div. 369.

One who walks a little over a mile on Sunday, partly for exercise and partly to make a social call, is not a "traveler" within Pub. St. c. 98, § 8, providing that "whoever travels on the Lord's day, except from necessity or charity, shall be punished." Barker v. City of Worcester, 29 N. E. 474, 139 Mass. 74.

As determined by purpose.

"Traveling," as used in Rev. Code Ala. § 3555, means to pass from place to place, whether for pleasure, instruction, business, or health, and the length of the journey does not destroy the character of the occupation. A person who is a passenger on a railway train for a distance of 28 miles to seek employment is traveling in the sense of the statute. Lockett v. State, 47 Ala. 42, 45.

A mail carrier, who had two routes, while going from one to the other was a "traveler," within the meaning of Rev. St. 1881, § 1985, exempting travelers from the provisions making it a criminal offense to carry concealed weapons. Lott v. State, 24 N. E. 156, 122 Ind. 393.

"Traveler," as used in St. 18 & 19 Vict. c. 18, § 2, prohibiting the sale of intoxicating liquors between the hours of 3 and 5 on Sunday afternoon, except to travelers, is not confined to those traveling for the purpose of business, but includes those traveling for pleasure as well. Atkinson v. Sellers, 5 C. B. (N. S.) 442, 448.

Every one passing on a highway, which constitutes "traveling" as used in Rev. St. c. 18, giving an action to travelers injured by defective highways, does not necessarily constitute traveling within chapter 124, prohibiting traveling or the doing of any work, labor, or business, etc., on Sunday. A person who walks on the highway simply for exercise in the open air is not traveling, in violation of chapter 124. O'Connell v. City of Lewiston, 65 Me. 34, 37, 20 Am. Rep. 673.

The general term "traveler" means one who travels in any way, one who makes a journey, one who goes from place to place. Going on a train every day some 150 miles would, in common parlance, constitute a traveler. Bain v. State, 44 S. W. 518, 38 Tex. Cr. R. 635. A railroad porter is a traveler, within the exemption of a statute authorizing travelers to carry weapons. Williams v. State, 72 S. W. 880, 381, 44 Tex. Cr. R. 494.

As determined by time occupied.

A "traveler" is not necessarily one who is merely on the move for a day. Davis v. State, 45 Ark. 359, 361.

"Traveling," as used in Rev. Code, § 3555, providing that persons traveling or setting out on a journey may carry concealed weapons, etc., includes a person who was traveling to a certain place on a raft in a certain river; it taking two days to complete the journey. Baker v. State, 49 Ala. 350, 353.

TRAVEL TO SERVE.

As used in Rev. St. 1898, § 731, subd. 27, providing that a sheriff should have a certain sum per mile for "travel to serve" a criminal warrant, means travel on the trip to serve which is successful. It means travel when it results in a service. Northern Trust Co. v. Snyder, 89 N. W. 460, 469, 113 Wis. 516, 70 Am. St. Rep. 367.

TRAVELED PART.

The "traveled part" of a turnpike or road means, when the wrought path is not obscured from the eye, that part which is usually wrought for traveling. Where from the quantity of snow on the ground the wrought path is obscured from the eye, and the traveled and beaten path is on the right of the center of the wrought path, the path then beaten and traveled by those passing and repassing with their sleds is the traveled part, to which the law of the road is restricted, and not the wrought part. The law is as well applicable to the path as actually traveled on the snow as it is to the wrought part in different seasons of the year. Jaquith v. Richardson, 49 Mass. (8 Metc.) 213, 215.

By the "traveled part" of a road, in a statute which requires persons traveling with any vehicle, meeting each other on the road, to turn to the right of the traveled part of the road, is meant that part which is usually wrought for traveling, and not any track which may happen to be made in the road by the passing of vehicles. Clark v. Commonwealth, 21 Mass. (4 Pick.) 125, 126; Winter v. Harris, 49 Atl. 398, 399, 23 R. I. 47, 54 L. R. A. 643.

The "traveled part of the road," within Comp. Laws, § 2002, relating to the conduct of parties driving along the highway, is that part which is wrought for traveling, and is not confined simply to the most traveled track. Daniels v. Clegg, 28 Mich. 32, 42.

TRAVELED PLACE.

"Traveled place," as used in St. 1849, c. 222, § 2, requiring a railroad to maintain a signboard at the place where the railroad crosses a "traveled place," should be construed to include an open and traveled street in a city, though not so laid out and established by the municipal authorities as to make the city responsible for damages occasioned by defects therein. Whittaker v. Boston & M. R. R., 73 Mass. (7 Gray) 98, 100.

Where a railroad company has not been requested in writing by the selectmen or required by the county commissioners to erect and maintain warning boards at the crossing of its road with a discontinued town way, such town way, though still used by abutting owners, is not a "traveled place," within the meaning of Pub. St. c. 112, § 163, which renders a railroad company liable for accidents caused by its failure to signal, etc., where the road crosses any highway or traveled place. Coakley v. Boston & M. R. R. Co., 33 N. E. 930, 932, 159 Mass. 32.

"Traveled place," as used in Gen. St. § 1483, requiring locomotive engineers and firemen on trains, when approaching any public highway or traveled place, to signal, etc., means a place where the public have a legal right to cross the track, and not a place where people are accustomed to cross to reach a store and post office, where such crossing was not a public one, and the railroad company did not know of or acquiesce in such crossing. Barber v. Richmond R. Co., 13 S. E. 630, 632, 34 S. C. 444.

"Traveled place," as used in Gen. St. § 1483, does not include a place where the right is one of mere sufferance. Hankinson v. Charlotte, C. & A. R. Co., 19 S. E. 206, 214, 41 S. C. 1.

Under Rev. St. § 1892, the use of a road crossing a railroad track for 20 years gives the public a prescriptive right therein, and makes the crossing a "traveled place" within such statute. Strother v. South Carolina & G. R. Co., 25 S. E. 272, 274, 47 S. C. 375.

"Traveled place," as used in Rev. St. 1893, § 1635, means not only a place where persons are accustomed to travel, but it must also be a place where persons have in some way acquired the right to travel, and an open space, which people have traveled for years, in going from the streets of a town to a depot, is a traveled place. Risinger v. Southern Ry. Co., 38 S. E. 1, 2, 59 S. C. 429 (citing Hale v. Columbia & G. R. Co., 34 S. C. 292, 299, 13 S. E. 537).

A "traveled place" is a place where a person has a legal right to be. Thus, where the right of the public to use a road has been established by proof of 20 years' use, the place where such road crosses a railway track is a traveled place, within Rev. St. § 1635, requiring signals to be given by railroads at such places. Kirby v. Southern Ry., 41 S. E. 765, 767, 63 S. C. 494.

TRAVELED PUBLIC ROAD.

A highway laid out across a railroad track, but which has not been actually opened for public travel, and no notice of which has been served upon the officers of the railroad company, is not a traveled public road, within the meaning of the statute which requires the ringing of a bell or sounding a whistle upon a train approaching the crossing of a railroad by a traveled public road. Cordell v. New York Cent. & H. R. R. Co., 64 N. Y. 535, 540.

To bring a case within the provisions of the General Railroad Act, Laws 1865, c. 82, § 7, requiring that a bell shall be rung or whistle sounded upon the engine of a train "approaching the place where the railroad shall cross any traveled public road or street," it is not sufficient that the locus in quo has been so dedicated to the public by the owners as to constitute it a public street, but it must be both traveled and public; and it was held that it was not negligence upon the part of the railroad company to fail to blow a whistle or ring a bell before crossing an alley which was not traveled or capable of being traveled. Bryne v. New York Cent. & H. R. R. Co., 94 N. Y. 12, 15.

To constitute a "publicly traveled road," it need not be a public road, but need only be publicly traveled. Morgan v. Wabash R. Co., 60 S. W. 195, 199, 159 Mo. 262.

"Traveled public road or street," as used in Wag. St. p. 310, §§ 38, 39, requiring a locomotive bell to be rung within a certain distance of a railroad crossing of a traveled public road or street and the erection of signs at such crossing, cannot be construed to include a way provided by a railway company across its own grounds for ingress to and egress from its depot. Bauer v. Kansas Pac. Ry. Co., 69 Mo. 219, 222.

The term "traveled public road," in Wag. St. § 3110, requiring trains approaching a regular traveled road to give certain signals, does not include a switch crossing provided by the railroad company across its own ground for ingress to and egress from its depot. Hodges v. St. Louis, K. C. & N. Ry. Co., 71 Mo. 50, 51.

A traveled public road, within a statute requiring signals by railroads at public crossings, is sufficiently shown by evidence that the road has been traveled and worked for 10 or 15 years. State v. St. Joseph, St. L. & S. F. Ry. Co., 46 Mo. App. 466, 470.

"Traveled road," as used in the statute requiring a bell to be rung or a whistle to be sounded at least 80 rods from where a railway crosses a traveled road or street, applies to highway or public highway, without regard to whether they have been legally laid out or dedicated as such, but does not include private farm crossings. Czech v. Great Northern Ry. Co., 70 N. W. 791, 792, 68 Minn. 85, 38 L. R. A. 302, 64 Am. St. Rep. 452.

TRAVELED WAY.

The "traveled way" which it is the duty of borough authorities to keep in a reasonable condition is the part of the road that the borough has laid out and provided for public travel. Nudd v. Borough of Lansdowne, 42 Atl. 474, 190 Pa. 89.

Evidence that persons had been accustomed to pass over a railroad bridge, at each end of which there was a notice to keep off, showed that such bridge was not a "traveled way," within the statute providing that failure to give signals at such a place is negligence per se. Ringstaff v. Lancaster & C. Ry. Co., 43 S. E. 22, 24, 64 S. C. 546.

TRAVELER ON HIGHWAY.

One who received an injury while crossing planking placed over a gutter within the located limits of a public street, but outside of the wrought portion thereof, put there to facilitate access from the street and private way or court, is not a traveler upon the street, within the meaning of Rev. St. c. 18, §§ 40, 65, giving travelers injured upon highways, etc., an action against the town for failure to keep it in repair. Philbrick v. Inhabitants of Pittston, 63 Me. 477, 478.

"Traveler," as used in the Maine act giving a right of action to travelers injured on a defective highway, does not include one going from his dwelling to his water-closet by passing into the highway around the end of a drain in process of excavation. Leslie v. City of Lewiston, 62 Me. 468, 470.

A trespasser who reaches the middle of a street crossing from ties, either up or down the railroad, is in no sense of the word a "traveler" from the street, approaching danger, and about to exercise a right common to the public, that of crossing the railroad, so as to have the question of his contributory negligence affected by the fact that the gates at the side of the crossing are up and the watchman gives no signal. Matthews v. Philadelphia & R. R. Co., 28 Atl. 936, 937, 161 Pa. 28.

"Traveler," as used in Rev. St. c. 25, § 1, providing that towns shall keep all highways, etc., safe and convenient for travelers passing along and upon them with their horses, teams, and carriages, should not be construed to mean only persons with horses, teams, and carriages, but may include a person with an elephant. Gregory v. Inhabitants of Adams, 80 Mass. (14 Gray) 242, 247.

As affected by temporary stop.

A person lawfully passing on the street does not cease to be a traveler, so as to be come an intruder, by stopping on the door-sill of a house fronting on the street for the purpose of adjusting his shoe, his head being within the lines of the street, and receiving an injury on his head while thus occupied; and hence he may recover where the injury was caused by a nuisance. Murray v. McShane, 52 Md. 217, 226, 36 Am. Rep. 367.

A person journeying on a highway does not necessarily forfeit his rights as a traveler, within the meaning of Gen. St. c. 44, § 22, giving a right of action to travelers on a highway, by stopping to pick berries by the wayside. Britton v. Inhabitants of Cummington, 107 Mass. 347, 352.

The word "travelers," in the Massachusetts statute imposing a duty upon municipal corporations of keeping all highways within their limits in such state of repair that they may at all times be safe and convenient for travelers passing along or upon them, was construed in Blodgett v. City of Boston, 90 Mass. (8 Allen) 237, to include every one who had occasion to pass over the highway for any purpose of business, convenience, or pleasure. A person was still a traveler on a street, though he had stopped a moment for a drink from a hydrant situated just within a lot. Duffy v. City of Dubuque, 18 N. W. 900, 902, 63 Iowa, 171, 50 Am. Rep. 743.

"Traveling," as used in a statute giving an action in favor of persons injured while traveling upon the highway, implies the use of the highway for the purposes for which highways are constructed, and only applies to persons thereon while they are so using the highway; but a person does not cease to be traveling merely by lingering or stopping a moment on the way. Hardy v. Town of Keene, 52 N. H. 870, 377.

A person is "traveling upon the highway," within the meaning of Gen. St. c. 69, § 1, giving an action against the town in favor of persons injured while upon the highway, when he is making a reasonable use of the highway as a way; and such use does not cease because of a short stop on the street. Varney v. City of Manchester, 58 N. H. 430, 431, 40 Am. Rep. 592.

The person who fastens his horse and wagon at the side of the highway is not "traveling," within the meaning of a statute giving an action for injuries to persons traveling on a highway from negligence of the town, etc. Cummings v. Town of Center Harbor, 57 N. H. 17, 19.

The passage of a traveler along the highway is not, as a rule, continuous between the extreme points of his journey. The demands of his business oftentimes compel him to withdraw temporarily from the limits of the road. The dwelling house, the post office, the store, the gristmill, the blacksmith's shop, the inn, and the watering trough quite often stand a little aside, and accessible from the highway. To visit one or the other of these is the occasion for the passage upon it. Those who maintain it expect the traveler to draw aside for business or pleasure at these several places and return to it. Indeed, these temporary, perhaps momentary, withdrawals from and stoppages outside of its limits, with the intent to return to it and pursue the journey, are so absolutely necessary to the beneficial and convenient use of it by the public, that they should be considered as necessary incidents to a passage over the road. And the court held that, though the statute requiring towns obliged to maintain any bridge to erect and maintain a good and sufficient railing or fence on the side thereof, and providing that, if any person shall suffer any damage in his property by reason of the want of such railing, or fence, such town shall pay to him just damages, was intended to promote the comfort and convenience and insure the safety of travelers, the town was not exempt from liability or damage to a runaway team resulting from a neglect to maintain a sufficient railing along a bridge, because the team started to run away from a point on the owner's premises and outside the limits of the highway. Ward v. Town of North Haven, 43 Conn. 148, 154.

As determined by purpose.

A person using a highway simply for the purpose of play is not a "traveler," within the statute giving travelers an action for injuries received on defective highways. Blodgett v. City of Boston, 90 Mass. (8 Allen) 237, 238; Tighe v. City of Lowell, 119 Mass. 472.

A girl passing on a sidewalk on her return from school is a "traveler," within the meaning of a statute giving an action to travelers injured on a defective highway. Stinson v. City of Gardiner, 42 Me. 248, 255, 66 Am. Dec. 281.

"Traveler," as used in a statute giving an action to travelers injured on a defective highway, includes every one, whatever may be his age or condition, who has occasion to pass over the highway for any purpose of business, convenience, or pleasure. Higginson v. Inhabitants of Town of Nahant, 93 Mass. (11 Allen) 530, 535.

A person passing from place to place on a sidewalk is a "traveler" thereon, whether going for business or pleasure. The following and guiding of a rolling hoop by a little girl on a sidewalk did not make her any the less a traveler. Reed v. City of Madison, 53 N. W. 547, 549, 83 Wis. 171, 17 L. R. A. 733.

"Traveler," as used in determining the liability of a city for negligence or for injuries on its streets to travelers, will not be given a narrow and restricted meaning, but embraces all those who are making an appropriate and legitimate use of the street, and one which was within the contemplation of the city when the right to use such street was granted. City of Kansas City v. Orr, 61 Pac. 397, 398, 62 Kan. 61, 50 L. R. A. 783.

"Travelers," as used in the statute requiring that a public highway shall be safe and convenient for travelers with horses, teams, and carriages, means those traveling for some purpose or other for which streets are required to be constructed and kept in repair. A person may be a traveler, and not such within the contemplation of the statute. He may be within or without the protection of the statute, and still a traveler, depending on whether his use of the highway or street is a legitimate one or not. Hence one using the highway for the purpose of racing was not a traveler within the meaning of the statute, not because racing horses is an unlawful thing, but because it was a purpose for which the street was not designed to be used. If the person had been on his way to his business house or home, or had been out riding for pleasure or recreation, and while so doing had speeded his horse to keep up with or pass other teams on the road, he might still have been a traveler within the protection of the statute, for in such case the racing might have been an incidental or casual thing; but where a person used a highway solely for the purpose of horse racing in the same manner he would have used it if a race course, fitted and designed for the purpose, he is not a traveler. McCarthy v. City of Portland, 67 Me. 167, 168, 24 Am. Rep. 23.

A person walking a short distance in the public highway simply for exercise on a Sunday evening, with no purpose of going to or stopping at any place but his own house, or of passing from one city or town to another, is not a traveler within the meaning of a statute forbidding traveling on Sunday, but is a traveler within the meaning of a word used in a statute giving an action to travelers injured by defective highways. Hamilton v. City of Boston, 96 Mass. (14 Allen) 475, 484.

TRAVELING AGENT.

As operative, see "Operative."

TRAVELING FROM PLACE TO PLACE.

"Traveling from place to place," as used in Rev. St. 1895, art. 5049, requiring specialists travelling from place to place in the practice of their profession to pay a certain tax in each county in which they practice, does not include one having two places of business, and dividing his time between the two, and attending professional calls in other counties. Hairston v. State, 37 S. W. 858, 36 Tex. Cr. R. 470.

TRAVELING IN CONVEYANCE.

An accident policy, which provided that the insurer should be liable for all injuries received by the insured while "traveling in a public or private conveyance," meant, not only while actually in some conveyance, but while passing from one conveyance to another on a journey. Northrup v. Railway Pass. Assur. Co., 43 N. Y. 516, 519, 3 Am. Rep. 724.

TRAVELING MERCHANT.

The term "traveling merchant," as used in Act March 27, 1848, forbidding any person from selling goods as a traveling merchant, means one who goes about with goods making sales, and it is not a violation of the act to travel from farm to farm, exchanging the goods of a merchant for farm produce; but taking orders for goods while traveling through the country, and afterwards delivering the goods and taking pay, is a violation of the statute. Commonwealth v. Edison, 2 Pa. Co. Ct. R. 377, 379.

TRAVELING PEDDLER.

In an ordinance of a town, passed pursuant to Elliott's Supp. § 826, to prohibit peddling within the corporate limits without a license, the term "traveling peddler," applies to all who travel from house to house in the town for the purpose of vending merchandise, without regard to their place of residence. Martin v. Town of Rosedale, 29 N. E. 410, 411, 130 Ind. 109.

TRAVELING SALESMEN.

See, also, "Commercial Traveler"; "Drummer."

As engaged in interstate commerce, see "Interstate Commerce."

One employed by wholesale dealers in dry goods, paying his own expenses and receiving house and road commissions, his compensation being entirely by commissions on approved sales, whether made upon the road or at the house, by him or any one to customers whom he had secured, is a traveling salesman. Mulholland v. Wood, 31 Atl. 248, 249, 166 Pa. 486.

A traveling salesman is one who exhibits samples of, and takes orders from purchasers for, his employer's goods, and is not in a popular sense a broker or factor, though he may be compensated for his services by commissions on the sales so effected by him. Appeal of Corr, 27 Atl. 681, 682, 157 Pa. 133.

An agent of a firm, who goes from town to town in the state exhibiting samples of goods and taking orders on his employer for such goods from consumers, is a "traveling salesman," within Act Dec. 14, 1896, prohibiting town authorities from collecting a license from any traveling salesman. L. B. Price Co. v. City of Atlanta, 31 S. E. 619, 623, 105 Ga. 353.

As clerk, laborer, etc.

TRAVELING VENDORS.

A traveling vendor is one who carries about with him the articles of merchandise which he sells; that is to say, he has with him the identical merchandise he sells, and delivers the same at the time of sale—his vocation differing in this respect from that of the commercial drummer, who carries only samples of his wares, which he exhibits, and takes orders for future delivery. Pegues v. Ray, 23 South. 904, 905, 50 La. Ann. 574.

Where a statute in relation to hawkers and peddlers taxed "traveling vendors," the statute included vendors traveling from place to place within the limits of the same town, and was not limited to vendors traveling from one town or place to another. Andrews v. White, 32 Me. 388, 389.

TRAVERSE.

See "Special Traverse."

A "traverse" is a denial by a party of facts alleged in an adverse pleading, if they be presumptively within his knowledge, or a denial that he has sufficient knowledge or information to form a belief concerning them, if they be not presumptively within his knowledge. Code, § 113; Dickinson v. Gray (Ky.) 9 S. W. 281, 282.

TREASON.

"Treason" is defined in the United States Constitution as only consisting in levying war against the United States, or adhering to their enemies, giving them aid and comfort. "No other acts can be declared to constitute the offense. Congress can neither extend nor restrict nor define the crime." United States v. Greathouse (U. S.) 26 Fed. Cas. 18, 21.

"Treason" is a breach of allegiance, and can be committed by him only who owes allegiance, either perpetual or temporary. Young v. United States, 97 U. S. 39, 62, 24 L. Ed. 992, 998 (citing United States v. Wiltberger, 18 U. S. [5 Wheat.] 76, 96, 5 L. Ed. 37).

Treason against the United States, consisting of levying war against them, requires an assemblage of men ready to act and with an intent to do some treasonable act, and armed in warlike manner, or else assembled in such numbers as to supersede the necessity of arms. United States v. Bollman (U. S.) 24 Fed. Cas. 1189, 1193.

Chief Justice Marshall, in defining "treason" on the trial of Burr, said: "It is not enough to be leagued in the conspiracy and that war be levied, but it is also necessary to perform a part. That part is the act of levying war. That part, it is true, may be minute. It may not be the actual appearance in arms, and it may be remote from the scene of action; that is, from the place where the army is assembled. But it must be a part, and that part must be performed by a person who is leagued in the conspiracy. This part, however minute or remote, constitutes the overt act, of which alone the person who performs it can be convicted." United States v. Greathouse (U. S.) 26 Fed. Cas. 18, 21.

Treason against the United States is defined by the Constitution itself. Congress has no power to enlarge, restrain, construe, or define the offense. The construction is intrusted to the court alone. By this instrument it is declared that "treason against the United States shall consist only in levying war against them, or in adhering to their enemies, giving them aid and comfort." What constitutes levying war against the government is a question which has been the subject of much discussion, whenever an indictment has been tried under this article of the Constitution. The levying of war is not necessarily to be judged of alone by the number or array of troops, but there must be a conspiracy to resist by force, and an actual resistance by force of arms, or intimidation by numbers. The conspiracy and insurrection connected with it must be to effect something of a public nature, to overthrow the government, or to nullify some law of the United States and totally to hinder its execution or compel its repeal. A conspiracy to resist by force the execution of a law in particular instances only, a conspiracy for a personal or private, as distinguished from a public and national, purpose, is not treason, however great the violence or force or numbers of the conspirators may be. So where a number of citizens in a free state collected together to prevent the enforcement of the fugitive slave law and the return of the escaped slave to his master in a slave state, the question whether such individuals were levying war against the United States was submitted to the jury, who found for the defendants. United States v. Hanway (U. S.) 26 Fed. Cas. 105, 126.

A levying of war, without having recourse to rules of construction or artificial reasoning, would seem to be nothing short of the employment, or at least of the embodying, of a military force, armed and arrayed in a warlike manner, for the purpose of forcibly subverting the government, dismembering the Union, or destroying the legislative functions of Congress. These troops should be so armed and so directed as to leave no doubt that the United States or their government were the immediate object of the attack. The act of resisting the embargo law by taking away from the United States officers and soldiers a raft of timber which had been seized by the collector, though done by a considerable force and by the firing of guns, and thereby intimidating the collector and troops, does not constitute a levying of war, or the offense of treason. United States v. Hoxie (U. S.) 28 Fed. Cas. 397, 398.

On an indictment for treason in adhering to the enemy, charging the defendant with going from the British squadron to the state of Delaware, with intention to procure provisions for the squadron, the going from the British squadron to the shore for the purpose of procuring peaceable provisions for the enemy did not amount to treason, as this conduct rested in intention, which is not punishable. United States v. Pryor (U. S.) 27 Fed. Cas. 628, 629.

"Treason, felony, or other crime," as used in Const. U. S. art. 4, cl. 2, declaring that if a person, charged in any state with treason, felony, or other crime, shall flee from justice and shall be found in another state, he shall, on demand of the executive authority of the state from which he fled, be delivered up to be removed to the state having jurisdiction of the crime, means every offense forbidden and made punishable by law in the state where the offense was committed. Commonwealth of Kentucky v. Dennison, 65 U. S. (24 How.) 60, 99, 16 L. Ed. 717; People v. Donohue, 84 N. Y. 438, 441; Barranger v. Baum, 30 S. E. 524, 528, 103 Ga. 465, 68 Am. St. Rep. 113; In re Hughes, 61 N. C. 57, 64; Hyatt v. People, 23 Sup. Ct. 456, 461, 188 U. S. 691, 47 L. Ed. 657 (citing Kentucky v. Dennison, 65 U. S. [24 How.] 60, 16 L. Ed. 717).

TREASURE.

A treasure is a thing hidden or buried in the earth, on which no one can prove his property, and which is discovered by chance. Civ. Code La. 1900, art. 3423.

TREASURE TROVE.

"Treasure trove" is where any money is found hid in the earth, but not lying on the ground, and no man knows to whom it belongs. Sovern v. Yoran, 20 Pac. 100, 103, 16 Or. 269; Livermore v. White, 74 Me. 452, 456, 43 Am. Rep. 600.

It is not treasure trove if the owner can be known, nor though he be dead, for his executor or administrator shall have it. Livermore v. White, 74 Me. 452, 456, 43 Am. Rep. 600.

"Treasure trove," which is commonly defined as gold or silver hidden in the ground, may in our commercial day be taken to include paper representations, especially when they are found hidden with both of these precious metals; and it is not necessary that the hiding should be in the ground. Huthmacher v. Harris' Adm'rs, 38 Pa. (2 Wright) 491, 499, 80 Am. Dec. 502.

TREASURER.

See "Deputy Treasurer"; "Town Treasurer."

Worcester defines the word "treasurer" as "one having charge of the money, funds, or revenue of a society, corporation, state, or nation." Abbott, in his Law Dictionary, more pointedly defines it as "the style or title of an officer to whom funds are committed to be kept or disbursed. The function is much the same in all cases—to take charge of the funds or revenues as they come in, keep them safely, and make payments from them as required from time to time." As used in an indictment charging an officer with the embezzlement of moneys intrusted to him as treasurer, it is equivalent to a charge that the funds were intrusted to him for safe-keeping or disbursement, as required by Rev. St. § 903. State v. Eames, 3 South. 93, 95, 39 La. Ann. 986.

A public treasurer is one who receives public moneys, keeps them in his charge, and disburses them upon proper orders. Mutual Life Ins. Co. of New York v. Martien, 71 Pac. 470, 471, 27 Mont. 437.

"Treasurer," as used in Const. Cal. art. 11, § 16, providing that all moneys of any municipal corporation, coming into the hands of any officer thereof, shall immediately be deposited with the treasurer or other legal depositary to the credit of such corporation, means the custodian of public money; and he is a public officer. Yarnell v. City of Los Angeles, 25 Pac. 767, 768, 87 Cal. 603.

Where a few persons assemble and form a voluntary society to raise money to be appropriated to some specific object, and choose one of their members to be their treasurer, the meaning of the word "treasurer" would imply that he held their funds for their use, to be appropriated according to their order. He would be a trustee for them, and accountable to them. Weid v. May, 63 Mass. (9 Cush.) 181, 189.

The treasurer of a corporation is the one who holds or keeps the treasury. His duty is to receive and guard its funds, to expend them, not at his own whim, or upon his own judgment, but as directed by those vested with the authority under its law; and while it is possible that a check drawn fraudulently by a treasurer alone, where counter signature of another officer was required, on the faith of which some innocent third person may have acted to his detriment, might be binding on the corporation, such a recognition of the power of a treasurer is the extreme limit to which this power would be carried by implication. In re Millward-Cliff Cracker Co.'s Estate, 28 Atl. 1072, 1074, 161 Pa. 157.

The term "treasurer," as used in the title relating to private corporations, shall mean the officer who has the care and custody of the funds of the corporation, by whatever name he is designated. V. S. 1894, 3676.

TREASURY.

"Treasury," as used throughout the Arkansas Constitution, means the state treasury, and not a county treasury. Straub v. Gordon, 27 Ark. 625, 628.

The word "treasury," as used in Comp. Laws, § 5771, which provides for the punishment of any officer, clerk, or other person employed in the "treasury" of the state who shall commit any fraud or embezzlement therein, "is not to be understood as descriptive of the particular building within which the treasurer keeps his principal office or place of official business; but moneys are to be considered as in the state treasury whenever and wherever they are in the official custody of the treasurer, or subject to his direction or control." People v. McKinney, 10 Mich. 54, 86.

TREASURY NOTE.

As cash, see "Cash."

As money, see "Money."

As promissory note, see "Promissory Note."

A "treasury note" is a bill circulating as money by authority of the general government; and this is also a sufficient designation of the species of money to constitute a valid description of the property in an indictment for robbery. Brown v. State, 25 South. 182, 184, 120 Ala. 342.

TREAT.

Gen. St. p. 332, § 16, providing that if any party obtaining a verdict in his favor shall, during the term of court in which such verdict is obtained, give to one of the jurors in such case, knowing him to be such, any victuals or drink "by way of treat," etc., means something distinct from the ordinary exercise of friendly hospitality, and does not forbid such acts of hospitality in the intercourse of friends as would be usual and ordinary, but was designed to apply to something of a different character, to an entertainment or treat which suggests the idea of convivial enjoyment and fellowship, rather than the customary hospitalities of daily life. Carlisle v. Town of Sheldon, 38 Vt. 440, 445.

TREATMENT.

Treatment endangering life, see "Endanger."

TREATY.

A treaty is a contract between nations. Goetze v. United States (U. S.) 103 Fed. 72, 79.

A treaty implies political relations. Marks v. United States, 16 Sup. Ct. 476, 478, 161 U. S. 297, 40 L. Ed. 706.

"Treaty," in the law of nations, "is an agreement or contract between two or more nations or sovereigns, entered into by agents appointed for that purpose, and duly sanctioned by the supreme powers of the respective parties." Cherokee Nation v. Georgia, 30 U. S. (5 Pet.) 1, 60, 8 L. Ed. 25.

A treaty is a compact formed between two nations or communities having the right of self-government. The only requisite is that each of the contracting parties shall possess the right of self-government and the power to perform the stipulations of the treaty. Worcester v. Georgia, 31 U. S. (6 Pet.) 515, 581, 8 L. Ed. 483.

A treaty "is a contract between independent nations, depending for the enforcement of its provisions on the interest and honor of the governments which are parties to it. If these fail, its infractions become the subject of international negotiations and reclamations, so far as the injured chooses to seek redress, which may in the end be enforced by actual war." Edye v. Robertson, 5 Sup. Ct. 247, 254, 112 U. S. 580, 28 L. Ed. 798.

A treaty is a contract, and hence is to be construed on principles similar to those applied to other articles. Anything necessarily implied is as though inserted. Adriance v. Lagrave, 59 N. Y. 110, 115, 17 Am. Rep. 317.

A treaty is usually a contract between the parties. It may, however, be so framed as to accomplish this purpose without any further act, if the language used be suitable, and the purpose be such as may be thus accomplished. In the United States a treaty is to be regarded as the supreme law, and operative as such when the stipulations do not import a contract to be performed. Little v. Watson, 32 Me. 214, 223, 224.

The terms "treaty" and "convention," as used in Rev. St. U. S. § 2116, providing that no purchase, grant, lease, or other conveyance of lands from an Indian nation shall be valid, unless made by treaty or convention pursuant to the Constitution, are employed in the sense of compacts between states and organized communities or their representatives. This is the ordinary signification of those words; the first meaning which is suggested by their use. This is not doubted as to the word "treaty," and scarcely admissible of doubt as to the word "convention," when used in connection with the word "treaty." United States v. Hunter (U. S.) 21 Fed. 615, 616.

The term "treaties," in the clause of the Constitution providing that the Constitution and the laws of the United States made in pursuance thereof and all treaties made shall be the supreme law of the land, includes treaties with the Indians, adopted prior to the adoption of the Constitution. Langford v. Monteith, 1 Idaho, 612, 616.

A treaty—in Latin, "foedus"—is a compact, made with a view to the public welfare by the superior power, either for perpetuity or for a considerable time. The compacts which have temporary matter for their objects are called "agreements," "conventions," and "pactions." They are accomplished by one single act, and not by repeated acts. These compacts are perfected in their execution once for all. Treaties receive a successive execution, whose duration equals that of the treaty. Public treaties can only be made by the supreme power, by sovereigns who contract in the name of the state. Thus conventions made between sovereigns affecting their own private affairs, and those between sovereigns and a private person, are not public treaties. The public compacts called "conventions," "articles of agreement," etc., when they are made between sovereigns, differ from treaties only in their object. Holmes v. Jennison, 39 U. S. (14 Pet.) 540, 571, 10 L. Ed. 579, 618 (quoting Vattel, §§ 152–154, 218).

A treaty is a written contract between sovereigns. Its terms are agreed on, and it is signed, by plenipotentiaries or commissioners, who are the authorized agents of the contracting powers; but after such agreement and signatures it must be ratified by the governments, and the ratifications constitute the delivery. Up to that time it is inchoate, and may never take effect. Ex parte Ortiz (U. S.) 100 Fed. 955, 962.

As between contracting sovereigns, a treaty, when ratified, relates back to the time of signing, as the stipulations it makes have reference to the then existing conditions. Ex parte Ortiz (U. S.) 100 Fed. 955, 962.

As a law of the land.

"A treaty is primarily a compact between independent nations. It depends for the enforcement of its provisions on the interest and the honor of the governments which are parties to it. If these fail, its infraction becomes the subject of international negotiations and reclamations, so far as the injured party chooses to seek redress, which may in the end be enforced by actual war. It is obvious that with all this the courts have nothing to do and can give no redress. But a treaty may also contain provisions which confer certain rights upon the citizens or subjects of one of the nations residing in territorial limits of the other, which partake of the nature of municipal law, and which are capable of enforcement as between private parties in the courts of the country. The Constitution of the United States places such provisions as these in the same category as other laws of Congress by its declaration that 'this Constitution and the laws made in pursuance thereof, and all treaties made or which shall be made under authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land.' A treaty, then, is a law of the land, as an act of Congress is, whenever its provisions prescribe a rule by which the rights of the private citizen or subject may be determined; and when such rights are of a nature to be enforced in a court of justice, the court resorts to the treaty for a rule of decision for the case before it as it would to a statute." Edye v. Robertson, 5 Sup. Ct. 247, 254, 112 U. S. 580, 28 L. Ed. 798 (cited in Ex parte McCabe [U. S.] 46 Fed. 363, 12 L. R. A. 589).

In Head Money Cases, 112 U. S. 580, 598, 5 Sup. Ct. 247, 254, 28 L. Ed. 798, the court said: "A treaty is primarily a contract between independent nations. It depends for the enforcement of its provisions on the interest and honor of the governments which are parties to it. A treaty, then, is the law of the land, as an act of Congress is, whenever its provisions prescribe a rule by which the rights of the private citizen or subject may be determined." La Ninfa (U. S.) 75 Fed. 513, 518, 21 C. C. A. 434 (citing Chew Heong v. United States, 112 U. S. 536, 540, 565, 5 Sup. Ct. 255, 28 L. Ed. 770).

A treaty is a law of the land, as an act of Congress is, whenever its provisions prescribe a rule by which the rights of a private citizen or subject may be determined; and when such rights are of a nature to be enforced in a court of justice, that court resorts to the treaty for a rule of decision for the case before it as it would to a statute. Ex parte McCabe (U. S.) 46 Fed. 363, 373.

As equivalent to a legislative act.

A treaty is primarily a contract between two or more independent nations. For the infraction of its provisions a remedy must be sought by the injured party through reclamations upon the other. By the Constitution a treaty is placed on the same footing and made of like obligation with an act of legislation. Whitney v. Robertson, 8 Sup. Ct. 456, 458, 124 U. S. 190, 31 L. Ed. 386.

A treaty is in its nature a contract between two nations, and not a legislative act. It does not of itself generally effect the object to be accomplished, especially so far as its operation is infraterritorial, but is carried into execution by the sovereign power of the respective parties to the instrument. This is the view taken of a treaty in Great Britain, but in the United States a different principle is established. Our Constitution declares a treaty to be the law of the land. It is consequently to be regarded in courts of justice as equivalent to an act of the Legislature whenever it operates of itself without the aid of any legislative provision; but when the terms of the stipulation import a contract, when either of the parties engages to perform a particular act, the treaty addresses itself to the political, not the judicial, department, and the Legislature must execute the contract before it can become a rule of the court. United States v. Rauscher, 7 Sup. Ct. 234, 239, 240, 119 U. S. 407, 30 L. Ed. 425; Same v. Watts (U. S.) 14 Fed. 180, 131 (citing Foster v. Neilson, 27 U. S. [2 Pet.] 253, 7 L. Ed. 415); In re Ah Lung (U. S.) 18 Fed. 28, 29; Commonwealth v. Hawes, 76 Ky. (13 Bush) 697, 702, 26 Am. Rep. 242.

TREBLE COSTS.

"Treble costs," are thrice the amount of single costs. Crane v. Dod, 2 N. J. Law (1 Penning.) 340, 342.

Where "treble costs" are allowed, the costs should be taxed and multiplied by three. Mairs v. Sparks, 5 N. J. Law (2 Southard) 513, 516.

According to the English practice, double or treble costs are not understood to mean twice or thrice the amount of single costs, but double costs consist of single costs and half the single costs, and treble costs consist of the single costs, half the single costs, and half of that half. But this is not in practice in Pennsylvania. Welsh v. Anthony, 16 Pa. (4 Harris) 254, 256.

The English rule of taxation of treble costs is to give single, half single, and quarter single costs. It has not been adopted, and its insolvency with the manifest intention of the Legislature is a decisive objection to it. But the fees of officers are not to be trebled where they are not regularly and usually payable by the defendant. With this exception he is entitled to treble the amount of such costs as he is entitled to charge in his bill. Shoemaker v. Nesbitt (Pa.) 2 Rawle, 201, 203.

If a statute authorizes "treble costs," they are to be calculated thus: First, the common costs; second, half the common costs; and then half of the latter. Van Aulen v. Decker, 2 N. J. Law (1 Penning.) 108, 112.

Where judgment is rendered for treble costs, it is not necessary to state the first amount of the single costs and then the trebled sum. It is sufficient to state it thus: "$40 being treble the costs and charges of" plaintiff. Davidson v. Schooley, 10 N. J. Law (5 Halst.) 145, 148.

TREBUCKET.

"Trebucket" was a name used to designate the "ducking stool," and it is spoken of by such name in St. 51 Hen. III. It was said by Lord Coke to "signify a stool that falls into a pit of water," whereas the last instrument that was seen in England, as Morgan, the last editor of Jacob's Dictionary, mentions, consisted of a beam or rafter moving on a fulcrum and extending to the center of a large pond, on which end the stool used to be placed. On the other hand, Daines Barrington, a learned antiquarian, in his observations on the statute, says: "It is a machine anciently used in the siege of towns, and the etymology is from the Celtic 'tre'—that is, ville—and our own 'bucket,' and signifies a town bucket." It was an ancient method of punishing minor offenses, such as common scolds, etc., effected by temporarily submerging the offender into water. James v. Commonwealth (Pa.) 12 Serg. & R. 220, 227. See, also, United States v. Royall (U. S.) 27 Fed. Cas. 907.

TREE.

See "Bee Tree"; "Timber Trees."
As included in term land, see "Land."

The word "tree," without expression, means a standing tree, and an accusation that plaintiff stole "my bee tree" refers to the tree, and not to the bees or honey, and is not actionable per se for slander. Idol v. Jones, 13 N. C. 162, 164.

A tree, strictly speaking, is that which is growing or standing in the ground, whether dead or alive. There are dead and live trees, both standing; but, when the trunk is severed from the root and felled to the earth, it is no longer, properly speaking, a tree. It becomes timber or lumber, according to the use to which it can be applied. United States v. Schuler (U. S.) 27 Fed. Cas. 978, 982.

"A tree is a woody plant, whose branches spring from and are supported upon a trunk or body, and the tree may be young or old, small or great," and cannot be designated as a "shrub" or "undergrowth"; for a shrub is a low, small plant, whose branches grow directly from the earth, without any supporting trunk or stem, while "undergrowth" is a term applicable to plants growing under or below other greater plants. Clay v. Postal Tel. Cable Co., 11 South. 658, 859, 70 Miss. 406.

Orchard trees.

The word "trees," generally speaking, means wood suitable to building, and does not include orchard trees. Bullen v. Denning, 5 Barn. & C. 842.

A grant of "timber trees and other trees" will not pass fruit trees, nor will a grant of "all timber trees, but not the annual fruit thereof," pass apple trees. Bullen v. Denning, 5 Barn. & C. 842.

A deed conveying an estate, excepting all "trees, woods, coppice, wood grounds, of what kind soever," does not convey apple trees. Wynham v. Way, 4 Taunt. 316, 318.

TRESPASS.

See "Forcible Trespass"; "Joint Trespass"; "Malicious Trespass."

Willful trespass, see "Willful—Willfully."

"Trespass" signifies a passing over or beyond our right; i. e., a transgression or wrongful act. Nolan v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co., 39 Atl. 115, 125, 70 Conn. 159, 43 L. R. A. 305.

The term "trespass," in its most extensive signification, includes every description of wrong. Gunn v. Fellows, 41 Hun. 257, 259 (citing 1 Chit. Pl. 166).

"Trespass" is any transgression against the laws of nature or society, whether it relates to person or property. Grunson v. State, 89 Ind. 533, 536, 47 Am. Rep. 178.

"Trespass," even in law, has a broad and comprehensive meaning. It is defined by Blackstone as follows: "Trespass in the most extensive sense signifies any transgression or offense against the law of nature or society, or of the country in which we live, whether it relates to a man's person or his property." In its more restricted sense it is defined as an unlawful act committed with violence, or injury committed with violence to the person of the other. Dave v. Morgan's L. & T. R. & S. S. Co., 14 South. 911, 46 La. Ann. 273.

"Trespass" is any misfeasance or act of one man whereby another is injuriously treated or damaged; any unlawful acts committed with violence, actual or implied, to the person, property, or rights of another; any unauthorized entry on the realty of another to the damage thereof. 1 Bouv. Law Dict 747. While different authors use different terms in defining the word, they all give to it the same meaning. But the definition given by Mr. Bouvier is probably as clear as any that can be found. Casey v. Mason, 59 Pac. 252, 253, 8 Okl. 635.

"Trespass" is defined as any misfeasance or act of one man whereby another is injuriously treated or damaged. Any unlawful act committed with violence, actual or implied, to the person, property, or rights of another, or any unauthorized entry upon the realty of another, to the damage thereof, is a trespass. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. McCombs (Ky.) 55 S. W. 921, 922.

The word "trespass," as used in the statute of limitations, is used, not in technical sense, but broadly, and means any act violative of the right of another, through which injury is done to his estate or property. Mr. Anderson, in his Law Dictionary, in defining the word "trespass," both in its restrictive and enlarged meaning, and in its application to the different common-law actions of that name, says: "In its widest scope trespass on property is any injury to the property. Its synonym in law Latin was 'transgressio,' any infraction of a legal right. In this sense it comprehends, not only forcible wrong, where the damages are direct and immediate, but also acts which are tortious in their consequences." While it is true that in one sense a cause of action against a common carrier for injury to stock in transit may be for the breach of a particular contract, yet, in so far as it seeks a recovery of damages for a violation by the carrier of the duty which it owes to the public, it also sounds in tort, so as to bring an action for the injury within the meaning of the word "trespass" as used in the statute of limitations. Ft. Worth & D. C. Ry. Co. v. McAnulty, 26 S. W. 414, 417, 7 Tex. Civ. App. 321.

The word "trespass" embraces only that class of torts which involves a final, unlawful, physical invasion of one's right of person or property, and this classification necessarily includes those acts of one person resulting in injury to another which arise from a mere omission to perform a duty imposed on the party bound to perform by the terms of a contract entered into between them. Southern Ry. Co. v. Harden, 28 S. E. 847, 849, 101 Ga. 263.

One who participates in a conspiracy to cheat and defraud another, and in the conversion of his property, commits a "trespass," within Rev. St. 1879, art. 1198, authorizing a defendant to be sued out of the county of his residence when the cause of action is a trespass committed in the county where the suit is brought. Rotan v. Maedgen, 59 S. W. 585, 586, 24 Tex. Civ. App. 558.

The word "trespass," in the Criminal Code, providing that in all cases of prosecution for assault and battery or other trespass, where the indictment shall be made on the knowledge of two or more of the grand jury, or on the information of any public officer, or on the information of any other person than he, she, or they against whom it has been committed, has a technical and definite meaning, and is descriptive of offenses of a lower grade only, such as misdemeanors, and not of offenses of deeper dye, such as horse stealing, etc., in which no prosecutor is necessary. United States v. Flanakin (U. S.) 25 Fed. Cas. 1105.

"Trespass," as used in St. 1783, c. 42, giving jurisdiction to a justice of the peace of all manner of debts, trespass, and certain other matters, and providing that the issue of the title to real estate shall not be raised in such actions of trespass, is construed not to be limited to a trespass quare clausum fregit, but to include all trespasses. Blood v. Kemp, 21 Mass. (4 Pick.) 169, 173.

Where the ground of a motion in arrest of judgment was that the action was in trespass, and the declaration purported to be in trespass, but the count was in trespass on the case, the court said: "The term 'trespass,' as here used, may be taken, without doing violence to language, in its most extensive signification, as meaning a wrong done generally, and not as denoting the particular species of action of 'trespass vi et armis,' rather than that of 'trespass on the case.'" Toledo, W. & W. Ry. Co. v. McLaughlin, 63 Ill. 389, 391.

Trespass to personal property is a substantial and real interfering with rightful possession. It is an active aggression on a right of property, and involves active, affirmative, and personal interference and participation. Weller v. Hanaur (U. S.) 95 Fed. 236, 243.

Every laying on of hands on the person of another, and every blow or push, constitutes a trespass, unless the action can be justified or excused. Clayton v. Keeler, 42 N. Y. Supp. 1051, 1053, 18 Misc. Rep. 488.

Blackstone says: "Every unwarrantable entry on one's soil the law entitles a trespass; for every man's land is in the eye of the law inclosed and set apart." Bileu v. Paisley, 21 Pac. 934, 935, 18 Or. 47, 4 L. R. A. 840 (quoting 3 Bl. Comm. 209).

"Trespass" is an entry on another's grounds without lawful authority, and doing some damage, however inconsiderable, to his real property. Hulick v. Scovill, 9 Ill. (4 Gilman) 159, 170 (citing 3 Chit. Bl. 209).

A trespass on realty in general may be defined to be an injury to or use of the land of another by one who has no right or authority whatever. Brown v. Solary, 19 South. 161, 164, 37 Fla. 102.

In the case of Norvell v. Gray's Lessee, 31 Tenn. (1 Swan) 96, 101, it was said:

"Trespass is in law every entry upon the soil of another, in the absence of lawful authority, without the owner's license." Hornsbey v. Davis (Tenn.) 36 S. W. 159, 164.

Every unauthorized intrusion upon the real property of another is a "trespass," and, whether actual injury is sustained or not by such intrusion, the party whose possession has been interfered with is entitled at least to nominal damages. McCarthy v. Miller (Tex.) 57 S. W. 973.

Every wrongful entry upon lands in the occupation or possession of the owner constitutes a trespass, for which the owner may maintain an action for damages; and if the entry be made by animals belonging to the wrongdoer he is responsible for their trespass, and the right of the owner to maintain an action of trespass is not taken away by St. Feb. 4, 1874, giving a remedy by process in rem against the cattle themselves. Triscony v. Brandenstein, 6 Pac. 384, 385, 66 Cal. 514.

A forcible entry on the land of another with strong hand and against the will of the owner constitutes a trespass. Westcott v. Arbuckle, 12 Ill. App. (12 Bradw.) 577, 580.

"What is a trespass? Every entry on the land of another without lawful authority is a trespass, though it be only trodden, and whether the land be inclosed or not, and no matter whether any damage be done or not. The gist of the action is the wrongful entry. Whatever is done after that is but an aggravation of damages. If a man's land be not inclosed, the law encircles it with an imaginary inclosure, to pass which is to break and enter. The mere act of breaking through this imaginary boundary constitutes a cause of action, as being a violation of the right of property." Agnew v. Jones, 23 South. 25, 26, 74 Miss. 347.

To disturb a peaceable possession by force is a "trespass," irrespective of ownership. Newcombe v. Irwin, 22 N. W. 66, 55 Mich. 620.

"Trespass," in the ordinary sense, is an unlawful entry made by a person upon the land of another; but it is defined by the Indiana statute to be either an unlawful entry, having been previously forbidden to another, or when one, being lawfully upon the land, is notified to depart, but refuses or neglects so to do. Manning v. State, 6 Ind. App. 259, 262, 33 N. E. 253.

The common-law rule that every man's land is inclosed either by a material fence or by an invisible boundary, and that every unwarrantable entry thereon is a trespass, is in force in all places where the right of private domain over things real is recognized. Bileu v. Paisley, 21 Pac. 934, 935, 18 Or. 47, 4 L. R. A. 840.

Any act of the landlord, transitory and fleeting in character, and not performed with intent to oust the tenant, must be regarded as a "trespass," for which damages will lie, and not as an eviction. As was said by the court in Avery v. Dougherty, 102 Ind. 447, 2 N. E. 125, 52 Am. Rep. 680: "It is quite well settled that it is not every entry of the landlord, though wrongful, that constitutes a breach of covenant. A landlord may be a trespasser, without breaking the covenant." A late author says: "Trespass embraces every unlawful entry upon the land of another. While such act in law constitutes trespass, it does not follow that it amounts to an eviction, which is something of a grave and permanent character done by the landlord with the intention to deprive the tenant of the enjoyment of the demised premises." Talbott v. English, 59 N. E. 857, 860, 156 Ind. 299 (citing McAdam, Landl. & T. § 418).

As requiring force.

Trespass is defined to be an unlawful act committed with violence vi et armis. St. Julien v. Morgan's L. & T. R. & S. S. Co., 3 South. 280, 39 La. Am. 1063.

Under a statute providing that in all cases where any corporation shall commit trespass it shall be liable to be sued in the parish where such damage is done or trespass committed, it is held that the word "trespass" is employed in its broadest sense, so as to comprehend a variety of wrongs having a common element of the use of force, whether direct or indirect, and that a wrong not having any element of force is not a trespass. Caldwell v. Vicksburg, S. & P. R. Co., 5 South. 17, 40 La. Ann. 753.

"Trespass" is an unlawful act committed with violence, vi et armis, to the person, property, or relative rights of another. It means a hurtful use of violence, which is wrongful. It excludes all varieties of wrongs in which force can neither be perceived nor implied, such as negligence. Castille v. Cafery Central Refinery & R. Co., 19 South. 332, 333, 48 La. Ann. 322.

"Trespass" signifies going beyond what is right. Trespasses may be committed either with or without actual force, and the remedy for trespasses committed without force is an action of trespass on the case. Other trespasses are accompanied with force, either actual or implied. If a trespass accompanied with actual force has been injurious to the property, the proper method of proceeding against the wrongdoer is by indictment or information. If a trespass accompanied with actual force has only been injurious to one or a few persons, the wrongdoer may in some cases be proceeded against by indictment, although the injury was done only to one or a few persons; yet, as every trespass accompanied with actual force amounts to a breach of the peace, it is an offense against the public. Ft. Dearborn Lodge, I. O. O. F., v. Klein, 3 N. E. 272, 277, 115 Ill. 177, 56 Am. Rep. 133.

"Trespass" is a direct and forcible invasion of one's property, producing a direct and immediate result, and consisting usually of a single act. Durfee v. Granite Mountain Min. Co., 33 Pac. 3, 4, 13 Mont. 181.

Trespass in its principal signification embraces every infraction of a legal right. In this sense it comprehends, not only forcible wrongs, where the damages are direct and immediate, but also the consequences of which made them tortious. Cooper v. Shore Electric Co., 44 Atl. 633, 634, 63 N. J. Law, 558.

Where a petition alleged that plaintiff's wife was enciente, and that, knowing that fact and that excitement was likely to injure a woman in that condition, plaintiff's landlord violently assaulted two negroes on the tenant's premises, and in his wife's presence, whereby she sustained a fright which eventually produced a miscarriage and otherwise injured her health, it was held the defendant landlord's action constituted a trespass, within the meaning of Rev. St. art. 1198, declaring that no inhabitant of the state shall be sued out of the county of his domicile, except for some crime or offense or trespass for which a civil action lies, in which case he may be sued in the county where it was committed or where defendant is domiciled. In this case the court says: "Trespass, in its widest signification, means any violation of law. In its more restricted sense, it signifies an injury intentionally inflicted by force, either upon the person or property of another. But it still has a signification in law much more narrow than the first, and more enlarged than the second, meaning given, and embraces all cases where injury is done to the person or to property, and is the indirect result of wrongful force. Abb. Law Dict. 'Trespass.' In this last sense the word would include injuries to persons or property which are the result of the negligence of the wrongdoer, and it seems to us more in consonance with the purpose and spirit of the exception to hold that it was in this sense that it intended that the word should be understood. We presume the exception was made in the interest of the injured party, and not of the wrongdoer; and we see no good reason why a distinction should be made between an injury resulting from intentional violence and one resulting from negligence. It occurs to us the consideration which induced the exception was that one who had been injured in his person or his property by the willful or negligent conduct of another should not be driven to a distant forum to get a redress of his wrongs. In the case of Ten Eyck v.

Runk, 81 N. J. Law (2 Vroom) 428, the Supreme Court of New Jersey construed the word 'trespass,' as used in a statute of that state, as descriptive of a class of actions, and held that it was not used in its most restricted sense, but applied, also, to all actions of trespass on the case. See, also, Cook v. Hertman, 2 White & W. Civ. Cas. Ct. App. 770. If, as we think, the word 'trespass,' in our statute, was intended to embrace, not only actions of trespass proper, as known to the common law, but also actions of trespass on the case, it is clear that the action in this case was properly brought in Freestone county, and that the court had jurisdiction over the person of the defendant." Hill v. Kimball, 13 S. W. 59, 60, 76 Tex. 210, 7 L. R. A. 618.

As an intentional act.

"Trespass," within the meaning of the statute relating to venue in civil cases, is any intentional wrong or injury to the person or property of another. London v. Miller, 47 S. W. 734, 737, 19 Tex. Civ. App. 446.

The word "trespass" is not confined to the restricted sense of an injury intentionally inflicted by force, but will embrace a tort negligently committed. Rotan v. Maedgen, 59 S. W. 585, 586, 24 Tex. Civ. App. 558 (citing Hill v. Kimball, 76 Tex. 210, 13 S. W. 59, 7 L. R. A. 618).

The word "trespass," as used in Rev. St. art. 1198, subd. 8, providing that where the foundation of the proceeding is some crime, offense, or trespass in which a civil action for damages will lie, etc., does not include an action for injury which resulted from a mere omission to do a duty. Ricker v. Shoemaker, 16 S. W. 645, 81 Tex. 22.

To constitute "trespass," within Rev. St. art. 1198, permitting an action to be brought in the county where the trespass was committed, something more than mere negligence must be shown. The act must be committed willfully, or the injury inflicted intentionally, though the intent to injure may be presumed from the inflicting of the injury by a wrongful "act committed," as contradistinguished from an act carelessly done, or omitted to be done. The act committed must be illegal, though it need not amount to a crime or an offense; nor need the intent to injure be directed toward the plaintiff. Connor v. Saunders, 17 S. W. 236, 237, 81 Tex. 633.

A tort resulting from an act committed without any intention of injuring the plaintiff, and which, through the negligence of the defendant, resulted in an injury to the former, constitutes a trespass, within Rev. St. art. 11, § 94, subd. 9, providing that no person shall be sued out of the county where he resides, except where the foundation of the suit is some crime, offense, or trespass for which a civil action in damages may lie. Wettermark v. Campbell, 56 S. W. 331, 333, 93 Tex. 517.

As either a joint or several act.

A trespass is at law regarded as the joint and several acts of those committing it, and the injured person has his remedy against all or any of them, and if he has sued them all he may dismiss his suit as to any one or more of them, and proceed against the others. Gusdorff v. Duncan, 50 Atl. 574, 576, 94 Md. 160.

Continual acts of ownership.

A "trespass," in the ordinary sense, is a mere fugitive and temporary intrusion on another's rights; and the term does not ordinarily extend to the exercise of acts of ownership which are continuous. Southern Pac. R. Co. v. City of Oakland (U. S.) 58 Fed. 50, 52.

Encroaching wall.

"Trespass" is defined to be an unauthorized entry upon the realty of another, to the damage thereof, and where plaintiff was in actual possession of his property including the land and the building erected thereon, if the building of an adjoining landowner encroached upon plaintiff's land, so as to injure his property, the one maintaining the encroaching wall was guilty of trespass. Hofferberth v. Myers, 59 N. Y. Supp. 88, 92, 42 App. Div. 183.

Intrusion distinguished.

"Trespass" is an entering on another's land without lawful authority and doing some damage, however inconsiderable, to his real property; while "intrusion" is one of the modes of ouster of the freehold, and is defined in 3 Chit. Bl. 169, as an entry by a stranger after a particular estate in freehold is determined before him in reversion or remainder, as when a tenant for life died seised of certain lands and tenements, and a stranger cometh thereon after such death of the tenant, and before any entry of him in reversion or remainder. This distinction between intrusion and trespass does not exist under the statutes of Illinois, and the only distinction between them, apparently, is that intrusion implies an unlawful possession of land, while trespass may amount to a mere entry upon lands without retaining possession, but doing some damage. Hullick v. Scovil, 9 Ill. (4 Gilman) 159, 170.

Petit larceny.

Petit larceny is a trespass, within Rev. St. 1835, p. 451, concerning practice and proceedings in criminal cases, and providing that no indictment for any trespass against the person or property of another not amounting to felony shall be preferred unless the name of the prosecutor be inserted therein. State v. Hurt, 7 Mo. 321.

Seizure as prize.

A seizure as prize is no trespass, though it may be wrongful. The authority and intention with which it is done deprive the act of the character that would otherwise be impressed upon it. The tort is merged in the capture as prize. Juando v. Taylor (U. S.) 13 Fed. Cas. 1179, 1187.

Tort synonymous.

The word "trespass," as used in Act March 17, 1885, providing that executors and administrators may have an action for any "trespass" done to the person or property of their testator or intestate, is synonymous with "tort." The description "torts to the person" and "torts to the property" is sufficiently comprehensive to embrace every possible injury that does not arise under contract. Noice v. Brown, 39 N. J. Law (10 Vroom) 569, 571.

Rev. St. p. 396, provides that, if any testator or intestate shall in his lifetime have committed any trespass on the person or property of another, such person or his executors may maintain an action against the executors or administrators of the intestate. The word "trespass," so used, signifies a tort or wrong, which is one of its meanings. The language of the act is comprehensive enough for this purpose, and it is hardly premissible to impute a lesser design in the Legislature. Tichenor v. Hayes, 41 N. J. Law (12 Vroom) 193, 198, 32 Am. Rep. 186.

Trover distinguished.

See "Trover."

Unlawful taking of water.

A taking by a water company of water in an unlawful manner is a trespass, as much as the taking of land. Lord v. Meadville Water Co., 135 Pa. 122, 131, 19 Atl. 1007, 1008, 8 L. R. A. 202, 20 Am. St. Rep. 864.

Waste distinguished.

"Waste" and "trespass" are easily distinguishable. Briefly stated, "waste" is the permanent or lasting injury to the estate by one who has not an absolute or unqualified title thereto. "Trespass" is an injury to the estate or the use thereof by one who is a stranger to the title. Price v. Ward, 58 Pac. 849, 25 Nev. 203, 46 L. R. A. 459.

Waste is an injury to the freehold by one rightfully in possession. This marks the distinction between "waste" and "trespass." Williamson v. Jones, 27 S. E. 411, 413, 43 W. Va. 562, 38 L. R. A. 694, 64 Am. St. Rep. 891.

TRESPASS (Action of).

An action in trespass is that which is instituted for the recovery of damages for a wrong committed against the plaintiff with immediate force. St. Julian v. Morgan's L. & T. R. & S. S. Co., 3 South. 230, 231, 39 La. Ann. 1063.

The words "actions of trespass," in Rev. Code, § 2660, permitting such actions to be triable at the first term after a certain date, etc., was used in its largest signification, as embracing as well the action on the case as the technical action of trespass vi et armis. Kelly v. Moore, 51 Ala. 364, 366.

The action of trespass, both as to real and personal property, is a possessory action. A party in possession is prima facie the owner, and that possession will entitle him to recover to the extent of an injury done, unless defendant shows something in mitigation of the damages. Todd v. Jackson, 26 N. J. Law (2 Dutch.) 525, 538.

Rev. St. § 3202, requiring actions for trespass to be commenced within two years after the cause of action shall have accrued, includes an action for seizure under an attachment wrongfully and maliciously sued out; for it is evident that the actions of trespass here spoken of do not mean such actions as are technically so known, for in this state there is no such distinction or form of action as is known at the common law. The word "trespass," as here used, is used, not in a technical sense, but broadly, and means any act violative of the right of another, though the injury is done to his estate or property. Bear Bros. & Hirsch v. Marx & Kempner, 63 Tex. 298, 301.

In Leame v. Bray, 3 East, 593, Le Blanc, J., says that the distinction between "trespass" and "case," as gathered from all the authorities, is that where the injury is immediate on the act done trespass lies, but where it is not immediate, but consequential, then the remedy is in case. Percival v. Hickey (N. Y.) 18 Johns. 257, 285, 9 Am. Dec. 210.

"Trespass" is the proper remedy for a tort which is committed with force and intentionally, and the immediate consequence of which is injury; but if the injury proceeds from mere negligence, or is not the immediate consequence of the tort, the appropriate remedy is "case"; and hence an action against a sheriff for damages for failure to permit plaintiff to obtain bail is in case. Taylor v. Smith, 16 South. 629, 631, 104 Ala. 537.

In actions in the nature of trespass or case, for misfeasance, the plaintiff recovers only the damages which he has suffered by reason of the wrongful acts of the defendant; but in actions in the nature of trover the general rule for damages is the value of the property at the time of the conversion, diminished, when the property has been returned and received by the owner, by the value of the property at the time it was returned, so that after the conversion and until the delivery to the owner the property is absolutely at the risk of the person who has converted it, and he is liable to pay for any depreciation in value, whether that depreciation has been occasioned by his negligence or fault, or by the negligence or fault of any other person, or by inevitable accident, or by act of God. Another distinction is that a judgment for a breach of contract or injury to property, though followed by payment, does not transfer title to the subject-matter involved, while a judgment in trover for conversion will, after payment, effect a complete change of ownership by operation of law. May v. Georger, 47 N. Y. Supp. 1057, 1060, 21 Misc. Rep. 622.

TRESPASS DE BONIS ASPORTATIS.

"Trespass de bonis asportatis" is the name of an action at common law, the foundation of which was the unlawful taking or carrying from lands of another of wood, timber, etc., thereon. Loewenberg v. Rosenthal, 22 Pac. 601, 608, 18 Or. 178.

To maintain trespass de bonis asportatis it has been frequently decided that it is not necessary to prove actual, forcible dispossession of the property, but that evidence of any unlawful interference with, or exercise of ownership over, property, to the exclusion of the owner, would sustain the action. Gibbs v. Chase, 10 Mass. 125, 128; Miller v. Baker, 42 Mass. (1 Metc.) 27; Phillips v. Hall, 8 Wend. 610, 24 Am. Dec. 108. Nor is it necessary to prove that the act was done with a wrongful intent. It is sufficient if it was without a justifiable cause or purpose, though it was done accidentally or by mistake. Dexter v. Cole, 6 Wis. 319, 321, 70 Am. Dec. 465.

TRESPASS ON THE CASE.

The action of "trespass on the case" is defined in general terms to be an action to recover damages for wrongs not committed with force, actual or implied, or, having been occasioned by force, when the injury is consequential; that is, where the injury to the plaintiff is the consequence or the result of an act of the defendant. Christian v. Mills (Pa.) 2 Walk. 130, 131.

Distinguishable from trespass vi et armis, was "trespass on the case," which was applicable to those injuries which were done without force directly applied. Munal v. Brown (U. S.) 70 Fed. 967, 968.

Trespass on the case signifies a form of action designed to cover all cases where an actionable wrong is claimed under the particular circumstances of the case stated. Nolan v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co., 39 Atl. 115, 127, 70 Conn. 159, 43 L. R. A. 305.

The action of trespass on the case, which warrants an arrest under Pub. St. c. 206, § 9, is an action ex delicto and in tort, and not assumpsit. Malone v. Ryan, 14 R. I. 614, 618.

Trespass on the case in its most comprehensive signification includes assumpsit, as well as an action in form ex delicto. Albert's Ex'x v. Blue, 49 Ky. (10 B. Mon.) 92.

"Trespass on the case" is generally used as comprehending three classes of actions—case, trover and conversion, and assumpsit. Robinson v. Welty, 22 S. E. 73, 75, 40 W. Va. 385.

An action in which the declaration is in form ex delicto and embraces counts upon a false warranty and upon a false representation respecting a horse is a trespass on the case, within the meaning of Gen. St. tit. 1, c. 12, § 152, providing that in all actions of trespass and trespass on the case tried in the county or superior court, if the damages found by a verdict of the jury or otherwise shall not exceed $35, the plaintiff shall recover no more costs than damages, etc. Humiston v. Smith, 22 Conn. 19, 23.

TRESPASS QUARE CLAUSUM.

As civil case, see "Civil Action—Case—Suit, etc."

The issues in "trespass quare clausum" and in real actions are vitally distinct. In trespass quare clausum it is rightful possession. The action lies for an injury to possession. It is called a possessory action. Lawry v. Lawry, 88 Me. 482, 34 Atl. 273. The gist of the action is the breaking and entering; that is, the invasion of a rightful possession. Hunnewell v. Hobart, 42 Me. 565. As the law writers say: "If a man's land is not surrounded by an actual fence, the law encircles it with an imaginary inclosure, to pass which is to break and enter his close. It is a violation of the right of possession." To sustain trespass quare clausum, proof of possession is essential. Kimball v. Hilton, 42 Atl. 394, 396, 92 Me. 214.

"Trespass quare clausum" being a possessory action, it is necessary to show possession in the plaintiff and the injury committed. The exception to the rule is where it may be maintained by the owner of land for an injury to the freehold, when it is in the occupation of a tenant at will. A remainderman who is not entitled to possession cannot maintain such action. Lawry v. Lawry, 34 Atl. 273, 88 Me. 482.

TRESPASS TO TRY TITLE.

An action of trespass to try title, upon whatever character of title it may be based, as well as the nature and character of judgment to be rendered, is essentially legal. New York & T. Land Co. v. Hyland, 28 S. W. 206, 211, 8 Tex. Civ. App. 601.

TRESPASS VI ET ARMIS.

The action of "trespass vi et armis" is the action for an injury which is the immediate result of an unlawful act. Legaux v. Feasor (Pa.) 1 Yeates, 586, 587.

One kind of action for trespass was "trespass vi et armis," which was for an injury committed by direct or immediate force or violence against the plaintiff or his property. Munal v. Brown (U. S.) 70 Fed. 967, 968.

An action for "trespass vi et armis" is the remedy for injuries resulting as the immediate consequence of a wrongful act, and is distinguished from "case," in that the latter is the proper action where the injury results by consequence of and collaterally from the wrongful act. Taylor v. Rainbow (Va.) 2 Hen. & M. 423, 438.

TRESPASSER.

"A trespasser" is defined to be one who does an unlawful act, or a lawful act in an unlawful manner, to the injury of the person or property of another. Little v. State, 8 South. 82, 83, 89 Ala. 99.

A person not sui juris cannot be a "trespasser," in the legal signification of the word. Barre v. Reading City Pass. Ry., 26 Atl. 99, 100, 155 Pa. 170.

A trespasser is not an outlaw, and it is within bounds to state that it is actionable to willfully injure such a one. Brooks v. Pittsburgh, O., C. & St. L. Ry. Co., 62 N. E. 694, 696, 158 Ind. 62.

A trespasser is a wrongdoer, and it is a general principle of jurisprudence that the court will not aid a wrongdoer. The fact that the trespasser is a wrongdoer does not, however, justify malicious, wanton, or willful maltreatment of him, and the failure to use reasonable care to avoid injury to him after the discovery of his danger may sometimes be sufficient evidence of willfulness or wantonness. Smalley v. Southern Ry. Co., 35 S. E. 489, 492, 57 S. C. 243 (citing 3 Elliott, R. R. § 1263).

A tenant who has failed to accept the terms demanded, and holds over after the expiration of the lease, may be treated by the landlord as a trespasser. Dietrich v. Ely (U. S.) 63 Fed. 413, 11 C. C. A. 266.

Persons who designedly enter railroad cars, not provided with either a ticket, pass, or money, and with the improper intent to ride thereupon, when not authorized either by law or the regulations of the company, may be justly treated as trespassers. Texas & P. R. Co. v. Casey, 52 Tex. 112, 123.

A tenant at will is not a trespasser. Bray v. McShane, 13 N. J. Law (1 J. S. Green) 35, 38.

TRESPASSER AB INITIO.

There is some confusion of the cases touching the proper application of the rule that a subsequent abuse of an authority given by the law makes the abuser a trespasser ab initio. In Ellis v. Cleveland, 54 Vt. 437, it is said that, if an officer to whom returnable process is directed would justify under it, he must show its return, else he is a trespasser ab initio, for he is commanded to return the writ, and he shall not be protected by it unless he shows that he has paid due and full obedience to its command. See, also, Briggs v. Mason, 31 Vt. 433; Munroe v. Merrill, 72 Mass. (6 Gray) 236, 238; Williams v. Babbitt, 81 Mass. (14 Gray) 141, 74 Am. Dec. 670; Russ v. Butterfield, 60 Mass. (6 Cush.) 242. In Shorland v. Govett, 5 Barn. & C. 485, Bayley, J., says: "When it is said that a sheriff is made a trespasser ab initio by the neglect to return a writ, the expression is inaccurate. There, for want of the return, no complete justification was ever shown. The distinction is this: Where there are facts alleged on the record making out a good defense, but something added in the replication destroys that defense, the party is made a trespasser ab initio. But, if the sheriff seizes goods under a writ, it is his duty to make a return. He never has a justification unless he discharges that duty." And Holroyd, J., said: "Instead of saying that the want of the return made the sheriff a trespasser ab initio, it would be more correct to say that the presence of the return was necessary to make his act lawful ab initio." But, whatever be the correct mode of reasoning, all the authorities agree that the failure to return the process is fatal to the justification, and in such case it is the same thing as if the officer had no process at all. Wright v. Marvin, 9 Atl. 601, 603, 59 Vt. 437.

It is held that, if one acting under authority of a warrant omits to do the act which the warrant justified after entering upon the premises, he thereby becomes a trespasser ab initio. Boston & M. R. R. v. Small, 27 Atl. 349, 350, 85 Me. 462, 35 Am. St. Rep. 379.

TRESPASSING STOCK.

As used in the chapter relating to domestic animals, the term "trespassing stock or animals" means those unlawfully upon land, or running at large contrary to law or police regulations. Code Iowa 1897, § 2311.

TRIABLE.

The statement that a cause is triable in a certain court means that the court has jurisdiction thereof. Jackson v. State, 15 South. 250, 251, 33 Fla. 620.

The phrase "county where the action is triable," as used in the Code in reference to the place of trial, means nothing more or less than the place of trial. Chubbuck v. Morrison (N. Y.) 6 How. Prac. 367, 368.

The words "or triable therein," as used in Rev. St. § 3477, providing that every court of record shall have power to punish any neglect or violation of duty or any misconduct by which the rights or remedies of the party in an action or proceeding depending in such court or triable therein may be defeated, impeded, or prejudiced, etc., are clearly intended to cover cases not covered by the words "depending in such court," and must be interpreted, not as limiting, but extending, the statute to cases not covered by the word "pending." Heymann v. Cunningham, 8 N. W. 401, 403, 51 Wis. 506.

A trial is the examination before a competent tribunal, according to the law of the land, of the facts or law put in issue in a cause, for the purpose of determining such issue. Finn v. Spagnoli, 7 Pac. 746, 67 Cal. 330 (citing Tregambo v. Comanche Mill. & Min. Co., 57 Cal. 501); United States v. Curtis (U. S.) 25 Fed. Cas. 726, 727; Lewis v. Smythe (U. S.) 15 Fed. Cas. 499, 500; Crossland v. Admire, 24 S. W. 154, 118 Mo. 87; Gibbs v. Gibbs, 73 Pac. 641, 643, 26 Utah, 382; In re Chauncey (N. Y.) 32 Hun, 429, 431; *Darden v. A trial is examination of a cause before a judge who has jurisdiction of it according to the laws of the land. Bullard v. Kuhl, 54

Wis. 544, 545, 11 N. W. 801 (citing Jacob's Law Dict. tit. "Trial").

A trial is a judicial examination of the issues. Stewart v. Stewart, 62 N. E. 1023, 1024, 28 Ind. App. 378; Miller v. King, 52 N. Y. Supp. 1041, 1042, 32 App. Div. 349; Sweet v. Chapman (N. Y.) 53 How. Prac. 253, 254; Miller v. King, 32 App. Div. 349, 351, 62 N. Y. Supp. 1041.

A trial is a judicial examination of the issues in a case. Tingley v. Dolby, 14 N. W. 146, 148, 13 Neb. 371.

A trial is the judicial examination of the issues between the parties. North Hudson Building & Loan Ass'n v. Ohlids, 82 Wis. 460, 486, 52 N. W. 600, 33 Am. St. Rep. 57; Third Nat. Bank v. McKinstry (N. Y.) 2 Hun, 443, 444.

A trial is the judicial examination of the issues in an action. Spencer v. Thistle, 13 Neb. 227, 229, 13 N. W. 214; Trustees of Swan Tp. v. McClannahan, 42 N. E. 34, 36, 53 Ohio St. 403.

A trial is the examination of the matters of fact in issue. State v. Starling (S. C.) 15 Rich. Law, 120, 131.

"Trial" is used to describe the process of determining the issues in an action at law. Doughty v. West, Bradley & Carey Mfg. Co. (U. S.) 7 Fed. Cas. 971, 972.

A trial is the judicial examination of the issues between the parties, whether they be of law or fact. State v. Brown, 63 Mo. 439, 444; Brookover v. Esterly, 12 Kan. 149, 152; State v. Clifton, 57 Kan. 448, 449, 46 Pac. 715; J. F. Hart Lumber Co. v. Rucker, 50 Pac. 484, 485, 17 Wash. 600; Pach v. Gilbert, 9 N. Y. Supp. 546, 547; Mora v. Great Western Ins. Co., 23 N. Y. Super. Ct. (10 Bosw.) 622, 623; Ward v. Davis (N. Y.) 6 How. Prac. 274; Meetze v. Charlotte, C. & A. R. Co., 23 S. C. 1, 13; Monticello Nat. Bank v. Bryant, 76 Ky. (13 Bush) 419, 423; Vertrees' Adm'r v. Newport News & M. V. R. Co., 95 Ky. 314, 317, 25 S. W. 1, 2; Ann. Codes & St. Or. 1901, § 118; Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 5419; Code Civ. Proc. S. D. 1903, § 243; Ann. St. Ind. T. 1899, § 3309; Cobbey's Ann. St. Neb. 1903, § 1262; Gen. St. Minn. 1894, § 5358; Rev. St. Mo. 1899, § 690; Bates' Ann. St. Wis. 1898, § 2842; Rev. St. Okl. 1903, § 4452.

The words "the trial," as used in the statute providing that objections to depositions must be filed before the commencement of the trial, meant the trial in which it is sought to use the depositions, and not a prior trial of the cause in another court.

Collier v. Gavin, 95 N. W. 842, 844, 1 Neb. (Unof.) 712.

Blackstone defines a "trial" to be "the examination of the matter of fact in issue in a cause." 3 Bl. Comm. 380. "The decision of the issue of fact is called the trial." Steph. Pl. 77. "By the common law," said Shipman, J., "at the date of the adoption of the Constitution, the trial of all issues of fact must be by jury. By issues of fact are meant questions of fact as distinguished from questions of law, which the result of the pleadings in each case shows to be in dispute or controversy between the parties; and a trial must be by jury in issues of fact for the right of a litigant." Raymond v. Danbury & N. R. Co., 43 Conn. 596, 20 Fed. Cas. 322. The common law required that the parties should form an issue of their pleadings before the case could be tried by jury. It is when the parties by their pleadings come to an issue that there is a case to be tried by a jury. When the matter alleged as the foundation of the cause of action stands confessed, there is no matter of fact in issue for the examination of the jury. It results, then, that there could be no trial by jury, where there is no matter of fact in issue for their examination. Deane v. Wilamette Bridge Co., 29 Pac. 440, 442, 22 Or. 167, 15 L. R. A. 614.

A judicial examination of the issues between the parties arising upon the demurrer to the complaint is a "trial," within the statutory definition. Pratt v. Lincoln Co., 20 N. W. 726, 727, 61 Wis. 62.

A demurrer involves an examination and decision of the issues, and where it is followed by a judgment, which disposes of the case, the argument must be regarded as a trial. Small v. Ludlow (N. Y.) 1 Hilt. 307, 308.

The submission of a case on demurrer involves the trial of issues of law, and constitutes a trial, within the meaning of a letter from a railroad to an attorney, inclosing passes, to be full compensation for legal services in a certain county for one year, except for assisting in trials of cases other than stock cases. Louisville, N. A. & C. Ry. Co. v. Reynolds, 118 Ind. 170, 173, 20 N. E. 711.

The term "trial" is applied to the determination of issues of fact, not issues of law. Consequently the provision of Code, § 2732, that a party, after trial on matter of abatement, shall not be allowed to answer or reply matter in bar, does not forbid further answer after a plea in abatement has been held bad on demurrer. Winet v. Berryhill, 7 N. W. 681, 683, 55 Iowa, 411.

"Trial of an action," as used in Code Civ. Proc. § 829, providing that on the trial of an action a party or person interested shall not be examined in his own behalf against the administrator of a deceased person, includes the trial of a feigned issue out of chancery as to the amount due on a land contract. Parks v. Andrews, 10 N. Y. Supp. 344, 346, 56 Hun, 391.

The taking of proofs before a master in order to dispose of a motion for an injunction pendente lite is not a trial. Doughty v. West, Bradley & Cary Mfg. Co. (U. S.) 7 Fed. Cas. 971, 972.

A trial is a judicial examination of the issues, whether of law or fact, and not a review of such examination upon an appeal from the decision. The appellate court corrects any errors of the trial court. It has no original jurisdiction to try issues, or jurisdiction to examine them, other than to see that the judgment under review is correct. The only trial, therefore, is at the special term, before the court, with or without a jury. Eldridge v. Strenz, 39 N. Y. Super. Ct. (7 Jones & S.) 295, 300.

A trial is a judicial examination of the issues. The granting of an allowance in a suit for divorce is not an examination of the issues involved—is not a trial. Stewart v. Stewart, 62 N. E. 1023, 1024, 28 Ind. App. 378.

A hearing before the mayor of New Haven for the removal of a city official is not a "trial," as there are no adverse parties nor a judge. It is rather an investigation by the executive as a necessary precedent to the performance of an official duty. The refusal of the mayor, therefore, to allow representation by counsel at the hearing, is not alone sufficient to invalidate the proceedings. Avery v. Studley, 50 Atl. 752, 757, 74 Conn. 272.

A question which arises as to the taxation of the marshal's poundage on money collected on an execution issuing out of a District Court of the United States is not a matter arising at the trial of the cause, so as to give the Supreme Court jurisdiction on a certificate of division from the Circuit Court. United States Bank v. Green, 31 U. S. (6 Pet.) 26, 28, 8 L. Ed. 307.

An inquest is a "trial," as the term is used in speaking of proceedings in the cause at circuit, which is but a trial of an issue of fact, where the plaintiff alone introduces testimony. Haines v. Davis (N. Y.) 6 How. Prac. 118, 119.

"Trial" as defined, by section 265 of the Code, as a judicial examination of the issues, whether of law or fact, in an action. The presentation and determination of a motion for a new trial was not a trial within such definition, but a hearing. McDermott v. Halleck, 69 Pac. 335, 336, 65 Kan. 403.

It cannot be claimed that there was no trial on an issue of fact because the court, after the evidence was in, directed the jury to find for the defendant. Fisher v. Nubian Iron Enamel Co., 45 N. E. 249, 250, 163 Ill. 387.

Where, in an action on two causes of action, separate verdicts were rendered, one in favor of defendant and the other against him, and the latter verdict was set aside and a new trial was granted as to such cause of action, the whole cause must be retried. The simple entry of judgment on the other verdict would not be a trial. A trial in the general sense and meaning of the law, which authorizes the Supreme Court by mandamus to require the district court to try a cause, embraces not only the rendition of judgment, but includes a hearing of some sort agreeably to the principles and usages of law, and embraces presenting the issues by pleading and a hearing in a forum with jurisdiction. Schintz v. Morris, 35 S. W. 516, 520, 13 Tex. Civ. App. 580.

The word "trial," as used in Civ. Code, § 5884, declaring that all applications for a new trial, except in extraordinary cases, must be made during the term at which the trial was had, and when the term continues longer than 30 days the application shall be filed within 30 days from the trial, etc., is to be given only its restricted meaning—that is, the sense in which it is used by Sir William Blackstone when he says a trial is the examination of the matter of fact in issue—and is not used in its comprehensive sense, meaning the investigation and decision of a matter in issue between parties before tribunals, including all the steps in the case from the submission to the jury to rendition of judgment. Castellaw v. Blanchard, 31 S. E. 801, 803, 106 Ga. 97.

In Code, § 252, "trial" is defined as a judicial examination of the issues between the parties. Such an examination may be had without being followed by a conclusion or verdict, such as when a jury disagrees, or a juror is withdrawn, or the complaint is dismissed. But when the court refuses to examine the issues, and of its own motion sends the case to a referee, it will be a stretch of common sense and law to hold that there had been a trial. Third Nat. Bank v. McKinstry (N. Y.) 5 Thomp. & C. 52, 53.

"The opening of the cause, introduction of evidence, and summing up by counsel to the jury, or submitting of the cause to the court or referee on written points and arguments after the evidence is closed, are parts of the trial of an issue of fact. Such trial is not completed until finally submitted to the court, referee, or jury." Mygatt v. Willcox (N. Y.) 35 How. Prac. 410, 412.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 632, providing that, on the trial of a question of fact by the court, its decision must be in writing and filed with the clerk, and section 633, providing that in giving the decision the facts found and the conclusions of law must be separately stated, and judgment entered accordingly, the trial of a cause by the court is not concluded until the decision is filed with the clerk, and when the term of office of the judge who tried the case expires before such decision is filed, the fact that it was signed by him, and ordered by his successor in office to be filed with the clerk, and was so filed, is not sufficient to sustain the judgment entered thereon. Connolly v. Ashworth, 33 Pac. 60, 98 Cal. 205.

As used in Comp. Laws, § 7401, providing that if, before the conclusion of a trial, a juror becomes sick, the court may discharge him and a new juror may be sworn, "and the trial begin anew," the word "trial" is restricted in its significance to the investigation of facts commencing after the jury is sworn and ending with the charge of the court. State v. Hazledahl, 52 N. W. 315, 316, 2 N. D. 521, 16 L. R. A. 150.

Where testimony was taken in investigation of an issue of fact by a competent court, and so far as defendant was concerned it would appear that the examination of the witness was exhausted, it was a "trial," within Code Civ. Proc. § 830, enabling resort to be had to the testimony of a deceased witness at a former trial. Taft v. Little, 79 N. Y. Supp. 507, 508, 78 App. Div. 74.

A default judgment in an action for the recovery of real estate and damages for its detention is not a "trial"; hence defendant is not entitled to "another trial," as a matter of right, under Code, § 599, which provides that in an action for the recovery of real property the party against whom judgment is rendered may, at any time during the term at which the judgment is rendered, demand another trial by notice on the journal, and thereupon the judgment shall be vacated and the action shall stand for trial at the next term. Hall v. Sanders, 25 Kan. 538, 549.

Until a decision of the court has been entered in the minutes, or reduced to writing by the judge and signed by him, and filed by the clerk, the cause has not been tried. Hastings v. Hastings, 31 Cal. 95, 96.

A trial is not a game of skill, in which the object is to catch the judge (or the other side) "out on first base" by an inadvertence or error. State v. Holder, 45 S. E. 862, 863, 133 N. C. 709.

In statutes relating to appeal or error.

The word "trial," as used in the statute requiring a bill of exceptions in a criminal case to be presented to the judge at the time of the trial, is not used in its limited and restricted sense, but in a general sense, and includes all the steps taken in a criminal action, from the submission of the cause to the jury to the rendition of the judgment. Jenks v. State, 39 Ind. 1, 8; Herron v. State, 46 N. E. 540, 542, 17 Ind. App. 161 (citing Sturgeon v. Gray, 96 Ind. 166); Hunter v. State, 101 Ind. 406, 407; Hotsenpiller v. State, 43 N. E. 234, 144 Ind. 9. It does not include any proceedings after the rendition of the judgment, and therefore exceptions cannot be taken on the overruling of a motion for a new trial. Nichols v. State, 63 N. E. 783, 786, 28 Ind. App. 674.

The word "trial," as used in Code Civ. Proc. § 850, providing that, when a party desires to have exceptions taken at the trial filed in a bill of exceptions, he may within 10 days after the entry of the judgment, etc., means a trial of an issue of law, as well as the trial of an issue of fact. Redington v. Cornwell, 27 Pac. 40, 43, 90 Cal. 49.

Pleading is not strictly a part of the trial. Trial does not commence until an issue of fact is joined. An alleged error in overruling a demurrer to a petition is not an error in law occurring at the trial, and therefore cannot be reviewed by the Supreme Court, unless the petition for error is filed within one year from the decision of the judgment. Mechanics' Sav. Bank v. Harding, 70 Pac. 655, 656, 65 Kan. 655.

Under Burns' Rev. St. 1894, § 1712, providing that a person convicted in a justice's court may appeal to the criminal court within 10 days after trial, no appeal lies from a judgment on conviction of one on a plea of guilty. Orear v. State, 53 N. E. 249, 250, 22 Ind. App. 553.

Under a statute providing that in the Supreme Court only errors at law occurring at the trial can be reviewed, it is held that the term "trial" has reference to the trial upon a plea in bar, and does not extend to a motion to quash, or to trial upon a plea in abatement. It commences, at least, when the jury is sworn in, embraces questions as to the admissibility of evidence or refusal to charge, and the charge given, and the like, and ends with the rendition of the verdict. Columbus, H. V. & T. Ry. Co. v. Thurstin, 9 N. E. 232, 234, 44 Ohio St. 525.

The term "trial," in Rev. St. § 7356, as amended in 1883, providing that in criminal cases in the Supreme Court only errors of law occurring on the trial or appearing in the pleadings or judgment can be reviewed, relates to the trial on the merits upon a plea in bar, and does not extend to a trial on a plea in abatement, or errors occurring on the trial of a plea in abatement, or hearing on motion to quash. The trial, in the sense of the provision, commences at least immediately after the jury is sworn, and embraces questions as to the admissibility of evidence, as to the refusal to charge and the charge given, and the like, and ends with the rendition of the verdict. Wagner v. State, 42 Ohio St. 537, 540.

The word "trial" in its general sense means the investigation and decision of a matter in issue between parties before a competent tribunal. Jenks v. State, 39 Ind. 1. Where defendant, on being arraigned, pleaded not guilty, but subsequently consented that the court should find him guilty without hearing any evidence, there was a trial sufficient to authorize an appeal under the statute providing that any defendant against whom any punishment is adjudged may appeal within 10 days after the trial. State v. Gardner, 35 N. E. 915, 916, 8 Ind. App. 440.

"A trial is a judicial examination of the issues, whether of law or of fact, in an action or proceeding." Rev. St. § 2514. "Issues arising on the pleadings, where a fact or conclusion of law is maintained by one party and controverted by the other. There are two kinds: First, of law; second, of fact." Section 2515. Under such definitions the action of a court in hearing and determining a motion to discharge an attachment is not in a strictly legal sense a trial, and therefore the action of the court may be reviewed in error, if the entire record, including the final judgment in the cause, is brought up, although a motion for a new trial was not made below. First Nat. Bank v. Swan, 23 Pac. 743, 749, 3 Wyo. 356.

The word "trial," as used in Rev. St. § 7356, declaring that the Supreme Court can only review errors in law occurring at the trial, includes the impaneling of a jury. Holmes v. State, 42 Ohio St. 596, 601.

In statutes relating to costs.

Where no issue is joined on the pleadings, a proceeding to determine the amount of plaintiff's recovery is not a "trial," within Code, § 308, relating to the granting of an extra allowance. Randolph v. Foster (N. Y.) 3 E. D. Smith, 643, 649.

Where a plaintiff voluntarily submits to a nonsuit after evidence has been given on both sides, and while defendant's counsel is summing up, a trial has been had entitling defendant to an allowance authorized by Code Civ. Proc. § 308, declaring that, where a trial has been had, the court may in difficult and extraordinary cases make an allowance in addition to the allowances specified by the statutes. Allaire v. Lee, 11 N. Y. Super. Ct. (4 Duer) 609.

A trial is defined to be the judicial examination of the issue. An argument takes place prior to a judicial decision of the issues in a case. There had been an argument and decision. Costs were allowable, and properly taxed and paid. They were paid for argument of the appeal. The judgment was affirmed, the costs paid, and, of course, the plaintiff satisfied. But upon defendant's application a reargument was ordered. He it was who imposed the labor of a reargument that took place; and the court thereupon reversed the judgment, and ordered a new trial, with costs to abide the event. The court expressly ordered the costs to abide. That, of course, covered statutory costs to the successful party. By subdivision 1 of section 306 of the Code, the costs of an appeal are in the discretion of the court when a new trial is ordered. The discretion was therefore properly exercised by the General Term when it reversed the judgment and ordered a new trial. The plaintiff would have no compensation for the reargument, if this item of costs for a new trial was not allowed. Miller v. King, 52 N. Y. Supp. 1041, 1042, 32 App. Div. 349 (citing Slocum v. Lansing [N. Y.] 3 Denio, 259, and note; Day v. Beach [N. Y.] 1 How. Prac. 236; Koon v. Thurman [N. Y.] 2 Hill, 357).

The provision authorizing the successful party to tax a certain sum as costs for the trial contemplates compensation for services rendered in the actual conduct of the trial. Where a cause was placed on a short-cause calendar, and after the trial had proceeded for an hour, without being concluded, was sent back to the general calendar and tried in general course, the successful party was entitled to two trial fees. Gilroy v. Badger, 58 N. Y. Supp. 1106, 1107, 28 Misc. Rep. 143.

In a certain sense there is but one "trial" of an action, for a trial that is so infected with error as to be reversed upon appeal is in effect no trial at all. As the result of the appeal both verdict and judgment are set aside, and a new trial is granted, which requires a retrial of the action the same as if it had never been tried. An executor, under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1822, 1835, 1836, 3243, is entitled to one lawful trial and to exemption from costs, saving the excepted cases, until he has had one lawful trial. Benjamin v. Ver Nooy, 61 N. E. 971, 972, 168 N. Y. 578.

In a statute relating to seizure and search of property, providing that the property taken shall be safely kept so long as necessary for the purpose of being produced or used as evidence on the "trial," and that if, on the hearing, it appears that the warrant was issued without probable cause, the complainant may be required to pay the costs, the words "trial" and "hearing" are generally understood as meaning a judicial examination of the issue between the parties, whether of law or of fact. Glennon v. Britton, 155 Ill. 232, 243, 40 N. E. 594, 598.

The "trial of the action," in the meaning of the statute providing that in civil actions in justice's court, where defendant tenders plaintiff judgment for a specified amount, plaintiff shall not recover attorney fees or other costs subsequent to such tender, unless he shall recover on the trial of the action a greater sum than that tendered, applies to a trial in the circuit court on appeal from the justice's court. Pepper v. O'Dowd, 89 Wis. 538, 547.

In criminal law.

See, also, "Preliminary Examination."

In a criminal cause the term "trial" does not include the arraignment, or any other merely preparatory proceeding which may be taken prior to the time of administering the requisite oath to the jury. Hunnel v. State, 86 Ind. 431, 434; McCall v. United States, 46 N. W. 608, 611, 1 Dak. 320; United States v. Curtis (U. S.) 25 Fed. Cas. 726, 727; Commonwealth v. Soderquest, 68 N. E. 801, 802, 183 Mass. 199; Byers v. State, 16 South. 716, 717, 105 Ala. 31.

The word "trial," when used in connection with criminal proceedings, means proceedings in open court after the pleadings are finished and the case is otherwise ready, down to and including the rendition of the verdict. It includes all those steps in the trial during which defendant may be of assistance to his counsel in conducting the proceedings. It does not include the preliminary steps wherein the court is passing upon questions of law and preliminary motions with a view of settling the issues. State v. Spotted Hawk, 55 Pac. 1026, 1028, 22 Mont. 33.

The word "trial" means the judicial hearing upon the issues in the cause, for the purpose of determining it, and cannot be applied to a preliminary examination before a magistrate to ascertain if the evidence is such that the accused ought to be put upon trial for the offense charged. State v. Bergman, 37 Minn. 407, 408, 34 N. W. 737.

Within the meaning of section 55 of the Criminal Code, providing that if from the trial it appears that defendant is guilty of a public offense other than that charged in the warrant, he shall be held in the custody of the officer and tried for such offense, the term "trial" will be construed as meaning preliminary examination, and not trial in the ordinary sense of the term. State v. Goetz, 69 Pac. 187, 189, 65 Kan. 125 (citing Redmond v. State, 12 Kan. 172).

The word "trial," as used in Act Feb. 7, 1850, enacting that hereafter, on the trial of any person indicted for trading with a slave, it shall not be necessary for the state to aver, etc., is used in its comprehensive sense, and embraces all the proceedings down to the acquittal or conviction of the party. Hirschfelder v. State, 19 Ala. 534, 539.

Code 1892, § 933, provides that "when the trial of any case, civil or criminal, has been commenced and is in progress," and the time for the expiration of the term as fixed by law arrives, the court may proceed with "such trial or hearing," and bring it to a conclusion in the same manner and with the like effect as if the stated term had not expired. Section 1522 provides that words and phrases are used in statutes in their ordinary meaning, and technical words and phrases in their technical meaning. Held that, as used in section 933, the "trial" of a criminal case commenced, not at the later stage, when jeopardy attaches, but at the instant the court enters on the impaneling of a jury for an investigation of the matters of fact presented by the pleadings. Lipscomb v. State, 25 South. 153, 164, 76 Miss. 223.

An "examination" is not a "trial," so that accused is not entitled to have a jury called at the time of his examination. The "holding to bail" upon an examination is not even an accusation. It is merely a finding that, before the defendant is formally accused of the crime, the question of his guilt or innocence ought to be investigated by a competent tribunal, namely, the grand jury. 1 Chit. Cr. Law, 89. It adds nothing to the weight of the complainant's charge. State v. Gerry, 38 Atl. 272, 279, 68 N. H. 495, 38 L. R. A. 228.

A demurrer is a trial upon the issues of law, and it is only upon the determination of that trial that an order can be made. Therefore, when the defendant in a prosecution for bribery demurred to the indictment, there was no power in the grand jury, in the absence of an order by the court, to again investigate the same charge or find a second indictment. People v. Bissert, 75 N. Y. Supp. 630, 633, 71 App. Div. 118.

The word "trial," as used in Bill of Rights, § 13, securing to an accused the right to a public trial, does not extend to the act of pronouncing of sentence. Reed v. State, 46 N. E. 135, 136, 147 Ind. 41.

Same—Attachment of jeopardy.

Jeopardy of life is when one is put upon his trial upon a valid indictment for a capital offense. It may result in his condemnation. Hence he is in jeopardy. But a prisoner is never on his trial unless there is a good indictment, and therefore no judgment can be pronounced on a verdict of conviction if the indictment is not good. From the time the trial commences it is a mere form that cannot result in his condemnation, and if the indictment is not good the prisoner is not in jeopardy. State v. Ray (S. C.) Rice, 1, 5, 33 Am. Dec. 90.

"At what particular period in the progress of the arraignment and other formalities usual, and perhaps necessary, preparatory to a trial, the trial may be said to be entered into, or at which it may be said the prisoner is put on his trial, may be a question of some nicety, and it appears to me to be wholly unnecessary to consider it here; for it must appear evident that a prisoner cannot be put on trial unless he is before a court in every respect competent to try the offense with which he is charged. One of the members of the court indispensably necessary to a trial for a felony is a jury. To constitute a jury, every lawyer knows that 12 lawful men are necessary, and that without this number no jury can exist. Where only 8 have been sworn, although they constitute so many constituent parts, they are not a jury, and therefore are incompetent to pronounce a verdict, and when it is impossible to supply the deficiency, so as to form a complete jury, the trial has not commenced, and those sworn may be discharged, and the prisoner remanded to jail, and tried at another time." State v. Burket (S. C.) 2 Mill, Const. 155, 156, 12 Am. Dec. 662.

After the names of 49 jurors had been drawn from the box, which had contained 60, and 8 jurors had been separately sworn, it appeared that 11 of the paper pellets had been clandestinely removed, whereupon the court directed the clerk to prepare 11 pellets in place of those which had been removed, and again put all the pellets in the box, and that the drawing of the jury be commenced de novo. The defendant complains that the tendency of that order was to put him twice in jeopardy, and that the court had no power to make it. He was not in jeopardy at the time of making the order. The trial begins when the jury is charged with the defendant, and that is at the moment a full jury is impaneled and sworn. He is not in jeopardy before. Up to that point the court may postpone the trial as lawfully at one stage of the proceedings as another. A man is not in peril from the verdict of a jury until the full number are qualified to hearken unto the evidence and make deliverance. Alexander v. Commonwealth, 105 Pa. 1, 9.

Same—Presence of accused.

The absence of a defendant convicted of murder during the motion for a new trial is no ground for reversal, inasmuch as such motion is no part of the trial. State v. Brown, 63 Mo. 439, 444.

The provision of the Constitution of North Carolina providing that a defendant in a criminal action shall be informed of the accusation against him, and shall have the right to confront the accusers and witnesses with other testimony, and shall not be convicted except by a unanimous verdict of a jury of good and lawful men in open court, defines the trial of an accused, and implies that he shall have the right to be present, but his presence is not required in the Supreme Court considering his case on his appeal. State v. Overton, 77 N. C. 485, 486.

The word "trial," as used in St. Okl. § 5147, declaring that, if the indictment is for felony, the defendant must be personally present at the trial, only means that the defendant shall be present in court from the beginning of the impaneling of the jury until the reception of the verdict, the recording of the same, and the discharge of the jury, and has no reference to a hearing on a motion for a new trial or a hearing on a motion in arrest of judgment. Ward v. Territory, 56 Pac. 704, 707, 8 Okl. 12.

In statutes relating to official fees.

The words "trial" and "final hearing" have well-known, definite meanings in the law, and they are used in that well-known sense in the statute authorizing a docket fee of $20 in a trial before a jury in civil or criminal cases, or before referees, or on a final hearing in equity or admiralty. "Trial" is used to describe the process of determining the issues in an action at law, and "final hearing" the submission of the case for determination thereof upon the pleadings, or pleadings and proofs, or otherwise, so that the case may be finally disposed of. The statute does not authorize a docket fee on a reference to a master in a suit in equity under an interlocutory order of final hearing. Doughty v. West, Bradley & Cary Mfg. Co. (U. S.) 7 Fed. Cas. 971, 972.

Rev. St. § 24, allowing a specified fee for United States district attorneys for each case tried before a jury, includes cases which are tried before a jury, although there is a new trial and no verdict is rendered. Weed v. United States (U. S.) 82 Fed. 414, 418.

The word "trial," as used in Act Feb. 28, 1853, providing for compensation for attorneys, solicitors, and proctors of the United States courts in a trial before a jury in civil and criminal causes, or before a referee, or for a final hearing in equity or admiralty, and specified docket fees, means a trial by jury. Gordon v. Scott (Pa.) 3 Pittsb. R. 109, 111, 10 Fed. Cas. 816.

"Trial," within the statute allowing justices of the peace a certain fee for the trial of a cause, is the examination before a competent tribunal, according to the law of the land, of the facts or law put in issue in a cause, for the purpose of determining such issue. Anderson v. Pennie, 32 Cal. 265, 268.

Under the statute defining a "trial" as a judicial examination of the issues, whether of law or of fact, in an action, the hearing of a motion to dissolve an attachment is a trial of the issues of law or fact, or both, in an action or cause, within the meaning of the term as used in the statute relating to the fees of justices of the peace. Gibson v. Sidney, 69 N. W. 314, 50 Neb. 12.

A day spent in the office in hunting up witnesses is not a day spent in the trial of a case, within Rev. St. 1898, § 4713, providing that whenever, in a criminal action or proceeding, any attorney shall defend the accused by order of the court on the ground that the accused is destitute, the county or town in which such criminal action or proceeding may arise shall only be liable to pay such attorney such sum as the court shall certify to be reasonable, and which shall in no case exceed $15 per day for each day actually occupied in such trial or proceeding. Green Lake County v. Waupaca County, 89 N. W. 549, 552, 113 Wis. 425.

A trial is an examination before a competent tribunal, according to the laws of the land, of the facts appertaining to the cause, for the purpose of determining such issue; and it is held that the dismissal of a suit is not the trial thereof, within the Code of Criminal Procedure, authorizing the county judge to receive the sum of $3 for each criminal action tried and finally disposed of before him. Brackenridge v. State, 11 S. W. 630, 632, 27 Tex. App. 513, 4 L. R. A. 360.

Mansf. Dig. § 4068, provides that in cases before a justice of the peace, where plaintiff's claim is not founded on a written instrument signed by defendant, and the latter fails to appear, the justice shall hear the allegations and proof of the plaintiff, and render judgment for the amount to which plaintiff is entitled. Held, that the proceeding in such a case is a "trial," within the meaning of section 3259, allowing justices a certain fee "for each trial in a civil case." Reigler v. Quinn, 14 S. W. 1103, 1104, 54 Ark. 37.

A "trial" is a judicial examination of the issues between the parties; but, when the court refuses to examine the issues, it would be a stretch of common sense and of law to hold that there had been a trial. Where no jury was ever impaneled, and, on the action coming on for trial, an order was made, on plaintiff's motion, allowing him to discontinue the action on the payment of defendant's costs, there was no trial, within Code, § 3251, subd. 3, providing that a trial fee of $30 may be taxed "for the trial of an issue of fact." Studwell v. Baxter (N. Y.) 83 Hun, 331, 332.

There is no "trial," within Code, § 8804, providing that justices of the peace are entitled to one dollar for the trial of all causes, civil or criminal, for each six hours or fraction thereof, where there is a plea of guilty and judgment thereon, and no evidence is introduced. Wheeler v. Clinton County, 60 N. W. 207, 208, 92 Iowa, 44.

Rev. St. c. 116, § 2, provides that a trial justice shall be entitled to a fee of 80 cents for the trial of an issue. Held, that the words "trial of an issue" applied to the main trial of a civil case, and had no reference to and did not include criminal prosecutions. Knowlton v. Commissioners of Waldo County, 8 Atl. 683, 684, 79 Me. 164.

In removal statutes.

"Trial," as used in an act of Congress providing that any suits between citizens of different states instituted in a state court may be removed to a federal court on petition filed at any time before final hearing or trial of a suit, means final trial. "The qualifying adjective 'final' must be taken distributively, and apply as well to the word 'trial' as to the term 'hearing,' and to both alike. The test is whether the hearing or the trial is the final one in the cause. It was intended to permit the removal at any time before a hearing or trial, final in the cause as it stood when the application for the transfer was made. Where a judgment has been set aside and a new trial granted, the trial already had is not a trial within the meaning of the statute, so as to prevent a subsequent application for removal to the federal court." Home Life Ins. Co. v. Dunn, 86 U. S. (19 Wall.) 214, 224, 22 L. Ed. 68; Minnett v. Railway Co. (U. S.) 17 Fed. Cas. 449, 450; Fisk v. Henarie (U. S.) 32 Fed. 417, 425, 427; Whelam v. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. (U. S.) 35 Fed. 849, 858; Brayley v. Hedges, 5 N. W. 748, 749, 53 Iowa, 582.

The words "any time before the trial," as used in Act Aug. 13, 1888, c. 866, 25 Stat. 433 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 507], providing for the removal of a suit between the citizens of different states, commenced in a state court, into the Circuit Court of the United States for the proper district, at any time before the trial thereof, when it shall be made to appear that from prejudice or local influence defendant will not be able to obtain justice in such state court, should be construed in their ordinary meaning; that is, at any time before the first trial thereof and up to the time of such first trial, whether that occur at one term or another, the right of removal under the local prejudice clause remains. City of Detroit v. Detroit City R. Co. (U. S.) 54 Fed. 1, 4.

Rev. St. U. S. § 639, subd. 3, providing that suit between a citizen of the state in which it is brought and a citizen of another state may be removed to the federal court on the petition of the latter, whether he be plaintiff or defendant, filed at any time before the trial or final hearing of the suit, means before any trial of an action at law; and hence an application for the removal of a cause to a federal court will not be granted after one or more trials thereof in the state. "Had it been the intention of Congress to qualify the word 'trial' by the word 'final,' they would have preceded the word 'trial' by the word 'final.'" Jones v. Foster, 20 N. W. 785, 786, 61 Wis. 25.

"Trial" is a common-law term, to denote that step in the case by which the facts are ascertained, and is always final, unless the matter is set aside for cause. "Hearing" is an equity term, and may denote the argument and consideration of a case at more than one stage of its progress; but when it results in an absolute disposition of the case it is called "final." But the term "trial," as used in Act March 3, 1875, c. 137, 18 Stat. 470 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 507], relating to removals to the federal courts, comprehends that step or proceeding in a cause at law or in equity which results in a final judgment or decree, whether the trial be of an issue or question of law or fact. Miller v. Tobin (U. S.) 18 Fed. 609, 616.

A hearing before an auditor is not a "trial," within the meaning of Rev. St. U. S. § 639, cl. 3, giving the right to remove a cause before trial from a state court to a Circuit Court of the United States. Stone v. Sargent, 129 Mass. 503, 511.

The trial of a demurrer in a state court is the trial of a cause, within the meaning of the words "before the trial thereof" in Act March 3, 1875, c. 137, 18 Stat. 470 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 507], authorizing a removal of the action in certain instances. Alley v. Nott, 4 Sup. Ct. 495, 496, 111 U. S. 472, 28 L. Ed. 491; Lookout Mountain R. Co. v. Houston (U. S.) 32 Fed. 711; Boyd v. Gill (U. S.) 19 Fed. 145, 150.

The word "trial," in 14 Stat. 306, authorizing the removal of a suit in a state court to the federal court at any time before the trial or final hearing of the cause, appropriately designates a trial by the jury of an issue which will determine the facts in an action at law; and "final hearing," in contradistinction to hearings upon interlocutory matters, a hearing of the cause upon its merits by a judge sitting in equity. Galpin v. Critchlow, 112 Mass. 339, 343, 17 Am. Rep. 176 (quoted in Chandler v. Coe, 56 N. H. 184, 186, 22 Am. Rep. 437).

In construing the federal removal act of 1866, requiring applications to remove a case from the state to the federal courts to be made before the "trial or final hearing," it was said that "it is well known to every lawyer, and must have been understood in Congress, that according to general usage by the bench and bar the term 'trial' is uniformly, though perhaps not universally, applied to the actual litigation of the merits in an action at law, as contradistinguished from the debate on the merits in a case in equity, and that 'hearing' is a term more precisely applied to equity cases, and others savoring of civil-law forms, as contradistinguished from those proceedings which are either grounded on the common law, or are shaped by analogy to its forms and methods. It is, then, reasonable to suppose that, in using the term 'trial,' Congress referred to proceedings of a common-law nature, and in using the term 'hearing' had in contemplation cases of equitable cognizance, and any others of a civil-law nature within the reason of the enactment, and that in using both terms they intended to mark and preserve the distinction which exists between them, and prescribe and confine their application to their respective subjects." Crane v. Reeder, 28 Mich. 527, 535, 15 Am. Rép. 223.

In statutes relating to voluntary nonsuits.

The trial of an issue presented by a demurrer on the ground that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of suit is a "trial" of the cause, within the statute relating to voluntary nonsuits. Hume v. Woodruff, 38 Pac. 191, 26 Or. 373.

Code Civ. Proc. § 581, provides that an action may be dismissed or nonsuit entered by the plaintiff by written request to the clerk at any time before trial, provided a counterclaim has not been filed or affirmative relief sought by cross-complaint or answer. Section 588 declares that issues on the pleadings are of law and of fact, and section 591 provides that issues of law shall be tried by the court unless referred by consent. Held, that where a complaint contains three alleged causes of action, and defendant demurs thereto, and the demurrer is sustained as to two of the cases and overruled as to the third, and defendant answers the third cause of action, and plaintiff dismisses as to it, and does not amend his complaint, there is a "trial," and he cannot afterwards dismiss the entire action, but judgment may be rendered for defendants as to the issues raised by the demurrer. Goldtree v. Spreckels, 67 Pac. 1091, 1092, 135 Cal. 666.

TRIAL ANEW

"Trial anew," as used in 1 Wag. St. p. 578, §§ 92, 93, providing for an appeal in a contested election case and the giving of a bond therein conditioned that the applicant will prosecute his appeal with true diligence to a decision, and that if on such appeal the judgment or decision of the county court be affirmed, or if upon a trial anew in the circuit court judgment will be given against him, he will pay all costs, should be construed to mean that a new trial may be had in the circuit court. Boggs v. Brooks, 45 Mo. 232, 233.

A trial anew on appeal is a trial de novo, but under Rev. St. art. 1294, giving on appeal from inferior courts a trial de novo, does not carry with it the right to plead new defenses in the superior court. Ostrom v. Tarver (Tex.) 29 S. W. 69, 70.

TRIAL BEFORE A JURY.

"Trial before a jury," as used in Rev. St. § 824 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 632], fixing the amount of attorney fees on a trial before a jury in civil or criminal cases or before referees, means a trial which is terminated by a verdict of a jury and a judgment thereon. A trial in which a jury disagrees, resulting in a subsequent trial, cannot be construed to be a jury trial within the meaning of such act. Strafer v. Carr (U. S.) 6 Fed. 466, 467.

The term "trial before a jury" does not necessarily mean the same as a trial by a jury, and a case which is tried before a jury, although there is a mistrial and no verdict is rendered, is a trial before a jury within Rev. St. § 824 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 632], allowing a specified fee to the United States district attorneys for each case "tried before a jury." Weed v. United States (U. S.) 82 Fed. 414, 418.

TRIAL BY INSPECTION.

"An examination of 3 Black. Comm. 381, will show that 'trial by inspection' was a trial by the judges, not by a jury, of some single matter obvious to sight." Roberts v. Ogdensburgh & L. C. R. Co. (N. Y.) 29 Hun, 154, 156.

TRIAL BY JURY.

See, also, "Jury."

As a privilege or immunity, see "Privileges and Immunities."

The right of trial by jury, as secured by the Constitution, is simply a right to a trial by a jury constituted substantially as juries were constituted when the Constitution was adopted. Gunn v. Union R. Co., 49 Atl. 999, 1003, 23 R. I. 289; State v. Almy, 28 Atl. 372, 374, 67 N. H. 274, 22 L. R. A. 744; Copp v. Henniker, 55 N. H. 179, 193, 20 Am. Rep. 194; Stilwell v. Kellogg, 14 Wis. 461, 465; Whallon v. Bancroft, 4 Minn. 109, 113 (Gil. 70, 74); State v. Kingsley, 88 N. W. 742, 743, 85 Minn. 215; Carroll v. Byers (Ariz.) 36 Pac. 499, 500; State v. Williams, 19 S. E. 5, 6, 40 S. C. 373; Hickman v. Baltimore & O. R. Co., 30 W. Va. 296, 299, 4 S. E. 654; Neely v. State, 63 Tenn. (4 Baxt.) 174, 179; State v. McClear, 11 Nev. 89, 46.

The provision that "trial by jury shall remain inviolate," in the Constitution, looks to the preservation, not the extension, of the right. It is the old right, whatever it was, the one previously enjoyed, that must remain inviolable, alike in its mode of enjoyment and in its extent. It was a right the title to which is founded upon usage, and its measure is to be determined by the usages which prevailed at the time it was asserted. Byers v. Commonwealth, 42 Pa. (6 Wright) 89, 94.

The "trial by jury," guaranteed by the Constitutional provision providing that, when any issue of fact proper for the cognizance of a jury is joined in a court of law, the parties have a right to trial by jury, means the right of trial by jury according to the course of the common law in cases proper for the cognizance of a jury. Plimpton v. Town of Somerset, 83 Vt. 283, 289.

Section 28 of the Bill of Rights, declaring "that the right of trial by jury as heretofore enjoyed shall remain inviolate," means that all the substantial incidents and consequences which pertained to the right of trial by jury are beyond the reach of hostile legislation, and are preserved in their ancient, substantial extent as existing at common law. State v. Withrow, 86 S. W. 43, 48, 133 Mo. 500.

A statute which authorizes a single magistrate to try and pass sentence in a criminal case, but gives the defendant an unqualified and unfettered right of appeal, and a trial by jury in the appellate court, subject only to the requirement of giving bail for his appearance there, or, in default of such bail, be committed to jail, is not unconstitutional, as impairing the right of trial by jury. Jones v. Robbins, 74 Mass. (8 Gray) 329, 341.

Assessment of punishment by jury.

The requisites of a "trial by jury" at common law seem to have been: First. That the jury must be 12 men, indifferent between the prisoner and the commonwealth. To secure this, challenges must be allowed. Second. The jury must be summoned from the vicinage where the crime is supposed to have been committed. This gives the accused on the trial the benefit of his own good character and standing with his neighbors. Third. The jury must unanimously concur in the verdict. Fourth. The jurors must be left free to act in accordance with the dictates of their own judgment. The assessing of the punishment of an accused person found guilty was at common law no part of the duty of the jury, and hence a statute vesting the power of assessing punishment in the court is not a violation of a constitutional provision that persons accused of crime shall have a right to trial by jury as heretofore enjoyed. State v. Hamey, 67 S. W. 620, 623, 168 Mo. 167, 57 L. R. A. 846.

Presence and superintendence of a judge.

"Trial by jury," in the primary and usual sense of the term, at the common law and in the American Constitutions, is not merely a trial by jury of 12 men before an officer vested with authority to cause them to be summoned and impaneled, to administer oaths to them and to the constable in charge, and to enter judgment and issue execution on their verdict, but it is a trial by a jury of 12 men in the presence and under the superintendence of a judge empowered to instruct them on the facts and (except on acquittal of a criminal charge) to set aside their verdict if in his opinion it is against the law or the evidence. Capital Traction Co. v. Hof, 19 Sup. Ct. 580, 585, 174 U. S. 1, 43 L. Ed. 873; Howe v. Raymond, 49 Atl. 854, 855, 74 Conn. 68; Hodges v. Kimball, 104 Fed. 745, 749, 44 C. C. A. 193; In re Brenner, 70 N. Y. Supp. 744, 748, 85 Misc. Rep. 212.

A trial by jury in the courts of the United States is a trial presided over by a judge, with authority not only to rule upon objections to evidence and to instruct upon the law, but also, when in his judgment the due administration of justice requires it, to aid the jury by explaining and commenting upon the evidence, and even giving them his opinion on questions of fact, provided only he submits those questions to their determination. Kerr v. Modern Woodmen of America (U. S.) 117 Fed. 593, 596, 54 C. C. A. 655 (citing United States v. Philadelphia & R. R. Co., 123 U. S. 113, 8 Sup. Ct. 77, 31 L. Ed. 138).

Conviction on plea of guilty.

The "trial by jury," the right of which is secured to the accused in all criminal prosecutions by the sixth amendment of the Constitution, is a trial according to the course of common law as it existed when such amendment was adopted; and as by that law the court might proceed to judgment on a plea of guilty, and a trial by jury was necessary only when the accused by plea of not guilty had made an issue to be tried, a judgment of conviction rendered on a plea of guilty is not a violation of the constitutional provision. West v. Gammon (U. S.) 98 Fed. 426, 428, 89 C. C. A. 271.

Method of selection.

A "trial by jury," which the Minnesota Constitution guarantees by declaring that the right of trial by jury shall remain inviolate, has reference to a jury trial as known at common law and as it existed in the territory of Minnesota at the time of the adoption of the Constitution. The essential and substantive attributes or elements of a jury trial are, and always have been, number, impartiality, and unanimity. The jury must consist of 12, they must be impartial between the parties, and their verdict must be unanimous. The mode of selecting the jury is only a means to an end, and only goes to the question of impartiality. It has always been held that the method of selection of a jury is entirely within the control of the Legislature, provided only that the fundamental requisite of impartiality is not violated. Gen. Laws 1896, c. 328, providing for struck juries, is not in conflict with the constitutional provision guarantying a trial by jury. Lommen v. Minneapolis Gaslight Co., 68 N. W. 53, 54, 65 Minn. 196, 33 L. R. A. 437, 60 Am. St. Rep. 450.

Jury of 12.

The term "trial by jury," in the Constitution, providing that a trial by jury in all cases in which it is heretofore used shall remain inviolate forever, means a common-law jury of 12 men. People v. Brady, 74 N. Y. Supp. 973, 974, 37 Misc. Rep. 126; People v. Kennedy (N. Y.) 2 Parker, Cr. R. 812, 817; People v. Dutcher, 83 N. Y. 240, 242, 85 App. Div. 570; People v. Justices of Court of Special Sessions, 74 N. Y. 406, 407; Lincoln v. Smith, 27 Vt. 328, 358; Cairo & Fulton R. R. Co. v. Trout, 32 Ark. 17, 18.

A trial by jury "is a trial by 12 competent, impartial men of the body of the county." State v. Wilson, 48 N. H. 398.

"Trial by jury" may be defined to be finding out the truth of the facts in issue by the verdict of 12 men. Cregier v. Bunton (S. C.) 2 Stroob. 487, 491.

The term "trial by jury," as used in the federal Constitution, guarantying trial by jury, "had at the time of its adoption a fixed legal signification, and from time immemorial has been a trial by a jury of 12 men acting only upon a unanimous determination. The origin of this mode of trial is lost in the dimness of the past, but from the earliest period down to the time of the adoption of the Constitution the unanimity of 12 jurors alone has constituted a legal verdict." Kleinschmidt v. Dunphy, 1 Mont. 118, 131.

The term "trial by jury" was well known and understood at the common law, and in that sense it was adopted in our Bill of Rights providing that jury trial shall not be denied. "Of course, the nonessentials of that institution, such as concern the qualification of jurors, the mode of summoning them, and many others of such nature, were left to the regulation of law. The Constitution is preserved in retaining the substance of that form of trial as it was known and practiced among those from whom we have derived it. This subject has undergone an examination in other tribunals, and we find them concurring in those views. They unite in declaring that where there is a constitutional guaranty of the right to trial by jury 12 is the number of which the jury must be composed." Vaughn v. Scade, 80 Mo. 600, 604.

"Trial by jury," as used in the constitutional provision securing trial by jury, means a trial by 12 competent men, disinterested and impartial, not of kin nor personal dependents of either of the parties, having their homes within the jurisdictional limits of the court, drawn and selected by officers free from all bias in favor of or against either party, duly impaneled and sworn to render a true verdict according to the law and the evidence. State v. McMahon, 30 Pac. 1000, 1001, 17 Nev. 365 (citing State v. McClear, 11 Nev. 39).

The terms "jury" and "trial by jury" are and for ages have been well known in the meaning of the law. They were used at the adoption of the Constitution, and always it is believed before that time, and almost always since, in a single sense. A jury for the trial of a cause is a body of 12 men, described as being upright, well qualified and lawful men, disinterested and impartial, not of kin nor personal dependents of either of the parties, having their home within the jurisdictional limits of the court, drawn and selected by officers free from all bias in favor of or against either party, duly impaneled under the direction of a competent court, sworn to render a true verdict according to the law and the evidence given them, who after hearing the parties and their evidence, and receiving the instruction of the court relative to the law involved in the trial, and deliberating when necessary apart from all extraneous influences, must return their unanimous verdict on the issues submitted to them. Whenever the right of trial by jury is preserved and guarantied by the Constitution, a common-law jury is meant, and a common-law jury is always composed of 12 men, no more and no less. Dennie v. McCoy (Ind. T.) 69 S. W. 858, 860.

Unanimous verdict.

The provision in the Constitution that the right of "trial by jury" shall remain inviolate means a trial by a jury of 12 men impartially selected, who must unanimously concur in the guilt of the accused. Brown v. State, 42 Atl. 811, 814, 62 N. J. Law, 666 (citing Thompson v. Utah, 170 U. S. 843, 849, 18 Sup. Ct. 620, 42 L. Ed. 1061).

"Trial by jury," as used in Const. U. S. Amend. 7, providing that in suits at common law where the value in controversy shall exceed $20, the right of trial by jury shall be preserved, does not mean that in a civil case there shall be no verdict without the unanimous action of 12 of its members; and hence Laws 1892, c. 44, providing that in all civil actions a verdict may be rendered by a concurrence therein of 9 or more of the jury, is not unconstitutional. Hess v. White, 33 Pac. 243, 244, 9 Utah, 61, 24 L. R. A. 277.

The "trial by jury" guarantied by Const. art. 1, § 9, declaring that the right of trial by jury shall remain inviolate in criminal cases, but a jury in civil cases in all courts not of record may consist of less than 12, as may be prescribed by law, is the common-law jury, composed of 12 men who are impartial between the parties, and whose verdict must be unanimous. Rev. St. 1899, § 3651, providing that in all civil cases which shall be tried by jury three-fourths of the jurors may return a verdict, which shall have the same effect as if returned by all the jurors, is therefore unconstitutional, as violating one of the essential elements of a jury at common law; that is, unanimity of verdict. First Nat. Bank of Rock Springs v. Foster, 61 Pac. 466, 9 Wyo. 157, 54 L. R. A. 549.

Jury of the vicinage.

"Trial by jury, it is said, means a trial by a jury of the vicinage." Taylor v. Gardner, 11 R. I. 182, 184.

Waiver by defendant.

A constitutional guaranty of right of trial by jury in felony cases is held not to prohibit the waiver of a jury trial in misdemeanor cases; it being said that the constitutional provision merely amounted to a declaration that a jury trial should not be withheld from an accused person, and not that a jury trial is in any case a necessity. Moore v. State, 2 S. W. 634, 635, 22 Tex. App. 117.

Act Conn. 1874, providing that in criminal causes the party may, if he shall so elect, be tried by the court instead of the jury, is not a violation of the constitutional provision that the right of trial by jury shall remain inviolate, as the accused is not deprived of such right, but voluntarily relinquishes it. State v. Worden, 46 Conn. 349, 364, 33 Am. Rep. 27.

"Trial by jury" is the only method provided by the state for the ascertainment of guilt. To allow one accused of felony a trial by 11 jurors is to grant him the right to waive a trial by any number less than 12, or to waive a trial by jury altogether and submit his case to the judge. The continued existence of the institution of trial by jury in such class of cases can be thus placed within the power of individuals. State v. Simons, 60 Pac. 1052, 1053, 61 Kan. 752.

Right of juror to weigh evidence.

The very essence of "trial by jury" is the right of each juror to weigh the evidence for himself, and in the exercise of his own reasoning faculties determine whether or not the facts involved in the issue are proved. Therefore statutes declaring certain circumstantial evidence, as, for example, the payment of the United States special tax as a liquor seller, or the possession of certain fish or game during the closed season, to be prima facie or presumptive evidence of the guilt of the defendant of those acts which such evidence goes to prove, does not require that the jury in such cases shall find the defendant guilty, whether they believe him so or not, but only that such evidence is competent and sufficient to justify a jury in finding a defendant guilty, providing it does in fact satisfy them of his guilt beyond a reasonable doubt. State v. Intoxicating Liquors, 12 Atl. 794, 795, 80 Me. 57.

Contempt proceedings.

The constitutional provision that the right of "trial by jury" shall remain inviolate has no application to a summary proceeding to punish for contempt. Such guaranty does not extend beyond the cases where such right existed at common law. The provision is that the right should remain inviolate. The right of a court to punish for contempt without the intervention of a jury was a well-established rule at common law. State v. Mitchell, 52 N. W. 1052, 3 S. D. 223 (citing Ellenbecker v. Plymouth County District Court, 134 U. S. 31, 10 Sup. Ct. 424, 33 L. Ed. 801; State v. Becht, 23 Minn. 411).

Condemnation proceedings.

The constitutional provision that the right of trial by jury shall remain inviolate does not apply to the case of taking private property for public use, but to suits in courts of justice; to some known and fixed mode of judicial proceeding for the trial of issues of fact in civil and criminal causes in courts of justice. It was intended as a constitutional safeguard in the trial of those cases for which it is stipulated that the courts shall remain open, and wherein a party shall have remedy by due course of law. Buffalo Bayou, B. & C. R. Co. v. Ferris, 26 Tex. 583, 598; People v. Smith, 21 N. Y. 595, 598; Wixom v. Bixby, 86 N. W. 1001, 1004, 127 Mich. 479.

Disorderly persons.

Act 1873, known as the "habitual criminal act," authorizing a single magistrate to deal with certain offenders, is not unconstitutional, as violating article 1 of the Constitution, declaring that trial by jury in all cases in which it has heretofore been used shall remain inviolate forever; both in England and in this state, disorderly persons, etc., having been made subject to summary trials without jury. People v. McCarthy (N. Y.) 45 How. Prac. 97, 98.

Trial by jury, guaranteed by the Declaration of Rights of Maryland, is the jury according to the course of the common law, and refers to such crimes and accusations as have, by the regular courts of law and the established mode of procedure as theretofore practiced, been the subjects of jury trial. Acts 1878, c. 415, § 10, conferring jurisdiction upon justices of the peace to try, convict, and commit to the house of correction vagrant and habitually disorderly persons, is therefore not unconstitutional for failing to provide for a jury trial. State v. Glenn, 54 Md. 572, 599.

Prosecutions under ordinances.

The right to trial by jury does not extend to prosecutions for the violation of an ordinance. State v. Fourcade, 13 South. 187, 45 La. Ann. 717, 40 Am. St. Rep. 249.

Prosecutions for violation of city ordinances were conducted generally without juries prior to the adoption of the Constitution, and consequently did not fall within the constitutional guaranty. Hunt v. City of Jacksonville, 16 South. 398, 84 Fla. 504, 43 Am. St. Rep. 214.

The right of trial by jury guaranteed by Const. Ohio, art. 1, § 5, does not enlarge or modify the right of trial by jury, but its sole purpose is to guaranty the perpetuity of the institution as it then existed and as it had long existed at common law. At common law the right to demand a trial by jury did not exist for offenses made such by statute, which offenses are but quasi criminal. A statute, therefore, which authorizes a penalty by fine only upon a summary conviction under a police regulation or of an immoral practice prohibited by law, authorizing imprisonment as a means of enforcement of the payment of a fine, is not in conflict with this provision of the constitution, though it fails to provide for trial by jury. Inwood v. State, 42 Ohio St. 186, 187.

The right of trial by jury, given by all the Constitutions of Georgia and the Constitution of the United States, has never been held to apply to police courts of cities or towns, and arrests and trial, with fine and imprisonment, therein under ordinances thereof. Hill v. City of Dalton, 72 Ga. 314, 818.

There is no right of trial by jury in cases of petty offenses cognizable by local courts in the exercise of police jurisdiction. Hence one accused of a violation of an ordinance of a city prohibiting the sale of lottery tickets could not object that he was not tried by a jury. Ex parte Kiburg, 10 Mo. App. 442, 447.

The right of trial by jury as heretofore used in the state, given by the Constitution of 1798, does not apply to pecuniary penalties by municipal corporations or towns and cities for a breach of their local police regulations, but refers to the trial by jury as it existed in England and was secured by Magna Charta. Williams v. City Council of Augusta, 4 Ga. 509, 516.

The provision of a city charter authorizing the common council to provide for the enforcement of its ordinances by imprisonment not exceeding seven days or a fine not exceeding $20, without providing for a trial by jury, is not unconstitutional. McGear v. Woodruff, 83 N. J. Law (4 Vroom) 213, 215.

Statutory or equitable rights and remedies.

The right of trial by jury, which, it is declared, shall remain inviolate forever, guaranteed to the citizens a trial by jury only in those cases where at the time of the adoption of the Constitution the law gave that right, and not in those cases where the right, and the remedy with it, are thereafter created by statute, nor where the cause was already the subject of equity jurisdiction. Hence Rev. St. § 1744, providing for the enforcement of liens of mechanics and materialmen by bills of equity, is not in derogation of the provision of the statute that the right of trial by jury shall be secured to all and remain inviolate forever. Hathorne v. Panama Park Co. (Fla.) 82 South. 812, 813.

The constitutional provision of Illinois giving a right of trial by jury was designed simply to secure the right of trial by jury in all tribunals exercising common-law jurisdiction as it had theretofore been enjoyed. It was not intended to confer the right in any class of cases where it had not previously existed, nor was it intended to introduce it into special summary jurisdictions unknown to the common law and which did not provide for that mode of trial. The right of trial by jury does not extend to suits in chancery, which are of an equitable nature, without regard to the fact whether the cause of action was one of equitable cognizance prior to the adoption of the Constitution or since. But it is not competent for the Legislature to defeat the right of a trial by jury in common-law cases by simply declaring that they may be tried in courts of chancery and that the proceedings therein shall conform to the proceedings in chancery. Ward v. Farwell, 97 Ill. 593, 612.

Act Cong. April 7, 1874, c. 80, § 2, 18 Stat. 27, 28, prescribes that the appellate jurisdiction over judgments of territorial courts in cases of trial by jury shall be exercised by writ of error, and in all other cases by appeal. Held, that the phrase "in cases of trial by jury" had regard to a trial by jury as in an action at common law, in which there is and must be a trial by jury, and the court is not authorized to try and determine the facts for itself, unless a jury is waived; and hence it has no application to a trial of special issues submitted to a jury in a proceeding in the nature of a suit in equity, not as a matter of right or to settle the issue of fact, but at the discretion of the court and simply to inform its conscience and aid it in making up its judgment. Idaho & Oregon Land Imp. Co. v. Bradbury, 10 Sup. Ct. 177, 178, 132 U. S. 509, 33 L. Ed. 433.

TRIAL DE NOVO.

A "de novo trial" in an appellate court is a trial had as if no action whatever had been instituted in the court below. Karcher v. Green (Del.) 32 Atl. 225, 8 Houst. 163.

"Trial de novo" means trial of the entire case anew, hearing evidence, whether additional or not, and not a trial on appeal and on nothing but the record to correct errors. Shultz v. Lempert, 55 Tex. 273, 277 (quoted in Harrold v. Barwise, 30 S. W. 498, 499, 10 Tex. Civ. App. 138).

"Trial de novo" means a trial anew in the appellate tribunal according to the usual or prescribed mode of procedure in other cases involving similar questions, whether of law or fact. Lewis v. Baca, 21 Pac. 343, 344, 5 N. M. 289.

"De novo" means anew; a second time. In civil cases this term has been construed to mean that a trial de novo, where an appeal is taken from a judgment of a justice court to the county court, is a trial upon the original papers and upon the same issues had in the court below. Ex parte Morales (Tex.) 58 S. W. 107, 108.

TRIAL JURY.

A trial jury is a body of men returned from the citizens of a particular district before a court or officer of competent jurisdiction, and sworn to try and determine by verdict a question of fact. Code Civ. Proc. Cal. 1903, § 193; Code Civ. Proc. Idaho 1901, § 3046; Rev. St. Utah 1898, § 1294.

A trial jury is a body of men, 12 in number in the circuit court, and 6 in number in the county court and courts of justices of the peace, drawn by lot from the jurors in attendance on the court at a particular term, and sworn to try and determine a question of fact. Ann. Codes & St. Or. 1901, § 962.

A trial jury in the territory of Utah is a body of 12 men possessing the requisite qualifications, duly summoned and sworn to well and truly try the questions of fact submitted to them by the court, and a true verdict render according to law and the evidence. People v. Hopt, 4 Pac. 250, 255, 8 Utah, 396.

The terms "trial juror" and "trial jury" are respectively equivalent to the terms "petit juror" and "petit jury" as used in the Constitution and laws of the state. Code Civ. Proc. N. Y. 1899, § 3343, subd. 19.

TRIAL OF THIS CASE.

A submission to arbitration, providing that the defeated party should pay all costs, past and present, incurred in the "trial of this case," means not any one particular trial, but the whole procedure which follows the commencement of the suit. Shurtleff v. Parker, 138 Mass. 86, 88.

A stipulation that certain testimony taken on a former trial may be read in evidence "on trial of this cause" means any subsequent trial of the same cause, and not merely the first one. Hinckley v. Beckwith, 23 Wis. 328.

TRIALS AT COMMON LAW.

"Trials at common law," as used in 1 Stat. 92, providing that the laws of the several states, except where the Constitution, treaties, or statutes of the United States shall otherwise provide, shall be regarded as rules of decision in all trials at common law in the courts of the United States, means trials in a court of common-law jurisdiction, when exercising such authority, as contrasted with courts of admiralty, equity, or maritime jurisdiction. United States v. Mundell (U. S.) 27 Fed. Cas. 23, 26.

TRIBE.

See "Indian Tribe."

TRIBUNAL.

See "Competent Tribunal"; "Inferior Tribunals"; "Judicial Tribunal."

Under the statute providing that tribunals and magistrates having power to order commitments to the insane hospital shall certify the name of the town where the patient resided, etc., it is held that "tribunals" means courts of criminal jurisdiction administering the law. Foster v. Inhabitants of Worcester, 33 Mass. (16 Pick.) 71, 81.

TRIBUTARIES.

A policy of insurance, insuring the steamboat and giving permission to navigate the Mississippi and "tributaries," except the Missouri and Arkansas rivers, is construed to include waters which do not empty their waters directly into the Mississippi but into other waters or rivers which do, and hence would include Cypress Bayou, which empties into Red river; the Red river emptying into the Mississippi. Miller v. Citizens' Fire, Marine & Life Ins. Co., 12 W. Va. 116, 131, 29 Am. Rep. 452.

TRICK.

"Trick" is defined as a sly, dexterous, ingenious procedure fitted to puzzle or amuse, and is synonymous with "strategy," "wile," "fraud," "cheat," "deception," or "delusion"; and hence, as used in Gen. St. 1894, § 6595, providing that any one who obtains money by the use of any "trick" shall be deemed guilty of swindling, applies to obtaining money by means of the "short change trick." State v. Smith, 85 N. W. 12, 13, 82 Minn. 342.

TRICYCLE.

A tricycle, not being a bicycle or known by the general term bicycle, does not come within the provisions of an ordinance prohibiting the use of sidewalks by all varieties of vehicles known by the term of "bicycle." Wheeler v. City of Boone, 78 N. W. 909, 910, 108 Iowa, 235, 44 L. R. A. 821.

The terms "tricycle" and "bicycle," as used in the statutory provisions relative to the use of bicycles and tricycles, shall include all vehicles propelled by foot or hand power of the person riding them. Rev. Laws Mass. 1902, p. 531, c. 52, § 12.

The terms "bicycle" and "tricycle," as used in the section relating to bicycle riding, shall be deemed to include all vehicles propelled by the person riding the same by foot or hand power. Gen. St. Conn. 1902, § 2061.

The terms "bicycle" and "tricycle," as used in the act regulating the use of highways, etc., shall be deemed to include all vehicles propelled by the person riding the same, either wholly or in part. Pub. St. N. H. 1901, p. 256, c. 93, § 2.

TRIED TO STEAL.

The words "tried to steal," in a charge that plaintiff tried to steal defendant's wagon, does not impute the crime of larceny, and is not per se slanderous. Steinecke v. Marx, 10 Mo. App. 581.

TRIFLING SUM.

A "trifling sum," as that phrase is used in the definition of "nominal damages," is such a sum as a penny, one cent, six and a quarter cents, etc. Maher v. Wilson, 73 Pac. 418, 421, 139 Cal. 514.

TRIMMING.

"Trimming," in the canal boat, spoken of in Laws N. Y. 1888, c. 581, is shovelling the grain from one place to another, and is done by longshoremen with scoops or shovels; and "trimming" the ship's cargo when loading is stowing and securing it for the voyage. Budd v. New York, 143 U. S. 517, 552, 12 Sup. Ct. 468, 38 L. Ed. 247, 250.

TRIMMINGS.

Goods woven wholly of silk, and used from 4 to 12 inches wide to trim women's hats, are not assessable as "trimmings," but as manufactures of silk, under Act July 24, 1897, c. 11, § 1, Schedule L, par. 891, 30 Stat. 187 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1670]. Robinson v. United States, 121 Fed. 204, 205.

"Mourning crapes," so called, consisting of all-silk fabrics, in piece of the width known as "4/4," are dutiable under Tariff Act July 24, 1897, c. 11, § 1, Schedule L, par. 390, 30 Stat. 187 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1670], as trimmings made of silk not specially provided for. Robinson v. United States (U. S.) 122 Fed. 970.

TRINITARIANS.

Trinitarians "are those who believe in the trinity or the tri-unity of God." Hale v. Everett, 53 N. H. 9, 92, 16 Am. Rep. 82.

TRINKETS.

As used in Carriers Act 11 Geo. IV, and St. 1 Wm. IV, c. 68, § 1, providing that no common carrier shall be liable for the loss of trinkets contained in any parcel which shall have been delivered to be carried for hire, etc., "trinkets" cannot be defined with precise accuracy; but the closest approximation is that they must be articles of mere ornament, or, if ornament and utility be combined, the former must be the predominating quality. For instance, bracelets, pins, rings, brooches, and ornamented tortoise shell and pearl portemonnaies, however small their intrinsic value, are trinkets. Bernstein v. Baxendale, 6 C. B. (N. S.) 251 258.

"Trinkets," as used in Rev. St. § 4281 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 2942], requiring the shippers of trinkets to give to carriers by vessel written notice of the true character and value thereof, means an article of great value in small compass or shape or size, and does not mean articles of small value. Most lexicographers, in defining the term carefully, exclude articles of utility, such as bracelets, brooches, and pins, which are mere fasteners for dress. Thus Webster describes it as a small ornament, as a jewel, a ring, or the like; Richardson, any small piece of ornament or decoration; and Dr. Johnson, as ornaments of dress, or superfluities of decoration. Ocean S. S. Co. of Savannah v. Way, 17 S. E. 57, 60, 90 Ga. 747, 20 L. R. A. 123.

TRIVIAL IMPERFECTION.

A contractor agreed to excavate a cellar and erect walls of concrete and steps to the street, and plaintiff did the work thereon for said contractor. The work was accepted by the owner as complete, but later a carpenter was employed by the owner to place a frame in the cellar door, and plaintiff at the owner's request filled a small hole outside of the cellar. Held, that the lack of this additional work was a "trivial imperfection," within Code Civ. Proc. § 1187, providing that a trifling imperfection shall not prevent the filing of a lien claim. Lippert v. Lasar (Cal.) 33 Pac. 797.

Code Civ. Proc. § 1187, as amended by St. 1887, p. 154, providing that every person, save the original contractor, claiming a lien, must within 30 days after the completion of the building file his lien, but any "trivial imperfections" in the construction shall not be deemed such a lack of completion as to prevent the filing of the lien, cannot be construed to mean unhung doors, unfinished plumbing, unfinished closets and bathroom, unplaced ventilators, and no mouldings. Such things are not trivial imperfections, but are necessary to be done to effect a completion of the building. Schallert-Ganahl Lumber Co. v. Sheldon (Cal.) 32 Pac. 235.

Code Civ. Proc. § 1187, providing that a "trivial imperfection" in a building will not be deemed such a lack of completion as to prevent the filing of any lien, refers to imperfect or defective performance of the work claimed to be done therein, and not to work admittedly uncompleted. It is not determined by its relative cost. Blanchi v. Hughes, 56 Pac. 610, 611, 124 Cal. 24.

The term "trivial imperfection," in Code Civ. Proc. § 1187, provides that any trivial imperfection in the construction of any building shall not be deemed such a lack of completion as to prevent the filing of any lien, may apply to a failure to complete a building costing $4,000, which is completed thereafter at an expense of about $7. Santa Clara Valley Mill & Lumber Co. v. Williams (Cal.) 81 Pac. 1128, 1129.

Whether the failure of a contractor to complete his contract to the letter is a substantial breach of the contract or a "trivial imperfection," which is not sufficient to affect his claim for a lien, is a question for the jury. Willamette Steam Mills Lumbering & Mfg. Co. v. Los Angeles College Co., 29 Pac. 629, 634, 94 Cal. 229; Coss v. MacDonough, 44 Pac. 325, 328, 111 Cal. 662.

TROLL

A "troll" is a long rope, extended on the water for many fathoms, with baited hooks attached to it about three or four feet apart. This is sunk in the water and occasionally drawn up with a fish on a hook. The Lucy Anne (U. S.) 15 Fed. Cas. 1092, 1093.

TROLLEY SYSTEM.

"Trolley system," as used in a statute authorizing a street railway company to use the trolley system, is generally understood to imply the use of a stationary engine and overhead wires strung on poles. Hooper v. Baltimore City Pass. Ry. Co., 37 Atl. 359, 361, 85 Md. 509, 38 L. R. A. 509.

TROOP HORSE.

"Troop horse," within the meaning of Act 1794, making a sheriff liable to a penalty for levying and selling a trooper's horse, does not apply to a horse belonging to a trooper, unless it is duly entered and registered as such with the captain of the troop. Southwell v. Harley (S. C.) 3 Rich. Law, 180, 181.

TROOPER.

The term "trooper" was said, in construing the act of 1794, making the sheriff liable for levying and selling a trooper's horse, to only include persons legally enrolled in some troop of cavalry. Southwell v. Harley (S. C.) 3 Rich. Law, 180, 181.

TROOPS.

The word "troops" conveys to the mind the idea of an armed body of soldiers, whose sole occupation is war or service answering to the regular army. The organization of the active militia of a state is not in violation of Const. U. S. art. 1, § 10, which withholds from the states the power to keep "troops" in time of peace, as such militia is simply a domestic force, as distinguished from regular troops, and is only liable to be called into service when the exigencies of the state make it necessary. Dunne v. People, 94 Ill. 120, 138, 34 Am. Rep. 218.

TROTting.

There can be no just distinction taken between the trotting of horses and the racing of horses. Ellis v. Beale, 18 Me. 337, 339, 36 Am. Dec. 726.

TROUBLE.

Gen. St. c. 43, § 14, allowing a person whose land has been taken for laying out a street full indemnity for the "trouble and expense" to which he has been put by the proceedings, means "trouble from which some material or pecuniary injury results, involving labor and the expenditure of time or occasional inconvenience to the owner in the use and occupation of the land. But mental troubles, so difficult to estimate by any pecuniary standard, and which may vary in different individuals according to their temperament or health, do not come within the statute and are not the subject-matter of damages." Whitney v. City of Lynn, 122 Mass. 338, 343.

TROUBLE HUNTER.

A "trouble hunter" is a lineman employed by a telegraph company, whose duty it is to trace out and remedy difficulties which might arise from the contact of the telegraph wires with other wires. Judge v. Narragansett Electric Lighting Co., 42 Atl. 507, 21 R. I. 123.

TROUT.

The common and ordinary meaning of the word "trout" is a fresh-water fish—a fish which at least breeds and ordinarily lives in the fresh water, even if it may sometimes escape to the salt water when it has an opportunity; and although zoologically the term may be more inclusive, it was used in its more limited, but common and ordinary, sense in Rev. St. c. 40, § 49, providing that no person should sell or have in possession with intent to sell any landlocked salmon, trout, or togue between certain dates. State v. Lewis, 33 Atl. 10, 11, 87 Me. 498.

TROVER.

In 1 Chit. Pl. (14th Am. Ed.) p. 146, it is said: "The action of trover or conversion was, in its origin, an action of trespass on the case for the recovery of damages against a person who had found goods and refused to deliver them on demand to the owner, but converted them to his own use, from which word, 'finding,' the remedy is called an action of trover. By a fiction of law, actions of trover were at length permitted to be brought against any person who had in his possession, by any means whatever, the personal property of another, and sold or used the same without the consent of the owner, or refused to deliver the same when demanded. The injury lies in the conversion and deprivation of the plaintiff's property, which is the gist of the action, and the statement of the finding or trover is now immaterial and not traversable; and the fact of conversion does not necessarily import an acquisition of property in the defendant. It is an action for the recovery of damages to the extent of the value of the thing converted. The object and result of the suit are not the recovery of the thing itself, which can only be recovered by an action of detinue or replevin. Lord Mansfield thus defined this action: 'In form it [i. e., the trover] is a fiction. In substance, it is a remedy to recover the value of the personal chattels wrongfully converted by another to his own use. The form supposes that the defendant might come lawfully by it, and, if he did not, yet by bringing this action, the plaintiff waives the trespass. No damages are recoverable for the act of taking. All must be for the act of converting. In Cooley, Torts (2d Ed.) p. 516, it is said: "In form, the action is a fiction; in substance, a remedy to recover the value of personal chattels wrongfully converted by another to his own use. The form supposes the defendant may have come lawfully by the possession of the goods. This action lies, and has been brought in many cases, where in truth the defendant has the possession lawfully. Where the defendant takes them wrongfully and by trespass, the plaintiff, if he sees fit to bring this action, waives the trespass and admits the possession to have been lawfully gotten." Burnham v. Pidcock, 66 N. Y. Supp. 806, 33 Misc. Rep. 65.

The action of trover and conversion was, in its origin, an action on the case for the recovery of damages against the person who had found goods and refused to deliver them on demand to the owner, but converted them to his own use. The circumstance of the defendant not being at liberty to wage his law in this action, and the less degree of certainty requisite in describing the goods, gave it so considerable an advantage over the action of detinue that by a fiction of law actions of trover were at length permitted to be brought against any person who had in his possession by any means whatever the personal property of another, and sold or used the same without the consent of the owner, or refused to deliver it up when demanded. The injury lies in the conversion and deprivation of the plaintiff's property, which is the gist of the action, and the statement of the finding or trover is now immaterial, and not traversable. It is an action for the recovery of damages to the extent of the value of the things converted. Peterson v. Kier (Pa.) 2 Pittsb. R. 191, 200.

The action of "trover" is a remedy to recover the value of personal chattels wrongfully converted by another to his own use, and in order to sustain it plaintiff must show a legal title to the property in himself; that is, he must prove property therein, either general or special, coupled with a right of immediate possession at the time of the conversion. Trover for conversion of money will not lie where plaintiff intrusted money to defendant with which to buy a lot and commence the erection of a building thereon, and defendant afterwards refused to so expend it or return it, but expended it for himself; there being no duty resting on defendant to keep the money intact in specie. Larson v. Dawson, 53 Atl. 93, 94, 24 R. I. 317, 96 Am. St. Rep. 716.

Lord Mansfield defines the action of trover to be a remedy "to recover the value of personal chattels wrongfully converted by another to his own use." The taking may have been lawful. Hence the gist of the action lies in the wrongful conversion. Where one has the lawful possession of the goods of another, and has not converted them, this action will not lie until there has been a refusal to deliver them on demand made. Where goods have been converted by the bailee, it is presumed to be wrongful, and trover may be maintained without a previous demand; but such presumption may be rebutted by showing permission of the plaintiff to convert the property. Waring v. Pennsylvania R. Co., 76 Pa. 491, 496.

"Trover" is an action in which the injury to be redressed is technically called "conversion," and the declaration counts on the real or supposed fact that the plaintiff casually lost his goods and the defendant found and appropriated them. In form the action is a fiction, and in substance a remedy to recover the value of personal chattels wrongfully converted by another to his own use; and the form supposes that the defendant may have come lawfully in possession of the goods. To sustain trover, the plaintiff must show a legal title, and he must either have actual possession of the property or the right to immediate possession at the time of the conversion, and the right to take possession at some future day, or a right in action is not sufficient; and in case the plaintiff has temporarily parted with his possession under a contract, or bailment, he cannot maintain trover, unless the time or the bailment had terminated at the time of the conversion. McIntire v. Blakeley (Pa.) 12 Atl. 825, 327.

Trover is grounded on the legal fiction of the finding of personal property casually lost by the owner and the subsequent conversion of the same by the finder to his own use or to the use of another, and the gist of the action is the wrongful conversion. Blakey v. Douglas (Pa.) 6 Atl. 398, 400.

"Trover" is the remedy to recover the value of personal property wrongfully converted by another to his own use. Boulden v. Gough (Del.) 54 Atl. 693.

"Trover" is an action ex delicto, and the gist of it is a wrongful conversion. Finch v. Clarke, 61 N. C. 335, 336.

In Hambly v. Trott, Cowp. 371, Lord Mansfield said that although technically and strictly an action of trover was an action ex delicto, yet that substantially and really it was, as he termed it, an action of property. During the last argument of the case he is reported to have said: "An action of trover is not now an action ex delicto maleficio, though it is so in form and also in substance. Trover is an action of property. If a man receives the property of another, his fortune ought to answer it." Chase v. Fitz, 132 Mass. 359, 365.

A conversion is the gist of the action, and without conversion neither possession of the property, negligence, nor misfortune will enable the action to be maintained. Stephen says: "Trover is a remedy to recover the value of personal chattels wrongfully converted by another to his own use." Rogers v. Hule, 2 Cal. 571, 572, 56 Am. Dec. 363.

Trover is a generic name, applied to those torts arising from unlawful conversion of any particular piece of personal property owned by another. Spellman v. Richmond & D. R. Co., 14 S. E. 947, 949, 35 S. C. 475, 28 Am. St. Rep. 858.

Since the abolition of the common-law forms of action in pleading, the phrase "action of trover" does not accurately define a cause of action. The names of the ancient forms are still used for convenience as approximately designating different causes of action for which there is now only one form; but their use is sometimes deceptive, in that, while the essential elements of a cause of action as determined by principles of substantive law may be unaffected by the change in procedure, yet those insignia of a distinct cause of action which depended upon or grew out of the limitations and fictions involved in the use of prescribed forms have lost their significance as distinguishing marks of distinct causes of action. The gist of that action was a conversion, or the unlawful exercise of dominion over goods or chattels belonging to another, who is entitled to their immediate possession. Where a complaint alleges facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action for breach of contract, and such facts are proved, judgment for plaintiff must follow, though he has proceeded on the theory that the action was in trover, in which case the proof would be insufficient. Metropolis Mfg. Co. v. Lynch, 36 Atl. 832, 833, 68 Conn. 459.

Trover lies for the conversion of goods or personal chattels. It does not lie for fixtures eo nomine. The title to land cannot be tried in such action when the plaintiff is not in possession. It does not lie for property severed from the realty against one who has actual adverse possession under claim of title. Darrah v. Baird, 101 Pa. 265, 268, 269.

"In order to sustain the action of trover, there must have been on the part of the defendant some unlawful assumption of dominion over the property in question, in defiance or exclusion of the plaintiff's right, or else a withholding possession from the plaintiff under a claim of title inconsistent with his own." Thweat v. Stamps, 67 Ala. 96, 98.

An affidavit to hold to bail, stating that the defendant was "indebted to the plaintiff in trover," was bad as not sufficiently positive or certain according to the statute, as so technical a word as "trover" ought not to be used. Hubbard v. Pacheco, 1 H. Bl. 218.

Detinue distinguished.

See "Detinue."

As transitory action.

See "Transitory Action."

Trespass distinguished.

There is a material difference between "trespass" and "trover." Trover waives the trespass in taking, admits the possession to have been lawfully gotten, and proceeds to recover damages only for the unlawful conversion. In trespass, a jury may also give damages for the taking. Hall v. Moor (Pa.) 1 Add. 376, 377.

There are two principal differences between actions of trespass and trover for personalty appropriated by defendant, the first of which is that in trespass there is always either an original wrongful taking, or a taking made wrongful ab initio by subsequent misconduct, while in trover the original taking is supposed or assumed to be lawful, and often the only wrong consists in a refusal to surrender a possession which was originally rightful, but the right to which has terminated. Burnham v. Pidcock, 66 N. Y. Supp. 806, 807, 83 Misc. Rep. 65 (citing Cooley on Torts).

TRUCK ACT.

In English law this name is given to St. 1 & 2 Wm. IV, c. 37, passed to abolish what is commonly called the "truck system," under which employers were in the practice of paying the wages of their work people in goods, or of requiring them to purchase goods at certain shops. This led to laborers being compelled to take goods of inferior quality at a high price. State v. Peel Splint Coal Co., 15 S. E. 1000, 1010, 36 W. Va. 802, 17 L. R. A. 885 (citing Black, Law Dict.).

TRUCK WAGON.

"Truck wagon," as used in Laws 1838, c. 807, § 9, exempting from execution one cart or a truck wagon, does not include a peddler's wagon designed to be used in trade from place to place, the body of which was hung on springs and contained drawers for carrying goods, but refers to vehicles used for farm work or heavy hauling. Smith v. Chase, 71 Me. 164, 166.

TRUCKMAN.

As common carrier, see "Common Carrier."

TRUE.

See "Just and True"; "Substantially True."

Webster's International Dictionary defines the word "true" as: "(1) Conformable to fact; in accordance with the actual state of things; correct and not false, erroneous, inaccurate, or the like; as a true relation or narration, a true history; a declaration is true when it states the facts. (2) Right to precision; conformable to a rule or pattern; exact; accurate; as a true copy; a true likeness of the original." Johnson v. Des Moines Life Ass'n, 105 Iowa, 273, 276, 75 N. W. 101, 102.

A representation that a horse is "sound, kind, and true" is a false representation, within the meaning of a statute providing a punishment for obtaining goods by false pretenses, if made knowingly during negotiations for the sale of the horse, with intent to cheat and defraud the purchaser, and the latter is induced to purchase by reason thereof; the falsity not being apparent at the time. Watson v. People, 87 N. Y. 561, 564, 41 Am. Rep. 397.

As honest or sincere.

In one sense that only is true which is conformable to the actual state of things; but in another and broader sense the word "true" is often used as the synonym of honest, sincere, or not fraudulent, and as used in an application for an insurance policy, warranting the statements full, complete, and true in every particular, meant that the company required of the applicant, as a condition precedent to any binding contract, that he would observe the utmost good faith toward it, and make full, direct, and honest answers to all questions, without evasion or fraud, and without suppression, misrepresentation, or concealment of facts with which the company ought to be made acquainted. Ames v. Manhattan Life Ins. Co., 58 N. Y. Supp. 244, 249, 40 App. Div. 465; Globe Mut. Life Ins. Ass'n v. Wagner, 58 N. E. 970, 971, 188 Ill. 133, 52 L. R. A. 649, 80 Am. St. Rep. 169. Under this construction of the word "true" it was held that a statement by the applicant that he was not affected with a particular disease, when as a matter of fact he was, was not an untrue answer, because, while he was in fact affected with such disease, he was not aware of it. Moulou v. American Life Ins. Co., 111 U. S. 335, 345, 346, 4 Sup. Ct. 466, 471, 28 L. Ed. 447.

Though sometimes signifying only that which is conformable to the actual state of things, "true" is often used as a synonym for honest, sincere, or not fraudulent, and as used in a life policy, warranting the statements of insured as to the condition of his health at the time of the application to be true, does not warrant the absolute accuracy of such statements; but the warranty is not broken unless it appears that insured knew or believed at the time of making the warranties that they were incorrect. Well v. New York Life Ins. Co., 17 South. 853, 857, 47 La. Ann. 1405.

As just.

The use of the word "true" in the verification of a lien notice showing a certain amount due after deducting all just credits and offsets, the affidavit merely alleging that the lien notice is true, is a sufficient compliance with the statutory requirement that the verification shall show that the claim is just. Fairhaven Land Co. v. Jordan, 32 Pac. 729, 731, 5 Wash. 729.

The omission of the words "true and just" from an inventory by an assignor for the benefit of creditors does not invalidate the inventory, though section 4668 requires the affidavit to be to the effect that the inventory is in all respects just and true, if other words having the same effect are used. Thus an affidavit which only stated that the inventory is true is sufficient, as Webster's Dictionary shows that the words "true" and "just" are synonymous. Landauer v. Conklin, 54 N. W. 322, 325, 8 S. D. 462.

TRUE ACCOUNT.

Rev. St. c. 125, § 16, requiring a creditor to render a "true account of the sum due" upon demand, is not complied with by an account rendered wherein it stated that two separate items are both due, when in fact only one of such items is due. Cushing v. Ayer, 25 Me. (12 Shep.) 383, 387.

The "true and just account" mentioned in the mechanic's lien law, requiring a person claiming such a lien to state a just and true account, means an account honestly stated. It does not require the statement of the exact account which a jury or court may find to be due. Black v. Appolonio, 1 Mont. 342, 346.

TRUE AND COMPLETE.

Civ. Code 1852, § 283 (Rev. St. 1881, § 462), provides that copies of records shall be proved and admitted as legal evidence by the attestation of the keeper of such records that the same are "true and complete" copies thereof. Held, that the words "true and complete," as used in such statute, were not technical words, and that a certificate using words of substantially the same import, or words of equivalent meaning, was a sufficient attestation to authorize the admission of a copy of a record in evidence. Thus the words "full, true, and complete" were held to be certainly equivalent in meaning to the words used in the statute, and a certificate containing them was a substantial compliance with the statute. Anderson v. Ackerman, 88 Ind. 481, 490.

The certificate of the clerk to the transcript of a record that it is a "true and correct" copy, instead of a "true and complete" copy, as required by statute, will not be cause for dismissing the appeal; the words "true and complete" as used in the statute not being regarded as technical, and the words "true and correct" as used in the certificate being equivalent in meaning to the statutory words. Walker v. Hill, 12 N. E. 387, 388, 111 Ind. 223.

A transcript of a justice of the peace, exhibiting a complete proceeding and judgment against the defendant therein named, and certified as a true and correct copy, is admissible as evidence in support of a deed on a sale of real estate on execution thereunder, under Rev. St. 1894, § 624, Rev. St. 1881, § 612, which requires such justice to make out and certify a "true and complete transcript" of the proceedings and judgment; the phrases "true and correct copy" and "true and complete transcript" being equivalent terms. Collier v. Collier, 49 N. E. 1063, 1064, 150 Ind. 276.

TRUE AND FULL VALUE.

The term "true and full value," whenever used in the act relating to taxation, shall be held to mean the usual selling price at the place where the property to which the term is applied shall be at the time of assessment, being the price which could be obtained therefor at private sale, and not at forced or auction sale. Gen. St. Minn. 1894, § 1511; Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 1176.

The term "true and full value," wherever used in the title on taxation, shall be held to mean the fair market value, in cash, at the place where the property to which the term is applied shall be at the time of assessment, being the price which could be obtained therefor at private sale, and not at forced or auction sale. Rev. St. Tex. 1895, art. 5064.

TRUE AND PERFECT LIST.

The "true and perfect list" of taxable estate, which Rev. St. c. 6, § 92, requires a taxpayer to bring to the assessors as a condition precedent to a right of appeal to the county commissioners for any abatement of taxes, comprises a true enumeration, description, and specification of the property. No appraisement or estimation of the value of the property is essential. Inhabitants of Orland v. County Com'rs, 78 Me. 460, 461.

TRUE COPY.

McClain's Code, § 1733, requiring insurance companies, on the issue of any policy, to attach a "true copy" of the application or representation of insured, means not merely a substantial copy, but one so exact that upon comparison it can be said to be a true copy, without resorting to construction. If, upon comparison, it may be said that the copy is conformable to the facts, and in accordance with the actual state of things appearing in the original, then it may be said to be a true copy. Johnson v. Des Moines Life Ass'n, 75 N. W. 101, 102, 105 Iowa, 278.

TRUE DESCRIPTION.

Wag. St. p. 909, § 5, requiring that a mechanic, in order to obtain a lien, shall file a "true description" of the property, means such a description as would enable a party familiar with the locality to identify the premises. De Witt v. Smith, 63 Mo. 263, 265.

TRUE QUESTIONS OF FACT.

Shannon's Code, § 6285, referring to issues for jury trial in the chancery court, provides that "the issue shall be made up by the parties under the direction of the court, and set forth briefly and clearly the true questions of fact to be tried." These concluding words, "the true questions of fact to be tried," signify those controlling questions of fact whose decision will determine the real merits of the controversy, and do not include those of an immaterial, collateral, or inclusive nature. A mere dispute or a difference between statements of witnesses on a given point is not, under the statute, a true question of fact, or a proper subject for a separate issue, unless it is so central and far-reaching that its decision will control the final disposition of the cause as a whole or in some distinct branch. Any number of points in evidence tending severally to establish a controlling controverted fact should be covered by one issue, and not submitted separately in as many different issues. Whether or not such controlling fact really exists is a true question of fact, and the proper subject of a single issue. Crisman v. McMurray, 64 S. W. 711, 712, 107 Tenn. 469.

TRUE SUN TIME.

"True sun time" is obtained by the means of a dial, while mean sun time is what is called "standard time." There is a difference of four minutes for each degree between true sun time and standard or mean sun time. Ex parte Parker, 29 S. W. 480, 481, 35 Tex. Cr. R. 12.

TRUE TITLE.

The term "true titles" has been used to distinguish between the character of titles acquired under Act 1819 and those acquired by adverse possession before that act; the title in the one case being vested in the adverse holder, while in the other he simply has a right of possession only. But no title can with propriety be said to ever become the true title until its superiority to all other titles is either conceded or established after contest. Coal Creek Consol. Coal Co. v. East Tennessee Iron & Coal Co., 59 S. W. 634, 637, 105 Tenn. 563.

TRUE VALUE.

"True value," as used in laws providing that property shall be assessed for taxes according to its true value, means the value which it has in exchange for money. State Board of Assessors v. Central R. Co., 4 Atl. 578, 607, 48 N. J. Law (19 Vroom) 146; Central R. Co. v. State Board of Assessors, 2 Atl. 789, 793, 48 N. J. Law (19 Vroom) 1, 57 Am. Rep. 516.

By the express provisions of Tax Law, § 53, the words "true value or valuation," as used in such act, means the usual selling price at the place where the property to which such term is applied shall be at the time of assessment, being the price which could be obtained therefor at private sale, and not at forced or auction sale. State Board of Tax Com'rs v. Holliday, 49 N. E. 14, 17, 150 Ind. 218, 42 L. R. A. 828.

"True value," as used in the tariff act of 1818, means the "actual cost of the goods to the importer at the place from which they were imported, and not the current market value of the goods at such place." United States v. Tappan, 24 U. S. (11 Wheat.) 419, 421, 6 L. Ed. 509; Tappan v. United States (U. S.) 23 Fed. Cas. 690, 691.

TRUE VERDICT.

A "true verdict" is the voluntary conclusion of the jury after deliberate consideration, and it is none the less a true verdict because the respective jurors may have been liberal in concessions to each other, if conscientiously and freely made. A true verdict is not the result of any arbitrary rule or order, whether imposed by themselves or by the court or officer in charge. If a jury should agree in advance that their verdict should be the result of a division by 12 of the sum total of all the jurors' separate assessments, a verdict brought about by such an agreement ought to be set aside. Where on the back of a paper containing instructions taken into the jury room and returned with the verdict there appears a memorandum showing 12 different amounts in a column, the total thereof, and its division by 12, the verdict which corresponds with the quotient so given will be set aside because of the presumption that it is the result of the jurors in advance agreeing to average their separate assessments. Southern Ry. Co. v. Williams, 21 South 328, 329, 118 Ala. 620.

TRUE VOTE.

"True vote," as used in the Florida election law of 1872, means the vote actually cast, as distinguished from the legal vote. State v. McLin, 18 Fla. 17, 47.

TRULY.

See "Well and Truly."

"Truly," as used in an oath by a commissioner to take deposition in a foreign state that he shall, according to the best of his skill and knowledge, truly, faithfully, and without partiality to any or either of the parties in the cause, take the examination and depositions of all and every witness and witnesses produced and examined by virtue of the commission, is not synonymous with "fairly," as used in Nix. Dig. p. 925, § 2, requiring that the commissioner take oath that he will faithfully, fairly, and impartially execute the commission. The words "fairly" and "truly" have widely different shades of meaning and convey entirely distinct ideas. "Every day's experience teaches us that language may be truly, yet most unfairly, repeated. The answer of the witness may be truly written down, yet it may convey a meaning quite different from that which the witness intended to convey, and did convey, to the person that heard him speak. On the other hand, language may be fairly reported, yet not in accordance with strict truth." Lawrence v. Finch, 17 N. J. Eq. (2 C. E. Green) 234, 239.

TRUNK.

The words "trunk" and "chest" are not synonymous, and therefore an indictment charging the theft of a trunk or chest is bad for want of certainty. Potter v. State, 39 Tex. 388, 389.

TRUSSED ROOFS.

"Trussed roofs," as used in a city ordinance requiring the outside walls of buildings having trussed roofs of a certain height to average at least a certain thickness, are roofs packed or bound closely. They are necessarily very heavy roofs, and, although they are said sometimes to be self-supporting, this is said only in respect to their being packed or bound closely, and not otherwise; for their weight, when supported either by walls or pilasters, is uncommonly heavy in comparison to the weight of other kinds of roofs. Diamond State Iron Co. v. Giles (Del.) 11 Atl. 189, 194, 7 Houst. 557.

TRUST.

A "trust" is defined by Black to mean an organization of persons or corporations formed for the purpose of regulating the supply and price of commodities, etc. Mollyneaux v. Wittenberg, 58 N. W. 205, 208, 39 Neb. 547.

What is commonly called a "trust" is a species of combination organized by individuals or corporations for the purpose of monopolizing the manufacture of or traffic in various articles and commodities, which were well known and fully understood when the anti-trust act was approved. United States v. Northern Securities Co. (U. S.) 120 Fed. 721, 724.

In order to constitute a trust, within the statute making contracts void where a combination of capital, skill, or acts is formed to create or carry out restrictions in trade or to prevent competition in the sale or purchase of commodities, there must be a combination of capital, skill, or acts by two or more. "Combination," as here used, means union or association. If there be no union or association by two or more of their capital, skill, or acts, there can be no combination; hence, no trust. When we consider the purposes for which the combination must be formed, the essential meaning of the word "combination," and the fact that a punishment is prescribed for each day that the trust continues in existence, we are led to the conclusion that the union or association of capital, skill, or acts denounced is where the parties in the particular case designed the united co-operation of such agencies, which might have been otherwise independent and competing, for the accomplishment of one or more of such purposes. State ex inf. Crow v. Continental Tobacco Co., 75 S. W. 737, 747, 177 Mo. 1 (citing Gates v. Hooper, 90 Tex. 563, 39 S. W. 1079).

The term "trusts," as employed in the title of Act March 30, 1889, being "An act to define trusts and to provide for penalties and punishment of corporations, persons, firms and associations connected with them," is not employed in its technical legal sense. By very recent commercial usage, the meaning of the word has been extended so as to comprehend combinations of corporations or capitalists for the purpose of controlling the price of articles of prime necessity or the charges of transportation for the public. Queen Ins. Co. v. State, 24 S. W. 397, 402, 86 Tex. 250, 22 L. R. A. 483.

A "trust," within the meaning of the act of 1889 prohibiting trusts and conspiracies against trade, includes a contract for the sale of beer which provides that the purchaser shall handle only the beer named in the contract and that the manufacturer shall sell to no other dealer in the town or vicinity. Fuqua v. Pabst Brewing Co., 38 S. W. 29, 30, 90 Tex. 298, 35 L. R. A. 241.

A "trust" is a contract, combination, confederation, or understanding, express or implied, between two or more persons, to control the price of a commodity or service, for the benefit of the parties thereto and to the injury of the public, and which tends to create a monopoly; and a social club, composed of underwriters of the various insurance companies doing business within a city, which tended to maintain a uniform and equal rate of insurance, was unlawful as against public policy. Marshall, J., stated that "in the olden times such practices were called 'contracts in restraint of trade.' Nowadays they are called 'trusts.' There is no difference in the principle. There is a difference in the extent and methods. Those the courts condemned long ago were as mere saplings compared to the mammoth oaks when considered alongside of those of to-day. When the evils to the public interests that flow from these trust combinations are attempted to be described, words become mere weaklings in their power of expression, and one stands appalled at the helplessness of the people outside of judicial aid." State ex inf. Crow v. Firemen's Fund Ins. Co., 52 S. W. 595, 607, 152 Mo. 1, 45 L. R. A. 363.

A trust may or may not be endowed with corporate powers; if not, then it is a mere aggregation of individuals or partnerships. State v. Haun, 59 Pac. 340, 342, 61 Kan. 146, 47 L. R. A. 369.

A trust is a combination of capital, skill, or acts, by two or more persons, firms, corporations, or associations of persons, or either two or more of them, for either, any, or all of the following purposes: First, to create or carry out restrictions in trade or commerce, or aids to commerce, or to carry out restrictions in the full and free pursuit of any business authorized or permitted by the laws of this state; second, to increase or reduce the price of merchandise, produce, or commodities, or to control the cost or rates of insurance; third, to prevent competition in the manufacture, making, transportation, sale, or purchase of merchandise, produce, or commodities, or to prevent competition in aids to commerce; fourth, to fix any standard or figure, whereby its price to the public shall be in any manner controlled or established, for any article or commodity of merchandise, produce, or commerce intended for sale, use, or consumption in the state; fifth, to make or enter into, or execute or carry out, any contract, obligation, or agreement of any kind or description by which they shall bind or have to bind themselves not to sell, manufacture, dispose of, or transport any article or commodity, or article of trade, use, merchandise, commerce, or consumption below a common standard figure, or by which they shall agree in any manner to keep the price of such article, commodity, or transportation at a fixed or graded figure, or by which they shall in any manner establish or settle the price of any article or commodity or transportation between them, or themselves and others, to preclude a free and unrestricted competition among themselves or others in transportation, sale, or manufacture of any such article or commodity, or by which they shall agree to pool, combine, or unite any interest they may have in connection with the manufacture, sale, or transportation of any such article or commodity, that its price may in any manner be affected. Gen. St. Kan. 1901, § 7864.

A "trust and combine" is a combination, contract, understanding, or agreement, express or implied, between two or more persons, corporations, or firms, or associations of persons, or between one or more of either with one or more of the others—(a) in restraint of trade; (b) to limit, increase, or reduce the price of a commodity; (c) to limit, increase, or reduce the production or output of a commodity; (d) intended to hinder competition in the production, importation, manufacture, transportation, sale, or purchase of a commodity; (e) to engross or forestall a commodity; (f) to issue, own, or hold the certificates of stock of any trust or combine; (g) to place the control, to any extent, of business, or of the products or earnings thereof, in the power of trustees, by whatever name called; (h) by which any other person than themselves, their proper officers, agents, and employes, shall, or shall have the power to dictate or control the management of business; or (i) to unite or pool interests in the importation, manufacture, production, transportation, or price of a commodity. But this shall not apply to the associations of those engaged in husbandry, in their dealings with commodities in the hands of the producer, nor to the societies of artisans, employes, and laborers formed for the benefit and protection of their members. Code Miss. 1892, § 4437.

A trust is a combination of capital, skill, or acts by any person or persons to fix the price of any article or commodity of trade, use, or merchandise, with the intent to prevent others from conducting or carrying on the same business, or selling or trafficking in the same article, use, or merchandise, or a combination of capital, skill, or acts by two or more persons, or by two or more of them, for either, any, or all of the following purposes: (1) To create or carry out restrictions in trade; (2) to limit or reduce the production or increase or reduce the price of merchandise or commodities; (3) to prevent competition in insurance, either life, fire, accident, or any other kind, or in manufacture, making, constructing, transportation, sale, or purchase of merchandise, produce, or commodities; (4) to fix any standard or figure, whereby its price to the public shall be in any manner controlled or established, upon any article of merchandise, produce, or manufacture of any kind intended for sale, use, or consumption in this state, to establish any pretended agency whereby the sale of any such article, commodity, merchandise, or product shall be covered up, concealed, or made to appear to be for the original vendor, for a like purpose or purposes, and to enable such original vendor, producer, or manufacturer to control the wholesale or retail price of any such article of merchandise, produce, or commodity after the title to the same shall have passed from such vendor or manufacturer; (5) to make or enter into, carry on, or carry out any contract, obligation, or agreement of any kind or description by which they shall bind or have heretofore bound themselves not to sell, dispose of, traffic in, or transport any article of merchandise, or commodity or article of trade, product, use, merchandise, consumption, or commerce, below a common standard figure, card, or list price, or by which they shall agree in any manner to keep the price of such article, product, commodity, or transportation at a fixed or graduated figure or price, or by which they shall in any manner establish or settle the price of any article of merchandise or commodity, or of insurance, fire, life, or accident, or transportation between them or between themselves and others, or with the intent to preclude, or the tendency of which is to prevent or preclude, a free and unrestricted competition among themselves or others, or the people generally, in the production, sale, traffic, or transportation of any such article of merchandise, product, or commodity, or conducting a like business, or by which they shall agree to pool, combine, or unite any interest they may have in connection with the sale, production, or transportation of any such article of merchandise, product, or commodity, or the carrying on of any such business, that its price might in any manner be affected thereby. Cobbey's Ann. St. Neb. 1903, § 11,500.

A "trust" is a combination of capital, skill, or acts, by two or more persons, firms, partnerships, corporations, or associations of persons, or of any two or more of them, for either, any, or all of the following purposes: (1) To create or carry out restrictions in trade or commerce; (2) to limit or reduce the production, or increase or reduce the price, of merchandise or any commodity; (3) to prevent competition in manufacturing, making, transportation, sale, or purchase of merchandise, produce, or any commodity; (4) to fix at any standard or figure, whereby its price to the public or consumer shall be in any manner controlled or established, any article or commodity of merchandise, produce, or commerce intended for sale, barter, use, or consumption in this state; (5) to make or enter into, or execute or carry out, any contracts, obligations, or agreements of any kind or description, by which they shall bind or have bound themselves not to sell, dispose of, or transport any article or any commodity, or any article of trade, use, merchandise, commerce, or consumption below a common standard figure or fixed value, or by which they shall agree in any manner to keep the price of such article, commodity, or transportation at a fixed or graduated figure, or by which they shall in any manner establish or settle the price of any article, commodity, or transportation between them, for themselves and others, so as to directly or indirectly preclude a free and unrestricted competition among themselves, or any purchasers or consumers, in the sale or transportation of any such article or commodity, or by which they shall agree to pool, combine, or directly or indirectly unite any interests that they may have connected with the sale or transportation of any such article or commodity, that its price might in any manner be affected. Bates' Ann. St. Ohio 1904, § 4427-1.

A trust is a combination of capital, skill, or acts, by two or more persons, firms, corporations, or associations of persons, or of either two or more of them, for either, any, or all of the following purposes: (1) To create or carry out restrictions in trade; (2) to limit or reduce the production, or increase or reduce the price, of merchandise or commodities; (3) to prevent competition in manufacture, making, transportation, sale, or purchase of merchandise, produce, or commodities; (4) to fix at any standard or figure, whereby its price to the public shall be in any manner controlled or established, any article or commodity of merchandise, produce, or commerce intended for sale, use, or consumption in this state; (5) to make or enter into, or execute or carry out, any contract, obligation, or agreement of any kind or description by which they shall bind or have bound themselves not to sell, dispose of, or transport any article or commodity, or article of trade, use, merchandise, commerce, or consumption, below a common standard figure, or by which they shall agree in any manner to keep the price of such article, commodity, or transportation at a fixed or graduated figure, or by which they shall in any manner establish or settle the price of any article or commodity or transportation between them or themselves and others, to preclude a free and unrestricted competition among themselves or others in the sale or transportation of any such article or commodity, or by which they shall agree to pool, combine, or unite any interest they may have in connection with the sale or transportation of any such article or commodity, that its price might in any manner be affected. Pen. Code Tex. 1895, art. 976.

A combination is within the denouncement of the statute, though there is no bad motive, and its immediate result is a reduction in price, if its object is in restraint of trade and to create a monopoly. San Antonio Gas Co. v. State (Tex.) 54 S. W. 289, 290.

The purchase of six cotton compresses located at different parts of the state on the same day by one company, where the purchase does not restrict aids to commerce, the price for compressing cotton being the same throughout the state, being fixed by a commission, does not create a trust. State v. Shippers' Compress & Warehouse Co., 69 S. W. 58-60, 95 Tex. 603.

A trust is an equitable right, title, or interest in property, real or personal, distinct from the legal ownership thereof. Pratt v. Thornton, 28 Me. (15 Shep.) 355, 360, 48 Am. Dec. 492 (citing Story, Eq. § 964), Raines v. Woodward (S. C.) 4 Rich. Eq. 399, 406; Gough v. Satterlee, 52 N. Y. Supp. 492, 497, 32 App. Div. 33; Dillenbeck v. Pinnell, 96 N. A trust is where the legal estate is in one and the equitable estate in the other. Goodwin v. McMinn, 44 Atl. 1094, 1095, 193 Pa. 646, 74 Am. St. Rep. 703; Chaffees v. Risk, 24 Pa. 432; Gough v. Ellicott, 1 Pac. 593, 594, 31 Kan. 173.

A trust, in common parlance, may be said to be a confidence reposed by some one in some one for some public or private purpose. Ex parte Faulkner, 1 W. Va. 269, 298.

A trust is a relation between two persons, by virtue of which one of them, as trustee, holds property for the benefit of the other, the cestui que trust. Corby v. Corby, 85 Mo. 371, 389.

A trust signifies a holding of property subject to a duty of employing it or applying its proceeds according to directions given by the person from whom it was derived. 2 Abb. Law Dict. 609; Munroe v. Crouse, 12 N. Y. Supp. 815, 819, 59 Hun, 248.

A trust, in its simplest elements, is a confidence reposed in one person, who is termed the "trustee," for the benefit of another, who is called the "cestui que trust"; and it is a confidence respecting property which is thus held by the former for the benefit of the latter. Carter v. Gibson, 45 N. W. 634, 636, 29 Neb. 324, 26 Am. St. Rep. 381 (citing Will. Eq. Jur. 186).

The word "trust" is often used in a broad and comprehensive sense. Every deposit is a trust; and the receipt of money to be paid to another, or to be applied to a particular purpose, and which is not so applied, constitutes a trust. Kane v. Bloodgood (N. Y.) 7 Johns. Ch. 90, 109, 11 Am. Dec. 417; Brown v. Brown, 31 N. Y. Supp. 650, 652, 88 Hun, 160; Richardson v. Whitaker (Ky.) 45 S. W. 774, 779; Robinson's Committee v. Elam's Ex'r, 14 S. W. 84, 90 Ky. 300; Appeal of McMullin, 18 Atl. 1056, 1058, 131 Pa. 370; Rice v. United States, 7 Sup. Ct. 1377, 1385, 122 U. S. 611, 30 L. Ed. 793.

A trust is an obligation arising out of a confidence reposed in the trustee or representative, who has the legal title to property conveyed to him, that he will faithfully apply the property according to the confidence reposed; in other words, according to the wishes of the grantor of the trust. This is the technical definition of a trust. Beers v. Lyon, 21 Conn. 604, 613 (citing 4 Kent, Comm. 304 et seq.); Sinking Fund Com'rs v. Walker, 7 Miss. (16 How.) 143, 185, 38 Am. Dec. 433 (quoting Willis, Trustees, 2); Thornburg v. Buck, 41 N. E. 85, 86, 13 Ind. App. 446.

Lewin says that a trust cannot be more exactly defined than in the terms employed by Lord Coke for the definition of a use, namely, a confidence reposed in some other, not issuing out of the land, but as a thing collateral, annexed in privity to the estate of the land and to the person, touching the land for which the cestui que use has no remedy but by a subpoena in chancery. It is a confidence reposed in some other; not in some other than the author of the trust, for a person may convert himself into a trustee, but in some other than the beneficiary, for, as a man cannot sue a subpoena against himself, he cannot be said to hold in trust for himself. Farmers' Loan & Trust Co. v. Carroll (N. Y.) 5 Barb. 613, 643.

A trust is not merely a right to recover a judgment because of the commission of some wrong in violation of some duty arising from contract or statute, or natural or moral obligation, but it is an equitable right, title, or interest in property, real or personal; the legal title to the property being in some other person. National Bank v. Wilcott, 1 Pac. 593, 594, 31 Kan. 173.

A trust is an equitable obligation, either express or implied, resting upon a person by reason of a confidence reposed in him, to apply or deal with the property for the benefit of some other person, or for the benefit of himself and another or others, according to such confidence. McCreary v. Gewinner, 29 S. E. 960, 963, 108 Ga. 528.

A trust is merely what use was before the statutes of uses, and the same rule applies to trusts in chancery now which were formerly applied to uses, and in exercising its jurisdiction over executory trusts the court of chancery is not bound by the technical rules of law, but takes a wider range in favor of the intent of the party. Fuller v. Missroon, 35 S. C. 314, 329, 14 S. E. 714.

A trust is an interest in land existing only in foro conscientiae, and which can be reached, recovered, protected, and dealt with only in a court of equity. It is an estate of inheritance, of which the owner may be seised in law or fact. Yeo v. Mecereau, 18 N. J. Law (3 Har.) 387, 390.

Mr. Justice Swayne, in Seymour v. Freer, 75 U. S. (8 Wall.) 202, 19 Ed. 306, defined a trust as "where there are rights, titles, and interests in property distinct from the legal ownership. In such cases the legal title, in the eye of the law, carries with it to the holder absolute dominion, but behind it lie beneficial rights and interests in the same property belonging to another. These rights, to the extent to which they exist, are a charge upon the property, and constitute an equity which a court of equity will protect and enforce, whenever its aid for that purpose is invoked." Crosby v. Cotton, 24 S. W. 343, 347, 5 Tex. Civ. App. 583.

A "use," a "trust," and a "confidence" is one and the same thing, and if an estate is conveyed to one person for the use of, or upon a trust for, another, and nothing more is said, the statute immediately transfers the legal estate to the usee, and no trust is created, though express words of trust are used. Teller v. Hill, 72 Pac. 811, 812, 18 Colo. App. 509 (citing Perry, Trusts [5th Ed.] 298).

The declaration of trust, whether written or oral, must be reasonably certain in its material terms, and this requisite of certainty includes the subject-matter or property embraced within the trust, the beneficiaries, the nature and quantity of interests which they are to have, and the manner in which the trust is to be performed. If the language is so vague, general, or equivocal that any of these necessary elements of the trust is left in real uncertainty, then the trust must fail. Within such rule no trust is created in homestead property decreed to a wife in adverse proceedings awarding such property to her, to be held by her in trust for her support and that of her children. Simpson v. Simpson, 22 Pac. 167, 168, 80 Cal. 237 (citing Pom. Eq. Jur. 1009).

Trusts are various. A debtor may be said to be a trustee for his creditor, a bailee is certainly one for his bailor, and an agent for his principal. Pickens v. Dwight, 4 S. C. (4 Rich.) 360, 367.

The word "trust," in its popular and broadest sense, embraces a multitude of relations, duties, and responsibilities. Thus executors and administrators, guardians of infants and lunatics, assignees in insolvency and bankruptcy, bailees, factors, agents, commission merchants, and common carriers, as well as the officers of public and private corporations, all exercise a kind of trust. Wilson v. Kirby, 88 Ill. 566, 570 (citing Perry, Trusts, § 1).

The term "trust" is a very comprehensive one. Every deposit is a direct trust. Every person who receives money to be paid to another, or to be applied to a particular purpose, is a trustee. The cases of hirer and letter to hire, borrower and lender, pawnor and pawnee, principal and agent, are all cases of express trust. It has never been held, however, that these and the like cases are such technical trusts as to bring them within the limited equity jurisdiction. Warner v. McMullin, 18 Atl. 1056, 1058, 131 Pa. 370; Brown v. Brown, 31 N. Y. Supp. 650, 652, 83 Hun, 160.

Where one person employs another as an agent, loans money, or sells property on credit, a confidence and trust is reposed to a greater or less extent, and yet such transactions have never been regarded by courts as falling within any recognized class of trusts.—Weer v. Gand, 88 Ill. 490, 493.

The confidence reposed in the trustee or holder of property for the benefit of another, and at other times the interest or right of the beneficiary in or to the property recognized and enforced in equity only, are both mentioned as a "trust." Perhaps it may be properly said that the confidence is the foundation of the peculiar interest or right, and gives to it the name of trust, though, generally, mere mutual promises and a compliance by one party will not create the trust. Nease v. Capehart, 8 W. Va. 95, 105.

Any agreement or contract in writing, made by a person having the power of disposal over real property, whereby such person agrees or directs that certain real estate shall be held or dealt with in a particular manner for the benefit of another, creates a trust. Carter v. Gibson, 45 N. W. 634, 636, 29 Neb. 324, 26 Am. St. Rep. 381.

The word "trust" in its popular sense covers many things besides legal and pe-cunlary trust. A layman, using the word, might easily suppose that he was expressing thereby simply his belief or trust that the devisee would carry out his wishes; that, in saying that he gave his property to his wife in trust to carry out his express wishes as to the education and maintenance of the children, he was making an absolute gift to her of the property, trusting that she would faithfully carry out those wishes—in other words that the property was to be hers, simply burdened with the execution of his express desire. Davies v. Davies, 85 N. W. 201, 203, 109 Wis. 129.

The word "trust," found in Rev. St. 1893, c. 3, § 70, par. 6, which declares that, where a decedent has received money in trust, the claim against his estate shall be a preferred one, is to be taken as used in a restrictive sense, as applying to technical trusts only, and hence it did not apply to an agent who had negotiated his principal's note, and was to expend the proceeds for the principal's benefit. Shipherd v. Furness, 39 N. E. 1096, 1098, 153 Ill. 590.

Classification.

"Trusts" are divided in Perry, Trusts, §§ 25-27, into four classes: "Express trusts, sometimes called direct trusts; implied trusts; resulting trusts; and constructive trusts." Gottstein v. Wist, 61 Pac. 715, 718, 22 Wash. 581.

Civ. Code, § 2215, classifies trusts as (1) voluntary, which are express trusts, and (2) involuntary, which are implied or constructive trusts. Barker v. Hurley, 63 Pac. 1071, 1073, 132 Cal. 21.

A trust may be express or implied, and it is implied when deducible from the transaction as a matter of intent. There must be sufficient words to raise a trust, property which becomes subject to it, and an ascertained purpose to be accomplished. Jones v. Wadsworth (Pa.) 11 Phila. 227, 229.

Trusts are divided into simple and special trusts. A simple trust is a simple conveyance of property to one upon trust for another, without further specifications or directions. In such case the law regulates the trust, and the cestui que trust has the right of possession and of disposing of the property, and he may call upon the trustee to execute such conveyances of the legal estate as are necessary. A special trust is where special and particular duties are pointed out to be performed by the trustee. In such cases he is not a mere passive agent, but he has actual duties to perform, as when an estate is given to a person to sell and from the proceeds to pay the debts of the settlor. Cone v. Dunham, 20 Atl. 311, 313, 59 Conn. 145, 8 L. R. A. 647.

A trust may be either executed or executory. When the legal estate or the equitable title passes, it is executed; but when the trust is to be perfected at some future time by settlement or conveyance, it is executory, and the same rules which govern trusts of realty govern trusts of personalty. It is essential to the establishment of a trust that the person who created it be the real owner of the property which is to constitute the trust fund. It is essential that the language employed in the creation of a trust should be such as to leave no room for reasonable controversy as to the intention of the donor. The declaration relied upon as creating a trust must point out with reasonable certainty, not only the property or subject-matter of the trust, but also the purposes thereof and the person for whose benefit the trust is created. Indefinite, vague, and equivocal expressions are not sufficient, nor are declarations of a purpose to create a trust, or a mere voluntary promise to give property to a person, or to dispose of it in the future for the benefit of such person, when such promises remain unfulfilled, sufficient to create a trust. Skeen v. Marriott, 61 Pac. 296, 300, 22 Utah, 73.

"Trusts" are simple and special. In the one the trustee is passive, performing no duty, and the trust is merely technical. In the other he is active, executing the donor's will, and the trust is operative. A simple trust gives to the cestui que trust the right to the possession and disposal of the property, and legal estate is executed in him, unless when necessary to remain in the trustee to preserve it for the cestui que trust or pass it to another. A special trust maintains the legal estate in the trustee to perform the duties imposed by the donor, and the cestui que trust has but a right in equity to enforce the performance. Dodson v. Ball, 60 Pa. (10 P. F. Smith) 492, 500, 100 Am. Dec. 586.

Essentials.

Three things are indispensable to a valid trust: First, sufficient words to raise it; secondly, a definite subject; and, thirdly, a certain or ascertained object. Farmers' Loan & Trust Co. v. Carroll (N. Y.) 5 Barb. 613, 643; Gough v. Satterlee, 52 N. Y. Supp. 492, 497, 32 App. Div. 33.

The essential elements of a trust are: First, a sufficient expression of an intention to create a trust, and, second, a definite beneficiary. Carter v. Gibson, 45 N. W. 634, 636, 29 Neb. 324, 26 Am. St. Rep. 381.

A subject or corpus of a trust estate is absolutely essential, not merely to the validity of a trust, but to its existence. Courts will supply a trustee; in England, at times, under the cy pres power, they will select beneficiaries; but in no country will they furnish a trust estate. Gough v. Satterlee, 52 N. Y. Supp. 492, 497, 32 App. Div. 33.

One of the essential features of a trust is the creation of an estate, or principal sum, from which rents or profits may be derived that may be used for the benefit of another. Gifford v. Rising, 3 N. Y. Supp. 392, 393, 51 Hun, 1.

There are four essential elements of a valid trust of personal property: (1) A designated beneficiary; (2) a designated trustee, who must not be the beneficiary; (3) a fund or other property sufficiently designated or identified to enable title thereto to pass to the trustee; and (4) the actual delivery of the fund or other property, or of a legal assignment thereto, to the trustee, with the intention of passing legal title thereto to himself as trustee. Brown v. Spohr, 84 N. Y. Supp. 995, 998, 87 App. Div. 522.

A trust implies two estates or interests, one equitable and one legal: one person as trustee holding the legal title, while another as the cestui que trust has the beneficial interest. Absolute control and power of disposal are inconsistent with the idea of trust. The capital of a corporation is its property. It has the whole beneficial interest in it, as well as the legal title. It may use the income and profits of it, and sell and dispose of it, the same as a natural person. It is a trustee for its creditors, and in such sense a trust exists as a natural person, but no further. Hospes v. Northwestern Manufacturing & Car Co., 50 N. W. 1117, 1119, 48 Minn. 174, 15 L. R. A. 470, 31 Am. St. Rep. 637; Hawkins v. Donnerberg, 66 Pac. 691, 695, 40 Or. 97.

Intent.

As was said by Andrews, J., in Beaver v. Beaver, 117 N. Y. 421, 428, 22 N. E. 940, 6 L. R. A. 403, 15 Am. St. Rep. 531, to constitute a trust there must be either an express declaration of trust or circumstances which show beyond a reasonable doubt that a trust was intended to be created. It would introduce a dangerous instability of titles if anything less was required, or if a voluntary trust inter vivos should be established, in the absence of express words, by circumstances capable of any construction or consistent with a different intention. Hamer v. Sidway, 11 N. Y. Supp. 182, 186, 57 Hun, 229.

Particular words unnecessary.

No express words are necessary to create a trust, if the intention clearly appears. Gifford v. Rising, 3 N. Y. Supp. 392, 393, 51 Hun, 1.

The creation of a trust does not depend upon the use of a particular form of words, but it may be inferred from the facts and circumstances of the case. To constitute a trust there must be either an expressed declaration of trust or circumstances which show beyond a reasonable doubt that a trust was intended to be created. O'Neill v. Greenwood, 106 Mich. 572, 582, 64 N. W. 511.

To establish a trust no particular technical words are essential. Even the words "trust" or "trustee" are not essential. Any other words which unequivocally show an intention that the legal estate was vested in one person, to be held in some manner or for some purpose on behalf of another, if certain as to all other requisites, are sufficient. On the other hand, if the words "trust" and "trustee" are used, they do not necessarily show an intention to create or declare a trust. The existence of a trust, express or implied, is to be determined by a reference to the facts upon which it depends and as matter of law. Green v. McCord, 66 N. E. 494, 495, 30 Ind. App. 470 (citing Hedges v. Keller, 104 Ind. 479, 3 N. E. 832; Repp v. Leshner, 27 Ind. App. 360, 61 N. E. 609).

The words "trust" and "trustee" have a definite and technical meaning, and are more generally, as well as more properly, used to create a trust; but it is well settled that there is no magic in particular words, and any language which satisfactorily indicates an intention to stamp upon a devise the character of a trust will be sufficient. In construing devises, no positive rule can be laid down as to what terms will carry a beneficial interest and what will carry a trust. The court must examine the whole will and carry out the intention of the testator. A testator devised to his wife, during her widowhood, all the property, real and personal, with a remainder over to designated persons, to dispose of according to their verbal directions. In the event of his wife's marriage, the testator gave to her one-fourth of the property to be wholly hers, to make use of as she might see proper, and the remaining three-fourths he gave to other persons, to be disposed of according to the verbal directions of the said donees, or either of them. * * * In view of the fact that these designated persons in the will were neither heirs nor next of kin to the testator, it will be held that they only took the property in trust, and, as the terms of the trust were not declared, the designated persons will be held to hold the property under a trust arising by imputation of law in favor of the heirs of the testator in regard to the real estate and in favor of his personal representatives as to the personal property. Saylor v. Plaine, 31 Md. 158, 163, 1 Am. Rep. 34.

Though it is true that a "trust" may exist without the use of the word, nevertheless its absence is significant where the claim is that the language creates an express trust. Reynolds v. Hennessy, 2 Atl. 701, 702, 15 R. L. 215.

Charge distinguished.

A charge on land is distinguished from a trust of the land, in that in the case of the former the land is devised generally for the beneficial enjoyment of the devisee, subject, however, to the payment by him of a specific sum or sums of money or the performance of a particular duty, while in the case of a trust the devise is limited to some particular purpose, with no beneficial interest in the devisee. Where testator gave his wife all his property for life, if she should remain his widow so long, on condition that she should, out of the income, maintain his children during minority, and the will expressly stating that the devise was in lieu of dower, a trust estate for testator's children was not created, but a life estate in the widow, charged with the children's support, was created. Lang v. Everling, 23 N. Y. Supp. 329, 331, 3 Misc. Rep. 530.

Debt distinguished.

See "Debt."

Power distinguished.

"The distinction between a power and a trust has been clearly defined by the courts. A mere power is not imperative, but leaves the action of the party receiving it to be exercised at his discretion; that is, the donor or grantor, having full confidence in the judgment, disposition, and integrity of the party, empowers him to act according to the dictates of that judgment and the promptings of his own heart. A trust is imperative, and is made with strict reference to its faithful execution. The trustee is not empowered, but is required, to act in accordance with the will of the one creating the trust." Law Guarantee & Trust Co. v. Jones, 58 S. W. 219, 220, 103 Tenn. 245 (quoting Sugd. Powers).

In Taylor v. Benham, 46 U. S. (5 How.) 233, 269, 12 L. Ed. 130, the Supreme Court of the United States says: "One of the tests as to a trust or a power is that a naked power to sell may be exercised or not by executors, and is discretionary, while an imperative direction to sell and dispose of the proceeds is a power coupled with a trust." So in Story, Eq. Jur. § 1070, the rule is stated in these terms: "In the nature of things, there is a wide distinction between a power and a trust. In the former, the party may or may not act in his discretion; in the latter, the trust will be executed, notwithstanding his omission to act." Chew v. Hyman (U. S.) 7 Fed. 7, 15.

Use distinguished.

Prior to St. 27 Hen. VIII, c. 10, the words "use" and "trust" were regarded as convertible terms; and although, even in that statute, the word "trust" is mentioned, as well as the word "use"—for it classes "trusts," "uses," and "confidences" in one category, and undertakes to apply the same remedy to all by uniting the legal with the equitable interest, and thus creating a new legal estate (see 1 Sand. Uses and Trusts, 70-84)—still the distinction between the two terms is practical, substantial, and important. The elementary writers call our attention to three things as essential to the effectual operation of the statute of uses, namely: a person seised to a use, a cestui que use, and a use in esse (1 Cruise, Dig. 349; 2 Washb. Real Prop. *113), and when these three things concur, the use is said to be executed (Bac. Law Tracts, 351; 1 Sand. Uses and Trusts, 97, 98; 2 Washb. Real Prop. *119); that is, "the statute comes in and actually transfers the seisin and possession from the feoffee to use to the cestui que use, to all intents and purposes, without any actual entry being necessary to give him the seisin. It is not merely a title, but an actual estate, which is thus created in the cestui que use, as effectually as if it had been done by a conveyance with livery of seisin at common law." When, therefore, the three elements referred to existed, the use was said to become executed, and full effect was given to the statute; and thereupon only one interest or estate remained. But a trust, technically speaking, was and is practically different. A trust may, and perhaps ordinarily does, exist only where the use is incapable of being thus executed, and so the legal estate is necessarily left as at common law. Hutchins v. Heywood, 50 N. H. 491, 495.

A trust, technically speaking, ordinarily exists only where the use is incapable of being executed, and so the legal estate is necessarily left as at common law. If the beneficial interest which one person has in land which in the eye of the common law belongs to another is a permanent enjoyment of the benefits or profits of the land, it is a use; if the interest is for a temporary purpose, it is a trust. Technical words will not create a trust. It is a fixed rule of law that there is no magic in particular words. The test which determines whether the devise or conveyance is governed by the statute of uses, whereby the legal title is transferred, or whether a trust is created, whereby the legal title is reserved in the trustee, is very plain and simple. If the party who takes the beneficial interest has the full and uncontrolled use of the property, he takes the legal, as well as the equitable, title. If anything remains for the trustees to do concerning the property, such as may require them to retain the control of it to any extent or for any purpose, in such a case they retain the legal estate, and the beneficiary has only an equitable interest. Appeal of Tappan, 55 N. H. 317, 320.

A trust is a use not executed by statute. Farmers' Loan & Trust Co. v. Carroll (N. Y.) 5 Barb. 613, 643.

Office of administrator.

The term "trust" is a very broad one. In its most comprehensive sense it embraces every deposit; but it is held that the relations of an administrator to the assets of the estate and the distributees do not constitute a trust, within the meaning of Gen. St. c. 71, art. 4, § 20, providing that the provisions of the chapter as to limitations of actions shall not apply in the case of a continuing and subsisting trust. Robinson's Committee v. Elam's Ex'r, 14 S. W. 84, 90 Ky. 300.

Acts 1883, c. 168, providing that the Union Bank & Trust Company shall have the right and power to accept and execute all "trusts," whether the trust be that of guardian, executor, trustee, the committee of an estate of a non compos mentis, or any other trust, should be construed to apply to the office of administrator. Union Bank & Trust Co. v. Wright (Tenn.) 58 S. W. 755, 758, 52 L. R. A. 469.

Insolvent corporation.

Whatever technical objections may be made to the use of the word "trust" in connection with the relation existing between the directors of an insolvent private corporation and its creditors is a matter of no importance, for the substance of the matter is that the word "trust" is used to express the fact that the creditors of an insolvent corporation have the right to have the specific property owned by the corporation subjected to the payment of the sums due them. Lyons-Thomas Hardware Co. v. Perry Stove Mfg. Co., 24 S. W. 16, 23, 86 Tex. 143, 22 L. R. A. 802.

Statute of limitations.

The word "trust" is often used in a very broad and comprehensive sense. Every person who receives money to be paid to another, or to be applied to a particular purpose, to which he does not apply it, is a trustee, and may be sued either at law for money had or received or in equity as a trustee for breach of trust. Kane v. Bloodgood (N. Y.) 7 Johns. Ch. 90, 11 Am. Dec. 417. The trusts intended by the courts of equity not to be reached or affected by the statute of limitations are those technical and continuing trusts which are not cognizable at law, but fall within the proper and exclusive jurisdiction of this court. Id. This rule has been repeatedly adopted and approved in this state. Gutch v. Fosdick, 48 N. J. Eq. (3 Dick.) 353, 355, 22 Atl. 590, 27 Am. St. Rep. 473.

In construing Gen. St. c. 71, art. 4, § 20, providing that the provisions in the chapter which related to the limitation of actions should not apply in the case of a continuing and subsisting trust, the court says: "The term 'trust' is a very broad one. In its most comprehensive sense, it embraces every deposit; and it, of course, would not do to hold that in all such cases the statute does not run, even though the claimant is invested with power and right to sue. Such a rule would evidently defeat the legislative purpose, and render nugatory in a great degree our 'statute of repose.' The trusts intended to be embraced by the statute, and to be excepted out of the limitation, are those of an exclusively equitable character, where the trustee has a right to hold the estate, and the cestui que trust has no right to sue and recover it. Where only the latter may do so, and forbears to exercise the right, the letter of our statute, as well as the policy of our law, gives the opposing party the right to rely upon the lapse of time. The time, by the terms of the statute, begins to run from the accrual of the cause of action." Thus the statute of limitations commences to run against an action by a creditor, whose debtor has assigned for the benefit of creditors, against the assignee for the settlement of the trust, at the time of a settlement in full between the assignee and the creditor. Richardson v. Chanslor's Trustee, 45 S. W. 774, 779, 103 Ky. 425.

TRUST CAPACITY.

Rev. St. § 5228, providing that "a party in any trust capacity, who has given bond in this state, with sureties according to law, shall not be required to give bond and security to perfect an appeal," does not include a county treasurer. An executor, administrator, guardian, assignee or trustee clearly acts in a trust capacity, while a treasurer, auditor, sheriff, and other public officers act in an official capacity. Hubbard v. Topliff, 54 N. E. 367, 60 Ohio St. 382.

As bank, see "Bank."

As moneyed corporation, see "Moneyed Corporation."

A "trust company" is defined in the banking law to mean any domestic corporation formed for the purpose of taking, accepting and executing such trusts as may be lawfully committed to it, and acting as trustee in the cases prescribed by law and receiving deposits of money and other personal property and issuing its obligations therefor, and of loaning money on real or personal securities. A corporation denied the exercise of the powers of a trust company on its incorporation, but afterward expressly given the power to receive and execute trusts, is a trust company, subject to the banking law. Venner v. Farmers' Loan & Trust Co., 66 N. Y. Supp. 773, 775, 54 App. Div. 271.

A trust company accepts and executes all trusts of every description committed to it by any person or corporation or any courts of record; accepts title to real or personal estate on trusts; acts as agent for corporations in reference to issuing, registering, and transferring certificates of stock; accepts trusts for married women in respect to their separate property; and acts as guardian in respect to infants. Trust companies are therefore not, in the legal or commercial sense, engaged in the business of banking, so as to bring such companies into competition with national banks, within Rev. St. U. S. § 5219 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3502], prohibiting states from taxing national banks at a greater rate than other moneyed capital. Jenkins v. Neff, 57 N. E. 408, 410, 163 N. Y. 320.

Trust companies, as they are established in New York according to the powers conferred on them by their charter, are not, in any proper sense of the words, banking institutions. They are authorized to receive money in trust, and to accumulate the same at an agreed rate of interest; to accept and execute all trusts of every description committed to them by any person or corporation, or by any court of record; to receive the title to real or personal property on trust created in accordance with the laws of the state, and to execute the same; to act as agents for corporations in reference to issuing, registering, and transferring certificates of stock and bonds and other evidence of debt; and to accept and execute trusts for married women in respect to their separate estates, and to act as guardian for the estates of infants. It is required that their capital shall be invested in bonds and mortgages on unincumbered real estate in the state of New York worth double the amount loaned thereon, or in stocks of the United States or of the state of New York, or of incorporated municipalities within the state, from which it is evident that such companies are not banks, in the commercial sense of the word, and do not perform the functions of banks in carrying on exchanges of commerce. Mercantile Nat. Bank v. New York City, 7 Sup. Ct. 826, 837, 121 U. S. 138, 30 L. Ed. 895.

The words "trust company," as used in the chapter relating to investments and loans, shall be construed to include savings banks and trust companies. V. S. 1894, 4106.

TRUST DEED.

A trust deed is, in legal effect, a mortgage with a power of sale. Aggs v. Shackelford County, 19 S. W. 1085, 1086, 85 Tex. 145; Connecticut Mut. Life Ins. Co. v. Jones (U. S.) 8 Fed. 303, 304.

Trust deeds are mortgages under a power of sale, and differ only from mortgages by providing for sale without foreclosure. Cornell v. Conine-Eaton Lumber Co., 47 Pa. 912, 914, 9 Colo. App. 225; Axman v. Smith, 57 S. W. 105, 106, 156 Mo. 286; Southern Bldg. & Loan Ass'n v. McCants, 25 South. 8, 10, 120 Ala. 616.

A deed of trust in the nature of a mortgage is a conveyance in trust for the purpose of securing a debt, subject to a condition of defeasance. Union National Bank v. Bank, 10 Sup. Ct. 1013, 1016, 136 U. S. 223, 34 L. Ed. 841.

A deed of trust is an assignment or transfer of property to a trustee for the purposes therein declared, usually made by a debtor to secure some or all of his creditors, either equally or preferentially. It is in the nature of a mortgage, and both are equally within the provisions of the registry laws of North Carolina, and in many respects are governed by the same principles of law. Means v. Montgomery (U. S.) 23 Fed. 421, 424; In re Anderson (U. S.) 23 Fed. 482, 491.

A deed of trust to secure a debt is a conveyance made to a trustee as security for a debt owing to the beneficiary, a creditor of the grantor, and conditioned to be void on payment of the debt by a certain time, but, if not paid, the trustee to sell the land, and apply the proceeds in extinguishing the debt, paying over any surplus to the grantor. The object of such deeds is, by means of the introduction of trustees as impartial agents of the creditor and debtor, to provide a convenient, cheap, and speedy mode of satisfying debts on default of payment. Reynolds v. City of Waterville, 42 Atl. 553, 555, 92 Me. 292.

A mortgage or deed of trust is a contract between the debtor and the creditor, and it is not binding upon any one until accepted by the beneficiary. Byrd v. Perry, 26 S. W. 749, 752, 7 Tex. Civ. App. 378.

A mortgage or deed of trust is a simple security for the debt, and, when considered in connection with the debts secured, it is personal assets. Augusta National Bank v. Beard's Ex'r, 42 S. E. 694, 696, 100 Va. 687.

In an action to reform a warranty deed and have it declared a mortgage, the term "trust deed," used in the complaint, was used in the sense of "mortgage," "mortgage deed," or "mortgage security." Forester v. Van Auken (N. D.) 96 N. W. 301, 304.

A deed of trust in the nature of a mortgage is a conveyance in trust by way of security, subject to a condition of defeasance, or redeemable at any time before the sale of the property. By an absolute deed of trust the grantor parts absolutely with the title, which rests in the grantee unconditionally for the purpose of the trust. The latter is a conveyance to a trustee for the purpose of raising a fund to pay debts, while the former is a conveyance in trust for the purpose of securing a debt subject to the condition of a defeasance. Mills v. Williams, 81 Mo. App. 447, 459 (citing Hoffman v. Mackall, 5 Ohio St. 124, 130, 64 Am. Dec. 637).

Assignment distinguished.

See "Assignment for Benefit of Creditors."

As conveyance.

See "Conveyance."

Mortgage distinguished.

As mortgage, see "Mortgage."

The chief practical difference between a deed of trust with power of sale and a plain mortgage is that the deed of trust may be foreclosed according to its terms by the trustee without authority of court, whereas a simple mortgage can be foreclosed only under decree of court. Axman v. Smith, 57 S. W. 105, 106, 156 Mo. 236; Cornell v. Conine-Eaton Lumber Co., 47 Pac. 912, 914, 9 Colo. App. 225.

"Deed of trust" is not synonymous with "mortgage," even when used in reference to security for debt. A deed of trust has no feature in common with a mortgage, except that it was executed to secure an indebtedness. In a mortgage there is a right, after condition broken, to foreclose on the part of the mortgagee, and a right of redemption on the part of the mortgagor. These two rights are reciprocal. When the one cannot be enforced, the existence of the other is denied; and, when either is wanting, the instrument, whatever its resemblance in other respects, is not a mortgage. Southern Building & Loan Ass'n v. McCants, 25 South. 8, 10, 120 Ala. 616 (quoting Koch v. Briggs, 14 Cal. 257, 71 Am. Dec. 631).

There is a manifest and well-settled distinction between an unconditional deed of trust and a mortgage or deed of trust in the nature of a mortgage. The former is an absolute and indefeasible conveyance of the subject-matter thereof, for the purpose expressed, whereas the latter is conditional and defeasible. A mortgage is the conveyance of an estate or pledge of property as security for the payment of money or the performance of some other act, and conditioned to become void upon such payment or performance. A deed of trust in the nature of a mortgage is a conveyance in trust by way of security, subject to a condition of defeasance, or redeemable at any time before the sale of the property. A deed conveying land to a trustee as mere collateral security for the payment of a debt, with the condition that it shall become void on the payment of the debt when due, and with power to the trustee to sell the land and pay the debt in case of default on the part of the debtor, is a deed of trust in the nature of a mortgage. By an absolute deed of trust the grantor parts absolutely with the title, which rests in the grantee unconditionally for the purpose of the trust. The latter is a conveyance to a trustee for the purpose of raising a fund to pay debts, while the former is a conveyance in trust for the purpose of securing a debt, subject to a condition of defeasance. Hoffman v. Mackall, 5 Ohio St. 124, 130 (citing Woodruff v. Robb, 19 Ohio, 212, 216; 1 Hill. Mortg. 359).

TRUST ESTATE.

The term "trust estate" is used with some confusion in the text-books—sometimes to express the estate of a trustee, and sometimes that of the beneficiary. Cooper v. Cooper, 5 N. J. Eq. (1 Halst. Ch.) 9, 12.

A trust estate is a right in equity to take the rents and profits of land, whereof the legal estate is vested in some other person; to compel the person thus seised of the legal estate, who is called the "trustee," to execute such conveyances as the person entitled to the profits, who is called the "cestui que trust," shall direct; and to defend the title to the land. Farmers' Loan & Trust Co. v. Carroll (N. Y.) 5 Barb. 613, 643.

Under a will which gave all of the testator's estate in trust for his sister during her life, and to her children thereafter, and, in case of her death without issue, to be divided into two equal parts, one to go to H. in fee, and the other to be divided among his heirs, the heirs at law and H. on the death of the sister without issue become tenants in common of the real estate devised, and their shares vest at her death, and therefore there is no trust estate to be distributed under St. 1898, c. 65, providing that, whenever by the terms of a written instrument a trust estate is to be distributed, the probate court may, on application of any person interested, order such estate to be converted into cash and distributed to such persons as seem to be entitled thereto. Heard v. Trull, 54 N. E. 875, 877, 175 Mass. 239.

An estate held in trust is an estate where the legal title or ownership is in one person, denominated the trustee, to hold for the benefit and use of some other person, who is entitled to the income or profit. Catlin v. Hull, 21 Vt. 152, 157.

A power in trust is a mere authority or right to limit and use, while an estate in trust is an estate or interest in the subject. A trustee is always invested with a legal estate, but this is not necessary with respect to the donee of the power. In the case of a power in trust there is always a person other than the donee or grantee of the power, which person is called the "appointee," answering to the cestui que trust in a simple trust. Every estate and interest not embraced in an express trust, and not otherwise disposed of, remains in or reverts to the person who created the trust. Stericker v. Dickinson (N. Y.) 9 Barb. 516, 519.

TRUST EX MALEFICIO.

A trust ex maleficio can only result from some act of bad faith, and a mere refusal to perform a parol contract to hold or convey land is not sufficient to create such a trust. Barry v. Hill, 31 Atl. 126, 127, 166 Pa. 344.

Where two persons purchase separate tracts of land from the same vendor, and enter into possession of the respective tracts, and subsequently, by mutual agreement between the purchasers and the vendor, the land is sold under an order of the court, and it is agreed that one of such purchasers shall bid in the land, and then make a conveyance to the other purchaser of the land formerly purchased by the latter, if, upon such sale under the order of the court, the person designated to bid in the land does so, and, upon demand of the other purchaser, refuses to make the conveyance, he can be compelled to do so by a bill in equity to enforce the trust; he holding such land as trustee ex maleficio. Kent v. Dean, 30 South. 543, 544, 546, 128 Ala. 600.

TRUST FUND.

Where a single partner sells all the partnership property, and receives the money for it, he holds the shares of his copartners as trustee; and the money so received by him is, in the strictest sense of the words, trust funds. Standish v. Babcock, 29 Atl. 327, 329, 52 N. J. Eq. 628.

"Trust fund," as used in a deed conveying real estate to a trustee to hold in trust to the use of certain persons, and, on either of them attaining the age of 30 years, any additions of the trust fund to be conveyed to him, should be construed to embrace not only the original property included in the trust, but any subsequent part of it that might have been added thereto, including also the accumulations. Draper v. Palmer, 1 N. Y. Supp. 116, 120.

"Trust funds," as used in Bankr. Act Aug. 19, 1841, refusing a discharge to any person who, after the passing of the act, shall apply trust funds to his own use, does not include the amount of a note collected and retained by a factor who received the note for collection on account of his principal. Commercial Bank of Manchester v. Buckner, 2 La. Ann. 1023, 1025.

Property of corporation.

The doctrine that the property of a corporation is a trust fund for the payment of its debts merely means that the property must be first applied to such payment, before any portion of it can be distributed among the stockholders. Henderson v. Indiana Trust Co., 40 N. E. 516, 518, 143 Ind. 561.

The words "trust fund," as relating to the assets of an insolvent corporation, apply only after it has been placed in the hands of a receiver. Merchants' Nat. Bank of Richmond v. Newton Cotton Mills, 20 S. E. 765, 766, 115 N. C. 507.

The trust-fund doctrine is stated in Thomp. Liab. Stockh. § 10, as "a favorite doctrine of American courts that the capital stock and other property of a corporation is to be deemed a trust fund for the payment of the debts of the corporation, so that the creditors have a lien or right of priority of payment on it in preference to any of the stockholders of the corporation." Where a stockholder of a national bank died subsequent to the insolvency of the bank, and before any assessment was made on his stock on account of such insolvency, and after his death an assessment equal to the full value of his stock was made on the administrator of his estate, which also was insolvent, such assessment is entitled to no preference in payment from his estate, as against his general creditors, on the ground that the statutory liability of such deceased stockholder to pay the sum equal to the face value of his stock towards the debt of such insolvent bank created from the assets of his estate a trust fund for the payment of such debts of the bank. In re Beard's Estate, 50 Pac. 226, 227, 7 Wyo. 104, 38 L. R. A. 860, 75 Am. St. Rep. 882.

In First Nat. Bank v. Dovetail B. & G. Co., 143 Ind. 550, 40 N. E. 810, 52 Am. St. Rep. 435, it was decided that the property of a corporation constituted a trust fund for its creditors, which only means that when a corporation is insolvent, and a court of equity has taken possession of its assets, such assets must be appropriated to the payment of the debts before distribution to its stockholders, but, as between a corporation and its creditors, the former does not hold the property in trust, or subject to a lien in favor of the creditors, in any other sense than does an individual debtor. Clapp v. Allen, 50 N. E. 587, 589, 20 Ind. App. 263.

TRUST IN INVITUM.

Trusts in invitum are constructive trusts imposed by equity, contrary to the trustee's intention and will, upon property in his hands. Sanford v. Hamner, 22 South. 117, 119, 115 Ala. 406.

TRUSTEE.

See "Acting Trustee"; "Constructive Trustee"; "Conventional Trustee"; "Testamentary Trustee"; "Township Trustee."

All trustees, see "All."

A trustee, in the widest meaning of the term, is defined to be a person in whom some estate, interest, or power in or affecting property of any description is vested for the benefit of another. Hill, Trustees, 41; Taylor v. Davis, 110 U. S. 330, 4 Sup. Ct. 147, 38 L. Ed. 163; Truesdale v. Philadelphia Trust, Safe Deposit & Insurance Co., 65 N. W. 133, 134, 63 Minn. 49; Taylor v. Mayo, 4 Sup. Ct. 147, 150, 110 U. S. 330, 28 L. Ed. 163; Robertson v. Bullions, 9 Barb. 64, 101; St. Louis Piano Mfg. Co. v. Merkel, 1 Mo. App. 305, 310.

A trustee of a legal estate is one to whom the estate has been conveyed in trust. Manley v. Culver, 20 Tex. 143, 146.

A person is said to be trustee, in whom a power over property, or affecting it, rests for the benefit of another; and a person having such power is as essentially a trustee as is one in whom a title to the property which he has a right to control is vested for the benefit of another. Dority v. Dority, 71 S. W. 950, 954, 96 Tex. 215, 60 L. R. A. 941.

Every one who voluntarily assumes a relation of personal confidence with another is deemed a trustee, not only as to the person who reposes such confidence, but also as to a person of whose affairs he thus acquires information which was given to such person in a like confidence, or over whose affairs he by such confidence obtains any control, under Civ. Code, § 2219. Colton v. Stanford, 23 Pac. 16, 20, 82 Cal. 351, 16 Am. St. Rep. 137.

In the case of Kane v. Bloodgood, 7 Johns. Ch. 90, 11 Am. Dec. 417, Chancellor Kent said: "Every person who receives money to be paid to another or to be applied to a particular purpose, to which he does not apply it, is a trustee, and may be sued either at law for money had and received, or in equity as a trustee for a breach of trust." Brown v. Maplewood Cemetery Ass'n, 89 N. W. 872, 873, 85 Minn. 498 (citing Taylor v. Benham, 46 U. S. [5 How.] 233, 12 L. Ed. 130); Warner v. McMullin, 18 Atl. 1056, 1058, 131 Pa. 370; Brown v. Brown, 81 N. Y. Supp. 650, 652, 83 Hun, 160.

The person in whom the confidence of a trust is reposed is called the "trustee."

Civ. Code Mont. 1895, § 2953; Civ. Code Cal. 1903, § 2218; Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 4257; Civ. Code S. D. 1903, § 1610.

He is a trustee who takes a trust as a devisee under the will. He is an executor who takes under the probate of the will. In re Anderson's Estate, 5 N. Y. Leg. Obs. 302, 303.

The term "trustee" is used in Rev. St. § 5152, providing that persons holding stock as executors, etc., or trustees, shall not be persons subject to any liability as stockholders, does not refer only to a trustee appointed by will or by order of the court or judge, but to any one who stands in the relation of trustee to a cestui que trust. Lucas v. Coe (U. S.) 86 Fed. 972.

In Tax Law 1866, § 7, providing that every person shall be assessed in the township or ward where he resides for all personal property in his possession or under his control as trustee, guardian, or executor. The Legislature used the term "trustee" in its more technical and restricted sense; that is, they intended to designate thereby the class of persons who hold property on trust or confidence that they will apply the same for the benefit of those who are entitled according to an intention expressed either by the parties themselves, or by the deed, will, settlement, or arrangement of another. State v. Irons, 35 N. J. Law (6 Vroom) 464, 465; State v. Grover, 37 N. J. Law (8 Vroom) 174, 176.

A will appointing a brother as executor and trustee, where the provision of the will required action by him after the death of certain devisees, will be construed as nominating such brother as a legal trustee. Leonard v. Haworth, 51 N. E. 7, 8, 171 Mass. 496.

The word "trustees," in a will directing the doing of certain acts by trustees, was said to have been used in its technical sense. "In determining whether a trust was intended, the fact that the will was not prepared by a lawyer, or by a person familiar with the technical terms usually employed in such instruments or with the requisites of a valid trust, is to be borne in mind, and the fact must be taken into consideration that the scrivener had no accurate knowledge as to the meaning of the words 'trust,' 'trustee,' or 'trust fund,' as is evident from a consideration of the whole instrument. It is clear from a reading of this will that the word 'trustees' was not used or intended to be employed in its technical and general sense, as all the duties they were to perform were of an executorial character. That such was the nature of the trust reposed in them seems to be practically admitted, as they were appointed executors by the surrogate's court." Trask v. Sturges, 63 N. E. 534, 536, 170 N. Y. 482.

The wrongdoer who becomes possessed of property under such circumstances as amount to a tort has been styled a "trustee"; but this is for want of a better term, and because he has no title to property, and really holds it for the true owner. It might as well be said that, where two persons conspire to possess themselves of the personal property of another, when he brings trover for its recovery they should be styled "trustees," instead of "tortfeasors," and should be permitted to claim the benefit of a lien for care or for provender. Henninger v. Heald (N. J.) 30 Atl. 809, 811.

A bequest to the trustees of an institution means to the institution itself, although those having charge of it were in the charter called "managers." The words as so used should be construed to mean officers in charge, however they are designated. New York Institution for Blind v. How's Executors, 10 N. Y. (6 Seld.) 84, 92.

Where a bequest was made to a town in trust, with directions that the selectmen and a certain other should manage the fund, the selectmen and the other are not trustees, but the town; and, where the town afterwards was incorporated as a city, there was no vacancy in the trust, and the probate court had no authority to appoint trustees to manage the fund. Higginson v. Turner, 51 N. E. 172, 174, 171 Mass. 586.

In the terms "trustee" and "steward," as referring to a church organization, there is no legal import of such ownership or control of real property as to render such officers responsible for the negligent falling of a gate located in the church property, which results in the death of a child. Fopplano v. Baker, 3 Mo. App. 560.

The office of a trustee is to hold and safely keep the trust funds in accordance with the terms of the instrument creating the trust. Sometimes it is to pay income to the parties entitled thereto, or to accumulate the same during a stated period. If the trustee transfers securities, it must be in pursuance of express authority in the trust itself, or by virtue of an authority implied from the nature of the trust or the securities in his hands. Fesmire v. Shannon, 143 Pa. 201, 209, 22 Atl. 898.

A default judgment rendered on publication service against the Farmers' Loan & Trust Company is not binding on the Farmers' Loan & Trust Company, trustee; the word "trustee" signifying the opposite of the word "owner," and meaning that, while the party called "trustee" has the legal title, he has no beneficial interest. Farmers' Loan & Trust Co. v. Essex (Kan.) 71 Pac. 269, 270.

"Trustee," as used in the bankruptcy act, shall include all the trustees of an estate. U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 8420.

As descriptive personae.

The addition of the word "trustee" after one's signature is merely descriptive personae. Swift v. Williams, 11 Atl. 835, 841, 68 Md. 236; Tradesmen's Nat. Bank v. Looney, 42 S. W. 149, 153; Id., 99 Tenn. 278, 38 L. R. A. 837, 63 Am. St. Rep. 830; Chambers v. Webster, 75 N. Y. Supp. 31, 33, 69 App. Div. 546; Manhattan Sav. Inst. v. New York Nat. Exch. Bank, 62 N. E. 1079, 1082, 170 N. Y. 58, 88 Am. St. Rep. 640; Moss v. Johnson, 15 S. E. 709, 710, 36 S. C. 551; Wallace v. Langston, 29 S. E. 552, 562, 52 S. C. 133; Bowen v. Penny, 76 Ga. 743, 745; Crusselle v. Chastain, 76 Ga. 840. So, also, after the name of a payee, grantee, etc., where no declaration of trust is contained in the instrument. Kanably v. Volkenberg, 75 N. Y. S. 8, 10, 70 App. Div. 97; Van Schaick v. Lese, 66 N. Y. Supp. 64, 67, 31 Misc. Rep. 610; Westmoreland v. Foster, 60 Ala. 448, 449; Thompson v. Toland, 48 Cal. 99.

The word "trustee," following the name of one who has signed a contract, is prima facie descriptive only, and does not tend to show that the contract was executed in such capacity. Peterson v. Homan, 46 N. W. 303, 304, 44 Minn. 166, 20 Am. St. Rep. 564.

As a general rule, it is well settled that one will be held personally liable on a covenant made by him as trustee, for the obvious reason that, having no power to bind the trust estate, the covenantee would be otherwise without remedy; and it is therefore fair to presume that the covenant was made and accepted on the individual liability of the covenantor. The additional word "trustee," in such cases, is construed merely as a word of description, to show the capacity in which the covenantor acted. But where it plainly appears from the face of the instrument that the trustee did not mean to bind himself personally, the courts will construe the covenant according to the plainly expressed intent of the parties. Glenn v. Allison, 58 Md. 527, 529.

The word "trustees," in a stock certificate standing in the name of several trustees, cannot be regarded as mere descriptive personae, and rejected as a nullity, but is a plain and actual notice of the existence of a trust of some description; and it is the duty of one taking such a certificate as security for a debt to ascertain whether the trustee had the right to give it. Shaw v. Spencer, 100 Mass. 382, 389, 97 Am. Dec. 107, 1 Am. Rep. 115.

Where a fund was deposited to the credit of W., trustee—W. at the time having an account with the bank from which the money in question was checked—and then placed in the first-named account, the word "trustee" meant something. It was not merely descriptive personae, but was a description of the fund deposited. It imported the existence of a trust, and was notice of the character of the fund. Bundy v. Town of Monticello, 84 Ind. 119, 130.

It is a matter of common knowledge that many of the bank accounts in the name of a person simply as "trustee" require no strictness in the investment of the funds held in trust in what are called legal investments, and that a fund was on deposit in the name of one P., "trustee," though it gave notice to the banker that the funds were not or might not be the property of the depositor individually, was not notice that the giving of a check was prima facie a waste of the trust estate, or that the trustee was using the trust funds for his personal benefit. Isham v. Post, 23 N. Y. Supp. 211, 212, 3 Misc. Rep. 184.

The word "trustee" is one of significance, and is constantly made use of not only in legal phraseology, but in common speaking, to indicate that one holds the title to property in his own absolute right, but for the benefit of some other party or parties. Such words as "trustee," "administrator," and "executor" have a well-understood meaning, and, when attached to a name appearing on the corporate books, are certainly sufficient to notify all that such shares of stock are held by the subscriber not in his own right, but in a representative capacity; thus putting those dealing with the corporation on inquiry. Welles v. Larrabee (U. S.) 36 Fed. 866, 870, 2 L. R. A. 471.

The use of the term "trustee" in a deed as descriptive of the grantee is notice to one who takes title under the deed that the property is or may be held under a trust of some description, and puts him upon inquiry as to the existence and nature of the trust. Mercantile Nat. Bank v. Parsons, 54 Minn. 56, 55 N. W. 825, 826, 40 Am. St. Rep. 299.

The word "trustee" was inserted after the name of the grantee in a deed, and the deed was accepted in that form. The grantee afterwards, in a contract relating to the land, affixed the word "trustee" to his signature. Held, that the word "trustee," thus used, without other words, was not mere descriptio personæ, but indicated that the grantee took the title, not in his individual capacity, but in trust for another, though the names of his cestui que trust were not disclosed by the deed. Johnson v. Calnan, 34 Pac. 905, 908, 19 Colo. 168, 41 Am. St. Rep. 224.

Agent distinguished.

An agent represents and acts for his principal. He may be either a natural or artificial person. A trustee is not an agent, but is a person in whom some estate, interest, or a power in or affecting property is vested for the benefit of another. When an agent contracts in the name of his principal, the principal contracts, and is bound, but the agent is not; but, when a trustee contracts as such, unless he is bound no one is bound, for he has no principal, and, as a trust estate cannot promise, the contract is therefore the personal undertaking of the trustee; and, though a principal holds the estate only with power and for the purpose of managing it, he is personally bound by a contract which he makes as trustee, even when designating himself as such. Taylor v. Mayo, 4 Sup. Ct. 147, 150, 110 U. S. 330, 28 L. Ed. 163.

A trustee in a trust deed is not the mere agent or attorney for the holder of the note, but he is the trusted agent of both debtor and creditor. In a sale of property under a deed, he should use all reasonable efforts and methods to make it bring as much as possible, and should be fair and impartial as between debtor and creditor. Axman v. Smith, 57 S. W. 105, 106, 156 Mo. 286.

An agent, in a general sense, and for certain purposes, is a trustee, but is not a trustee within the meaning of 1 Rev. St. tit. 2, pt. 1, c. 13, art. 1, § 5, providing that personal property held by persons as agents, trustees, executors, or administrators must be assessed against them, since these terms are limited in their meaning, and apply only to persons filling particular offices. People v. Com'rs, 3 N. E. 85, 86, 100 N. Y. 215.

Assignee.

"The word 'trustee,' taken by itself, is broad enough to include and does include an assignee, for an assignee is the trustee both for the creditors of the assignor, and also for the assignor himself. Said word, in the statutes relating to garnishment, must not be taken out of its setting, however, and simply its abstract or technical meaning determined, but it must be considered in its collocation, and also with reference to the process of garnishment provided by our statutes relating to that subject. The word in these statutes is limited in its application to the debtor or agent of the principal defendant against whom an action ex contractu at law only might be maintained in favor of such defendant." Cross v. Brown, 33 Atl. 147, 157, 19 R. I. 220.

Though in many sections of the Revised Statutes the terms "assignee" and "trustee" are coupled as though they meant the same, section 2734, requiring that the property of every person for whose benefit property is held in trust must be listed by the trustee, does not furnish authority for such listing by an assignee of an insolvent. The purpose of the provision is satisfied by confining its application to those trusts where title and possession are placed in one for the benefit of others, in some permanent form, from which in general some interest, income, or profit is expected to be derived. McNeill v. Hagerty, 37 N. E. 523, 529, 51 Ohio St. 255, 23 L. R. A. 622.

An assignee is the person to whom property is made over or transferred, whether he receives it in his own right, or for the benefit of another, as for the benefit of creditors. Among the definitions of "trustee" is one to whom property has been conveyed to be held or managed for the benefit of another. To a certain extent, executors, administrators, guardians, and assignees are trustees. While in some respects, for the purpose of enforcement, the terms differ, in many respects they are interchangeable. Hence, where property is conveyed by a debtor to a third person, to be held and disposed of for the benefit of creditors, such transaction is an assignment, and the trust officer is the assignee, though the instrument is called a "trust deed," the property "trust property," and conveyed in trust. In such case "assignee" and "trustee" may be used interchangeably. Schee v. La Grange, 42 N. W. 616, 618, 78 Iowa, 101.

Banker distinguished.

See "Banker."

Committee of lunatic.

A committee of a lunatic is a trustee. To him is intrusted the entire control and care of the estate of the lunatic, and, although he is a mere servant or bailiff, he is invested with a trust. If a trustee, he is, of course, trustee of an express trust, and is authorized to bring, in his own name, as committee of the lunatic, an action for the purpose of setting aside an act or deed done by the lunatic. Person v. Warren, 14 Barb. 438, 494.

The committee of a lunatic is held not to be a trustee, within the meaning of a statute authorizing the assessment of property held by a trustee in the name of the trustee. People ex rel. Smith v. Commissioners, etc., of New York, 3 N. E. 85, 87, 100 N. Y. 215.

Corporation.

The title to property belonging to a corporation is vested in it. It holds, subject to its charter and by-laws, for the use and benefit of its stockholders and the corporation, and therefore falls within the strict definition of a trustee; that is, one who holds the legal title for the use and benefit of others. Where a mining corporation purchases a majority of the stock of another mining corporation, and by so doing is able to elect a director under its control, and secure a bond and lease of the property of such corporation on its own terms and conditions, such lease and bond will be set aside at the suit of minority stockholders of the latter corporation, though obtained without any actual fraud. Glengary Consol. Min. Co. v. Boehmer, 62 Pac. 839, 28 Colo. 1.

Directors of corporation.

See, also, "Bank Director."

Directors of a corporation such as a bank are not express trustees. In this connection, the court says, the language of Special Judge Ingersoll in Shea v. Mabry, 69 Tenn. (1 Lea) 319, that directors are trustees, etc., is rhetorically sound, but technically inexact. It is a statement often found in opinions, but is true only to a limited extent. They are mandatories. They are agents. They are trustees in the sense that every agent is a trustee for his principal, and bound to exercise diligence and good faith. They do not hold the legal title, and more often than otherwise are not the officers of the corporation having possession of the corporate property. They are equally interested with those they represent. They more nearly represent the managing partners in a business firm than a technical trustee. At most, they are implied trustees, in whose favor the statutes of limitation do run. Wallace v. Lincoln Sav. Bank, 15 S. W. 448, 453, 89 Tenn. (5 Pickle) 630, 24 Am. St. Rep. 625.

Pen. Code, § 165, inflicting a penalty for offering bribes to any member of the board of trustees of any county, city, or corporation, includes the board of directors of a corporation. People v. Turnbull, 29 Pac. 224, 93 Cal. 445.

Bank directors are often styled "trustees," but not in a technical sense. The relation between the corporation and them is rather that of principal and agent—certainly so far as creditors are concerned, between whom and the corporation the relation is that of contract, and not of trust. Briggs v. Spaulding, 11 Sup. Ct. 924, 929, 141 U. S. 132, 35 L. Ed. 662.

The term "trustees," if used in a technical sense, can be construed, in Indiana, to include the directors of a bank of discount and deposit incorporated under the statutes of the state, and it is said that they can be held to a very high degree of diligence as to the financial affairs of the bank. They usually serve without pay, and the general direction of the business of the bank is necessarily to a large extent left to the executive officers of the corporation. Codding v. Canaday, 61 N. E. 567, 572, 157 Ind. 243.

Whatever technical objections may be urged to the use of the word "trustee" in connection with the relation existing between the directors and creditors of an insolvent corporation is immaterial, as the word "trustee" tee" is used to give expression to the fact that the directors and other managing officers of such a corporation, lawfully having possession and control of the assets, are under obligation to apply them. Lyons-Thomas Hardware Co. v. Perry Stove Mfg. Co., 24 S. W. 16, 23, 86 Tex. 143, 22 L. R. A. 802.

Donee distinguished.

See "Donee."

Executors and administrators.

An executor is a trustee for the legatees. Paxton v. Wood, 77 N. C. 11, 17.

The court of chancery regards executors and administrators as trustees, and compels them faithfully to execute their trusts in administering the assets of the estate. Hunt v. Sneed, 64 N. C. 180, 181.

An administrator, under Pasch. Dig. art. 1373, declaring that, upon the issuance of letters of administration, the administrator shall have the right to the possession of the estate as it existed at the death of the testator, with certain exceptions, and providing that it shall be the duty of the administrator to recover and hold possession of such estate in trust, to be disposed of under the provisions of the law, is a trustee. Jones v. Lee (Tex.) 22 S. W. 1092, 1094.

Under a statute defining the jurisdiction of a surrogate's court, and not extending that jurisdiction to a settlement of accounts of testamentary trustees, it is held that an executor, although a trustee in a general sense, is not a trustee, within the meaning of the statute. In re Hawley, 10 N. E. 352, 357, 104 N. Y. 250.

The word "trustee," as used in statutes requiring personal property in the hands of a trustee to be assessed in the town in which such trustee resides, does not include an executor or administrator, as such, during settlement of the estate, and before final distribution. Cornwall v. Tood, 38 Conn. 443, 444.

An administrator is not a trustee, within Pub. Laws March 31, 1870, c. 858, § 1, providing that the personal estate of any person in the hands of his trustee shall be liable to be attached. An administrator is sometimes spoken of as holding the estate in his hands in trust. Wrongdoers are sometimes held to be trustees in order to effect equity in particular cases, and so an office is spoken of as a trust. But, in the sense in which the words are ordinarily used, an administrator cannot be considered a trustee. Conway v. Armington, 11 R. I. 116, 117.

In a will creating a trust fund, and providing that the probate court should appoint a proper person as administrator and trustee, to carry out the provisions of the will, the word "administrator" was probably used to indicate that the trustee was expected to discharge the duties which ordinarily devolve upon the administrator. Roberts v. Chambers, 59 N. W. 45, 46, 91 Iowa, 204.

Holder of collateral.

The term "trustee," as used in Mills' Ann. St. Colo. § 496, providing that every executor, administrator, conservator, guardian, or trustee shall represent the stock in his hands at all meetings of any such corporation, and may vote accordingly as a stockholder, and every person who shall pledge his stock may nevertheless represent the same at all meetings and vote accordingly, means a person who holds the legal title to stock for the benefit of some third party, who is the equitable owner thereof and entitled to the dividends thereon, and whose property, whether held in trust or otherwise, is chargeable with whatever liability may result from the ownership of the stock, as a married woman, minor, etc., but does not include a person in whose hands stock is placed as collateral security. National Bank of Commerce v. Allen (U. S.) 90 Fed. 545, 552, 33 C. C. A. 169.

Master in chancery.

A master in chancery, who is the custodian, by order of the court, of money belonging to parties to suits or others, is a "trustee," in the true sense of the word. He is intrusted with the custody of money belonging to another, with the power, but without the right, to dispose of it for his own benefit, and therein lies the essential element of a trust. Van Doren v. Van Doren, 17 Atl. 805, 806, 45 N. J. Eq. 580.

Mortgagor.

A mortgagor occupying mortgaged property holds it as a fiduciary, to the extent that he may not destroy the property or commit waste to the prejudice of the owner or the mortgagee, and so may properly enough be called a "trustee," in a general sense, as that term is frequently used to cover fiduciary relations of many kinds which do not rise to the dignity of express trusts. Merton v. O'Brien, 94 N. W. 340, 342, 117 Wis. 437.

Mortgagees in possession are often spoken of as trustees, but they are so only in a very limited sense. As remarked by Shaw, C. J., in reasoning to a somewhat different point, "in some very limited respects a mortgagee is a trustee, as when he has entered and is in receipt of the rents and profits, and is liable to account therefor, and in that respect may be considered a trustee." Murdock v. Clarke, 24 Pac. 272, 274 (quoting King v. Insurance Co., 7 Cush. 7).

As officers of corporation.

See "Officer (of Corporations)."

Partner.

The authorities settle the question that only in a qualified sense is a surviving partner a trustee of the representatives of a deceased partner, but he takes or retains the partnership property jure proprio, and the only trust which attaches to his possession and disposition of the property is his duty to settle up the affairs of the partnership, and account to the representatives of the deceased partner. Krueger v. Speith, 20 Pac. 664, 667, 8 Mont. 482, 3 L. R. A. 291.

Lord Westbury, in a very felicitous way, analyzes the use of the word "trustee," and properly defines and limits it. The distinguished jurist said: "Another source of error in this matter is the looseness in which the word 'trustee' is frequently used. The surviving partner is often called a 'trustee,' but the term is used inaccurately. He is not a trustee, either expressly or by implication. On the death of a partner the law confers on his representative certain rights as against the surviving partner, and imposes upon the latter corresponding obligations. The surviving partner may be called, so far as these obligations extend, a 'trustee for the deceased partner'; but when these obligations have been fulfilled, or are discharged or terminated by law, the supposed trust is at an end. The advantage of correcting by familiar practice an inaccurate use of a word, although that use may be found in treatises of reputation, I remember to have singularly illustrated in a case that occurred some years ago in a court of law, where the court of law was told that, in an agreement for the sale of a house, the vendor was trustee for the purchaser, and the judges were called upon to apply a rule which is quite right as between a complete trustee by declaration and the cestui que trust, but quite wrong when the vendor is called a trustee only by metaphor, and an improper use of the term; and it required some trouble to convince them that, though the vendor might be called a trustee, he was a trustee only to the extent of his obligation to perform the agreement between himself and the purchaser. * * * The application to a man who is improperly, and by metaphor only, called a trustee, of all the consequences which would follow if he were a trustee by express declaration—in other words, a complete trustee—holding the property exclusively for the benefit of the cestui que trust, well illustrates the remark made by Lord Mansfield, that nothing in law is so apt to mislead as a metaphor." Burchinell v. Koon, 46 Pac. 932, 933, 8 Colo. App. 463 (quoting Knot v. Gye, L. R. 5 H. L. 656; Hume v. Woodruff, 38 Pac. 191, 26 Or. 373).

Where a single partner sells all the partnership property, and receives the money for it, he holds the shares of his co-partners as trustee. Standish v. Babcock, 29 Am. 327, 329, 52 N. J. Eq. 628.

Receiver.

Laws 1893, c. 293, prescribing a six-months limitation for actions by a receiver of a foreign mutual fire insurance company for claims due from policy holders within the state, applies to an action by a trustee of such a company organized under the laws of Ohio, since the same functions exercised under the laws and practice of Ohio by a trustee are exercised by a receiver under the laws of Wisconsin. Mansfield v. William Becker Leather Co., 68 N. W. 411, 93 Wis. 656.

Statehouse commissioner.

Commissioners appointed by the General Assembly, and charged with the expenditure of a fund created for the building of a statehouse, are not trustees, in a legal sense, but are officials of the state. In re New Statehouse (R. I.) 37 Atl. 2, 4.

Stockholder.

Under an act providing that the trustees and corporators of any company shall be severally liable for all debts or responsibilities of such company to the amount by him or them subscribed, until the whole amount of the capital of such company shall have been paid in, etc., it is held that stockholders are included in the terms "trustees" and "corporators." Shufeldt v. Carver, 8 Ill. App. (8 Bradw.) 545, 548.

No person will be regarded as holding stock as a trustee, or by way of collateral security, within the meaning of section 9, Wag. St. p. 301, and therefore exempt from liability as a stockholder, unless it has come into his possession by original subscription as trustee for some person other than the corporation, or by derivative title as trustee, or by way of collateral security after it has already been issued by the corporation in the ordinary course of business. Fisher v. Seligman, 75 Mo. 13, 24.

"Trustees," as used in a statute declaring that the trustees and corporators of any company organized in the act shall be liable for the debts of the company, etc., means shareholders, and not merely commissioners or promoters, of corporations so organized. Gulliver v. Roelle, 100 Ill. 141, 147.

TRUSTEE DE SON TORT.

A trustee de son tort is he who, of his own authority, enters into the possession or assumes the management of property which belongs beneficially to another. Morris v. Joseph, 1 W. Va. 256, 259, 91 Am. Dec. 386; Bailey v. Bailey, 32 Atl. 470, 471, 67 Vt. 494, 48 Am. St. Rep. 828.

A trustee in invitum or trustee de son tort is one who acts without authority or exceeds his authority in some matter of fact or law. An agent following instructions does not, and cannot thereby, make himself a trustee in invitum or de son tort. Houston v. Farris, 11 South. 330, 331, 93 Ala. 587.

Persons receiving money in a fiduciary capacity are sometimes denominated trustees ex maleficio and trustees de son tort; but, when such terms are employed, they are employed only to designate those implied trusts which the law raises for the purposes of justice. Brown v. Brown, 31 N. Y. Supp. 650, 652, 83 Hun, 160.

TRUSTEE EX MALEFICIO.

When a party has acquired the legal title to property by unfair means, he will be deemed to hold it in trust for the injured party, who may call for a conveyance thereof. The party guilty of fraud is said in such cases to be a trustee ex maleficio. Bisp. Eq. § 91. Mr. Pomeroy has stated the doctrine as follows: "In general, whenever the legal title to property, real or personal, has been obtained through actual fraud, misrepresentation, concealment, or other undue influence, duress, taking advantage of one's weakness or necessities, or under any other similar circumstances which render it unconscientious for the holder of the legal title to retain and enjoy the beneficial interest, equity impresses a constructive trust on the property thus acquired in favor of the one truly and equitably entitled to have the same." Parrish v. Parrish, 54 Pac. 352, 354, 33 Or. 486 (citing 2 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 1053).

An attorney purchasing property intrusted to him to sell is termed a trustee ex maleficio. Yeoman v. Townshend, 26 N. Y. Supp. 606, 609, 74 Hun, 625.

Persons receiving money in a fiduciary capacity are sometimes denominated trustees ex maleficio and trustees de son tort, but when such terms are employed they are employed only to designate those implied trusts which the law raises for the purposes of justice. Brown v. Brown, 31 N. Y. Supp. 650, 652, 83 Hun, 160.

TRUSTEE IN BANKRUPTCY.

The position of a trustee in bankruptcy is a peculiar one. He takes the place of the bankrupt, being vested by operation of law with the title of the bankrupt as of the date he was adjudged a bankrupt, and, with reference to pending suits, is treated like any other person who acquires title pendente lite. As such, he is bound by a judgment subsequently rendered, unless, by a direct proceeding before the court rendering it, he can have it set aside. He may also be said to represent the creditors, and is a trustee with limited powers, and must look to the provisions of the bankrupt law not only as the source of his power, but also for the manner of its exercise. Belcher Land Mortg. Co. v. Bush (Tex.) 67 S. W. 444, 446.

The trustee in bankruptcy peculiarly represents the creditors of the bankrupt, and his claims to property are essentially in their behalf. Arnold v. Eastin's Trustee, 76 S. W. 855, 860, 25 Ky. Law Rep. 896.

A trustee in bankruptcy is an officer of the court, who has inquisitorial powers given him by the court, and the court regards him as its officer, and he is to hold moneys in his hands in trust for its equitable distribution among creditors. In re Myers (U. S.) 99 Fed. 691, 694.

A trustee in bankruptcy, under the bankrupt act, is an officer, and, in a certain restricted sense, an officer of the court. But he is not an officer of the court in any such sense as a receiver. He takes the legal title to the property, and in respect to suits stands in the same general position as a trustee of an express trust or an executor. In re Smith (U. S.) 9 Am. Bankr. Rep. 603, 21 Fed. 1014.

TRUSTEE IN INSOLVENCY.

As personal representative, see "Personal Representative."

TRUSTEE OF EXPRESS TRUST.

A person with whom or in whose name a contract is made for the benefit of another is a "trustee of an express trust," within the meaning of the provision that such a person may sue without joining with him the persons for whose benefit the action is prosecuted. Code Civ. Proc. Cal. 1903, § 369; Rev. St. Utah 1898, § 2902; Code Civ. Proc. N. Y. 1899, § 449; Ballinger's Ann. Codes & St. Wash. 1897, § 4825; Wright v. Tinsley, 30 Mo. 389, 395; Muncie Natural Gas Co. v. City of Muncie, 66 N. E. 436, 442, 160 Ind. 97, 60 L. R. A. 822; Hastings v. Gwynn, 12 Wis. 671.

The term "trustee of express trust," in the Code provision authorizing a trustee of an express trust to sue without joining with him the person for whose benefit the action is prosecuted, means a trustee created by express agreement to that effect, or something which in law is equivalent to such an agreement. In every case the trust must be expressed by some agreement of the parties, not necessarily, perhaps, in writing, but either written or verbal, according to the nature of the transaction. Robbins v. Deverill, 20 Wis. 142, 148.

The cashier and custodian of the funds of a bank which is not incorporated, but merely a partnership, of which such cashier is a member, who habitually makes contracts for the bank, may sue on such contract in his own name in behalf of the bank; he being a trustee of an express trust. Merchants' Bank v. McClelland, 13 Pac. 723, 724, 9 Colo. 608.

One with whom a contract for the carriage of goods is made, and who is described therein as the consignor or consignee and sole owner, although not in fact the owner, is a trustee of an express trust. Waterman v. Chicago, M. & St. P. Ry. Co., 21 N. W. 611, 613, 61 Wis. 464, 50 Am. Rep. 145.

A trustee of an express trust is a person with whom or in whose name a contract is made for the benefit of another. Thus, where a plaintiff bid in property and received a certificate of sale, and the sheriff's deed for the same issued in his own name as between him and the bank for which he purchased, he was a trustee of an express trust. Walker v. McCusker, 12 Pac. 723, 725, 71 Cal. 594.

Where one transfers a claim to an attorney for collection, with directions to the attorney to apply the proceeds to demands held by the attorney for collection against the party transferring the claim, the attorney holds the claim as trustee of an express trust. Wynne v. Heck, 92 N. C. 414, 416.

A written order by the owner of personal property, authorizing plaintiff to dispose of it and collect the proceeds, does not constitute plaintiff a trustee of an express trust. Swenson v. Kleinschmidt, 26 Pac. 198, 199, 10 Mont. 473.

Const. 1874 provides that the homestead shall not be exempt from execution on judgments rendered "against executors, administrators, guardians, receivers, attorneys for money collected by them, and other trustees of an express trust for moneys due in their official capacity." Held, that since all the specific classes therein named were persons holding money exclusively for the benefit of others, and since the relation between them and those for whom they held was in each case one of confidence and trust, the "other trustees of an express trust" mentioned must refer to the same class of trustees, and therefore, where an attorney became surety on his client's bond to relieve his client's money from garnishment, and received the money until the suit was decided, and converted it, he could not be said to hold it as a trustee of an express trust. Sanders v. Sanders, 20 S. W. 517, 518, 56 Ark. 585.

Agent.

An agent to whom goods are assigned for his principal, and who has no pecuniary interest in them beyond his lien for commission, and who has contracted with the common carrier for their delivery, is a trustee of an express trust. Wolfe v. Missouri Pac. Ry. Co., 11 S. W. 49, 51, 97 Mo. 473, 3 L. R. A. 539, 10 Am. St. Rep. 331.

An agent who collected money belonging to his principal, and delivered it to an express company, and paid the charges for carrying and delivering the money to another agent, was a "trustee of an express trust," and, as such trustee, such agent may maintain an action against the express company to recover such money on the company's failure to deliver. Snider v. Adams Express Co., 77 Mo. 523, 526.

An agent who takes a contract for the benefit of his principal in his own name is within Gen. St. Minn. 1878, c. 66, § 23, allowing a trustee of an express trust to sue in his own name. Cremer v. Wimmer, 42 N. W. 467, 40 Minn. 511.

The executive agent of a corporation who transacts business in his own name is the trustee of an express trust and may sue, without joining the corporation. Albany & R. Iron & Steel Co. v. Lundberg, 7 Sup. Ct. 958, 960, 121 U. S. 451, 30 L. Ed. 982.

An agent of a mowing machine company, who contracts to sell and sells mowing machines for the company, is a trustee of an express trust, and hence may sue on the contract in his own name. Davis v. Reynolds (N. Y.) 48 How. Prac. 210, 212.

Assignee.

An assignee in bankruptcy is the trustee of an express trust, expressly authorized to sue by Code, § 317. Reade v. Waterhouse, 52 N. Y. 587, 589.

An assignee for the benefit of creditors is a trustee of an express trust. That the duties of the assignee, in disposing of the trust estate, are regulated by law, rather than by the express terms of the deed of assignment, does not render the trust any less an express one. Caldwell v. Matthewson, 45 Pac. 614, 615, 57 Kan. 258.

Assignee of collateral.

One to whom a bond and mortgage were assigned as collateral security is a trustee of an express trust, and may maintain an action to foreclose the mortgage without joining his assignor as a party thereto. Chew v. Brumagen, 80 U. S. (13 Wall.) 497, 502, 20 L. Ed. 663.

Committee of lunatic.

The committee of the estate and person of a lunatic is not the trustee of an express trust, and therefore the committee cannot institute an action in his own name, but the action must be brought in the name of the lunatic. Burnet v. Bookstaver (N. Y.) 10 Hun, 481, 484.

Grantee.

Where land has been conveyed to one by deed for the benefit of another, he is a trustee of an express trust, and the proper person to bring an action under it in behalf of the beneficiary. Brown v. Cherry (N. Y.) 56 Barb. 635, 640, 38 How. Prac. 352, 357.

Guardian.

A guardian appointed by the probate court under the act providing for the appointment, and prescribing the duty of guardians, is not a trustee of an express trust, and hence is not authorized to bring an action for the benefit of his ward in his own name. Fox v. Minor, 32 Cal. 111, 116, 91 Am. Dec. 566.

A guardian is not the trustee of an express trust, against whom limitations will not run. Harris v. Calvert, 44 Pac. 25, 29, 2 Kan. App. 749.

Insured.

One who has insured his life for the benefit of another is a trustee of an express trust, and may bring an action on the policy without joining the beneficiary. Kerr v. Union Mut. Life Ins. Co., 69 Hun, 393, 397, 23 N. Y. Supp. 619.

A trustee of an express trust, within Code, § 113, who is expressly authorized to sue without joining the beneficiary, includes a person with whom or in whose name a contract is made for the benefit of another; and under an insurance policy payable to the personal representatives of insured—the sum specified to be for the benefit of his wife—such representatives were trustees of an express trust. Greenfield v. Massachusetts Mut. Life Ins. Co., 47 N. Y. 430, 435.

Officer of fraternal organization.

One who takes upon himself an office in a fraternal and benevolent organization, the duties of which office, as set forth in its printed or written by-laws or regulations, are to collect the moneys of such organization and pay them over to another of its officers, is the trustee of an express trust, and hence liable, under Gen. St. 1897, c. 100, § 95, for the embezzlement of the moneys collected by him. State v. Campbell, 52 Pac. 454, 455, 59 Kan. 246.

Payee.

Where a note is payable to one for the benefit of another, such payee is a "trustee of an express trust," within Practice Act, § 4, and entitled to sue on the note. Winters v. Rush, 34 Cal. 136, 138.

An administrator to whom a promissory note is given, payable to him by name, with the addition of his office as administrator, after he has resigned the office, and an administrator de bonis non is appointed, is, as to such note, a trustee of an express trust, and may sue upon such note in his own name. Harney v. Ducher, 15 Mo. 89, 93, 55 Am. Dec. 131.

Where a note was made payable to W. or any authorized agent of a certain college, "for the endowment of said college," W. was the trustee of an express trust, within the meaning of section 6 of the practice act, authorizing a trustee of an express trust to bring an action in his own name. Winters v. Rush, 34 Cal. 136, 138.

The agent of a foreign corporation, to whom a subscription note is made payable, as executive agent of the company, for stock of the corporation to be issued to the signer, is a trustee of an express trust, within Code, §§ 111, 113. Considerant v. Brisbane, 22 N. Y. 389, 392.

An action on a note payable to plaintiffs, as agents of a syndicate, may be maintained by the plaintiffs in their own name, as trustees of an express trust; such action being authorized by the Code. Coffin v. President Grand Rapids Hydraulic Co., 32 N. E. 1076, 1078, 136 N. Y. 655.

People or state.

Where a bond of a trustee was given to the people of the state for the benefit of those interested in the trust estate, the people were "a trustee of an express trust," within Code, § 113, authorizing suit to be brought in the name of such a trustee. People v. Norton, 9 N. Y. 176, 179.

In Code Civ. Proc. § 369, authorizing a trustee of an express trust to sue without joining with him the person for whose benefit the action is prosecuted, it is provided that a person with whom or in whose name a contract is made for the benefit of another is a trustee of an express trust, within the meaning of this section. The state may bring an action on the official bond of a collector of license taxes, which bond was made payable to the state. People v. Stacy, 16 Pac. 192, 193, 74 Cal. 373.

Under a statute authorizing trustees of an express trust to sue without joining with them the person for whose benefit the action was brought, and declaring that a trustee of an express trust shall be construed to include a person with whom or in whose name a contract is made for the benefit of another, the state may bring an action on a recognition for a criminal action which is made out in the name of the state, though the money recovered belongs to the county in which the party was held to stand trial, and not to the state. State v. Wettstein, 25 N. W. 34, 38, 64 Wis. 234.

Receiver.

A receiver is not a trustee of an express trust. State ex rel. Fichtenkamm v. Gamba, 68 Mo. 289, 297.

TRUSTEES OF THE POOR.

Trustees of the poor are not private parties. They are public officers, and hence, where they are defendants in an action, and attending as witnesses in behalf of the corporation, with no private interest therein, they are entitled to witness fees. Taylor v. Trustees of the Poor of Newcastle County (Del.) 40 Atl. 116.

TRUSTEE PROCESS.

"Trustee process" is the name by which the process corresponding to garnishment is known in Massachusetts. White v. Simpson, 18 South. 151, 153, 107 Ala. 386; Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Rogers, 44 S. E. 300, 302, 52 W. Va. 450, 62 L. R. A. 178.

The term "trustee process" is the term generally employed in the Northeastern states to designate garnishment proceedings. It is so used in Rhode Island. In some states it is called "factorizing." In the one case the party in possession is called the "trustee," in the other the "factor." Cross v. Brown, 83 Atl. 147, 157, 19 R. I. 220.

"Trustee process," or "process of foreign attachment or garnishment," is, so far as it relates to the trustee, an attachment of the property in his hands, and a summons to him to appear at court. Creed v. Gilman, 48 N. E. 778, 169 Mass. 562.

A trustee process is in the nature of the proceeding in rem. It is a sequestration of the debt due from the trustee in order that it may be devoted to the payment of one to whom the trustee's creditor is himself indebted. Lancashire Ins. Co. v. Corbetts, 46 N. E. 631, 634, 165 Ill. 592, 36 L. R. A. 640, 56 Am. St. Rep. 275.

The trustee process, or the name by which the process for responding to a garnishment is known in Massachusetts, will operate as a species of compulsory assignment, by which a creditor may obtain that by operation of law which his debtor might voluntarily assign to him in payment of his debt. White v. Simpson, 18 South. 151, 153, 107 Ala. 386.

The trustee process is an equitable proceeding, and, where an assignee has been appointed, and no creditors have proved their claims within the prescribed time, creditors cannot reach the funds in the hands of the assignee by trustee process. Tucker v. Chick, 87 Atl. 672, 673, 67 N. H. 77.

TRUSTEE'S SALE.

As judicial sale, see "Judicial Sale."

TRUSTOR.

The person whose confidence creates the trust is called the "trustor." Civ. Code Mont.

1895, § 2953; Civ. Code Cal. 1903, § 2218; Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 4257; Civ. Code S. D. 1903, § 1610; Colton v. Stanford, 23 Pac. 16, 20, 82 Cal. 351, 16 Am. St. Rep. 137.

A trustor is one who gives a deed of trust by way of a mortgage. Stephens v. Clay, 30 Pac. 43, 44, 17 Colo. 489, 31 Am. St. Rep. 328.

TRUTH.

See "Whole Truth."

"Truth," as applied to the doctrine of Christian science, is that which is always the same, and can never change; the one Supreme Being; the All Powerful; that which created all things that are; He who made all that was made, and made it good, as is said in His word. State v. Buswell, 58 N. W. 728, 730, 40 Neb. 158, 24 L. R. A. 68.

"According to the best lexicographers of our language—at least, in this country—the words, 'truth,' 'veracity,' and 'honesty' are almost synonymous; very nearly the same definitions being given to each of the words. Truth is so nearly allied to honesty and moral soundness, it seems to us, that, where a witness has testified in chief that the reputation of a person for truth and veracity is good, it is competent to ask him on cross-examination if he has not heard of a certain matter which would seriously effect the reputation of the party for honesty and moral soundness, as being necessarily inconsistent and at variance with the reputation he has given the party." Wachstetter v. State, 99 Ind. 290-297, 50 Am. Rep. 94.

Fact distinguished.

A "truth," in pleading, is the legal principle which declares or governs the facts and their operation and effect, and is widely different from a "fact," which, in pleading, is a circumstance, act, event, or incident, though the terms "fact" and "truth," in common parlance, are often used as synonymous. Drake v. Cockcroft (N. Y.) 1 Abb. Prac. 203, 205.

TRUTHFULNESS.

The word "truthfulness," as used in an application for insurance, wherein the applicant warrants the truthfulness of his statements, should be construed to mean according to the knowledge and information possessed by the applicant. The word is susceptible of this meaning, and since the law does not favor forfeitures, or a construction of an application or a medical examination which renders the statements warranties, with harsh and inequitable results, that meaning should be applied. Jennings v. Supreme Council of Loyal Additional Ben. Ass'n, 81 N. Y. Supp. 90, 100, 81 App. Div. 78.

TRY.

An averment that another tried to do anything, implying physical effort, is the equivalent of saying that he attempted to do it. In an action for slander, a count averring that defendant feloniously and maliciously charged plaintiff, in the presence of others, with having tried to steal, but could not, is equivalent to charging him with an attempt to commit larceny, and such a charge is actionable per se. Berdeaux v. Davis, 58 Ala. 611, 612.

A record showing that the jurors were tried in the manner required by law imports that the jurors were tested as to their fitness and qualification. Ohio River Railroad Co. v. Blake, 18 S. E. 957, 958, 38 W. Va. 718.

A statement in the record on appeal that the jury was sworn to try the issues was of no effect where the record also showed that the parties proceeded to trial without a replication to the plea of set-off, as there was no issue. Reagan v. Irvin, 25 Ark. 86, 88.

TUG.

As boat, see "Boat."

As common carrier, see "Common Carrier."

TUITION.

Tuition is the charge made for instruction, rather than a rent for use of buildings in which instruction is imparted. Linton v. Lucy Cobb Institute, 45 S. E. 53, 55, 117 Ga. 678.

"Tuition," as used in Rev. St. § 388, providing that no student who shall have been a resident of the state for one year next preceding his admission shall be required to pay any fees for tuition in the university, construed not to include incidental expenses, and hence students may be charged therefor without regard to the statute. State v. Regents of the University of Wisconsin, 11 N. W. 472, 473, 54 Wis. 159.

Laws 1893, c. 175, providing that, on the death of one parent, the surviving parent may by will dispose of the custody and tuition of an infant child, includes guardianship of the estate as well as of the person. In re Zwickert, 26 N. Y. Supp. 773, 774, 5 Misc. Rep. 272.

TUMBLE STUFF.

"Tumble stuff" is used in the mining law to designate that superficial deposit on the earth's surface which is movable, as contrasted with the immovable mass that lies below. Stevens v. Williams (U. S.) 23 Fed. Cas. 44.

TUMBREL.

A "tumbrel" was an instrument of punishment known to the ancient common law, by which a woman convicted of being a common scold was punished by being plunged into the water. Lord Coke says that, in law, "it signifieth a stool that falleth down into a pit of water for the punishment of the party in it." United States v. Royall (U. S.) 27 Fed. Cas. 907, 908.

TUMULT.

Rev. St. c. 113, declares that no person shall make any "brawl or tumult" in a street, lane, alley, or public place. Held, that the Legislature intended to provide a punishment for one offense; brawl and tumult being relative terms, the one employed to express the meaning of the other. State v. Perkins, 42 N. H. 464, 465.

TUMULTUOUS ASSEMBLY.

"Tumultuous" means conducted with disorder; noisy, confused, boisterous, disorderly, as a tumultuous assembly or meeting. Ky. St. § 8, makes any city liable for injury to property by any riotous or tumultuous assemblage of people, etc. In an action for damages alleged to have been inflicted by such an assembly, it was insisted for the city that the words "tumultuous assemblage" referred only to an unlawful assembly, bent on evil, such as a mob, and that it should not be held to apply to a crowd of merry-makers celebrating the advent of Christmas, which was in fact the assemblage that inflicted the injury complained of in the case. It was, however, held that the purpose of the assembly, or the aim that it had primarily in view, was not material, if it was in fact tumultuous, and that, as a matter of fact, an assemblage of 1,000 people in the main street of a city, obstructing the use of the street, and discharging bombs, skyrockets, Roman candles, and other missiles loaded with powerful explosives, at private property, endangering life and preventing the use of the street for purposes of business, was a tumultuous assembly. City of Madisonville v. Bishop, 67 S. W. 269, 270, 113 Ky. 106, 57 L. R. A. 180.

TUNNEL CLAIM.

A tunnel location has been called a "tunnel claim" by the highest judicial authority, and it seems that a valid tunnel location may inure to the benefit and protection of mineral lodes discovered in such tunnel. Eillet v. Campbell, 33 Pac. 521, 525, 18 Colo. 510.

TUNNEL RIGHT.

A tunnel right through a specific piece of ground is a right to enter upon and occupy the ground for the purpose of prosecuting work in the tunnel, and to extract therefrom waste rock or earth necessary to complete the running of the tunnel, and making such use thereof after completion as may be necessary to work the mining ground or lode owned by the party running the tunnel; and, by implication, a grant of a tunnel right carries with it the right to dump waste rock and earth on land owned by the grantors at the time of the conveyance of the tunnel right. Scheel v. Alhambra Mining Co. (U. S.) 79 Fed. 821, 825.

TURBARY.

See "Common of Turbary."

TURKEY.

An indictment for stealing two "turkeys" was not supported by evidence of the theft of two "dead turkeys" stolen from a larder. Rex v. Holloway, 1 Carr. & P. 128.

TURN OUT.

"Turn out," as used in a receipt given to an administrator by an assignee of claims against the estate, providing that if it should turn out that the assignee had received more than was due, or that there were prior liens, he would refund the overpayment, meant when those facts, if existing, were discovered by the administrator, or might have been discovered with reasonable diligence. Eller v. Church, 28 S. E. 364, 121 N. C. 269.

An old field, that had formerly been cleared, inclosed, and cultivated, but of which the fences are down, and the land grown up in broom sedge and pine bushes, is said to be "turned out," in the common parlance of the country. Hall v. Canford, 50 N. C. 3, 4.

Act Feb. 26, 1817, providing that a wife may secure a divorce from her husband in case he shall "turn her out of doors," does not apply to an instance where she is not ejected by force, or compelled to leave because of a threat to employ it, and a reasonable apprehension that it would be used against her, or a refusal to receive her upon demand that she should be taken into her husband's house as a wife, or an emphatic refusal to allow her to remain after she had returned, accompanied by the declaration that she wished to remain and conduct herself as a wife should do, or where the facts do not show a justification on the part of the wife in withdrawing from the house of her husband. Appeal of Sower, 89 Pa. 173, 181.

As side track.

The words, "turn-outs, switches, and sidings, in relation to railroads, are of modern growth, and not only in early use, but in the dictionaries, are treated as to some extent interchangeable. Webster defines a turn-out as a short side track on a railroad, which may be occupied by one train while another is passing on a main track; a siding. Appeal of River Front R. Co., 19 Atl. 356, 357, 133 Pa. 134.

A turn-out is a short railroad side track, upon which one train may be shunted to permit another to pass on the main track; a short side track on a railway, designated to enable one train to pass another. A statute authorizing a railroad to take lands for the construction of turn-outs does not authorize it to take lands for the construction of another main line adjoining its constructed road. Erie R. Co. v. Steward, 70 N. Y. Supp. 698, 700, 61 App. Div. 480.

Freightyards containing 450 acres, operated as one yard, are not turn-outs or switches, as those terms are understood by railroad men in railway parlance. People v. New York Cent. & H. R. Co., 51 N. E. 312, 314, 156 N. Y. 570.

TURN-OUT ROAD.

A turn-out road is a road used temporarily by the public in consequence of a temporary obstruction of a public road. Such a road, which is not made a public road as required by statute, or acquired by the public by prescription or dedication, is not a public road, within Cr. Code, § 4095, providing for the punishment of one who discharges a gun or any other kind of firearm along or across a public road. McDade v. State, 11 South. 375, 376, 95 Ala. 28.

TURNING ROW.

A turning row is a strip of unplowed ground lying between plowed fields on each side, and upon which the teams used in cultivating the fields are turned around. Langan v. Whalen (Neb.) 93 N. W. 393.

TURNPIKE.

See "Public Turnpike."

The word "turnpike" does not mean road, but gate—such as are used to throw across the road to obstruct travelers, carriers, and the like, until the tolls are collected. A road is termed a turnpike road not because of its form or of the material of which it is composed, but because of the form and character of the gates placed on the road to obstruct the passage of travelers until they have paid the tolls always collected on such roads. Jersey City & B. P. Plank-Road Co. v. Haight, 30 N. J. Law (1 Vroom) 443, 446.

A turnpike is a highway, differing neither in responsibility for proper maintenance, nor in any other particular, from an ordinary highway, save in the mode of constructing and maintaining it. It is regarded, in law, as a public easement, and not as private property. State ex rel. Allison v. Hannibal and Ralls County Gravel Road Co., 39 S. W. 910, 912, 138 Mo. 332, 38 L. R. A. 457.

A turnpike road is a road having toll-gates or bars on it, and on which tolls are collected. Northam Bridge Co. v. London Ry., 6 M. & W. 428, 439.

A turnpike road is a road which is private property, and is subject to be traveled over on condition of first paying such stipulated sum as is prescribed by the Legislature. Bradshaw v. Rodgers (N. Y.) 20 Johns. 103, 105.

Whether a road is a turnpike road is a question depending on whether it is a road maintained by tolls payable by passengers, and not whether it is an important road or not. No amount of traffic can make a road a turnpike road. Reg. v. East & West I. D. Ry. Co., 2 Ellis & Bl. 464, 472.

Whenever the word "turnpike" occurs in the act relating to free turnpike roads, it shall be held and taken to mean and include all turnpikes and gravel roads either purchased or constructed by counties, and which are used as free turnpikes or gravel roads. Horner's Rev. St. Ind. 1901, § 5106.

Bridge.

The term "turnpike road" includes turnpike bridges. Smith Bridge Co. v. Bowman, 41 Ohio St. 37, 52, 52 Am. Rep. 66.

As a public highway.

As road or street, see "Road"; "Street."

Turnpikes are public highways, notwithstanding the exaction of toll for passing on them. Dodge County v. Chandler, 96 U. S. 205, 208, 24 L. Ed. 625.

Turnpike roads are, in point of fact, the most public roads or highways that are known to exist; and, in point of law, they are made entirely for public use, and the community have a public interest in their construction and preservation. They are under legislative regulation, and the gates are subject to be thrown open, and the company indicted and fined, if the road is not made and kept easy and safe for the public use. Rogers v. Bradshaw (N. Y.) 20 Johns. 735, 742.

Turnpikes adopted by law, and used for the three purposes of permitting persons to pass and repass on foot, and horseback, and in carriages, as public highways, are public highways, within Rev. Code, c. 34, § 2, punishing with death robbery in or near a public highway; and the fact that the agency of individuals or of corporations is used for the purpose of constructing and keeping in repair these kind of public highways in no wise affects the principle or policy of the statute. State v. Johnson, 61 N. O. 140, 143.

A turnpike is a public highway, differing neither in the responsibility for its maintenance, nor in any other particular, from an ordinary highway. No additional burden is imposed on the servient estate by changing a public highway into a tollroad. The change is not in the character of the servitude, but in the method of sustaining the highway. In the one case it is sustained by taxes; in the other, by tolls. St. Joseph Plankroad Co. v. Kline, 30 South. 854, 858, 106 La. 325.

A turnpike road can be constructed and opened under authority of law only, and when used by the public it becomes a public highway. It differs from a common highway in the fact that it is not constructed in the first instance at the public expense, and the cost of construction is reimbursed by the payment of toll imposed by authority of law. Its use is common to all who comply with the law. Common understanding and public policy unite in requiring that a turnpike be held to be a public highway. People's Telephone & Telegraph Co. v. President, etc., Berks & D. T. Road, 49 Atl. 284, 286, 199 Pa. 411 (citing Northern Central Ry. Co. v. Com., 90 Pa. 300, 306; Pittsburgh, M. & Y. R. Co. v. Com., 104 Pa. 583).

A turnpike road is a public highway established by public authority for public use, and is to be regarded as a public easement, and not as private property. The only difference between this and a common highway is that, instead of being made at the public expense in the first instance, it is authorized and laid out by public authority, and made at the expense of individuals in the first instance, and the cost of construction and maintenance is reimbursed by a toll levied by public authority for the purpose. Every traveler had the same right to use it, paying the toll established by law, as he would have to use any other public highway. Commonwealth v. Wilkinson, 33 Mass. (16 Pick.) 175, 177, 28 Am. Dec. 654.

Where defendant obtained an order from a board of auditors fixing his rates, and giving him a right to demand and receive tolls from all persons passing over a road, this right was a franchise, and made the road a legalized tollroad or turnpike. Such roads are public highways. They are constructed, like other highways, for the convenience of the public, in the hope of profit to their proprietors, it is true, yet for a public purpose; and travelers have a right to use them on paying the specified tolls. People v. O'Keefe, 21 Pac. 538, 539, 79 Cal. 166, 171.

A turnpike is a public highway which the public have a right to use on paying toll. If it is appropriated to some other public use, the turnpike company would be entitled to compensation, and, if the new use was essentially different from the old, the owner of the reversion would also be entitled to compensation. Grand Rapids, N. & L. S. R. Co. v. Grand Rapids & I. R. Co., 35 Mich. 265, 272, 24 Am. Rep. 545.

A turnpike is a public highway, and no adverse right to maintain an inclosed bank of earth projecting into it arises from mere lapse of time. Appeal of Stevenson (Pa.) 2 Montg. Co. Law Rep. 73, 80.

Turnpike roads are public highways. It is the franchise of a citizen to use them free of every restriction that is not explicitly imposed by the Legislature. Geiger v. Perkiomen & R. Turnpike Road (Pa.) 11 Montg. Co. Law Rep. 25, 27 (citing Huntingdon, C. & I. Turnpike Co. v. Brown (Pa.) 2 Pen. & W. 462-464).

A turnpike road is not a highway, within the meaning of Gen. St. c. 60, § 22, requiring towns to keep in repair the highways. Town of North Providence v. Dyer-ville Mfg. Co., 13 R. I. 45, 47.

Material of road as affecting.

A plankroad constructed by a private company and under legislative authority, and dedicated to public travel, with gates erected thereon for the collection of tolls, as a condition of such travel, is properly termed a "turnpike road," without regard to the material of which the surface of the road may be composed. Haight v. Jersey City & B. P. Plankroad Co., 32 N. J. Law (3 Vroom) 449, 451.

A turnpike road is one which is repaired by tolls collected on it, and whether it is so, or not, does not depend on the width or make of the road. Reg. v. East & West I. D. & B. J. Ry. Co., 22 Eng. Law & Eq. 113, 117.

A "turnpike road" means a macadam pavement. City of Louisville v. Tyler, 64 S. W. 415, 416, 111 Ky. 588.

In an action to collect toll on a gravel road which at places was only 8½ feet in width—it being claimed by defendant that the provision of 1 Rev. St. 1876, p. 664, amending all acts of incorporation for the construction of plankroads and turnpike roads by providing, "where they are now required to construct a double track, either of plank or of metal, the same may be changed to a single track, not less than eight and a half feet in width," did not apply to gravel roads—the court said: "This construction of the statute is, we think, entirely too narrow and technical, and we are not inclined to adopt it. In Worcester's Dictionary a turnpike road is defined to be a road made by individuals or by a corporation, on which tolls are collected. This definition is certainly broad enough to include gravel roads, on which, under the statutes of this state, tolls may be lawfully collected. Neff v. Mooresville & W. Gravel Road Co., 68 Ind. 279, 284.

TURNPIKE COMPANY.

A turnpike company is one that owns and receives toll on a turnpike road. Jersey City & B. P. Plankroad Co. v. Haight, 30 N. J. Law (1 Vroom) 443, 445.

A turnpike company is one which has the power to collect tolls from persons passing over their roads, and to enforce the collection by erecting turnpikes or gates, or both, to obstruct the passage until the tolls are paid. Haight v. Jersey City & B. P. Plankroad Co., 32 N. J. Law (3 Vroom) 440, 451.

TURNPIKE GATE.

Tollgate synonymous, see "Tollgate."

TURPITUDE.

See "Moral Turpitude."

TUTOR.

The term "tutor" is a name used in the civil law to designate one who has charge of the maintenance and education of an infant. Sproule v. Davies, 75 N. Y. Supp. 229, 230, 69 App. Div. 502.

TUTRIX.

The use of the term "tutrix" to distinguish a female from a male tutor is conventional. The terminology of the Code recognizes no such distinction of sex in tutorship. A tutor is a tutor, whether the person be man or woman. Though in some articles the Code refers to a female tutor as a tutrix, yet in all articles prescribing the nature, powers, and duties of tutorship it uses simply the words "tutor" and "tutorship," and those provisions apply equally to female as to male tutors. Succession of Roudreaux, 7 South. 453, 454, 42 La. Ann. 296.

TWENTY-ONE.

As used in Shannon's Code, § 4318, providing for the delivery of a ward's property to her upon attaining the "age of twenty-one years," the term is synonymous with "full age" or "coming of age," so that there is nothing in the statute fixing 21 years as the age at which a guardian shall settle with wards who are of full age in the state of their domicile; and hence a minor 18 years of age, but emancipated by the law of her domicile, is entitled to a settlement with her guardian under the statute. The word "twenty-one" happens to be used in the statute merely because that is the age of majority at common law, which is the law of Tennessee on that subject; there being no statute declaring it. Memphis Trust Co. v. Blessing, 58 S. W. 115, 117, 103 Tenn. 237.

Mill. & V. Code, § 3419, provides that every minor, upon attaining the age of "twenty-one" years, on receipt of money, shall receipt to the guardian for the same. Section 3358 provides that a guardian who fails to deliver up effects of the ward "upon majority" is guilty of a misdemeanor. Held, that the term "twenty-one" as used in section 3419, should be construed as synonymous with "full age," since it happens to be used in the statute merely because that is the age of majority at common law, which is the law of Tennessee on that subject, there being no statute declaring it; and hence a guardian is not required to wait until the ward is 21 years of age before settling with him, where the ward was a minor domiciled in another state and emancipated by its laws of the disabilities of infancy, but such ward might demand and receive personal property held for her by a guardian appointed and resident in Tennessee, as she will be regarded of full age in Tennessee for that purpose. Woodward v. Woodward, 11 S. W. 892, 898, 87 Tenn. (3 Pickle) 644.

As a game.

A statute making the game of "twenty-one" a misdemeanor, without further defining the character of the game, is not sufficiently descriptive to create a crime; for it is a word which does not convey a fixed or ascertainable meaning in law or in English. The word "twenty-one" does not inform us what class of acts there are which constitute the game. A law is a rule of action prescribed. A word which has no fixed meaning cannot constitute a rule of action; for the connotation is not definite, nor does it prescribe either to the public or to the courts what acts are or are not criminal. Harland v. Territory, 13 Pac. 453, 457, 8 Wash. T. 131.

TWENTY-SECOND OF FEBRUARY.

The "22d of February" is a voluntary holiday, and an act done on that day which is not prohibited by statute is quite as effective as if done on any other day. Handy v. Maddox, 37 Atl. 222, 224, 85 Md. 547.

TWICE IN JEOPARDY.

See "Jeopardy."

TWILIGHT.

Twilight is the light received before the rising and after the setting of the sun, or when the sun is less than 18 degrees below the horizon, occasioned by the illumination of the earth's atmosphere by the direct rays of the sun and their reflection on the earth. The length of twilight necessarily depends on the time of the year and the distance from the equator. State v. Magers, 57 Pac. 197, 198, 35 Or. 520.

TWISTED STRAW.

The term "twisted straw" is used in trade and commerce to designate the raw material used in making straw laces. A stock of rye straw is split into two parts, and these parts twisted together compose the "twisted straw" of commerce. Rheimer v. Maxwell (U. S.) 20 Fed. Cas. 630.

TWO.

"Two," as used in Laws 1892, c. 668, § 1, par. 1, providing for the consolidation of two corporations into a new corporation, authorizes by intendment the consolidation of two or more corporations. People v. Rice, 21 N. Y. Supp. 48, 49, 66 Hun, 130.

Where there is a contract for making two boilers and a cylinder and to put up an engine, the words "two boilers and a cylinder" should be construed to mean an entire steam engine, if it appear that in the locality where the contract was made such phrase be a word of art having such significance. James v. Bostwick (Ohio) Wright, 142, 143.

TWO HUNDRED AND FORTY ACRES.

As used in Act Feb. 1, 1877, authorizing the swamp land commissioners to sell swamp land belonging to the state, but providing that no person shall be allowed to enter more than "240 acres," this is construed to be synonymous with three-eighths or six-sixteenths of a section. Phillips v. Gastrell, 62 Miss. 362, 365.

TWO MONTHS SUCCESSIVELY.

An order requiring the publication of a notice for "two months successively" is satisfied by a publication for ten weeks. Foster v. Givens (U. S.) 67 Fed. 684, 693, 14 C. C. A. 625.

TWO-THIRDS.

Of qualified voters.

Act Dec. 19, 1865, providing that the mayor and council of the city of St. Joseph should cause all propositions to create a debt by borrowing money to be submitted to a vote of the qualified voters of the city, and in all such cases should require "two-thirds of such qualified voters" to sanction the same, means two-thirds of the qualified voters who voted at the special election, and not two-thirds of all the voters resident in the city, whether voting or not. State ex rel. Bassett v. Renick, 87 Mo. 270, 272.

Of stockholders.

"Two-thirds of the stockholders," in an act requiring two-thirds of the stockholders to approve and consent to the abandonment of a canal, meant the amount of stock in value, and not the number of stockholders. Fredericks v. Pennsylvania Canal Co. (Pa.) 42 Leg. Int. 428.

TWO-THIRDS VOTE.

As used in the Constitution, requiring a "two-thirds vote" of the Legislature for certain purposes, the phrase means a vote in each house of two-thirds of all the members thereof. State v. Gould, 17 N. W. 276, 81 Minn. 189.

Const. art. 9, § 7, providing that no law creating a public debt shall take effect until it shall have been passed by the vote of "two-thirds" of the members of the General Assembly, etc., means two-thirds of the members present, a quorum voting. Bond Debt Cases, 12 S. O. 201, 285.

TYMBRELLA.

An instrument of punishment known to the ancient common law, by which a woman convicted of being a common scold was punished by being plunged into the water. Lord Coke says that "in law it signifieth a stool that falleth down into a pit of water for the punishment of the party in it." United States v. Royall (U. S.) 27 Fed. Cas. 908, 908.

TYPEWRITING.

"Typewriting" is a substitute for and the equivalent of writing. Appeal of Deep River Nat. Bank, 47 Atl. 675, 677, 73 Conn. 341.

U

UBERRIMÆ FIDÆ.

Contracts of life insurance are said to be "uberrimæ fidæ" when any material misrepresentation or concealment is fatal to them. Equitable Life Assur. Soc. v. McElroy (U. S.) 83 Fed. 631, 636, 28 C. C. A. 365.

ULTIMATE.

The word "ultimate" means at last, finally, or at the end. Cambria Iron Co. v. Keynes, 47 N. E. 548, 550, 56 Ohio St. 501.

Ultimate means the last in the train of progression or sequence, tended toward by all that precedes; arrived at as the last result; final. Read v. State Ins. Co., 72 N. W. 665, 668, 103 Iowa, 307, 64 Am. St. Rep. 180.

ULTIMATE FACT.

An "ultimate or issuable fact" is one essential to the claim or defense, and which cannot be stricken from the pleading without leaving it insufficient. Meyer v. School Dist. No. 31, 57 N. W. 68, 69, 4 S. D. 420.

Where, in legal proceedings, from the facts in evidence, the result can be reached by an exact process of rational reasoning adopted in the investigation of proof, it becomes an ultimate fact, to be found as such. Levins v. Rovegno, 12 Pac. 161, 162, 164, 71 Cal. 278.

In an action in which a partnership was alleged and an accounting prayed, the partnership being in issue, and the trial court having found "that there was no partnership between plaintiff and defendants as charged in the complaint," the court said: "The fact that there was a partnership is the ultimate fact alleged in the complaint. There are certain acts and conditions and circumstances set out in the complaint, from which this ultimate fact is deduced; that is, there is in the complaint much detail of mere evidentiary facts. The material issue of fact is, however, was there a partnership? and the findings respond to this issue. This was the ultimate fact to be ascertained, and it is none the less a finding of fact because drawn as a conclusion from other facts." Kahn v. Central Smelting Co., 2 Utah, 371, 375, 376.

"Ultimate facts," as used in a statute making it the duty of the clerk of the court in which a suit is commenced to issue a writ of attachment on the filing by the plaintiff of an affidavit stating the ultimate facts, means the ground of attachment in manner and form as expressed by the statute. First Nat. Bank v. Swan, 23 Pac. 743, 747, 3 Wyo. 356.

"Ultimate facts" are, when considered with reference to the facts or evidence by which they are established or proved, but the logical results of the proofs, or, in other words, mere conclusions of fact, as, in an action for negligence, a finding that the plaintiff did not use ordinary care to avoid injury, or that the defendant was not guilty of willful or wanton injury, or, in an action for fraud, a finding that the evidence does not show fraud. Caywood v. Farrell, 51 N. E. 775, 776, 175 Ill. 480.

"Ultimate," as used in Code Iowa 1873, § 2807, providing that a special verdict must present the ultimate facts as established by the evidence, the fact found must be one inhering in, and one necessary to determine in arriving at, the general verdict. Read v. State Ins. Co., 72 N. W. 665, 668, 103 Iowa, 307, 64 Am. St. Rep. 180.

ULTIMATE PAYMENT.

The word "ultimate" means at last, finally, or at the end; so that a guaranty of ultimate payment will permit extension of credit to the principal debtor. Cambria Iron Co. v. Keynes, 47 N. E. 548, 550, 56 Ohio St. 501.

To guaranty, in addition to full and prompt payment, the "ultimate payment," can have no other meaning than that the obligor should continue bound to the end of all substitutions, renewals, and extensions. Gay v. Ward, 84 Atl. 1025, 1026, 67 Conn. 147, 32 L. R. A. 818.

A bond in which the obligor guaranteed the full, prompt, and "ultimate payment" of all promissory notes, imported that the relation of borrower and lender would continue during a long period of time—for years. "The parties contemplated that, though the lending would be in form on the comparatively short time customary to a bank, yet in fact the borrower would long continue to be such by renewal or extension, and the bond is formed to meet such a contingency. To 'guaranty full and prompt payment' would meet the case of a note on usual bank time actually to be paid in full at maturity. To guaranty, in addition to 'full and prompt payment,' the 'ultimate payment,' can have no other meaning than that the obligor should continue bound to the end of all substitutions, renewals, and extensions." National Exch. Bank v. Gay, 17 Atl. 555, 556, 57 Conn. 224, 17 L. R. A. 343.

ULTIMATELY.

A guaranty reciting, "I will be ultimately accountable to you for the sum of $150, if H. shall purchase goods of you and shall fail to pay you for them," means that, if H. should not comply with the terms of his engagement as to the payment for the goods purchased, then on due notice of the advances made on the faith of the guaranty he would be accountable and pay for such advances, not exceeding the limited amount, and does not mean that he would pay at some indefinite period. Seaver v. Bradley, 6 Me. (6 Greenl.) 60, 64.

ULTRA VIRES.

An act is said to be ultra vires when it is not within the scope of the powers of the corporation to perform it under any circumstances, or for any purpose. An act is also sometimes said to be ultra vires with reference to the rights of certain parties when the corporation is not authorized to perform it without their consent, or with reference to some specific purpose when it is not authorized to perform it for that purpose, although fully within the scope of the general powers of the corporation, with the consent of the parties interested, or for some other purpose. Miners' Ditch Co. v. Zellerbach, 37 Cal. 543, 578, 99 Am. Dec. 300 (quoted in McPherson v. Foster, 43 Iowa, 48, 65, 22 Am. Rep. 215); Field v. City of Shawnee, 54 Pac. 318, 319, 7 Okl. 73.

The expression "ultra vires" is used to express either that the act of the directors or officers is in excess of their authority as agents of the corporation, or that the act of a majority of the stockholders is in violation of the rights of the minority, or that the act has not been done in conformity with the requirements of the charter, or that the act is one that the corporation itself has not the capacity to do, as being in excess of its corporate powers. In its legitimate use the expression should be applied only to the latter class of cases. Depue, J., in a dissenting opinion in Camden & A. R. Co. v. May's Landing & E. H. C. R. Co., 7 Atl. 523, 531, 48 N. J. Law (19 Vroom) 530.

The term "ultra vires," as applied to the acts of a corporation, is used in two different senses: First, as to the state, meaning an act which transcends the power conferred by law on the corporation; something which is not within the scope of the powers of a corporation to perform under any circumstances or for any purpose, as, for example, where a corporation authorized only to build a railroad engages in banking. This is the primary and really only proper sense of the term. But it is also used in a secondary sense, as something beyond the power of the majority to bind dissenting stockholders or something in violation of the legal rights of creditors, and sometimes in the sense merely of something beyond the authority of corporate agents or executive officers. The primary meaning of the term applies only when the public is concerned. The secondary meaning, when the question is between the corporation and its shareholders, or creditors, or other parties dealing with it, or between it and its agent or executive officer. Minnesota Thresher Mfg. Co. v. Langdon, 46 N. W. 310, 312, 44 Minn. 37.

The doctrine of ultra vires, as now interpreted by the courts and applied to corporations, signifies merely such acts and doings of any corporation which, though it may have the power to perform or adopt and sanction through its agents or servants, yet it has no legal authority to do under its charter of corporate powers. In the same sense precisely every act performed by a natural person which the law does not sanction, nor confer on him any right to do, would be illegal, and might be termed ultra vires. In the well-considered case of State v. Morris & E. R. Co., 23 N. J. Law (3 Zab.) 360, 368, the whole subject is ably reviewed and the modern doctrine clearly expressed. Denver & R. G. Ry. Co. v. Harris, 2 Pac. 369, 370, 371, 3 N. M. (3 Gil.) 114.

Ultra vires contracts of a corporation are such as do not in any manner serve the accomplishment of the purposes for which the corporation is chartered. They are contracts not positively forbidden, but impliedly forbidden, because not expressly or impliedly authorized. Tourtlot v. Whithed, 84 N. W. 8, 13, 9 N. D. 407.

A contract of a corporation which is ultra vires in the proper sense—that is to say, outside the object of its creation, as defined in the law of its organization, and therefore beyond the powers conferred on it by the Legislature—is not voidable only, but is wholly void, and of no legal effect. The objection to such a contract is not merely that the corporation ought not to have made it, but that it could not make it; i. e., had no power to make it. Therefore a contract cannot be ratified by either party, nor can performance on either side give rise to any obligations thereunder. Central Transp. Co. v. Pullman's Palace Car Co., 11 Sup. Ct. 478, 488, 139 U. S. 24, 35 L. Ed. 55; Durkee v. People, 155 Ill. 354, 40 N. E. 626, 46 Am. St. Rep. 340; National Home Bldg. & Loan Ass'n v. Home Sav. Bank, 54 N. E. 619, 621, 181 Ill. 35, 64 L. R. A. 399, 72 Am. St. Rep. 245; California Bank v. Kennedy, 167 U. S. 362, 367, 17 Sup. Ct. 831, 833, 42 L. Ed. 198; Directors, etc., of Ashbury Ry. Carriage & Iron Co. v. Riche, L. R. 7 H. L. 653; First Nat. Bank v. American Nat. Bank, 72 S. W. 1059, 1061, 173 Mo. 153; G. V. B. Min. Co. v. First Nat. Bank of Halley (U. S.) 95 Fed. 23, 33, 36 C. C. A. 633.

The term "ultra vires" is used to designate the acts of corporations beyond the scope of their powers as defined by their charters or acts of incorporation. So, whether with strict propriety or not, the term is also used in different sense. Thus an act is said to be ultra vires when it is not within the scope of the powers of the corporation to perform it under any circumstances or for any purpose. When an act is ultra vires in this sense, it is generally, if not always, void in toto. Anderson v. Cleburne Bldg. & Loan Ass'n (Tex.) 16 S. W. 298, 300.

An ultra vires act or contract on the part of the corporation, as not being within the powers conferred on it or within the object of its creation, is void. Lightcap v. Bradley, 58 N. E. 221, 223, 186 Ill. 510 (citing Lurton v. Jacksonville Loan & Building Ass'n, 58 N. E. 218, 219, 187 Ill. 141).

An act is "ultra vires" a corporation when it is beyond and outside of the scope of the powers conferred by its founders, when the corporation is without authority to perform it under any circumstances or for any purpose. Under the United States statutes national banks have the power to increase their capital to such a limit as may be approved by the Comptroller of the Currency, and where stockholders have assented to an increase they cannot set up any defects or irregularities in the exercise of the power as a defense in an action to enforce their liability. Latimer v. Bard (U. S.) 76 Fed. 538, 543.

If a wrongful act by a city be not ultra vires, it may be the foundation of an action of tort against it. The term "ultra vires" is used in this connection in the sense of meaning an act which both extrinsically and in its external aspects is under all circumstances wholly and necessarily beyond the possible scope of the charter powers of the municipality. Commercial Electric Light & Power Co. v. City of Tacoma, 55 Pac. 219, 220, 20 Wash. 288, 72 Am. St. Rep. 103 (quoting Dillon, Mun. Corp.).

A case of "ultra vires" is where an existing corporation attempts to act on some subject-matter not within its charter powers. The fact that a corporation, whose charter provides that "25 per cent. of the capital stock shall be paid in before said company can exercise the privileges and powers granted," enters into a contract for the construction of necessary works for the corporation before the 25 per cent. has been paid in, does not release one from his subscription for stock of the corporation; the act not being ultra vires. Naugatuck Water Co. v. Nichols, 58 Conn. 403, 409, 20 Atl. 315, 8 L. R. A. 637.

The directors of a corporation are wholly without authority to enter into a contract bad in itself, and such a contract is ultra vires. In re Bumm's Estate, 8 Pa. Dist. Ct. R. 191, 197.

Illegality distinguished.

"Ultra vires" and "illegality" represent totally different and distinct ideas. It is true a contract may have both these defects, but it may also have one without the other. For example, a bank has no authority to engage, and usually does not engage, in benevolent enterprises. A subscription made by authority of the board of directors, and under the corporate seal, for the building of a church or college or almshouse, would be clearly ultra vires, but it would not be illegal. Bissell v. Michigan Southern & N. L. R. Co., 22 N. Y. 258, 262. The distinction is drawn in some of the states that, when an executed contract is merely ultra vires—that is, without authority—a suit can be maintained to enforce it, but that, where the act is prohibited by statute or the terms of the charter, it cannot be enforced; but it is unnecessary for us to discuss or express an opinion on this distinction. Whatever may be the difference of opinion on this subject, the tendency of the courts of the different states, as well as the Supreme Court of the United States, is to look with disfavor upon the defense of ultra vires set up against a contract executed in whole or in part. In the case of Ohio & M. R. R. Co. v. McCarthy, 96 U. S. 258, 24 L. Ed. 693, it is stated that "the doctrine of ultra vires, when invoked for or against a corporation, should not be allowed to prevail, where it would defeat the ends of justice or work a legal wrong." The fact that a contract entered into by a county was ultra vires was held no defense to an action by the county to recover the consideration by the contractor or the failure of the latter to perform. Edwards County v. Jennings (Tex.) 33 S. W. 585, 586.

ULTRAMARINE BLUE.

"Ultramarine blue" is imported in the form of powder, of little lumps or drops, and in pulp. The pulp is a thick paste, which is made by grinding the ultramarine in water, and is used to produce a high gloss upon paper hangings. It is sold by the pound, but the price is produced in accordance with the quantity of water contained in it. It is dutiable under Act Oct. 1, 1890, par. 55, on the full weight of the paste, and not on the weight of the ultramarine contained therein when dry. United States v. Zentgraf (U. S.) 60 Fed. 1014, 1015, 9 C. C. A. 335.

UMPIRE.

An umpire is one who takes on himself the decision, after arbitrators have disagreed. Haven v. Winnisimmet Co., 93 Mass. (11 Allen) 377, 383, 87 Am. Dec. 723.

An umpire is a person whom two arbitrators select to decide the question in controversy, in regard to which the arbitrators are unable to agree. Ingraham v. Whitmore, 75 Ill. 24, 30.

"The word 'umpire,' in common signification, denotes one who is to decide the controversy in case arbitrators cannot agree; and hence a submission 'to two arbitrators and their umpire,' or 'two and their umpire,' in case of disagreement, means precisely the same thing." Tyler v. Webb, 49 Ky. (10 B. Mon.) 123.

Where an umpire has been duly appointed, and in consequence of a disagreement of the arbitrators has entered on the performance of his duties, the authority to make a final decision on all the matters embraced in a submission is vested exclusively in him. The original powers of the arbitrators have ceased to exist, they being functi officio. Lyon v. Blossom, 11 N. Y. Super. Ct. (4 Duer) 313, 325.

As contained in an agreement between the insurer and the insured to submit to arbitration the amount of damage suffered by fire, and providing that each party should appoint an arbitrator by whom the loss should be estimated and appraised in detail, "together with a third person, to be selected by them, who shall act as umpire to decide between them in the matters of difference only, and the said three persons, or any two of them, shall true return and award make," does not constitute such third person a third arbitrator to act with the other two in making the estimate. Hartford Fire Ins. Co. v. Bonner Mercantile Co. (U. S.) 56 Fed. 378, 381, 5 C. C. A. 524.

UNABLE.

Unable to attend to his duties.

St. Okl. 1893, c. 22, art. 5, § 9, authorizing the district courts to appoint county attorneys in case the regular county attorney shall be absent from the court or "unable to attend to his duties," will be construed to mean some physical or mental incapacity to perform the duties of county attorney, and not competency or incompetency of the attorney. Mahaffey v. Territory, 66 Pac. 342, 345, 11 Okl. 213.

Unable to find goods or chattels.

A return on an execution that the officer is unable to find any goods or chattels of the within-named defendants is equivalent to the technical phrase "no goods," and shows that there was no personal property which the officer could find on which to levy. Treptow v. Buse, 10 Kan. 170, 178.

Unable to pay his debts.

The phrase "unable to pay his debts" means presently unable so to do, and is a different thing from alleging that the property of a man, taken at a fair valuation, is not sufficient to pay his debts. Martin v. Bigelow, 78 N. Y. Supp. 443, 445, 36 Misc. Rep. 298.

Unable to support himself.

A covenant to support a certain person when he should become "unable" to support himself means that the obligor should respond for the covenantee's needs only when the necessity therefor arose, and such person is not entitled to support when he has enough property in his hands to support himself for a year. Burcham v. Burcham, 40 N. E. 28, 12 Ind. App. 625.

Unable to take care of themselves.

Act Aug. 3, 1882, c. 376, 22 Stat. 214 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1288], authorizing the commissioners of immigration to examine into the condition of passengers arriving in any ship or vessel, and if on such examination there shall be found any persons "unable to take care of themselves" without becoming a public charge, they shall report the same in writing to the collector of the port, and such person shall not be allowed to land, does not mean an inability in reference to the passenger's personal efforts alone; but all the means of care or support that are provided for the passenger must be taken into account, and the law only intends those that are likely to become a public charge because they cannot take care of themselves and are not under the charge or protection of any other person who by natural relation or by assumed responsibility furnishes reasonable assurance that they will not become a charge upon the public. In re Day (U. S.) 27 Fed. 678, 681.

UNADJUSTED.

See, also, "Adjust."

The term "unadjusted," as applied to a demand, signifies that the amount is uncertain and not agreed on. Richardson v. Woodbury, 43 Me. 206, 214.

UNADMINISTERED.

"Unadministered assets," as used in Act Cong. Feb. 20, 1846, declaring that the court may require "assets or estate of the decedent which remain unadministered" to be delivered to the newly appointed administrator, meant assets or estate remaining in specie and unchanged in form; that being the well-settled signification of the words, unless the contrary appears. United States v. Walker, 3 Sup. Ct. 277, 281, 109 U. S. 258, 27 L. Ed. 927.

UNALIENABLE RIGHT.

An "unalienable right," within the meaning of the Constitution, is in its nature one which cannot be surrendered to government or society because no equivalent can be received for it, and one which neither the government nor society can take away because they can give no equivalent; one of the natural, essential, and inherent rights which belong to all men, and not only that, but an unalienable right, which a man cannot surrender, and which neither government nor society can take from him, as declared in Const. art. 5. Every individual has a natural and unalienable right to worship God according to the dictates of his own conscience and reason, and it is also his natural and unalienable right not to be hurt, molested, or restrained in his personal liberty or estate for worshiping God in the manner and season most agreeable to the dictates of his own conscience, or for his religious profession, sentiments, or persuasion, provided he does not disturb others. Hale v. Everett, 53 N. H. 9, 60, 16 Am. Rep. 82.

UNANIMOUS.

A quorum of four judges holding an Appellate Division are in contemplation of law the Appellate Division, and the unanimous vote of affirmance is a compliance with the provision of Code Civ. Proc. § 191, subsec. 2, providing that a unanimous affirmance in certain cases shall be final, unless a question of law is certified or leave to appeal given. Harroun v. Brush Electric Light Co., 46 N. E. 291, 292, 152 N. Y. 212, 38 L. R. A. 615.

A "unanimous reversal" by the Appellate Term differs from a "unanimous affirmance," in that the latter involves the conclusion that there was sufficient evidence to sustain the facts, whereas the former may be based on the facts as well as the law, though, if the decision does not so state in express terms, the Court of Appeals is obliged to presume, for the sole purpose of reviewing the questions of law, that it was on the law only. People v. Sutphin, 59 N. E. 770, 771, 166 N. Y. 163.

UNANSWERABLE EVIDENCE.

Conclusive or unanswerable evidence is that which the law does not permit to be contradicted; for example, the record of a court of competent jurisdiction cannot be contradicted by the parties to it. Code Civ. Proc. Cal. 1903, § 1837.

UNAPPROPRIATED.

"Unappropriated," as used in the general laws of the United States of 1881, authorizing the holders of scrip known as "Valentine scrip" to enter unappropriated lands of the United States, would include land until it had been surveyed, though squatters had settled thereon, but had taken no measures to procure title. Ferry v. Street, 7 Pac. 712, 714, 4 Utah, 521.

UNASCERTAINED.

"Unascertained duties" are payments to a collector of customs in gross on an estimate as to amount, and where the merchant on a final liquidation will be entitled by law to allowances or deductions which do not depend on the rate of duty charged, but on the ascertainment of the quantity of the article subject to duty. In this class of payments no question of law is in general supposed to arise between the merchant and the government. The payment of unascertained duties by the merchant, in order to obtain the permit to land his goods, is made without reference to the nature or character of the questions that may arise before the appraisers, measurers, or weighers, or the collector, and affords time to those officers to ascertain the quality, quantity, weight, or measure, and also the rate or amount of duty to be paid, while at the same time the merchant acquires possession of the bulk of his shipment and may deal with the goods as his own. The payment is but preliminary and indefinite, a sum in gross and by estimate, intended to be large enough to cover the actual legal amount of duty when ascertained. The ascertainment of the duty is subsequently made in conformity with the report of the proper custom house officers, the money in hand is applied, and any balance found on liquidation over and above the legal duties is refunded to the merchant. Moke v. Barney (U. S.) 17 Fed. Cas. 574, 575.

UNASSIGNED.

For the purpose of the chapter relating to volunteer forces, the term "unassigned battalion" shall apply to a battalion not attached to a regiment, and the term "unassigned company" to a company not attached to a regiment or battalion. Code Ga. 1895, § 1109.

UNAUTHORIZED.

In commenting on the dictum of Judge Cobb in Vose v. Muller, 23 Neb. 171, 36 N. W. 583, to the effect that the unauthorized drinking of intoxicating liquors should be held per se to vitiate a verdict, the court say: "Probably the court in that case meant by 'unauthorized' the procurement of liquors without the court's authorization by jurors sitting as such, either during court sessions or in deliberation upon a case submitted." Ankeny v. Rawhouser, 95 N. W. 1053, 1054, 2 Neb. (Unof.) 32.

UNAUTHORIZED BY LAW.

The phrase "unauthorized by law," as found in statutes relative to insurance made by companies unauthorized by law, means prohibited by law. Fire Department of City of New York v. Stanton, 51 N. Y. Supp. 242, 243, 23 App. Div. 334.

UNAVOIDABLE.

The word "unavoidable," in an allegation in a complaint against a railroad for injury that the engine and car on which the plaintiff was riding when injured were unavoidably run and driven on the track on which the defendant had negligently left open the switch, means that with the exercise of ordinary care the running on such track was unavoidable. The word does not mean "inevitable," and thus require a high degree of care to be shown to entitle plaintiff to recover. Chicago & A. R. Co. v. Harrington, 61 N. E. 622, 628, 192 Ill. 9.

A collision, which would excuse a common carrier for failure to deliver goods, must be such as could not be avoided by human prudence and skill. In other words, it must be the effect of the vi divina; the operation of wind and waves, combined to a degree not to be resisted by human skill or forethought, as if two vessels meet in a storm at night, or even in the day, when there is clearly no blame attributed to either side. By the law of England, if it appears to have been unavoidable, without fault in any one, the owner of a ship or cargo damaged must bear the loss; but, when resulting from the want of diligence or skill in either, it makes the common carrier liable. If the captain of the vessel which causes the injury be in fault, he is answerable to the owners of the injured vessel, and they to the persons for whom they carry. Blythe's Ex'rs v. Marsh (S. C.) 1 McCord, 360, 365.

Where, by reason of a buoy being displaced by some supposed natural cause 10 or 15 days before, a vessel, relying upon such buoy being in its proper position, was stranded, the court, in considering whether such accident was the result of an unavoidable peril of the sea, which would exempt a carrier from liability for loss of goods, said: "The owners are liable for every injury that might have been prevented by human foresight. Is there anything in the shifting of the buoy proximately and immediately causing unavoidable loss? On the contrary, has it more than a remote bearing upon the loss, or such as may excuse the captain personally? Take the nearest analogous cases for illustration. Two vessels come into collision in a dense fog. Here the fog is the immediate, natural, and culpable cause of the collision. A shoal unexpectedly changes its bed, and a ship grounds upon it. Here the unknown shoal is the immediate and sole cause of the stranding. The same may be justly said of unknown snags or sawyers in river navigation. In all such cases the cause of the loss is unseen and inevitable, and a blow is struck against which the power of man cannot guard the vessel. Such are the blows that are within the unavoidable perils of the sea, and 'which have too familiarly,' said Judge Story, 'been called the acts of God, in contradistinction to human acts.' It is difficult in many cases to lay down the plain cause of demarcation, especially where, as in this case, the carrier has a reasonable excuse for his not using great sagacity and great human exertion. The captain was probably surprised upon discovering where the buoy floated, and at his own mistake in being altogether governed by it. But human pains might have guarded against such surprise and mistake. He might have suspected the removal of the buoy, and not gone on relying upon it as far as he did, and then, when it was too late, discovering that he was in shallow water, changed his course. Great sagacity and human caution might have done so before." Reaves v. Waterman (S. C.) 2 Spears, 197, 208.

A storm is "unavoidable," in the sense that it cannot be prevented. Newport News & M. V. Co. v. United States (U. S.) 61 Fed. 488, 490, 9 C. C. A. 579.

UNAVOIDABLE ACCIDENT.

Act of God distinguished, see "Act of God."

An "unavoidable accident," is one which occurs without any apparent cause; at least, without fault attributable to any one. Clyde v. Richmond & D. R. Co. (U. S.) 59 Fed. 394 399.

Where an accident occurs without the negligence of either party, it is known as an "unavoidable accident." Galveston, H. & S. A. R. Co. v. Gormley (Tex.) 35 S. W. 488, 489.

"By common acceptance 'unavoidable accident' means a casualty which happens when all the means which common prudence suggests have been used to prevent it." Hodgson v. Dexter (U. S.) 12 Fed. Cas. 283.

An unavoidable accident is an act of God; that is, any accident produced by physical causes which are inevitable, such as lightning, storms, perils of the sea, earthquakes, inundations, sudden death, or illness. Fish v. Chapman, 2 Ga. (2 Kelly) 849, 356, 46 Am. Dec. 393.

"Unavoidable accident" means that there must be a vis major and that the interfering cause was irresistible, since, if by any care, prudence, or foresight the accident could have been guarded against, it was not unavoidable. Central Line of Boats v. Lowe, 50 Ga. 509, 511.

"Unavoidable accident," is defined in And. Law Dict. p. 13, as an accident which results from human agency, but is unavoidable under the circumstances. Dreyer v. People, 58 N. E. 620, 623, 188 Ill. 40, 58 L. R. A. 869.

"Unavoidable accidents," within the meaning of an exception in a bill of lading exempting the carrier from liability for unavoidable accidents, is not limited to unavoidable accidents occurring on the line of the first carrier, if the bill of lading is a through bill of lading, calling for transportation over connecting lines. Maghee v. Camden & A. R. Transp. Co., 45 N. Y. 514, 519, 6 Am. Rep. 124.

Act March 2, 1799, c. 128, § 27, providing that if, after the arrival of any ship laden with foreign goods bound to the United States within the limits of any of the districts of the United States or within four leagues of the coast thereof, any part of the cargo shall be unladen for any purpose whatsoever from out of such ship, before such ship shall come to the proper place for the discharge of her cargo, or some part thereof, etc., the goods unladen shall be forfeited and lost, except in case of some "unavoidable accident, necessity, or distress of weather," means any unavoidable accident or necessity arising from any other cause, as well as from distress of weather. United States v. Hayward (U. S.) 26 Fed. Cas. 240, 249.

Rev. St. c. 120, § 11, declares that if any action is duly commenced on a note within six years, and the writ fails of sufficient service or return by any unavoidable accident, or by default or neglect of the officer, etc., the plaintiff may commence a new action. Held, that the term "unavoidable accident" must have a reasonable construction, and does not limit the case to a cause or accident which no possible diligence could guard against, but means simply an unforeseen cause preventing the service of the writ, where due diligence has been used by the creditor to commence his suit seasonably by the due and ordinary course of law; and hence, where the creditor seasonably commenced his suit, and placed his writ, as he believed or had good reason to believe, in the hands of a proper officer for service, but by mistake described the residence of the debtor as he had known it, and as it was until within a short time before, when he had changed it to another town and county, of which the plaintiff had no knowledge, and which the officer did not immediately discover, such mistake was an unavoidable accident, within the meaning of the statute. Bullock v. Dean, 53 Mass. (12 Metc.) 15, 17.

"When we speak of an unavoidable accident in legal phraseology, we do not mean an accident which it was physically impossible in the nature of things for the defendants to have prevented; all that is meant is that it was not occasioned in any degree, either remotely or directly, by the want of such care or skill as the law holds every man down to exercise." Dyvert v. Bradley (N. Y.) 8 Wend. 469, 473.

"Unavoidable accident," sufficient to relieve a vessel from liability for collision, is a disaster or casualty happening from natural causes, without negligence or fault on either side, and if both parties have endeavored by every means in their power, with due care and caution and with a proper display of nautical skill, to prevent the occurrence of the accident. Sampson v. United States, 12 Ct. Cl. 480, 491 (citing Union S. S. Co. v. New York & V. S. S. Co., 65 U. S. [24 How.] 307, 16 L. Ed. 699).

The words "unavoidable accidents," as used in a bill of lading signed by a common carrier, exempting it from liability for unavoidable accidents, do not limit or restrict its liability in any way. Seligman v. Armijo, 1 N. M. 459, 463.

"Unavoidable accident," as used in Rev. St. c. 81, § 87, authorizing the commencement of a new suit after the expiration of the period of limitations, where a former writ has failed of a sufficient service by unavoidable accident, is not satisfied by the failure of the mails to carry a writ to a certain destination in time for service, when the writ has been in the hands of the plaintiff for ample time prior to its transmission to have been served. "That cannot be deemed an unavoidable accident that could have been so easily avoided." Marble v. Hinds, 67 Me. 203, 205.

The ignition of a combustible substance lying along the track of a railroad, by sparks dropped by a passing engine, is not an unavoidable accident. Flynn v. San Francisco & S. J. R. Co., 40 Cal. 14, 19, 6 Am. Rep. 695.

The destruction of the crops of a tenant by overflows is an unavoidable accident, within the meaning of Civ. Code, art. 2719, providing that the lessee must deliver a new lease to the lessor at the expiration of the term on the same condition on which it was taken possession of, making necessary allowances for "unavoidable accidents," unavoidable accidents being those accidents which are not attributable to the lessee, or to members of his family, or to any sublessee. Payne v. James, 12 South. 492, 493, 45 La. Ann. 381.

Where a man shoots at a fox, and thereby unintentionally kills a dog, it is not such an unavoidable accident as will excuse him from liability. Wright v. Clark, 50 Vt. 130, 135, 28 Am. Rep. 496.

As used in a contract binding defendant to deliver to plaintiff at his stable 5,000 bushels of corn and 50,000 pounds of fodder as early next fall as the same will be dry enough to house, unavoidable accidents only excepted, related to the time when the grain and fodder should be delivered, and hence it was no defense to an action for failure to deliver that, owing to an unusual drouth during the season, defendant's crop fell short, so that he did not raise sufficient to supply his own plantation and fill his contract with the plaintiff; such fact not amounting to unavoidable accident. McGehee v. Hill (Ala.) 4 Port. 170, 175, 29 Am. Dec. 277.

"Unavoidable accident" is an event from an unknown cause, or an unusual or unexpected event from a known cause. Where a person who had stepped into a freight car to unload freight stepped off such car when it was moved by an engine, and fell and broke his hip, the accident will not be deemed an unavoidable one, as it might have been reasonably anticipated by the injured person. Smith v. Southern Ry. Co., 40 S. E. 86, 87, 129 N. C. 374.

In an action for damages resulting from the collision of canal boats, the court said. "The rule in such cases is that, if the injury is occasioned by an unavoidable accident, no action will lie for it; but if any blame is imputable to the defendant, though he had no intention to injure the plaintiff or any other person, he is liable for the damages sustained. * * * When we speak of an 'unavoidable' accident in legal phraseology, we do not mean an accident which it was physically impossible in the nature of things for the defendant to have prevented. All that is meant is that it was not occasioned in any degree, either remotely or directly, by the want of such care or skill as the law holds every man bound to exercise." Dygart v. Bradley (N. Y.) 8 Wend. 469, 472, 473.

Inevitable accident synonyms.

"Unavoidable accident," as used in a bill of lading, instead of the usual expression, "inevitable accident," does not vary the meaning of the instrument, or change the liability of the carrier, but is a synonym of the latter expression. Fowler v. Davenport, 21 Tex. 626, 631.

"Unavoidable accident" is usually termed "inevitable accident," and a defense that an injury was the result of an "unavoidable accident" cannot be sustained when the disaster was caused by negligence, and negligence may be predicated of failure to furnish a seaworthy vessel. Haulenbeck v. Hunt, 63 N. Y. Supp. 406, 408, 49 App. Div. 47.

UNAVOIDABLE CASUALTY.

The phrase "unavoidable casualty," as used in leases, has a well-settled meaning.

It does not signify a mere want of repair arising from lapse of time or improper use of premises, neither does it include any injuries which may happen by reason of the common and ordinary use and occupation of the leased or adjoining premises. The term has a much more restricted meaning, and comprehends only damage or destruction arising from supervening and uncontrollable force or accident. By a strict definition it signifies events or accidents which human prudence, foresight, and sagacity cannot prevent. Tays v. Ecker, 24 S. W. 954, 955, 6 Tex. Civ. App. 188 (citing Welles v. Castles, 69 Mass. [3 Gray] 323, 325).

Where a lease of factory property contained a provision that in case the buildings or any part thereof should be destroyed or damaged by "unavoidable casualty," so that the same shall be rendered unfit for use and occupation, then the rent should be abated, etc., the giving away of two steam boilers on the premises while in use on low pressure and with moderate fire, so that they had to be replaced by others, which caused a closing down of the factory for three weeks, such accident should be construed to be an unavoidable casualty, within the meaning of such words as used in the condition in the lease. Phillips v. Sun Dyeing, Bleaching & Calendering Co., 10 R. I. 458, 461.

Events or accidents which human prudence, foresight, and sagacity cannot prevent are included within the term, "unavoidable casualty." Crystal Spring Distillery Co. v. Cox (U. S.) 49 Fed. 555, 559, 1 C. C. A. 365 (citing Welles v. Castles, 69 Mass. [3 Gray] 323, 325).

An unavoidable casualty is an event or casualty happening against the will and without the negligence or other default of a party. Hodgson v. Dexter (U. S.) 12 Fed. Cas. 283.

"Unavoidable casualty," as used in a lease, providing that the lessee should not be liable for payment of rent in case the buildings were destroyed by an unavoidable casualty, means an unexpected occurrence not contemplated in the making of the contract. Phillips v. Sun Dyeing, Bleaching & Calendering Co., 10 R. I. 458, 460.

"Unavoidable casualty," is used in a lease exempting a lessee from the payment of rent in case of damage to or destruction of the premises by unavoidable casualty, "does not signify a mere want of repair arising from lapse of time or improper use of the premises, nor from trespasses or nuisances occasioned by the acts of the tenants or from the acts of third persons, nor does it include any injuries which may happen by reason of the common or ordinary use of the estate leased or adjoining premises. The term has a much more restricted meaning, and comprehends only damage or destruction arising from a supervening and uncontrollable force or accident. By a strict definition, as applied to the subject-matter, it signifies events or accidents which human prudence and sagacity cannot prevent." Welles v. Castles, 69 Mass. (3 Gray) 323, 325.

As used in Code Ohio, § 534, providing that a judgment may be vacated after the term at which it was obtained for "unavoidable casualty or misfortune" preventing the party from prosecuting or defending, means accidental injury or sickness, etc., rather than a want of knowledge of the service of a summons because of the defendant's absence from the state. Howard v. Abbey, 2 Ohio Dec. 64, 65.

UNAVOIDABLE DANGER.

An exception of "unavoidable danger" in a contract of a common carrier does not limit his responsibility to the exercise of ordinary care and diligence. It may be doubtful whether the exception of "unavoidable danger" properly means more than unavoidable accidents, or such acts as the law has allowed to be in excuse. Fire cannot be considered an unavoidable danger, but is one to which, from the very nature of transportation by rail, it was to be expected the goods were to be exposed. Union Mutual Ins. Co. v. Indianapolis, A. & C. R. Co., 12 Ohio Dec. 745, 1 Disn. 480.

"Unavoidable dangers," as used in a bill of lading whereby a common carrier by water contracted to deliver goods safely and in good order, the "unavoidable dangers of river navigation and fire excepted," has been treated by numerous courts, judges, and writers as exactly equivalent to the common-law exception of the "act of God." Some treat them as identical terms, for the purpose of making "unavoidable accident" mean "act of God" in the sense of a sudden and violent act of nature, as lightning, tempests, etc., while others make them equivalent for the purpose of making "act of God" mean any accident which the carrier cannot by proper care, foresight, and skill avoid. It is impossible to define "unavoidable accident" by excluding the element of the intervention of man. Accident may be legally inevitable or unavoidable, though there be the intervention of man having some influence in it. The term "unavoidable accident," as used in the ordinary exceptions in bills of lading, has a much larger sphere than that which is attributed to the term "act of God." When a bill of lading provides that the carrier shall not be liable for the "unavoidable dangers" of navigation, it means dangers that are unavoidable by the carrier, supposing him to have exercised all the precaution, care, and skill that the law usually demands of common carriers. It means that he shall not be answerable as an insurer against accidents which the law regards as inevitable, and hence he is not liable for loss caused by a collision which was unavoidable by him. Hays v. Kennedy, 41 Pa. (5 Wright) 378, 379, 80 Am. Dec. 627.

"Unavoidable dangers and accidents of the road," as used in a bill of lading for the carriage of goods by a common carrier, excepting him from liability for injuries from the unavoidable dangers and accidents of the road, is synonymous with "acts of God," and hence does not restrict the general liability of a common carrier. Walpole v. Bridges (Ind.) 5 Blackf. 222.

"Unavoidable dangers of the river," as used in a bill of lading which excuses a common carrier from liability for loss occasioned by unavoidable dangers of the river, includes only those dangers which result from unavoidable accident, and would not include dangers arising by reason of the negligence or ignorance of the master or crew of a vessel. The Ocean Wave (U. S.) 18 Fed. Cas. 566, 567.

Where a policy insuring a steamboat recites that the insurer assumes the unavoidable dangers of the river, and that it should be free from all loss caused by barratry, the fact that the boat was stranded by carelessness and unskillfulness of the master would not preclude a recovery, in the absence of fraud in some officer, particularly when the word "unavoidable" does not refer to the duties of those in charge of the boat, but to such perils which are incident to navigation and from their nature are inseparable from it. Louisville Underwriters v. Pence, 19 S. W. 10, 12, 93 Ky. 96, 14 Ky. Law Rep. 21, 40 Am. St. Rep. 176.

UNAVOIDABLE INTERRUPTION.

Where a contract between a telegraph company and the sender of a message exempts the company from liability for "unavoidable interruptions in the working of its lines," such phrase means an interruption that could not be avoided. Kirby v. Western Union Tel. Co., 55 N. W. 759, 760, 762, 4 S. D. 105, 30 L. R. A. 612, 621, 624, 46 Am. St. Rep. 765.

UNAVOIDABLY PREVENTED.

Code, § 316, providing that a motion for a new trial must be made at the term at which the verdict or decision is rendered, and, except for the cause of newly discovered evidence, shall be within three days after the verdict or decision is rendered, unless "unavoidably prevented," refers to circumstances beyond the control of the party desiring to file the motion, and does not excuse mere neglect. Roggencamp v. Dobbs, 20 N. W. 100, 101, 15 Neb. 620.

UNBALANCED BID.

An "unbalanced bid" in public contracts is defined by the Century Dictionary to be a bid for the performance of a given work at specified rates for each of the various kinds of labor or material required, which, by being made on an erroneous estimate of quantities of each, appears, assuming these quantities to be correct, to be low in comparison with other bids, when a computation based on the true quantities would make the bid high. People v. McDonough, 83 N. Y. Supp. 125, 127, 85 App. Div. 162.

UNCERTAIN.

The word "uncertain" may include any doubt, whether reasonable or not. Nothing is absolutely certain that rests on the testimony of men, and where evidence is given to establish any proposition tending to prove guilt it is sufficient if it remove all reasonable doubt, so that an instruction that if the jury find that none but Chinese witnesses testified to the circumstances of the killing and as to the parties concerned in it, and the jury are in such doubt as to the credibility or truthfulness of such witnesses as to feel uncertain whether they should be believed, the defendant may be acquitted, may be properly refused. State v. Ah Lee, 7 Or. 237, 258.

In using the words "uncertain, speculative, and contingent," for the purpose of excluding that kind of damage, it is not meant to assert that the loss sustained must be proved with the certainty of a mathematical demonstration to have been the necessary result of the breach of covenant by defendant. The plaintiff is not bound to show to a certainty that excludes the possibility of doubt that the loss to him resulted from the action of defendant in violating his agreement. In many cases such proof cannot be given. Yet there might be a reasonable certainty, founded on inferences legitimately and properly deducible from the evidence, that the plaintiff's loss was not only in fact occasioned by defendant's violation of his covenant, but that such loss was the natural and proximate result of such violation. Certainty to a reasonable intent is necessary, and the meaning of the language is that the loss or damage must be so far removed from speculation or doubt as to create in the minds of intelligent and reasonable men the belief that it was most likely to follow from the breach of the contract, and was a probable and direct result thereof. United States Trust Co. v. O'Brien, 38 N. E. 266, 267, 143 N. Y. 284.

The word "uncertain," in Rev. St. art. 649, which provides that, if plaintiff's cause of action be a claim for unliquidated or uncertain damages founded on a tort or breach of covenant, the defendant shall not be permitted to set off any debt due him by plaintiff, does not characterize a demand for the conversion of a sum of money. Jones v. Hunt, 12 S. W. 832, 833, 74 Tex. 657.

Bankr. Act U. S. 1841, § 5, declares that all creditors whose debts are not due and payable until a future day, etc., or all persons having "uncertain or contingent demands" against a bankrupt, shall be permitted to come in and prove such debts or claims, and shall have the right, when their debts become absolute, to have the same allowed. Held, that the term "uncertain or contingent demands," as so used, did not include demands the existence of which depended on a contingency, but merely meant existing demands, the cause of action on which depended on a contingency. French v. Morse, 68 Mass. (2 Gray) 111, 112.

In matters of obligation, a thing is uncertain when the description is not that of an individual object, but designates only the kind, such as some corn, some wine, a horse. Civ. Code La. 1900, art. 3556, subd. 7.

UNCERTAINTY.

Webster defines that which is uncertain to be that which is doubtful, unsure, dubious. An instruction which declares that, if the evidence leaves a fact in a state of doubt and "uncertainty," then the jury must consider it as not proven, exacts too high a measure of proof. Rowe v. Baber, 8 South. 865, 866, 93 Ala. 422.

The word "uncertainty," as used in Code Civ. Proc. § 430, subd. 7, which provides that "uncertainty" in a complaint is a ground for demurrer, refers to the uncertainty defined by the authorities in pleading; and such authority does not include ambiguity. Kraner v. Halsey, 22 Pac. 1137, 1138, 82 Cal. 209.

UNCHASTE.

See, also, "Chaste."

An unchaste woman is "a sexually impure woman ordinarily." Foster v. Hanchett, 35 Atl. 316, 68 Vt. 319, 54 Am. St. Rep. 886.

Under Cr. Code, c. 4, § 12, declaring the carnal knowledge of a female child under the age of 18 with her consent to be rape, unless she was over 15 years of age and previously unchaste, the term "unchaste" does not require that she be a woman of notoriously lewd and lascivious habits, or that she must be a prostitute. Bailey v. State, 78 N. W. 284, 285, 57 Neb. 706, 73 Am. St. Rep. 540.

A woman is unchaste who has had unlawful intercourse, or is guilty of such conduct as would tend to indicate that she was ready and willing to submit to the unlawful embraces of a man. The embracing of a man and woman does not necessarily indicate unchastity, but words spoken of a woman charging that at a certain time and place the man was embracing her, and when discovered the parties seemed very much confused, etc., impute "unchastity," within the meaning of Code Civ. Proc. § 1906, providing that an action for words importing unchastity to a woman are actionable, without alleging special damage. Mason v. Stratton, 1 N. Y. Supp. 511, 512, 49 Hun, 606.

UNCLAIMED.

Laws 1899, p. 1294, c. 582, amending Railroad Law, Laws 1890, p. 1097, c. 565, § 46, provides that unclaimed live stock may be sold by any railroad without notice. Held, that the word "unclaimed" means unclaimed within a reasonable time after notice; and where a consignee of fish packed in ice failed to call for them for 54 hours, although two notices were sent to him, and he had ample opportunity to do so, the fish were properly regarded by the railroad as "unclaimed." Leech v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co., 83 N. Y. Supp. 166, 168, 40 Misc. Rep. 634.

UNCLE.

An "uncle" is defined to be the brother of a father or mother, and according to the common understanding there is no distinction between the whole and half blood. State v. Reedy, 24 Pac. 66, 67, 44 Kan. 190.

"Uncle," includes an uncle of the half blood. State v. Guiton, 24 South. 784, 785, 51 La. Ann. 155.

UNCOMPLETED.

Under the statute providing that it shall be lawful for any railroad company which shall have entered in good faith upon the work of constructing its road, and shall have become unable to complete the construction of the same or any part thereof, to sell and convey the whole, etc., to any other railroad company, not being a competing line, etc., a road is "uncompleted" where it has neither station house, side tracks, nor turntables, or rolling stock fit for use, and has leased what it used about as long as it could, and is unable to furnish what is necessary for its successful operation. Young v. Toledo & S. H. R. Co., 76 Mich. 485, 493, 43 N. W. 632, 635.

UNCOMPOUNDED MEDICINAL DRUG.

An "uncompounded medicinal drug," in pharmacy, is a drug not made up of two or more constituent drugs or chemicals, but a single drug as prepared without admixture for the pharmacist's use, and with no reference to its elementary chemical constitution, whether simple or compound. Iron, sulphur, or iodine are examples of simple chemical elements that are drugs when suitably prepared for medicinal use. Quinine, opium, etc., are common examples of single "uncompounded medicinal drugs," though compounds chemically considered. United States v. Stubbs (U. S.) 91 Fed. 608, 610.

UNCONDITIONAL.

A will giving to testator's wife all his interest in real estate, mortgages, notes "absolutely and unconditionally" means no more than that the wife should have the property without condition during the time in which she was to hold it. Kratz v. Kratz, 59 N. E. 519, 520, 189 Ill. 276.

UNCONDITIONAL AND SOLE OWNERSHIP.

"Unconditional and sole owner," as used in a policy of insurance which provided that, if the assured is not the "unconditional sole owner" of the property, this policy shall be void, includes a vendee in possession under an executory contract to purchase. Rumsey v. Phoenix Ins. Co. (U. S.) 1 Fed. 396, 398.

The interest of a mortgagor in realty before foreclosure is "unconditional and sole ownership," within the meaning of a fire policy that it shall be void if the interest of the assured be other than unconditional and sole ownership. Wolf v. Theresa Village Mut. Fire Ins. Co., 91 N. W. 1014, 1015, 115 Wis. 402.

The provisions of a policy to the effect that its validity shall be dependent on plaintiff's "unconditional and sole ownership" of the property insured had reference only to the quality of plaintiff's title, not to liens, and the policy was therefore not rendered void because of a chattel mortgage. American Artistic Gold Stamping Co. v. Glens Falls Ins. Co., 20 N. Y. Supp. 646, 647, 1 Misc. Rep. 114.

A provision in a policy that the "interest of the insured shall be free and unincumbered ownership" renders it void where it was subject to a mortgage not stated in the policy. Fitchburg Sav. Bank v. Amazon Ins. Co., 125 Mass. 431.

A party stated, in an application for a fire policy, that he was the unconditional owner of the building insured, which stood on a large tract of land in which the insured owned an undivided fourth in fee and the life interest in the remainder; but at the time the extent of his interest in the remainder, whether for life or in fee, was in litigation. The building was his dwelling, built at his expense. Held that, as in a partition the building would be assigned to him with his fourth, a representation that he was the unconditional owner thereof did not avoid the policy. Kenton Ins. Co. v. Wigginton, 89 Ky. 330, 12 S. W. 668, 669, 7 L. R. A. 81.

The omission of the owner of the equitable title to property to state the nature thereof will not render a policy of insurance invalid, under a condition forfeiting the insurance in case the interest is other than the entire, unconditional, and sole ownership, if the fact is not so represented to the company. Pelton v. Westchester Fire Ins. Co., 77 N. Y. 605. And he will be regarded as the absolute owner, although he may not have paid the purchase money. Ramsey v. Phoenix Ins. Co. (U. S.) 2 Fed. 429. Under these principles, where plaintiff insured certain buildings on land which he had contracted to purchase, but on which he had made no payment, and the policy was conditioned to be void if his interest was other than the "entire, unconditional, and sole ownership," or if the insured property was a building on land not owned by him in fee simple, the policy was not vitiated merely because he failed to hold the legal title to the land. Imperial Fire Ins. Co. v. Dunham, 12 Atl. 668, 675, 117 Pa. 460, 2 Am. St. Rep. 686.

Since a fee-simple estate is the highest tenure known to the law, and since landowners in fee simple, in the absence of any proof to the contrary, are presumed to be the owners of the buildings located and standing on the premises, it follows that the interest of the fee-simple owner of land in the buildings thereon is "the entire, unconditional, and sole ownership" of such property, within the meaning of a fire insurance policy requiring such ownership; and the fact of the existence of a lease of such buildings for a term of 10 years does not change the rule. Lycoming Fire Ins. Co. of Muncy v. Haven, 95 U. S. 242, 245, 24 L. Ed. 473.

Where a fire policy provided that, if the interest of the insured be other than "unconditional and sole," it shall be void, the phrase means that the interest must be completely vested in the assured, not contingent or conditional, nor for years or life, nor in common, but of such a nature that the insured must sustain the entire loss if the property is destroyed; and this is so, whether the title is legal or equitable. Hartford Fire Ins. Co. v. Keating, 38 Atl. 29, 31, 86 Md. 130, 63 Am. St. Rep. 499.

UNCONDITIONAL CONTRACT.

In the opinion rendered in Dye v. Garrett, 78 Ga. 471, 3 S. E. 691, it was said that an "unconditional contract" is one that has no condition in it. It is such a one that the court, by looking at the paper itself, may determine that judgment shall be rendered for the plaintiff in the case. Rodgers v. Caldwell, 37 S. E. 865, 866, 112 Ga. 635. See, also, Everett v. Westmorland, 92 Ga. 670, 19 S. E. 37.

A suit on notes, some of which were due and some not matured, except under a stipulation that they should become due if any one of the series was not paid within 30 days after maturity, is not founded on "unconditional contracts" in writing, within the meaning of paragraph 7, § 4, art. 6, of the Constitution, and requires a verdict by jury. Howard v. Wellham, 41 S. E. 62, 114 Ga. 934.

UNCONDITIONAL HEIRS.

"Unconditional heirs" are those who inherit without any reservation or without making an inventory, whether their acceptance be express or tacit. Civ. Code La. 1900, art. 882.

UNCONDITIONAL PROMISE TO PAY.

An unqualified order or promise to pay is unconditional, within the meaning of the negotiable instruments law, though coupled with (1) an indication of a particular fund out of which reimbursement is to be made, or a particular account to be debited with the amount, or (2) a statement of the transaction which gives rise to the instrument. But an order or promise to pay out of a particular fund is not unconditional. Ann. Codes & Sts. Or. 1901, § 4405.

UNCONSCIENTIOUS.

2 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 803, says the terms "fraud" or "fraudulent," as used by the courts in speaking of equitable estoppels, are virtually synonymous with "unconscientious" or "inequitable." The Ottumwa Belle (U. S.) 78 Fed. 643, 648.

UNCONSCIONABLE.

As defined by Bouvier, an unconscionable bargain is a contract which no man in his senses, not under a delusion, would make on the one hand, and which no fair and honest man would accept on the other. Such a contract, whether founded on fraud, accident, mistake, folly, or ignorance, is void at common law. It is not necessary to invoke the aid of a court of equity to reform it, and courts of law will always refuse to enforce such a bargain, as against public policy, honesty, fair dealing, and good morals. Hume v. United States, 10 Sup. Ct. 134, 136, 132 U. S. 406, 33 L. Ed. 393.

Where a theater lease provided for the payment of an annual rental of $22,500, a provision or a deposit by the tenant of $5,000 and a forfeiture of the same on a breach was not "unconscionable." Adler v. Kramer, 80 N. Y. Supp. 624, 626, 39 Misc. Rep. 642.

An agreement whereby an attorney retained $1,200 pension money out of a little over $1,700 received by him was an unconscionable agreement. In re —, 86 N. Y. 563, 564, 571, 573.

UNCONSTITUTIONAL

The term "unconstitutional law" must vary in its meaning in different states, according as the powers of sovereignty are or are not exercised by the individual or body which exercises the power of ordinary legislation. Where the lawmaking department is restricted in its powers by written fundamental law, as in the American states, we understand by unconstitutional law one which, being opposed to the fundamental law, is therefore in excess of legislative authority and void. Indeed, the term "unconstitutional law," as employed in American jurisprudence, is a misnomer and implies a contradiction; that enactment which is opposed to the Constitution being in fact no law at all. Cooley Const. Lim. pp. 2, 3; State v. McCann, 72 Tenn. (4 Lea) 1, 10.

Judge Cooley says: "The term 'unconstitutional law,' as employed in American jurisprudence, is a misnomer and implies a contradiction; that enactment which is opposed to the Constitution, being in fact no law at all." Again this same author says: "When a statute is adjudged to be unconstitutional, it is as if it had never been. Rights cannot be built up under it. Contracts which depend upon it for their construction are void. It constitutes a protection to no one who has acted under it, and no one can be punished for having refused obedience to it before the decision was made." A legislative act in conflict with the Constitution is not only illegal or voidable, but absolutely void. It is as if never enacted, and no subsequent change of the Constitution removing the restriction could validate it or breathe into it the breath of life. In re Rahrer (U. S.) 43 Fed. 556, 558, 10 L. R. A. 444.

Objection in a state court that an act of the state is "unconstitutional and void" relates only to the power of the state Legislature under the state Constitution, and does not raise the question that the act was in contravention of the Constitution of the United States. Layton v. Missouri, 23 Sup. Ct. 137, 138, 187 U. S. 356, 47 L. Ed. 214.

A law that is unconstitutional is so because it is either an assumption of power not legislative in its nature, or because it is inconsistent with some provision of the federal or state Constitution. Commonwealth v. Powell, 1 Pa. Co. Ct. R. 94, 97 (citing Commonwealth v. Maxwell, 27 Pa. [3 Casey] 444, 456).

An unconstitutional act is not a law. It confers no rights. It imposes no duties. It affords no protection. It creates no office. It is in legal contemplation as inoperative as though it had never been passed. Therefore an unconstitutional act purporting to create an office gives no validity to the acts of a person acting under color of its authority. Norton v. Shelby County, 6 Sup. Ct. 1121, 1125, 118 U. S. 425, 30 L. Ed. 178; Melody v. Goodrich et al., 70 N. Y. Supp. 568, 569, 35 Misc. Rep. 138.

UNCONTROLLABLE

An allegation in a complaint for divorce that the defendant was subject to "uncontrollable paroxysms of rage and violence" means that such paroxysms of rage and violence were beyond the control of the plaintiff and not beyond the control of the defendant, and that she was not, therefore, unaccountable for the same. Sylvia v. Sylvia, 17 Pac. 912, 915, 11 Colo. 319.

UNCONTROLLABLE IMPULSE

An uncontrollable impulse, sufficient to destroy criminal responsibility, exists only where it destroys the power of the accused to comprehend rationally the nature, character, and consequences of a particular act or acts charged against him, and not where the accused still has the power of knowing the character of the particular act or acts and that they are wrong. The law will hardly recognize the theory that any uncontrollable impulse may so take possession of a man's faculties and powers as to compel him to do what he knows to be wrong and thereby relieve him from all criminal responsibility. Whenever a man understands the nature and character of an act, and knows it is wrong, it would seem that he ought to be held legally responsible for the commission of it, if in fact he does commit it. State v. O'Neil, 33 Pac. 287, 294, 51 Kan. 651, 24 L. R. A. 555.

UNCULTIVATED.

Comp. Laws 1879, c. 89, § 12, authorizing a road overseer to enter on any "uncultivated land unincumbered by a crop" to obtain stone, etc., does not mean land which has once been under cultivation, but on which there is no present crop, but land which has not been cultivated. Barrett v. Nelson, 29 Kan. 594, 596.

UNDEPRECIATED MONEY.

A note given for land sold in 1864 upon a credit, with the understanding that at the time of the sale that payment should be required in "undepreciated money," does not, by force of that term, require the payment of specie or its equivalent. It is held that the time and circumstances under which the note is given are to be considered in ascertaining the intention of the parties, and that payment made in money in the ordinary commercial and business transactions of a country was a payment in undepreciated money in the contemplation of the contract. Blackburn v. Brooks, 65 N. C. 413.

UNDER.

A recital in municipal bonds that they were issued under and by authority of a statute is held equivalent to saying that it was done in conformity with the statute and authorized by it. Risley v. Village of Howell (U. S.) 64 Fed. 453, 457, 12 C. C. A. 218.

The word "under," as used in the recital in municipal bonds to the effect that the bonds are issued under the provisions of a given statute, is not synonymous with the phrase "in pursuance of," or "in conformity with," or "by virtue of," or "by authority of," but simply asserts that the bonds are subject to or controlled by the provisions of the statute named, and the purchaser is thereby informed where he should look in order to learn what the provisions of the statute are which confer and limit the power to issue the bonds. Bates v. Riverside Independent School Dist. (U. S.) 25 Fed. 192, 194.

A covenant in a deed by the grantor that his land is free from all incumbrances done or suffered by "those under whom they claim" means those from whom they have derived the title. Williams v. Hall, 62 Mo. 405, 406.

As at a lower level.

"Under," as used in Rev. St. Mass. c. 39, § 67, providing that every railroad corporation may raise or lower any turnpike or way for the purpose of having their railroad pass over or under the same, is not precisely the opposite of "over." One passes over a road if he crosses it on the surface, as well as when he passes above it on a bridge; but he cannot be said to pass under it, unless on another surface at a lower level. Newburyport Turnpike Corp. v. Eastern R. Co., 40 Mass. (23 Pick.) 326, 328.

As by virtue of.

"Under," in a notice that a certain person was not entitled to vote under the reform act, was equivalent to "by virtue of" the act. Huggett v. Lewis, 28 Eng. Law & Eq. 326, 327.

As in subordination to.

As used in Wag. St. p. 274, § 8, providing that the words "grant, bargain, and sell," in all conveyances, shall be construed to be express covenants that the grantor was at the time of the execution of the conveyance seised of an indefeasible estate in fee simple, and that such estate was free from incumbrances done or suffered by the grantor or "any person claiming under him," refers to those holding subordinately and not adversely to the grantor, since the statutory provision against incumbrances is based on the idea that the grantor had not previously sold the land conveyed, but that he was at the time of entering into it the owner thereof, and that it may have been incumbered by him, or by some person rightly claiming an estate in the land consistent with the owner's title, or some estate therein in trust for the owner. Clore v. Graham, 64 Mo. 249, 253.

"Under" has the same signification as the phrase "by virtue of," which is defined in the Century Dictionary as meaning "by or through the authority of." It is also defined "in subordination to" (Worcester Dict.), and "in conformity with" (Cent. Dict.); and it has such meaning in Act April 5, 1889, § 1, giving a lien for labor performed or material furnished for any building or improvement under or by virtue of the contract with the owner, or his agent, trustee, contractor, or contractors. Bassett v. Mills (Tex.) 34 S. W. 93, 94.

As subject to.

"Under this contract," as used in a contract providing that any question or dispute that shall arise under this contract shall be referred, etc., means the subject of the contract, or covered by the contract. Hostetter v. City of Pittsburg, 107 Pa. 419, 432.

"Under," as used in a statute providing that chiefs of police shall have power, under such rules as the police board may establish, to suspend, fine, or dismiss any subordinate officer, means "subject to," and indicates an intention to give the chief power to do these things, but makes him subject to the police board. Eslinger v. Pratt, 46 Pac. 763, 766, 14 Utah, 107.

UNDER AND SUBJECT TO.

An assignment of land on which a perpetual rent had been reserved, declared in the habendum to be "under and subject to the payment of the said rent as the same shall accrue, forever," means that the grantee is to take an incumbered estate, without recourse to the grantor for a breach of the statutory covenant arising from the words "grant, bargain, and sell," used in the assignment. Walker v. Physick, 5 Pa. 193, 203.

The words "under and subject," in a grant of land under and subject to the payment of the several ground rents which have been reserved in an original grant, operates to bind the grantee to indemnify the grantor no longer than his tenancy of the freehold. American Academy of Music v. Smith, 54 Pa. 130, 132.

The words "under and subject to," in a deed which recites that the grantee takes the land conveyed under and subject to a mortgage debt, does not operate to make him personally liable for the debt, where there is no agreement or consent on his part to pay the debt, and no consideration moves to him for its payment. Girard Life Ins. & Trust Co. v. Stewart, 86 Pa. 89, 91.

A clause in a deed of conveyance "under and subject" to a mortgage or other incumbrance is a covenant of indemnity only as between grantor and grantee, for the protection of the former, unless there be an express agreement to pay the incumbrance, or unless such an agreement may be implied from the circumstances. Thomas v. Wiltbank, 6 Wkly. Notes Cas. 477, 479.

A conveyance of land "under and subject" to a mortgage or other incumbrance is of itself a covenant of indemnity only for the protection of the vendor. It is only where there is an express agreement to pay the incumbrance, or where such agreement might be implied from the circumstances, that there is liability to the incumbrancer, or that he may sue in the name of the vendor to his use. Appeal of Moore, 88 Pa. 450, 453, 32 Am. Rep. 469; Samuel v. Peyton, 88 Pa. 465, 469.

In an action by a mortgagee to recover a deficiency resulting on the foreclosure of the mortgage from the grantee of the mortgagor, whose deed recited that the conveyance was under and subject to such mortgage, the court said: "The most that can be claimed for the words 'under and subject,' in the conveyance, is that as between the parties it creates a covenant of indemnity to the grantor on the part of the grantee. It creates no liability to the mortgagee, and does not authorize a suit in his own name." Taylor v. Mayer, 93 Pa. 42, 44.

A deed to a building association "under and subject" to the lien of a mortgage creates a covenant on the part of the grantees to indemnify the grantor against the mortgage debt. Greene v. Rick, 121 Pa. 130, 139, 15 Atl. 497, 2 L. R. A. 48, 6 Am. St. Rep. 760.

The legal import of the "under and subject to the lien of" clause in a deed is that the vendee will discharge the lien of the incumbrance by payment, or, in default thereof, that the land shall remain liable therefor, and shall be, as between himself and his vendor, primarily liable to the extent of its actual value. If the mortgage money is more than the value of the land, the vendor will be liable to his creditor for such surplus, and will be without recourse to his vendee for the amount so paid; but if the vendee neglects or refuses to pay, and the holder of the mortgage proceeds upon the bond or otherwise against the mortgagor, the implied covenant to indemnify him to the extent of the value of the land is broken, and his vendee is liable to him upon it. Blood v. Crew Livick Co., 33 Atl. 344, 346, 171 Pa. 328.

"Under and subject" to a mortgage, as used in a deed, do not import a promise to pay, nor create a personal liability. Lavelle v. Gordon, 39 Pac. 740, 741, 15 Mont. 515.

UNDER AUTHORITY OF LAW.

In Const. art. 5, § 29, providing that the county court shall hold at least four terms a year, as may be provided by the Legislature or by the commissioners' court of the county, under authority of law, and such other terms each year as may be fixed by the commissioners' court, the purpose of the use of the words "under authority of law" was not merely to empower the Legislature to authorize the commissioners' court to act in the premises, but it was rather to make their action subordinate and subject to legislative control. Hughes v. Doyle, 44 S. W. 64, 65, 91 Tex. 421.

UNDER COLOR OF.

See "Color."

UNDER CONTRACT.

A person who entices from the employ of a farmer a minor child, who is working on his farm under a contract made with the minor's father, is not guilty of violating 2 Rev. St. 1893, § 291, providing for the punishment of any person who shall entice any servant or laborer "under contract" with another to violate such contract. State v. Aye, 41 S. E. 519, 63 S. C. 458.

UNDER CONTROL.

Where a railroad engineer had testified that he had his train under control, it was proper to allow him to explain the meaning of "having the train under control," since, while the expression might be fully understood by railroad men operating a train, a jury would not, perhaps, have a clear idea of what was meant. Texas & N. O. R. Co. v. Mortensen, 66 S. W. 99, 103, 27 Tex. Civ. App. 106.

UNDER THE DIRECTION OF.

Rev. St. U. S. § 458 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 257], provides that the Commissioner of the General Land Office shall perform,

"under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior," all executive duties pertaining to the survey and sale of lands, or in any wise respecting such lands. Held, that the phrase "under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior" is not meaningless, but was intended as an expression in general terms of the power of the Secretary to supervise and control the operations of the Land Department. It means that in the immediate matters relating to the sale and disposition of the public domain, and the administration of the trust involving on the government, the Secretary is the supervising agent of the government. Stoneroad v. Stoneroad, 15 Sup. Ct. 822, 826, 158 U. S. 240, 39 L. Ed. 966; Orchard v. Alexander, 157 U. S. 372, 381, 384, 15 Sup. Ct. 635, 39 L. Ed. 737, 741.

UNDER DISABILITY.

See "Disability."

UNDER FALSE PRETENSES.

To charge a person with having obtained property under false pretenses conveys the idea that such person has been guilty of swindling, and therefore it is libelous per se to publish that a note given to plaintiff was obtained from the maker under false pretenses. Young v. Sheppard (Tex.) 40 S. W. 62.

UNDER HIS HAND.

The averment, in an action on notes, of a promise by defendant under his hand should be construed as equivalent to an averment of a promise in writing signed by defendant. The word "hand," in legal parlance, is often used to denote handwriting or written signature, as "Witness my hand and seal," or "Witness my hand." If the instrument be not under seal, also, as used in Gen. St. §§ 978, 985, and Mills' Ann. St. §§ 1484, 1491, authorizing a judge or justice of the peace to issue a warrant in certain cases "under his hand" means a writ or process in writing, signed by the judge or justice. Salazar v. Taylor, 33 Pac. 369, 370, 18 Colo. 538.

A special count on a note alleged to have been given by defendants under their hands, etc., is satisfied by the signing of a note by one of the parties by making his mark thereto. Walbridge v. Arnold, 21 Conn. 424, 428.

As used in a declaration in an action on a note, stating that the defendants by a note "under their hands" promised to pay, the phrase quoted embraces a note signed by procuration. Phelps v. Riley, 3 Conn. 266, 270.

UNDER IMPROVEMENT.

The term "under improvement," in Gen. St. c. 128, §§ 1, 4, authorizing the fence viewers, upon application, to make a division of the fences between owners of adjoining lands under improvement, means "used, occupied, employed, or turned to profitable account. The purpose of the statute was to require owners of adjoining lands occupying or using them, or beneficially using them in such a way as to derive some profit or advantage therefrom, to maintain the fences equally." Chase v. Jefts, 58 N. H. 280, 281.

Woodland through which the owner's cattle roamed as a part of their pasture is "under improvement," within the meaning of Gen. St. c. 128, § 1, relating to the maintenance of partition fences between land and woodland which is not "under improvement." Piper v. Piper, 60 N. H. 98, 99.

Rev. St. Me. c. 18, § 18, authorizing the selectmen of a town to lay out private ways leading from "land under improvement" in a town to a town or highway, includes a mill lot on which a mill is erected. Lyon v. Hamor, 73 Me. 56, 57.

UNDER THE INFLUENCE OF LIQUOR.

As used in an accident insurance policy, providing that no claim should be made thereunder where the death or injury happened while the insured was, or in consequence of his having been, "under the influence of intoxicating drinks," the quoted phrase means that the insured must have drunk enough to disturb the action of the mental or physical faculties, so that they were no longer in their normal condition. Shader v. Railway Passengers' Assur. Co. (N. Y.) 3 Hun, 424.

"Under the influence of intoxicating liquors," as used in an accident policy providing that the insurer shall not be liable for injuries received by the insured while under the influence of intoxicating liquors, means a condition amounting to intoxication, and does not include every instance in which the insured has partaken of any quantity of intoxicants. Campbell v. Fidelity & Casualty Co. of New York, 60 S. W. 492, 496, 100 Ky. 661.

The phrase "under the influence of liquor" means the same as "drunk" or "intoxicated," in an instruction, in an action for death occasioned by drunkenness caused by liquor furnished by defendant, that exemplary damages might be allowed if defendant gave deceased intoxicating liquors when he was already "under the influence of liquor." Buck v. Maddock, 47 N. H. 208, 209, 167 Ill. 219.

"Under the influence of intoxicating drinks," within the meaning of a policy of accident insurance which excused the insurer from liability for injuries which happened while the insured was under the influence of intoxicating drinks, or in consequence of having been under the influence of such drinks, means such influence as in reality amounts to intoxication. Insured must have drunk enough to have disturbed the action of the physical or mental faculties, so that they are no longer in their natural or normal condition, in order to excuse the company from liability. The fact that the insured had drunk some liquor, but not enough to overcome his faculties, would not excuse the insurer from liability under this clause of the policy. Standard Life & Accident Ins. Co. v. Jones, 10 South. 530, 532, 94 Ala. 434.

UNDERLEASE.

The ordinary distinction between an "assignment" and an "underlease" is that the former transfers the land for the whole term and the latter for only a part of it. When the transfer is of the whole of a term, the person taking is an assignee, and not an undertenant, though the transaction be in form an underletting. Bedford v. Terhune (N. Y.) 27 How. Prac. 422, 447.

In Woodf. Landl. & T. § 345, it is said that an assignment, as distinguished from an underlease, signified a parting with the whole term; and in 1 Hill. Abr. p. 126, § 55, it is said that the ordinary distinction between an assignment and an underlease is that the former transfers the land for the whole term and the latter for only a part of it. Bedford v. Terhune, 30 N. Y. 453, 458, 86 Am. Dec. 394.

UNDER LEGAL DISABILITY.

See "Legal Disability."

UNDERLESSEE.

As undertenant, see "Undertenant."

UNDER LIKE CIRCUMSTANCES.

The term "under like circumstances," as used in an instruction, called attention to the particular nature of the case, and coupled the instruction with the general instructions in such a manner as to make the former complementary to the latter, and removed any possible conflict in the instruction confusing the jury. Omaha Fair & Exposition Ass'n v. Missouri Pac. Ry. Co., 60 N. W. 330, 332, 42 Neb. 105.

UNDER A PENALTY.

The term "under a penalty," as used in a covenant by the seller of a business not to engage in the same business within a certain distance under a penalty, are not conclusive as to the sum named being regarded as liquidated damages. Smith v. Brown, 42 N. E. 101, 102, 164 Mass. 584 (citing Ropes v.

Upton, 125 Mass. 258, 262; Saintier v. Ferguson, 7 C. B. 716).

UNDER PROCESS OF LAW.

Where a mortgagor voluntarily surrendered the premises after a decree of foreclosure, an entry by the mortgagee was not an entry under process of law. Riddle v. George, 58 N. H. 25, 28.

UNDER PROMISE OF MARRIAGE.

The words "under promise of marriage," in a statute punishing seduction under promise of marriage, mean "by means, by virtue, and by reason of a promise of marriage"; that is, the man makes a promise, and then, by using it as a means, he seduces and debauches the girl. State v. Eckler, 106 Mo. 585, 588, 17 S. W. 814, 27 Am. St. Rep. 372.

UNDER PROTEST.

See "Protest."

UNDER SAIL.

It is a general principle of maritime law that a vessel "under sail" must avoid one at anchor. A vessel propelled by steam is considered, in the application of this principle, as "under sail," and with the wind at all times, and must give place accordingly. Knowlton v. Sanford, 32 Me. 148, 157, 52 Am. Dec. 649.

UNDER SEAL.

A writing is not "under seal," unless the purpose to seal it is expressed or indicated in its body. The mere suffixing a scroll containing the word "Seal" or the letters "L. S." to the name of the subscriber of an instrument does not make it a writing under seal. Breitling v. Marx, 26 South. 203, 204, 123 Ala. 222.

UNDERTENANT.

An underlessee is an "undertenant," within the meaning of Civ. Code, § 2707, relating to the landlord's right of pledge. University Pub. Co. v. Piffet, 34 La. Ann. 602, 603.

UNDER THE UNITED STATES.

The words "under the United States," in Const. art. 4, § 7, providing that no person holding any lucrative office under the United States or any other power shall be eligible to any civil office of profit under this state, means under the federal government. People v. Leonard, 14 Pac. 853, 855, 73 Cal. 280.

UNDER WAY.

A vessel is "under way" when she is not at anchor, or made fast to the shore or aground. U. S. Comp. St. 1901, pp. 2863, 2876, 2886.

A vessel lying to in a fog, but having some of her sails up, is "under way," within the definition of the international navigation rules. Burrows v. Gower (U. S.) 119 Fed. 616 (citing The Columbian [U. S.] 100 Fed. 991, 41 C. C. A. 150).

UNDER A WILL.

Code Civ. Proc. § 277, providing that a person entitled to a legacy or any other pecuniary provision "under a will" may, after one year from the issuance of letters testamentary or of administration, file a petition and have a decree requiring the executor to pay his claim or show cause why he should not do so, does not apply to an assignee of a legacy. In re Brewster, 3 N. Y. Supp. 556, 557, 1 Con. Sur. 172 (citing Peyser v. Wendt, 2 Dem. Sur. 221).

UNDERFLOW.

"Underflow" is the subterranean volume of water which slowly finds its way through the sand and gravel constituting the beds of streams which traverse the country adjacent and to which rights by appropriation may attach. Platte Valley Irr. Co. v. Buckers Irrigation Milling & Improvement Co., 53 Pac. 834, 336, 25 Colo. 77 (citing McClellan v. Hurdle, 3 Colo. App. 430, 33 Pac. 280).

UNDERGROUND STREAM.

Underground streams are divided into two distinct classes: Those whose channels are known or defined, and those unknown or undefined. The word "defined" means a contracted and bounded channel, though the course of the stream may be undefined by human knowledge; and the word "known" refers to knowledge of the course of the stream by reasonable inference. Regarding the laws governing these two classes, it must be known that if underground waters flow in well-defined and known channels, the course of which can be distinctly traced, they are governed by the same rules of law that govern streams flowing upon the surface of the earth. But for this purpose the underground water must flow in known and well-defined channels, so that the riparian owner may invoke the same rules as are applied to surface streams. Subterranean waters, whose channels are unknown and undefined, although there are undoubtedly a great many underground streams whose waters flow in confined channels, but whose courses are not known, are all classed with percolating waters. Deadwood Cent. R. Co. v. Barker, 86 N. W. 619, 621, 14 S. D. 558.

UNDERGROWTH.

"Undergrowth" is a term applicable to plants growing under or below other greater plants, and does not embrace a tree, which is a woody plant, whose branches spring from and are supported upon a trunk or body, which may be old or young, great or small. Clay v. Postal Telegraph Cable Co., 11 South. 658, 659, 70 Miss. 406.

UNDERLOOKER.

An "underlooker," or underground manager, is one whose duty it is to see that the roofs of a mine are propped and made secure. Jones v. Florence Min. Co., 28 N. W. 207, 210, 68 Wis. 268, 57 Am. Rep. 269.

UNDERSTANDING.

See "Want of Understanding."

Webster defines "understanding" thus: "Intelligence between two or more persons; agreement of minds; union of sentiments. There is a good understanding between a minister and his people." Allison v. Hagan, 12 Nev. 38, 61.

As an agreement.

"Understanding" may in a sense be said to involve a conclusion, but is often used as synonymous with "agreement," when used in reference to an understanding between two parties. Sykes v. City Sav. Bank, 73 N. W. 369, 370, 115 Mich. 321, 69 Am. St. Rep. 562.

"Understanding," as used in a finding of a committee that it was the understanding of certain parties that a debt secured by a mortgage should be allowed to lie for a number of years, unless sooner enforced by a certain party, which is always a loose, ambiguous, word, unless accompanied with some expression to show that it constituted a meeting of the minds of parties upon something respecting which they intended to be bound, was employed, not to express anything which was the subject of an agreement or contract between the parties, but only that kind of expectation or confidence upon which parties are frequently willing to rely, without requiring any binding stipulation. Camp v. Waring, 25 Conn. 520, 529.

"Understanding," as used in testimony of a somewhat uneducated person to the effect that a deed was executed with a certain understanding, might safely be regarded as synonymous with "agreement." Mitchell v. National Railway Building & Loan Ass'n (Tex.) 49 S. W. 624, 628.

The word "understanding" may be used to express a valid contract engagement, but one of a somewhat informal character. Winslow v. Dakota Lumber Co., 20 N. W. 145, 32 Minn. 237.

Webster defines the word "understanding" as anything mutually understood or agreed upon. An understanding between two parties to a contract as to what rights each shall have thereafter in the subject-matter thereof is an agreement. The words "understanding" and "agreement" may be used interchangeably, as synonymous. Bar-kow v. Sanger, 3 N. W. 16, 21, 47 Wis. 500.

An understanding is anything mutually understood or agreed upon, as to come to an understanding with another; and when a witness, speaking with reference to a contract between himself and the other party to the case on trial, says the understanding was so and so, the evidence tends to show that this was what was mutually agreed upon by the parties. Bullock v. Johnson, 35 S. E. 703, 705, 110 Ga. 486.

An action was brought against a telegraph company for failure to deliver a telegram, and it appeared that plaintiff had an arrangement with a Chicago firm to inform him by wire of any change in the cattle market. He delivered a message to his correspondent to defendant's agent, stating to the agent where he (plaintiff) could be reached by wire, which telegram was not sent, and plaintiff, relying on the silence of his correspondent, purchased cattle for the Chicago market on the basis of the price last named by it, which had fallen. On the trial of an action for damages, plaintiff was asked, "Now, had you any 'understanding' with them [plaintiff's correspondent]?" and an objection for incompetency and immateriality thereto was sustained. Held, that the word "understanding," as used in the question, was used in the sense of calling for facts as to the agreement between the parties, if any, and that the term "understanding" was practically synonymous with the word "agreement," and therefore the question was not objectionable as calling for a conclusion. Garrett v. Western Union Tel. Co., 58 N. W. 1064, 1065, 92 Iowa, 449.

In an action of ejectment plaintiff on cross-examination was asked: "Was there an understanding between you and Wright that he should eventually have a deed of the 20 acres?" To this question his attorney objected, as tending to prove a verbal contract for the sale of land, which the statute requires to be in writing, and as leading and calling for the opinion of the witness as to the effect of a conversation which is not proven. The objection being overruled, the witness answered: "Yes." In considering this objection the court said: "While it must be admitted that the general rule is that the facts within the knowledge of a witness must be given, and that he cannot testify to his understanding of or conclusion as to the facts, still in this case it is quite manifest that the word 'understanding' in the question asked was not employed or understood by the witness in the sense of calling for her understanding or conclusion as to the facts, but that it was used as a synonym of the word 'agreement,' and that the effect of the question was to inquire for a fact; i. e., whether there was an agreement between the plaintiff and Wright that he should eventually have a deed of the 20 acres. Thus construed, and we think such is a fair construction, the question was clearly proper." House v. Howell, 6 N. Y. Supp. 799, 801, 53 Hun, 638.

In an action against a city to recover as damages the value of a dwelling house, etc., destroyed by fire by reason of the failure on the part of the city to keep its water pipes, hydrants and fixtures in repair, so as to furnish a sufficient supply of water to enable the engines to extinguish fires, the plaintiff alleged that, "with the understanding that the plaintiff was to be furnished with an ample supply of water by means of such pipes and hydrants for the extinguishment of any fires that might occur, the plaintiff did agree to pay and did pay to such defendant the annual tax assessed and imposed for the use of such pipes." In considering this complaint, the court said: "It is certainly the general rule that the contract of a corporation should be evidenced by proper corporate proceedings, and nothing of that kind appears here. Neither the word 'contract' nor 'agreement,' as referring to the action of the corporation, is stated. As applied to the corporation, the strongest term used is 'understanding,' which is equivocal, or at least falls short of alleging a distinct and express contract between the parties." Black v. City of Columbia, 19 S. C. 412, 419, 45 Am. Rep. 785.

"Express understanding," as used in an averment in a pleading that all negotiations for the purchase of certain lands were with the express understanding that the land was bought for defendant, is an equivalent expression for "express contract" or "express agreement." Spence v. Spence, 17 Wis. 448, 454.

The words "understanding" and "agreement" import an oral agreement, when used in pleading. Franklin v. Browning (U. S.) 117 Fed. 226, 228, 54 O. C. A. 258.

As capacity of understanding.

In the statute, to the effect that a person entirely without understanding has no power to make a contract of any kind, it is held that the term "understanding" is used to denote, not the act of understanding, but the capacity or faculty of doing so, and the expression "without understanding" as referring to persons without such capacity; nor is the expression to be understood in its literal and extreme sense, for hardly in any case can even the most insane persons be said to be without some degree of understanding, but rather it is to be understood as restricted to the subject-matter to which the section relates, which is that of contracts, executed and executory, and hence as applied to all persons who are entirely without the capacity of understanding or comprehending such transactions. Jacks v. Estee, 73 Pac. 247, 248, 139 Cal. 507.

As a guaranty.

An understanding that certain vessels should be loaded within a certain time does not amount to a guaranty. Huron Barge Co. v. Turney (U. S.) 71 Fed. 972, 975.

As knowledge.

"Understanding" is defined to mean the act of one who understands or comprehends; so that a person who does not know what he is doing does not "understand" what he is doing, within the meaning of Civ. Code, § 39, relating to the right of rescission on a contract where a person of unsound mind, but not entirely without understanding, has entered into a contract. Abrahams v. Los Angeles Traction Co., 57 Pac. 216, 219, 124 Cal. 411, 418.

As realization of effect of acts.

The word "understand," so much used by lawyers and jurists in connection with the execution of deeds, wills, and such instruments, includes the realization of the practical effects and consequences in every direction of the proposed act, be it deed or will. White v. White, 45 Atl. 767, 771, 60 N. J. Eq. 104.

UNDERSTANDINGLY.

The word "understandingly," in a certificate to the deed of a married woman that she executed the same understandingly, means that she executed it with a knowledge of what she was doing. Murdock v. Railroad Co., 86 Tenn. (7 Baxt.) 557, 560.

UNDERSTOOD.

The word "understood," when a witness states what he understood parties to say, may be used to mean what parties say in fact or substance, as the witness understood them, or merely his inference drawn from what was said. If used in the former sense, evidence of his understanding is admissible, but not if used in the latter sense. Kingsbury v. Moses, 45 N. H. 222, 225.

Where a witness testified that "he had understood" a certain party to be a member of a firm, the court said: "'Understood' is the preterit of 'understand,' a verb of very extensive signification, and which, among other things, means to learn or to be informed. When the witness says, in effect, that he has learned, or been informed, that Mr. Dearing was a member of the firm, it cannot with propriety be assumed that his information was derived from rumor; but a jury might well infer that he had learned it from an authentic and satisfactory source, even from the party himself." Dearing v. Smith, 4 Ala. 432, 438.

As agreed.

"It is understood," in the ordinary sense in which the phrase is used in a written contract, has the same force and is of the same effect as "it is agreed," and the obligation of the parties is as absolute as if the latter phrase were employed. Higginson v. Weld, 80 Mass. (14 Gray) 165, 170.

The word "understood," as applied by a witness to his own apprehension of an agreement to which he was himself a party, is used in the sense of "agreement," and is direct proof in itself of what the agreement was. Fraser v. Davie, 11 S. C. 56, 68.

As intended.

"Understood," as used in a court's instruction on an issue as to whether the debt sued upon, which arose upon alleged sale of grain, was a gambling debt, that the jury should find that the debt was of that character if it was mutually agreed and "understood" between plaintiff and defendant that no grain should be delivered or received in settlement of the sale, but that settlement should be made merely by the payment of differences, was equivalent to the use of the word "intended," and so did not render the instruction erroneous. Connor v. Heman, 44 Mo. App. 346, 349.

UNDERTAKE.

The words "undertake" and "promise" are equivalent words, and a plea of general issue in assumpsit that defendant did not promise as alleged, omitting the words "undertake or," is good. Eastman v. Anthony, 93 Ill. 599.

"Undertook," as used in a complaint against a surgeon, charging malpractice, in that the defendant "undertook faithfully, skillfully, and diligently to treat and set, and endeavor to cure and heal, said arm and shoulder," is not synonymous with "promised, agreed, or contracted," but is used in the sense of "entered upon." De Hart v. Haun, 26 N. E. 61, 62, 126 Ind. 378, 382.

UNDERTAKER.

The terms "mechanics, undertakers, or journeymen," in a statute giving a lien to a mechanic, undertaker, or journeyman who builds or repairs a house, does not include a person who merely furnishes the owner with lumber to be used in such building. Stevens v. Wells, 36 Tenn. (4 Sneed) 387.

The term "mechanic or undertaker," in a statute giving a mechanic's lien to any mechanic or undertaker who shall build or repair, either in whole or in part, a house, fixtures, or improvements, or who shall furnish materials or any part of the materials in such building or repairing, or who shall do any work upon said house, either by finishing off the same, painting, ornamenting, or otherwise, does not include one who furnishes machinery to be used in such a house for manufacturing purposes. East Tennessee Iron Mfg. Co. v. Bynum, 35 Tenn. (3 Sneed) 268, 269, 65 Am. Dec. 58.

The terms "mechanics" and "undertakers," in a statute giving a mechanic's lien for their services in the erection of buildings, includes mechanics and undertakers who are not residents of the state. Greenwood v. Tennessee Mfg. Co. & Agricultural School, 32 Tenn. (2 Swan) 130, 135.

UNDERTAKING.

As bond, see "Bond."

"An undertaking is defined by Bouvier to be an engagement by one of the parties to a contract to the other, and not the mutual engagement of the parties to each other; a promise. It does not necessarily imply a consideration." Alexander v. State, 12 S. W. 595, 596, 28 Tex. App. 186.

"An undertaking is a promise. It may be made with or without consideration. If the promise is in writing, the consideration need not be expressed. It may be proved in all other cases by parol. The common law was satisfied if there was a consideration in fact to sustain the undertaking." Thompson v. Blanchard, 3 N. Y. 335, 337.

The word "undertaking," when used in statutes, means a promise or security in any form. Code Iowa 1897, § 48, subd. 20.

The word "undertaking," when used in statutes, means a promise or security in any form, where required by law. Gen. St. Kan. 1901, § 7342, subd. 20.

Laws 12th Sess. p. 9, provides that before issuing a writ of attachment the clerk shall require a written undertaking on the part of the plaintiff, with two or more sureties. Held, that this means an undertaking for him or on his behalf, and it is not necessary to the validity of such an undertaking that it be signed by the plaintiff. Pierce v. Miles, 6 Pac. 347, 348, 5 Mont. 549.

The term "undertaking," in Act Feb. 22, 1867, c. 64, 14 Stat. 403, providing: "No appeal shall be allowed upon a judgment of a justice of the peace, unless the appellant * * * enters into an undertaking to satisfy and pay all intervening damages and costs arising on the appeal"—is used in this statute as the equivalent of an appeal bond, or as a substitute therefor. Unlike the ordinary appeal bond, which is an obligation under seal, with a fixed penalty and a definite condition, limited to become effective or otherwise by the determination of the appeal, the undertaking is without seal or fixed penalty and without condition, and is simply a promise or assumption of liability to perform a judgment or to pay damages and costs. While it differs in form from the bond, its essential purpose and effect are the same as those of the bond, to give the guaranty of an additional person as security for the costs that might be incurred and the damages that might result to an appellee by the prosecution of an appeal that prevents him from realizing his claim as speedily and as effectively as he might otherwise have done. Tenney v. Taylor, 1 App. D. C. 223, 228, 229 (quoting Webst. Dict.).

Under Act March 3, 1875, c. 137, § 4, 18 Stat. 471 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 511], providing that all bonds, undertakings, or securities given by either party in the suit prior to its removal shall remain valid and effectual, notwithstanding such removal, and St. Mass. c. 161, § 24, providing that original writs, in which the plaintiff is not an inhabitant of the commonwealth, shall, before entry thereof, be indorsed by some sufficient person who is such inhabitant, who shall be liable for costs, it is held that the word "undertakings" in the federal statute is sufficient to include the indorsement required by the Massachusetts statute; the court observing that no term could be more sweeping in this connection than the word "undertakings." Pullman's Palace Car Co. v. Washburn (U. S.) 66 Fed. 790, 791.

A memorandum on a justice docket, required by Rev. St. §§ 3782, 3783, to be signed by sureties for costs in an action, is not an undertaking, bond, or recognizance, within Rev. St. § 2590, providing that no attorney practicing in the state shall be taken as bail or security on an undertaking, bond, or recognizance. Stark v. Small, 39 N. W. 359, 72 Wis. 215.

Plant distinguished.

In the case of In re Panama N. Z. & A. Royal Mail Co., 5 Ch. App. 318, it was held that where a company owning a fleet of vessels borrowed money, charging it on the "undertaking and all sums of money arising therefrom and all the estate of the company therein," the word "undertaking" had reference to all the property of the company, not only which existed at the time of the debenture, but which might afterwards be acquired. From this it was argued that the word "plant," used in a mortgage, covered all the property of the company; but the court held that holding did not apply. "Undertaking" being defined as any business, work, or project which a person engages in or attempts to perform, an enterprise, while "plant" is defined as the fixtures and tools necessary to carry on any trade or mechanical business, they are not equivalent, and do not assimilate. Maxwell v. Wilmington Dental Mfg. Co. (U. S.) 77 Fed. 938, 941.

Undertaking of an architect.

The "undertaking of an architect" implies that he possesses skill and ability, including taste sufficient to enable him to perform the required services at least ordinarily and reasonably well, and that he will exercise and apply in the given case his skill and ability, his judgment and taste, reasonably and without neglect; but the undertaking does not imply or warrant a satisfactory result. There is no implied promise that miscalculations may not occur. An error of judgment is not necessarily evidence of a want of skill or care, for mistakes and miscalculations are incident to all the businesses of life. Coombs v. Beede, 36 Atl. 104, 105, 89 Me. 187, 56 Am. St. Rep. 406.

Undertaking of bail.

An "undertaking of bail" in criminal cases is in definition and purpose a recognizance. It is an undertaking had before a competent court or magistrate by the persons who engage as sureties for a defendant that he will appear according to the conditions of the undertaking, or, in default thereof, that they will pay a specified sum. It is an obligation acknowledged and entered of record, and, when made absolute by forfeiture judicially declared by reason of a default or failure to appear according to its terms, it partakes more of the nature of a judgment than a contract, and is in principle and effect the same as a recognizance at common law. Colvig v. Klamath County, 19 Pac. 86, 89, 16 Or. 244.

UNDERWRITER.

See "Board of Fire Underwriters."

Being borrowed from the early method of obtaining marine insurance, "underwriter" has now acquired the meaning of any one who insures another on life or property in a policy of insurance; and hence, when the Legislature used the term "board of fire underwriters," the presumption is that they meant a board composed exclusively of fire insurers—that is, of those engaged in the business of insuring others on property against loss by fire. Childs v. Firemen's Ins. Co., 69 N. W. 141, 142, 66 Minn. 393, 35 L. R. A. 99.

UNDISPOSED OF.

A testator, in devising real and personal property to his wife, to have during her life, and providing that at her death "all the personal property that may remain unused or undisposed of by her" shall go to testator's grandchildren, did not give the testator's wife an unqualified title to the personalty, but only the right of disposition during her life. Logue v. Bateman, 11 Atl. 259, 261, 43 N. J. Eq. (16 Stew.) 434.

As residue.

"Undisposed of," as used in a will providing that, at the death of testator's wife, such of his real estate as remained "undisposed of" and the proceeds of the sale of such as might have been sold should descend to his children, simply means the residue. Stickel v. Crane, 59 N. E. 595, 597, 189 Ill. 211.

"Undisposed of," as used in a will giving to the testator's wife certain property for life, and providing that, if any such property should remain undisposed of by my wife at her death, it should go to certain persons, should be construed to mean undisposed of by any sale or otherwise that she as owner in her lifetime might see fit to make. Perry v. Cross, 132 Mass. 454, 456.

UNDISPUTABLE TITLE.

A covenant to make an "undisputable title" to land means a complete, connected paper title, and not an inferential title, one which might be deduced, in a course of dispute, from possession and facts which existed in presumption of law, etc. An undisputable title, free from all incumbrances, means not only that it shall be free from actual existing, but from probable, and even potential, incumbrances. Courcier v. Graham, 1 Ohio (1 Ham.) 830, 840.

UNDIVIDED.

"Undivided," when used in a grant of land by the proprietors of common and "undivided" lands, to be used for a certain purpose forever, and to lie undivided, "implies land set apart from the proprietor's general domain, and not subject to partition, and not to be divided, set off, and allotted to individual proprietors to hold in severalty." In re Wellington, 33 Mass. (16 Pick.) 87, 98, 26 Am. Dec. 631.

Code 1876, providing that the person who offers to pay the amount of taxes due on any parcel of land or town lot for the smallest portion of the same shall be considered the purchaser, and when he shall designate the portion for which he will pay the whole amount of taxes such portion shall be considered "an undivided portion," means that the land shall be contiguous and in one portion, and not that the part taken shall be undivided; that is, that he shall take say four acres in one part of the land, and four or any number of acres of land in another part. Brundige v. Maloney, 2 N. W. 1110, 1111, 52 Iowa, 218.

Where a deed described the property conveyed as "the north one-half of the southwest undivided quarter," etc., and it appeared that the quarter, as divided by the government lines, would consist of two unequal fractions, it was held that the word "undivided" was used with reference to a division of the quantity of the land, so as to give the grantee but one-half in quantity. Kinsey v. Satterthwaite, 88 Ind. 342, 348.

UNDUE CONCEALMENT.

"Undue concealment," which means a fraud in the sense of a court of equity, and for which it will grant relief, is the nondisclosure of those facts and circumstances which one party is under some legal or equitable obligation to communicate, and which the other party has a right not merely in foro conscientiae, but juris et de jure, to know. Young v. Bumpass (Miss.) Freem. Ch. 241, 249 (citing 1 Story, Eq. Jur. § 207); Paul v. Hadley (N. Y.) 23 Barb. 521, 524.

UNDUE INFLUENCE.

Undue influence has been described as that which overpowers the will without convincing the judgment. In re Halbert's Will, 37 N. Y. Supp. 757, 762, 15 Misc. Rep. 308.

There can be no fatally undue influence without a person incapable of protecting himself as well as a wrongdoer to be resisted. Latham v. Udell, 38 Mich. 238, 241.

The term "undue influence" means an influence which acts to the injury of the person who is swayed by it, or of those whom he would if left to himself have benefited. In re Coleman's Estate, 40 Atl. 69, 71, 185 Pa. 437.

"Undue influence" consists (1) in the use, by one in whom a confidence is reposed by another, or who holds a real or apparent authority over him, of such confidence or authority for the purpose of obtaining an unfair advantage over him; (2) in taking an unfair advantage of another's weakness of mind; or (3) in taking a grossly oppressive and unfair advantage of another's necessities or distress. Civ. Code Mont. 1895, § 2120; Rev. St. Okl. 1903, § 746; Civ. Code Cal. 1903, § 1575; Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 3851; Civ. Code S. D. 1903, § 1204.

As deprivation of free agency.

"Undue influence" is the exercise of sufficient control over the person the validity of whose act is brought in question to destroy his free agency and constrain him to do what he would not have done if such control had not been exercised. Bennett v. Bennett, 28 Atl. 573, 576, 50 N. J. Eq. 439; Hampton v. Westcott (N. J.) 25 Atl. 254, 256, 49 N. J. Eq. (4 Dick.) 522; Trumbull v. Gibbons, 22 N. J. Law (2 Zab.) 117, 136; Stoutenburgh v. Hopkins, 12 Atl. 689, 691, 43 N. J. Eq. 577; Dumont v. Dumont, 19 Atl. 467, 470, 46 N. J. Eq. 223; Lomerson v. Johnston, 13 Atl. 8, 14, 44 N. J. Eq. 93; Brick v. Brick, 18 Atl. 58, 59, 44 N. J. Eq. 282; *Elkinton v. "Undue influence," sufficient to invalidate a will, "is that kind of influence which prevents the testator from exercising his own judgment, and substitutes in the place thereof the judgment of another." In re Black's Estate (Cal.) Myr. Prob. 24, 31; In re Low's Estate (Cal.) Myr. Prob. 143, 147; Stockton v. Thorn, 39 N. W. 143, 39 Minn. 204; Schmidt v. Schmidt, 50 N. "Undue influence" which invalidates a will is such as deprives the testator of the free exercise of his intellectual powers. Iverson v. Iverson, 80 N. Y. Supp. 1011, 1012 (citing Buchanan v. Belsey, 65 App. Div. 58, 72 N. Y. Supp. 601; Gardiner v. Gardiner, 34 N. Y. 155).

To establish undue influence, it must appear that the influence was such as to deprive testator of the free exercise of his will. Undue influence is such as to impose a restraint on the will of the testator so as to prevent him from doing what he wishes to do or forces him to do what he does not wish to do. Booth v. Kitchen (N. Y.) 3 Redf. Sur. 52, 67.

"Undue influence" means influence brought to bear by others, and is a term used in contradistinction to proper influence. It means where a person influences a man against his will, or by resorting to means and methods to overcome his will, to get him to do that which he might not do and probably would not do. Price v. Richmond & D. R. Co., 17 S. E. 732, 737, 38 S. C. 199.

As fraud.

Strictly speaking, "fraud" and "undue influence" are not synonymous expressions. Undue influence is in one sense a species of fraud, and while there are sometimes, perhaps usually, present elements of fraud, undue influence may exist without any positive fraud being shown. In re Shell's Estate, 63 Pac. 413, 28 Colo. 167, 53 L. R. A. 387, 89 Am. St. Rep. 181.

"Undue influence" is such an influence that the instrument is not properly an expression of the will of the testator in regard to the disposition of his property, but rather an expression of the will of another person. Citing In re Jackman's Will, 26 Wis. 104.

Manifestly, it is a subtle species of fraud, whereby mastery is obtained over the mind of the victim by insidious approaches, seductive artifices, or other species of circumvention. In re Slinger's Will, 37 N. W. 236, 238, 242, 72 Wis. 22.

Undue influence is a fraud; but fraud may exist without any undue influence. Undue influence need not be attended at all with deception or circumvention. Gordon v. Burris, 54 S. W. 546, 551, 153 Mo. 223.

"Undue influence" is closely allied to actual fraud, and, like the latter, when resorted to by an adroit and crafty person in his presence, often becomes extremely difficult to detect. Grove v. Spiker, 20 Atl. 144, 72 Md. 300; Frush v. Green, 39 Atl. 863, 866, 86 Md. 494.

How exercised.

"In order that a will may be avoided because of 'undue influence,' it must be an influence exercised by coercion, imposition, or fraud." In re Read's Will, 40 N. Y. Supp. 974, 975, 17 Misc. Rep. 195; In re Carroll's Will, 7 N. W. 434, 435, 50 Wis. 437; Boggs v. Boggs, 87 N. W. 39, 42, 62 Neb. 274; Seguine v. Seguine, *42 N. Y. (3 Keyes) 663, 669; Trost v. Dingler, 12 Atl. 296, 298, 118 Pa. 259, 4 Am. St. Rep. 593; In re Halbert's Will, 37 N. Y. Supp. 757, 762, 15 Misc. Rep. 308; Brick v. Brick, 18 Atl. 58, 59, 44 N. J. Eq. 282; In re Elliott's Will, 25 Ky. (2 J. J. Marsh.) 340, 343; Eckert v. Flowry, 43 Pa. (7 Wright) 46, 51; Stockton v. Thorn, 39 N. W. 143, 39 Minn. 204.

The phrase "undue influence," as used with reference to wills, has been defined to be "that which compels testator to do that which is against his will from fear, a desire for peace, or some feeling which he is unable to restrain." In re Read's Will, 40 N. Y. Supp. 974, 975, 17 Misc. Rep. 195 (citing Schouler, Wills [2d Ed.] par. 22); Seebrook v. Fedawa, 46 N. W. 650, 653, 30 Neb. 424; Patterson v. Lamb, 52 S. W. 98, 99, 21 Tex. Civ. App. 512; In re Elliott's Will, 25 Ky. (2 J. J. Marsh.) 340, 343; McFadin v. Catron, 38 S. W. 932, 935, 138 Mo. 197; Riley v. Sherwood, 45 S. W. 1077, 1080, 144 Mo. 354; Carl v. Gabel, 25 S. W. 214, 217, 120 Mo. 233; Jackson v. Hardin, 83 Mo. 175, 185; Mooney v. Olsen, 22 Kan. 69, 79; Trumbull v. Gibbons, 22 N. J. Law (2 Zab.) 117, 136; In re Low's Estate (Cal.) Myr. Prob. 143, 147.

The influence which will avoid the will of a testator must have been exerted on him to such a degree as to have amounted to force and coercion, destroying his free agency, or by importunities that could not be resisted, so that the motive was equal to force or fear. Somers v. McCreedy, 53 Atl. 1117, 1118, 96 Md. 437; Elkinton v. Brick, 15 Atl. 391, 397, 44 N. J. Eq. (17 Stew.) 154, 1 L. R. A. 161; Duffield v. Robeson (Del.) 2 Har.

375, 384; Pressley v. Kemp, 16 S. C. 334, 344, 42 Am. Rep. 635; Sehr v. Lindemann, 54 S. W. 537, 541, 153 Mo. 276; Tibbe v. Kamp, 54 S. W. 879, 889, 154 Mo. 545; *Jackson v. R. 252, 261; Appeal of Turner, 44 Atl. 310, 315, 72 Conn. 305; In re Elliott's Will, 25 Ky. (2 J. J. Marsh.) 340, 343; Mooney v. Olsen, 22 Kan. 69, 79.

In order to establish undue influence, proof must be made of some fraud practiced, some threats or misrepresentations made, some undue flattery, or some physical or moral coercion employed, so as to destroy free agency in the testator. In re Murray's Estate, 11 Pa. Co. Ct. R. 263, 264; Tawney v. Long, 76 Pa. (26 P. F. Smith) 106, 115; In re Pensyl's Estate, 27 Atl. 669, 673, 157 Pa. 465; In re Logan's Estate, 45 Atl. 729, 732, 195 Pa. 282; Herster v. Herster, 16 Atl. 342, 343, 122 Pa. 239, 9 Am. St. Rep. 95; Pennypacker v. Pennypacker (Pa.) 8 Atl. 634, 635; Trumbull v. Gibbons, 22 N. J. Law (2 Zab.) 117, 136.

In order that it may be said that an act was done under undue influence, the influence must be equivalent to moral coercion. In re Carroll's Will, 7 N. W. 434, 435, 50 Wis. 437; Boggs v. Boggs, 87 N. W. 39, 42, 62 Neb. 274; In re Blair, 16 N. Y. Supp. 874, 876, 16 Daly, 540; Elkinton v. Brick, 15 Atl. 391, 397, 44 N. J. Eq. 154, 1 L. R. A. 161; Patterson v. Lamb, 52 S. W. 98, 99, 21 Tex. Civ. App. 512; Trumbull v. Gibbons, 22 N. J. Law (2 Zab.) 117, 136.

"Undue influence" exists wherever through weakness, dependence or implicit reliance on one of the good faith of another, the latter obtains an ascendancy which prevents the former from exercising an unbiased judgment. Caven v. Agnew, 40 Atl. 480, 481, 186 Pa. 314; In re Douglass' Estate, 29 Atl. 715, 716, 162 Pa. 567.

All that can be said in the way of formulating a general rule on this subject is that whatever destroys free agency, and constrains the person whose act is brought in judgment to do what is against his will, and what he would not have done if left to himself, is "undue influence," whether the control be exercised by physical force, threats, importunity, or any other species of mental or physical coercion. The extent or degree of the influence is quite immaterial; for the test always is, was the influence, whether slight or powerful, sufficient to destroy free agency, so that the act put in judgment was the result of the domination of the mind of another, rather than the expression of the will and mind of the actor? Dumont v. Dumont, 19 Atl. 467, 470, 46 N. J. Eq. (1 Dick.) 223; Stoutenburgh v. Hopkins, 12 Atl. 689, 691, 43 N. J. Eq. (16 Stew.) 577.

"Undue influence" may be exercised by physical coercion or threats of personal harm and duress. There is another kind of undue influence more common, and that is where the mind and will of the testator have been overpowered and subjected to the will of another, so that while the testator willingly and intelligently executed a will yet it was really the will of another, induced by the overpowering influence exercised upon a weak or impaired mind. Such a will may be procured by working on the fears or hopes of a weak-minded person by artful and cunning contrivances, by constant pressure, persuasion, and effort, so that the mind of the testator is not left free to act intelligently and understandingly. Marx v. McGlynn, 88 N. Y. 357, 370; In re Brunor's Will, 43 N. Y. Supp. 1141, 1143, 19 Misc. Rep. 203.

Influence obtained by flattery, importunity, threats, superiority of will, mind, or character, or by any art which would give dominion over the mind to such an extent as to destroy free agency, is undue influence. Ormsby v. Webb, 10 Sup. Ct. 478, 485, 134 U. S. 47, 83 L. Ed. 805; Dean v. Phillips (Ky.) 61 S. W. 10, 11; Webber v. Sullivan, 12 N. W. 319, 58 Iowa, 260.

"Undue influence" sufficient to set aside a will "is any kind of influence, either from fear or coercion or importunity, by which the testator is prevented from expressing his true mind. It must be an influence adequate to control the free agency of a testator. A testator should enjoy full liberty and freedom in making his will, and possess the power to withstand all contradiction and control. That degree of importunity or undue influence which deprives a testator of his free agency, which is such as he is too weak to resist, and will render the instrument not his free or unconstrained act, is sufficient to invalidate it." In re Tittel's Estate (Cal.) Myr. Prob. 12, 16; In re Crittenden's Estate (Cal.) Myr. Prob. 50, 53.

Undue influence is a coercion produced by importunity, or by a silent, resistless power, which the strong will often exercise over the weak and infirm, and which could not be resisted so that the motive was tantamount to force or fear. Stockton v. Thorn, 39 N. W. 143, 39 Minn. 204.

Undue influence does not imply the use of physical force. Any influence, however exercised, which destroys the free agency, and substitutes the will of another for that of the person in whose name the act brought in judgment is done, is undue and wrongful. Dingman v. Romine, 42 S. W. 1087, 1088, 141 Mo. 466.

Undue influence consists in the application of some extrinsic power to control the disposing mind of the testator, so as to exhibit as his testament what was not his free will. Bacon calls it "by fear, fraud, or flattery." 7 Bac. 303. In this state fear, fraud, or flattery, when applied to constrain, circumvent, or cajole the testator, has been called "undue influence." Farr v. Thompson (S. C.) 1 Speers, 93, 108.

Importunity which cannot be resisted or which is yielded to for the sake of peace amounts to coercion and the destruction of free agency. But the mere suggestion to a testator that an indicated testamentary provision would be productive of justice among the natural objects of his bounty cannot be said to destroy the freedom of the will. To attempt to persuade a testator, however, is treading on dangerous ground; for it is impossible to distinguish by rule between actions which are within the bounds of legitimate influence and acts which make the influence undue. Their effect must depend upon the relations between the parties, and the character, strength, and condition of each, and must be determined by the application of sound sense to the facts in each given case. Under these principles, undue influence was not established where it appeared that only a part of the suggestions made by the person alleged to have unduly influenced the testator were carried out by him, and that such person was excluded from the room while the will was made, and that the suggestion itself, so far as carried out, was in line with the desires of the testator. Elkinton v. Brick, 15 Atl. 391, 397, 44 N. J. Eq. (17 Stew.) 154, 1 L. R. A. 161.

A pressure which does not amount to duress at common law may be considered in equity as sufficient to set aside or rescind a contract. Whenever a contract is procured by such influences as overcome the free agency by the contracting party, whether parent or child, husband or wife, such influences afford an equitable defense. When the creditor of a husband induces a wife to join with her husband on a mortgage of her real estate to secure his debt, by telling her that her husband has been guilty of the crime of embezzlement and can be imprisoned for it, and that another who was interested had just said he would see him in jail before he would do anything to relieve him, and where it appears that such statements created fear or just apprehension, the reasonable conclusion is that the free agency of the wife was overcome, and that the execution of the mortgage was obtained by undue pressure. Lomerson v. Johnson, 13 Atl. 8, 14, 44 N. J. Eq. (17 Stew.) 93.

Influence obtained by flattery, importunity, superiority of will, mind, or character, or by what art soever, that human thought, ingenuity, or cunning may employ, which would give dominion over the will of the testator, to such an extent as to destroy the free agency, or constrain him to do against his will what he is unable to refuse, is such an influence as the law condemns as undue when exercised by any one immediately over the testamentary act, whether by direction or indirection, or obtained at one time or another. In re Disbrow's Estate, 24 N. W. 624, 629, 58 Mich. 98.

To constitute "undue influence" in procuring execution of a will, the mind of the testator must be so controlled or affected by persuasion or pressure, artful or fraudulent contrivances, or by the insidious influence of persons in close confidential relations with him, that he is not left to act intelligently, understandingly, and voluntarily, but becomes subject to the will or purposes of another. Mitchell v. Mitchell, 44 N. W. 885, 886, 43 Minn. 73.

"Undue influence" and importunity sufficient to invalidate a will may be exercised without the existence of fraud. A testator may entertain an unreasonable and unjust prejudice against one nearly connected with him, as a daughter who has married against his will, or a son who has offended him by neglecting his advice in a matter in which a child is not necessarily obliged to yield his convictions. In such a case undue influence may be exerted by an interested person simply by the mention of the facts of the case, and that, too, under the guise of remonstrance against leaving a smaller portion to the object of the testator's displeasure. The suggestion itself may suffice to rouse the sleeping hostility, and result in the disinheritance of the child in favor of the suggestor, and yet it would be difficult to find in such facts evidence sufficiently strong to the apprehension of the jury to induce them to denounce the influence thus exerted as fraudulent. Stewart v. Elliott (U. S.) 2 Mackey, 307, 319.

Gratitude, affection, etc.

The influence of gratitude, affection, or attachment, or the desire of gratifying the wishes of another, do not amount to undue influence. Jackson v. Hardin, 83 Mo. 175, 185; McFadin v. Catron, 38 S. W. 932, 935, 138 Mo. 197; Riley v. Sherwood, 45 S. W. 1077, 1080, 144 Mo. 366; Tibbe v. Kamp, 54 S. W. 879, 889, 154 Mo. 545; Sehr v. Lindemann, 54 S. W. 537, 541, 153 Mo. 276; Campbell v. Carlisle, 63 S. W. 701, 704, 162 Mo. 634; Williams v. Goude, 3 Eccl. R. 252, 261; Duffield v. Robeson (Del.) 2 Har. 375, 384; In re Disbrow's Estate, 24 N. W. 624, 629, 58 Mich. 96; Patterson v. Lamb, 52 S. W. 98, 99, 21 Tex. Civ. App. 512; Seguini v. Seguini, *42 N. Y. (3 Keyes) 663, 669; In re Halbert's Will, 37 N. Y. Supp. 757, 762, 15 Misc. Rep. 308; In re Gleespin's Will, 20 N. J. Eq. (11 C. E. Green) 523, 526; In re Elliott's Will, 25 Ky. (2 J. J. Marsh.) 340, 343.

Solicitations, however importunate, cannot of themselves constitute undue influence, for, though these may have a constraining effect, they do not destroy testator's power to freely dispose of his estate. Patterson v. Lamb, 52 S. W. 98, 99, 21 Tex. Civ. App. 512; Trost v. Dingler, 12 Atl. 296, 298, 118 Pa. 259, 4 Am. St. Rep. 593.

Mere solicitation will not be sufficient to vitiate a will made by a person having a knowledge of what he was doing, and intending to do it, though his act may be brought about by solicitation, or that kind of influence which a disposition to gratify another may produce. Sutton v. Sutton (Del.) 5 Har. 459, 461.

Mere advice, persuasion, or entreaty do not constitute "undue influence"; certainly not where there is no fraud, no deceit, no duress, or other improper or prohibited means. In Yoe v. McCord, 74 Ill. 33, 34, the court said: "To avoid a will, the influence which is exercised must be undue, and this, in the legal sense, is something wrongful; a species of fraud." Bowdoin College v. Merritt (U. S.) 75 Fed. 480, 511.

Mere kindness of treatment of testatrix by the legatee would not, nor would moderate and reasonable solicitation and entreaty or persuasion, when yielded to intelligently, from a sense of duty, and without constraint, vitiate a will in other respects valid, on the ground of undue influence. Appeal of Turner, 44 Atl. 310, 315, 72 Conn. 805.

Appeals to the affection, modest persuasion, or arguments addressed to the understanding which do not destroy his free agency, but leave the testator to act in accordance with his own will, do not constitute "undue influence." Barlow v. Waters (Ky.) 23 S. W. 785, 786.

A person has a perfect right, by kindness, by attentions—even though that may be the ulterior motive which governs him—to prevail upon a person to devise to him what perhaps, without the appeals of kindness and the manner towards him, he would not have done. That is proper and lawful, and a will would be perfectly legal made under those circumstances; but if that will were made by reason of any person being taken advantage of by reason of weakness, of disease, of threats, so that the party is not able to avoid this influence, and is prevented from freely exercising his own will, then that would be undue influence. Ethridge v. Bennett (Del.) 81 Atl. 813, 815, 9 Houst. 295.

"Undue influence" means wrongful influence, but influence secured through affection, and though a deed be made to a child at his solicitation and because of partiality and affection for him, it will not be undue influence. Burt v. Juisenberry, 24 N. E. 622, 624, 132 Ill. 385.

Merely urging gratitude, love, esteem, affection, or charity, so that the mind of the testator is left free to act and arrive at its own conclusions, is legitimate. These motives are entitled to their proper weight, and it is for the testator to determine how far they shall influence him in disposing of his property. Stockton v. Thorn, 39 N. W. 143, 39 Minn. 204.

"Undue influence" implies something more than mere advice, argument, or persuasion; but if the advice, argument, and persuasion be so importunate and persistent or otherwise so operates as to subdue and subordinate the will of the testator to the will of another, until the testamentary instrument speaks, not his own mind and purpose, but the wish and purpose of another, such advice, argument, and persuasion constitutes undue influence. In re Blair, 16 N. Y. Supp. 874, 876, 16 Daly, 540.

Influence gained by kindness and affection will not be regarded as undue if no imposition or fraud be practiced, even though it induces the testator to make unequal and unjust disposition of his property in favor of those who had contributed to his comfort and ministered to his wants, if such disposition is voluntarily made. Mackall v. Mackall, 10 Sup. Ct. 705, 707, 135 U. S. 167, 34 L. Ed. 84.

Purpose of influence.

The undue influence which will invalidate a will must be an influence exercised in relation to the will itself, not an influence in relation to other matters or transactions. Pennypacker v. Pennypacker (Pa.) 8 Atl. 634, 635; Seebrock v. Fedawa, 46 N. W. 650, 653, 30 Neb. 424.

Relation to and capacity of person influenced.

There is no rule which discourages the exercise by a wife of any such wifely influence over a husband as does not indicate that he is incapable of protecting himself adequately from her compulsion, and is practically not a free agent. Latham v. Udell, 38 Mich. 238, 241 (cited in Pierce v. Pierce, Id. 412).

The mere fact that a son to whom his father willed practically all his property had lived with and taken care of his parents in their old age is not evidence of "undue influence." Aylward v. Briggs, 47 S. W. 510, 513, 145 Mo. 604.

Where it is shown that a will was written by an attorney in his office in the form suggested by the husband of the testatrix, who was the sole devisee therein, with a direction that he should educate their grandson, but as thus written was read over to the testatrix, and assented to by her in the presence of the attorney and the parties who witnessed it before execution, in the absence of any affirmative proof of want of mental capacity on the part of testatrix, or evidence of undue influence on the part of the husband, the mere fact that the husband gave directions for the drawing of the will will not be grounds sufficient for refusing to admit it to probate. Armstrong v. Armstrong, 23 N. W. 407, 410, 411, 63 Wis. 162.

As bearing on the question of undue influence, the relationship of the parties to each other, the mental condition of the person whose act is in question, and the character of the transaction should be taken into consideration. If the relation of confidence and trust between the parties to the transaction exists, if the mind of the one nominally acting is weak and susceptible, and if the transaction results beneficially to the party charged and detrimental to the person in whose name the act was done, a presumption of undue influence is raised. Indeed, the presence of the relation of confidence and trust is generally sufficient to raise a presumption of undue influence; and if the party acting be of weak mind, and there is either no consideration or a very inadequate one, a presumption against its validity arises. Dingman v. Romine, 42 S. W. 1087, 1088, 141 Mo. 466.

The influence of a wife or child, if exerted in a fair and reasonable manner, is not unlawful. In order to be unlawful, it must be exerted to produce a result which the party, as a reasonable person, was bound to know was unreasonable and unjust, and it must have the effect of producing illusion or confusion in the mind of the testator. In re Jackman's Will, 26 Wis. 104, 113.

Taking advantage of one's position or the good opinion of the party confiding in one to the disadvantage of some other or his estate amounts to undue influence. O'Neil v. O'Neil, 14 N. W. 89, 60 Iowa, 57; Hanna v. Wilcox, 5 N. W. 717, 719, 53 Iowa, 547; Watkins v. Brant, 1 N. W. 82, 86, 46 Wis. 419.

The use by one in whom a confidence is reposed by another, or who holds a real or apparent authority over him, of such confidence or authority for the purpose of obtaining an unfair advantage over him, taking an unfair advantage of another's weakness of mind, or taking a grossly oppressive or unfair advantage of another's necessities or distress, constitutes undue influence. Civ. Code, § 1575; Dolliver v. Dolliver, 30 Pac. 4, 5, 94 Cal. 642.

"Undue influence" is defined in Civ. Code, § 1575, subd. 1, to consist in the use by one in whom confidence is reposed by another, or who holds a real or apparent authority over the other, of such confidence or authority for the purpose of obtaining an unfair advantage over him. Dimond v. Sanderson, 37 Pac. 189, 191, 103 Cal. 97.

Confidential relations existing between testator and beneficiary do not alone furnish any presumption of undue influence. Mackall v. Mackall, 10 Sup. Ct. 703, 707, 135 U. S. 167, 34 L. Ed. 84.

Where a testator had taken great interest in his church and contributed liberally to its support, expressing an intention to secure it an annual income equal to his subscription, the fact that he had already in his will given the church money for a new building, and was advanced in years and feeble in body and mind, does not justify the setting aside, on the ground of undue influence, of a codicil executed long after the will, and just before testator's death, bequeathing to the church an additional sum sufficient to produce an income equal to testator's annual subscription. In re Shannon's Will, 42 N. Y. Supp. 670, 673, 11 App. Div. 581.

"Undue influence," in the legal and proper sense of the term, cannot be exerted over an insane or unconscious person. Undue influence presupposes testamentary capacity if the testator were left free from such undue influence. Stirling v. Stirling, 21 Atl. 273, 275, 64 Md. 138.

There may be undue influence without absolute imbecility or other testamentary incapacity. A person may possess some mind, and yet be at the mercy of designing persons. In re Rollwagen (N. Y.) 48 How. Prac. 289, 310.

It is not necessary, in order to prove undue influence, that the mind shall be shown to be so weak as to render the person upon whom the influence is exercised incapable of attending to ordinary business. Ormsby v. Webb, 10 Sup. Ct. 478, 485, 184 U. S. 47, 33 L. Ed. 805.

The degree of influence necessary to control the mind of the testator must depend upon, and be proportionate to, the mental and physical strength or weakness of the testator. Pritchard v. Henderson (Del.) 50 Atl. 217, 223, 3 Pennewill, 128.

Those of feeble mind being more easily subjected to improper influence, the condition of the mind of the testator is always a proper subject of inquiry in connection with the allegation of undue influence. In re Douglass' Estate, 29 Atl. 715, 716, 162 Pa. 567.

Inducing an old and feeble person to do that which is for his own good is not undue influence, even though an advantage results therefrom to the one exercising such influence. Dailey v. Kastell, 14 N. W. 635, 56 Wis. 444.

If from age or imbecility, a testator could be induced to change his will contrary to his intentions and against his own wishes, that would be undue influence, and its effect upon doubtful or fluctuating capacity would invalidate the will. Sutton v. Sutton (Del.) 5 Har. 459, 461.

While the extreme age, helplessness, and consequent susceptibility of the testator are important factors in the ascertainment of the undue influence, yet it is not to be inferred from either age, sickness, or debility of body, if sufficient intelligence remains. Jackson v. Hardin, 83 Mo. 175, 185.

Where a conveyance was made by a weak and sickly young man to a woman older than himself, and who had been to him as a mother, a presumption arose that such conveyance was obtained by means of undue influence. Appeal of Worrall, 1 Atl. 380, 385, 110 Pa. 349.

The law does not permit undue influence to be inferred from the mere fact that one who is to profit by the instrument had an opportunity to impress his will upon the mind of the testator. There must be some evidence tending to show that an undue influence was actually exerted. Smith's Ex'r v. Smith, 32 Atl. 255, 67 Vt. 443; Riley v. Sherwood, 144 Mo. 354, 366, 45 S. W. 1077, 1080.

It is not evidence of undue influence that testator's son, who was the preferred beneficiary under the will, arranged for the execution of the will without the knowledge of his sister. In re Logan's Estate, 45 Atl. 729, 732, 195 Pa. 282.

Time of exerting influence.

Undue influence, to affect a will, must destroy the free agency, and operate on the mind of the testator at the time of making the will. Herster v. Herster, 16 Atl. 342, 343, 122 Pa. 239, 9 Am. St. Rep. 95; Smith's Ex'r v. Smith, 32 Atl. 255, 67 Vt. 443; In re Shepardson's Estate, 18 N. W. 575, 578, 53 Mich. 106; Schmidt v. Schmidt, 50 N. W. 598, 600, 47 Minn. 451; In re Nelson's Will, 39 N. W. 143, 39 Minn. 204; Ivison v. Ivison, 80 N. Y. Supp. 1011, 1012, 80 App. Div. 599; Gardiner v. Gardiner, 34 N. Y. 155; Eckert v. Flowry, 43 Pa. (7 Wright) 46, 51; In re Logan's Estate, 45 Atl. 729, 732, 195 Pa. 282; In re Pensyl's Will, 27 Atl. 669, 673, 157 Pa. 465; McMahon v. Ryan, 20 Pa. (8 Harris) 329; In re Douglass' Estate, 29 Atl. 715, 716, 162 Pa. 567; In re Low's Estate (Cal.) Myr. Prob. 143, 147; Trost v. Dingler, 12 Atl. 296, 298, 118 Pa. 259, 4 Am. St. Rep. 593. But the pressure may have been brought to bear previously, and if it remained so as to coerce the mind of the testator at the time the will was executed it cannot be upheld as his act. In re Shepardson's Estate, 18 N. W. 575, 578, 53 Mich. 106.

UNDUE PREFERENCE.

Under the prison bounds act, providing that no person shall be entitled to relief who shall, within three months prior to his arrest, have paid any part of his estate to one creditor in preference to another, and that, on the trial of an accusation of the violation of the act, where any person is charged with an undue preference, it may be tried by a jury, a preference, to be undue, must be fraudulent, and a confession of judgment cannot amount to undue preference. Robinsons v. Amy (S. C.) 1 Rich. Law, 289, 292, 293.

The expression "undue or unreasonable preference or advantage," as used in Ky. St. § 818, making it unlawful for any corporation to make or give any undue or unreasonable preference or advantage to any particular person or locality in the transportation of a like kind of traffic, is too indefinite and uncertain in its meaning to constitute a valid regulation of internal commerce. Commonwealth v. Louisville & N. R. Co. (Ky.) 46 S. W. 700, 701.

UNDUE PREJUDICE.

In Cavanah v. State, 56 Miss. 299, 307, it was said that the undue prejudice meant by the statute authorizing a change of venue in a criminal case for such a cause, was such as was likely to be so felt in the jury box as to prevent the accused from having a fair and impartial trial by the evidence and the law. Owens v. State, 33 South. 722, 723, 82 Miss. 31.

UNDUTIFUL WILL.

The civil law defines an inofficious and undutiful will to be such as substantially departs from the disposition of the estate as it would be distributed in case of intestacy; but such a definition is entirely inconsistent with the law of wills as recognized and established in this country, for the authority to make a will implies the power to discriminate between or disinherit next of kin. Stein v. Wilzinski (N. Y.) 4 Redf. Sur. 441, 450.

UNEARNED PREMIUMS.

The term "unearned premiums" intends the liability of an insurance company upon its insurance contracts, other than accrued claims, computed by the established rules of valuation. Rev. Laws Mass. 1902, p. 1120, c. 118, § 1.

The term "unearned premiums" intends the liability of an insurance company upon its insurance contracts, other than accrued claims, computed by rules of valuation established by other provisions of the act. Shannon's Code Tenn. 1896, § 3274.

The terms "unearned premiums," and "reinsurance reserved," and "liability reserved," and "net value of policies," or "premium reserved," as used in the article of the Code relating to the Department of Insurance, severally intend the liability of an insurance company upon its insurance contracts, other than accrued claims, computed by rules of valuation established by section 2583. Civ. Code Ala. 1896, § 2575.

UNEMBARRASSED.

The idea of the word "unembarrassed," as used by the judge in reference to the property of a debtor, is not that property may not be at all incumbered by mortgage. It imports, rather, property of which the debtor's title is not invalid or seriously questionable, or is not so subject to equitable claims, or is not so incumbered by mortgage as to render the attachment and levy on it fruitless of substantial benefit to the creditor. Moore v. Quint, 44 Vt. 97, 110.

UNEMPLOYED.

A bequest in a will of "money left unemployed" included a sum of trust moneys in which the testatrix had a vested reversionary interest at the time of her death, subject to be divested by the appointment of her mother. Ommanney v. Butcher, 1 Turn. & R. 260, 266.

UNEQUAL

"Unequal," as used in Organic Act, § 6, providing that there shall not be any unequal discrimination in taxing different kinds of property, is synonymous with the word "unfair." Pryor v. Bryan, 66 Pac. 848, 852, 11 Okl. 357.

UNEQUIVOCALLY.

"Unequivocally" means without doubt; without room to doubt. Webster. An instruction that the intent to dedicate "must be unequivocally and satisfactorily proven" is a stronger expression than "beyond all reasonable doubt"; much stronger than "clear conviction." Shugart v. Halliday, 2 Ill. App. 45, 51.

UNEXECUTED WRIT.

Unexecuted writs, within Revision, p. 1105, § 35, requiring that a sheriff must turn over to his successor in office all "unexecuted writs," are those on which nothing has been done. Hunt v. Swayze, 25 Atl. 850, 852, 55 N. J. Law (26 Vroom) 83.

UNEXPENDED.

"Unexpended," as used in Gen. St. c. 73, § 21, as amended by Act March 20, 1876, § 1, providing that commissioners of lunatic asylums shall report to the State Auditor any "unexpended balance" in their hands, means undisposed of. One of the meanings given by all lexicographers of "expend" is "to dispose of," and where the board had exercised the power which they possessed, and had set apart the money then on hand for a specific purpose, it was no longer unexpended, within the fair meaning of the statute. Norman v. Central Kentucky Lunatic Asylum, 17 S. W. 150, 152, 92 Ky. 16.

Acts 1883, § 4, providing that "any unexpended balance" that may be in the state treasury to the credit of the military fund on the 1st day of July, 1883, shall be transferred, on the warrant of the Auditor of Public Accounts, to the general revenue fund, should not be construed to include every part of the fund which has not been actually paid out of the treasury prior to the 1st day of July, without regard to existing claims against it, however just and well founded, but it means whatever may remain of the fund after the payment of all proper and just claims against it which accrued during the year ending on, and including the whole of, the 30th day of June, and the fact that a part of these claims had not been actually paid on the 1st of July will make no difference in this respect. People v. Swigert, 107 Ill. 494, 499.

UNEXPIRED TERM.

An unexpired term, within the meaning of Const. art. 4, § 6, declaring that, whenever during a recess of the Senate a vacancy shall occur in any office which is by law one which the Governor has a right of appointment, he shall appoint some one who shall hold the office for the unexpired term of the person whose place he is appointed to fill, means during the time which the latter would have continued in the office if a vacancy had not occurred. People v. Osborne, 4 Pac. 1074, 1077, 7 Colo. 605.

In a by-law providing that, in case of vacancy in the board of directors, the directors shall fill the vacancy for the "unexpired term," the reference to an unexpired term presupposes a previous incumbent. In re A. A. Griffing Iron Co., 41 Atl. 931, 933, 63 N. J. Law, 168.

UNFAIR.

The epithets "unfairly and secretly computed," "unjustly and unfairly attempted," and "artfully and purposely framed," used in regard to the official acts of the cashier of a bank, did not necessarily imply moral obliquity, and therefore are not slanderous per se. Kerr v. Force (U. S.) 14 Fed. Cas. 386, 387, 396.

"Unfair use," in connection with the right of the owner of a mill privilege, who has improved the same, to construe the law as protecting him against any unfair use by any other owner who may establish a mill above him, is equivalent of "unreasonable use." Mason v. Hoyle, 14 Atl. 786, 788, 56 Conn. 255.

UNFAIR COMPETITION.

With respect to articles placed upon the market for sale, it is only when the one article is dressed so as to represent the other, and to deceive a proposing purchaser as being that other, that there can be said to be a case of "unfair trade." Sterling Remedy Co. v. Eureka Chemical & Mfg. Co. (U. S.) 80 Fed. 105, 108, 25 C. C. A. 314.

The doctrine of unfair competition in trade rests on the proposition that equity will not permit any one to palm off his goods on the public as those of another. Unfair competition in trade, as distinguished from infringement of trade-marks, does not involve the violation of any exclusive right to the use of trade-marks or symbols. The word may be purely descriptive, and the mark or symbol indicative only of style, size, shape, or quality, and, as such, open to the public. Yet there may be unfair competition in trade by an improper use of such mark or symbol. Dennison Mfg. Co. v. Thomas Mfg. Co. (U. S.) 94 Fed. 651, 656.

The term "unfair competition in trade" includes the simulation by defendant of the packages of plaintiff, putting up and selling packages of the same general appearance as those of the plaintiff. The court will only interfere to protect the plaintiff and the public, and for the suppression of unfair and dishonest competition, when "the resemblance is such that it is calculated to deceive, and does in fact deceive, the ordinary buyer, making his purchases under the ordinary conditions which prevail in the conduct of the particular traffic to which the controversy relates." T. B. Dunn Co. v. Trix Mfg. Co., 63 N. Y. Supp. 833, 835, 50 App. Div. 75.

UNFAIR PROCEEDINGS.

The meaning of "proceedings unfair," in Code Civ. Proc. § 1552, providing for the confirmation of a sale by an administrator, but, if the proceedings were unfair, the court may vacate the sale, means evidently some irregularity as to the notice, or fraud or collusion among bidders. In re Leonis' Estate (Cal.) 71 Pac. 171, 173 (citing In re Sprigg's Estate, 20 Cal. 121).

UNFAITHFULNESS.

Within Gen. St. 1894, § 2600, providing that any officer, director, or member of a corporation is liable for corporate debts when he is guilty of any fraud, unfaithfulness, or dishonesty in the discharge of the official duty, the word "unfaithfulness" was intended to include negligence as well as bad faith, and will be construed according to the doctrine of nosctur a sociis, in connection with the words "fraud or dishonesty." First Nat. Bank v. Harper, 63 N. W. 1079, 1083, 61 Minn. 375.

Unfaithfulness in the transaction of the business of a corporation by an officer, director, or stockholder, for which he may be held liable for corporate debts, as provided by the statute, does not mean mere neglect arising out of a failure to carefully oversee and superintend corporate affairs on strict business principles—such a failure as may really and solely be attributable to incompetency or lack of business qualifications. Rice v. Madelia Farmers' Warehouse Co. (Minn.) 92 N. W. 225, 226.

UNFENCED.

A petition alleging that a railroad was "unfenced" at the place where plaintiff's cattle were killed means that no fence existed at the time the cattle were killed, and describes the condition of the absence of the fence caused by the removal or destruction of one existing before. Fritz v. Kansas City, C. B. & St. J. R. Co., 16 N. W. 144, 145, 61 Iowa, 323.

UNFINISHED BUSINESS.

Const. art. 11, par. 7, providing that the books, papers, and proceedings of the county courts, and the "unfinished business" thereof, shall be transferred to the superior courts, and shall be finished and performed by the latter courts, will be construed to include a case in which a verdict has been returned, but in which no judgment has been rendered, and hence such cause should be transferred to the superior courts. Foster v. Daniels, 39 Ga. 39, 40.

UNFIT FOR CULTIVATION.

Act Cong. March 7, 1857, confirming to the several states the swamp and overflowed lands "unfit for cultivation," refers to land that has not the capacity to produce a staple crop as the result of cultivation. Keeran v. Allen, 33 Cal. 542, 547.

Act June 3, 1878 (Supp. Rev. St. 328, § 1), providing for the sale of lands in California, Nevada, Oregon, and Washington Territory which are valuable chiefly for timber, but "unfit for cultivation," cannot be construed as meaning incapable of being made fit for cultivation. United States v. Budd (U. S.) 43 Fed. 630, 631.

UNFORESEEN CAUSE.

A charter party, by which the owner of the ship agreed that she should proceed direct to a certain place, and there load a complete cargo of guano, the charterers to ship bags and other materials requisite for loading the ship, and to supply stores, but, in the event of the vessel being lost, or any other "unforeseen causes" preventing the completion of the charter party, the owner agreed to pay the charterers the amount of their disbursements for stores. Held, that the fact of no guano being found was not an unforeseen cause preventing the completion of the charter party, within the meaning of the agreement. The parties contemplated that the freight might possibly never become payable, and therefore made this stipulation in regard to the repayment of advances by the charterers, but this clause had no reference to the positive contract to load a full cargo. Hills v. Sughrue, 15 Mees. & W. 253, 262.

UNFORESEEN EVENT.

The words "unforeseen event," as used in the Louisiana statutes in reference to the abatement of rent in the case of an unforeseen event, are synonymous with the words "fortuitous event." Viterbo v. Friedlander, 7 Sup. Ct. 962, 973, 120 U. S. 707, 30 L. Ed. 776.

The term "unforeseen event," in a clause of a lease entitling the lessee to credit for the unexpired term of the lease on the destruction of the property by fire, or the deprivation of the use by some other unforeseen event, does not apply to the passage of a Sunday law which forbids the use of the property rented to the particular use to which the lessee applies it. Abadie v. Berges, 6 South. 529, 530, 41 La. Ann. 281.

UNFORESEEN PERIL.

The words "unforeseen peril" do not describe a peril recklessly incurred. Schwannewede v. North Hudson County Ry. Co., 51 Atl. 696, 67 N. J. Law, 449.

UNFUNDED.

The Dictionary Britannica, under the title of "National Debt," in drawing the distinction between a funded debt, which term is said to apply to a debt which is recognized at least as quasi permanent, and for the payment of the interest on which legal provision is made, says that unfunded or floating debt, on the other hand, means strictly loans for which no permanent provision is required to be made, which have been obtained for temporary purposes, with the intention of paying them off within a brief period. Exchequer and treasury bills are included in this category, and such other moneys in the hands of a government as it may be required to reimburse at any moment. People v. Carpenter, 52 N. Y. Supp. 781, 783, 31 App. Div. 603.

UNGOVERNABLE PASSIONS.

The expression in an instruction, "excite ungovernable passions," is substantially the same as the expression "excite the passions beyond control," for, if ungovernable passions have been excited, they are necessarily beyond control. Cook v. Commonwealth (Ky.) 72 S. W. 283, 284.

UNIFORM.

"Uniform" means unvariable; resembling itself at all times; conforming to one rule or mode. Attorney General v. Winnebago Lake & F. R. Plankroad Co., 11 Wis. 35, 40.

UNIFORM OPERATION OF LAWS.

The constitutional provision that general laws shall be of uniform operation throughout the state requires that laws shall operate in all parts of the state where are found the conditions which are the subject of the legislation. State v. Bargus, 41 N. E. 245, 247, 53 Ohio St. 94, 53 Am. St. Rep. 628.

"Uniform operation" does not mean universal, but simply that the effect of general laws shall be the same to and upon all persons who stand in the same relation to the law; that is, all the facts of whose cases are substantially the same. Hellman v. Shoulters, 44 Pac. 915, 918, 114 Cal. 136.

The constitutional requirement is complied with when the law operates uniformly on all persons who are brought within the relations and circumstances provided by it. Crovatt v. Mason, 28 S. E. 891, 893, 101 Ga. 246.

"Uniform operation" means an operation which is equal in its effect on all persons or things on which the law is designed to operate at all. Brooks v. Hyde, 37 Cal. 366, 375 (citing Bourland v. Hildreth, 26 Cal. 162; French v. Teschemaker, 24 Cal. 544).

The constitutional provision that all laws of a general nature shall be uniform in their operation means that all laws of this character shall, as near as possible, affect persons and property alike. People v. Coleman, 4 Cal. 46, 55, 60 Am. Dec. 581.

"Uniform operation" does not mean operation on every person in the state, but on every person who is brought within the relations and circumstances provided for. The operation is uniform when it affects alike all persons in a like situation, and the fact of uniform operation is not affected by the number of persons within the scope of such operation. McAulich v. Mississippi & M. R. Co., 20 Iowa, 338, 342.

"Uniform operation" means that the same rule shall apply to all persons placed in the same circumstances. It does not prescribe one rule for one citizen or soldier, and another for his neighbor, if they are in the same situation. We have a statute regulating continuances on account of the absence of witnesses which gives a uniform right to all litigants, and yet one may be entitled to a continuance, and another not. This results not because a different rule is prescribed for each, but because one brings himself within its terms, and the other does not. Laws 1862, c. 109, § 1, providing that all actions now pending shall be continued on a showing that the defendant is in the actual military service of the United States or of the state during the actual continuance of the defendant in such service, is not invalid as not being of uniform operation. McCormick v. Rusch, 15 Iowa, 127, 129, 83 Am. Dec. 401.

The constitutional provision that general laws shall be uniform in their operation is to be construed to mean that such laws shall bear equally in their burdens and benefits upon persons standing in the same category, but this category depends upon the facts which characterize the offense. Every defendant is not entitled to the same privileges or subject to the same burdens as every other. For instance, some are entitled to bail, and others are not, and this depends upon the particular facts characterizing the imputed crime. When we speak of uniformity in the operation of a law, we speak of that operation which is equal under the same facts, for what justice or uniformity would there be in applying the same rigor of remedy or the same measure of punishment to all conditions of fact or degrees of criminality merely because there existed a similarity or identity in the general charge? To treat one man different from another man, to deny one man a privilege extended to another man, is not partiality. It may be a just discrimination. To constitute partiality and the invidious discrimination against which the Constitution aims, the denial to another of what is given to one must be made upon substantially the same facts, or, to express the idea differently, the denial must be of the same claim before accorded. People v. Judge of Twelfth Dist., 17 Cal. 547, 554.

The constitutional requirement that all laws of a general nature shall have a uniform operation throughout the state is violated by a general statute to restore to the court of common pleas the jurisdiction of minor offenses in certain counties of the state. Kelley v. State, 6 Ohio St. 269, 271.

The test of a statute as to uniform operation, and with respect to the required conformity to the law of the land and to the requirement of due process of law, seems to be that if the law under consideration operates equally upon all who come within the class to be affected, embracing all persons who are or may be in like situation and circumstances, and the designation of a class is reasonable—not unjust or capricious or arbitrary, but based upon a real distinction—the law does not operate uniformly; and if, added to this, the law is enforced by usual and appropriate methods, the requirement as to due process of law is satisfied. State v. Hogan, 58 N. E. 572, 573, 63 Ohio St. 202, 52 L. R. A. 863, 81 Am. St. Rep. 626.

"Uniform operation" does not involve, as an essential, identity of time, so as to make it necessary that it take effect at the same time upon all subjects to be governed by it. If a law operates equally on all the objects embraced within it, when they come within the circle or scope of its authority, the uniform operation contemplated by the Constitution is attained. A general law to fill vacancies in office cannot be void for want of uniformity in operation because such vacancies must occur at different periods. People v. Henshaw, 18 Pac. 413, 416, 76 Cal. 436.

Laws are general and uniform, not because they operate upon every person in the state, for they do not, but because every person that is brought within the relations and circumstances provided for is within the law. They are general and uniform in their operation upon all persons in the like situation, and the fact of their being general and uniform is not affected by the number of those within the scope of their operation. Arms v. Ayer, 61 N. E. 851, 855, 192 Ill. 601, 58 L. R. A. 277, 85 Am. St. Rep. 357.

The term "uniform operation throughout the state" means universal operation as to territory. It takes in the whole state, and, as to persons and things, it means universal operation as to all persons and things in the same condition or category. Where a law is available in every part of the state as to all persons in the same condition or category, it is of universal operation throughout the state. State v. Spellmire, 65 N. E. 619, 622, 67 Ohio St. 77.

A law is general and uniform if all persons in the same circumstances are treated alike. D. H. Davis Coal Co. v. Polland, 62 N. E. 492, 496, 158 Ind. 607, 92 Am. St. Rep. 319.

UNIFORM RATE OF TAXATION.

If the rate of assessment and taxation be equal, it is conceived it will be uniform; that is, that no meaning can be attached to the word "uniform" that is not conveyed by the word "equal." If the rate is everywhere equal, it will be uniform, necessarily. If the rate is varying, so that property of different kinds or in different localities is valued or taxed at different rates, the rate will be unequal, and so not uniform; but, so far as it is equal, it will also be uniform. Crawford v. Linn County, 5 Pac. 738, 739, 11 Or. 482.

The words "uniform rate of assessment and taxation," in the constitutional provision that the Legislature shall provide by law for a uniform and equal rate of assessment and taxation, mean that all ad valorem taxes shall be of a uniform rate or percentage, and that one species of taxable property shall not pay a higher rate of taxes than other kinds of property. State v. Estabrook, 8 Nev. 173, 177.

UNIFORM RULE OF TAXATION.

The constitutional requirement that property shall be assessed for taxes under general laws and by uniform rules, according to its true value, means that the same regulations shall be applied to every member of each class which the general laws recognized or established. The expression "uniform rules" is not of wider import than the expression general laws, and, if the latter may be confined to a class, with equal propriety may the former. Indeed, strictly speaking, a prescript may be a uniform rule without prevailing over even a class, for it would be a rule if designed for the government of a single individual, and, if designed for the government of more than one, could be called a uniform rule, but such an interpretation would be too narrow for this constitutional phrase. This signification of the word "uniform" is common. Thus the laws of nature are uniform, although none of them is universal, and many operate on single classes only. The federal Constitution provides that all duties imposed and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States, yet these taxes have always been levied in diverse methods and amounts upon the different classes of property and business. State Board of Assessors v. Central R. Co., 4 Atl. 578, 590, 48 N. J. Law (19 Vroom) 146.

Uniform rules for taxation are rules which fix a common standard for the assessment of taxes for the state and all its political subdivisions. Vreeland v. Jersey City, 43 N. J. Law, 135, 138.

Taxing is required to be by a uniform rule; that is, by one and the same unvarying standard. Taxing by a uniform rule requires uniformity not only in the rate of taxation, but also uniformity in the mode of the assessment upon the taxable valuation.

Uniformity in taxing implies equality in the burden of taxation, and this equality of burden cannot exist without uniformity in the mode of the assessment as well as in the rate of taxation. But this is not all. The uniformity must be coextensive with the territory to which it is applied. If a state tax, it must be uniform over all the state. If a county, town, or city tax, it must be uniform throughout the extent of the territory to which it applies. But the uniformity in the rule required by the Constitution does not stop here. It must be extended to all property subject to taxation, so that all property may be taxed alike, equally, which is taxing by a uniform rule. Exchange Bank of Columbus v. Hines, 3 Ohio St. 1, 15 (cited in Attorney General v. Winnebago Lake & F. R. Plank Road Co., 11 Wis. 42); Gilman v. City of Sheboygan, 67 U. S. (2 Black) 510, 517, 17 L. Ed. 305.

"Taxing by uniform rule" means by one and the same unvarying standard; uniformity not only in the rate of taxation, but uniformity in the mode of assessment by which the value is ascertained. There must be an equality of burden. This uniformity must be coextensive with the territory to which it applies. If a state tax, it must be uniform all over the state. If a county, township, city, town, or district tax, it must be uniform throughout the extent of the territory to which it applies. Chesapeake & O. R. Co. v. Miller, 19 W. Va. 408, 429 (citing Fletcher v. Oliver, 25 Ark. 289).

The words "uniform rule," in Const., art. 12, § 2, declaring that laws shall be passed taxing by a uniform rule all moneys and real and personal property, refer to all laws levying taxes for general revenue, whether for state, county, township, or corporation purposes. Hill v. Higdon, 5 Ohio St. 243, 246, 67 Am. Dec. 289.

The provision in Const. art. 8, § 1, that the "rule of taxation shall be uniform," means that the course or mode of proceedings in levying or laying taxes shall be uniform; it shall in all cases be alike. Knowlton v. Rock County Sup'rs, 9 Wis. 410, 420.

The constitutional provision that the rule of taxation shall be uniform extends to taxation of cities, towns, and counties, exercising, as they do, a portion of the sovereign power delegated to, them by the state. It extends to all taxes by the state, whether acting directly or by delegating its authority to political corporations. Weeks v. City of Milwaukee, 10 Wis. 242, 256. It means that, if a certain class of property is made taxable at all, it must not only be taxed at a uniform rate, but all of it must be taxed without partiality or discrimination, and at such rate. Wisconsin Cent. R. Co. v. Taylor County, 8 N. W. 833, 856, 52 Wis. 37. It requires that all property taxed for the purpose of revenue, whether general or local, shall be taxed equally, according to its just and true value, and that no one species of property from which such taxes may be collected shall be taxed higher than any other species of equal value. State v. Hastings, 12 Wis. 47, 50.

A rule taxing horses at one rate, cattle at another, and land at a third, would not be a uniform rule. The fact that all horses were taxed alike would not make it so, because the mode of taxing horses would be only a part of the rule. That part might be uniform with itself, but, the moment a change was made to other property, there the rule changed, and the uniformity ceased. Attorney General v. Winnebago Lake & F. R. Plankroad Co., 11 Wis. 35, 40.

The provision of the state Constitution is not applicable to the taxation of national banks within the state, since it is provided by the Constitution of the United States that the Constitution and the laws of the United States made in pursuance thereof shall be the supreme law of the land; and since Congress has, in the exercise of its supreme authority, prescribed a rule or mode of taxation of national banks different from that prescribed by the Constitution of the state, and therefore the Legislature of the state must be governed by the rule prescribed by Congress, instead of that fixed by the Constitution of the state. Van Slyke v. State, 23 Wis. 655, 667.

An act which undertakes to compel one town to levy a tax for the payment of a certain bounty, and all the costs and expenses of certain unsuccessful suits therefor, which does not impose a like obligation upon other towns, is in violation of the constitutional requirement that the rule of taxation shall be uniform. State v. Tappan, 29 Wis. 664, 677, 9 Am. Rep. 622.

UNIFORM SYSTEM OF COMMON SCHOOLS.

The word "uniform," as used in Const. art. 6, § 2, providing that the Legislature shall establish a uniform system of common schools, requires uniform educational facilities. Such facilities may be maintained with great simplicity of organization in sparsely settled regions, while the most elaborate machinery is necessary to meet the requirements of dense populations in cities. The system of schools, however, is uniform. Divisions and classifications of children in various respects may be necessary in the city, and not in the country, in order to obtain the best results from the facilities afforded. The facilities themselves, however, remain uniform. The system of educational opportunities, advantages, and accommodations is uniform, constant, and equal, whether availed of by children in a rural district or a city ward, whether by males or females, whether by blacks and whites commingling or by them separately, and whether race classification be made in one grade or department or city or county, or in many. In Cory v. Carter, 48 Ind. 327, 17 Am. Rep. 738, it was held that the uniformity of the school system was not broken by the establishment of separate schools for colored and for white children; and it was held that the classification of schools on the basis of race or color, and the education of the races in separate schools, involved questions of domestic policy, which are within the legislative discretion or control, and did not amount to an exclusion of either class, nor a denial of equal privileges required by the Constitution. The supreme judicial tribunal of Massachusetts, through Chief Justice Shaw, in 1849, declared that the principle of equality was in no wise violated by the establishment of separate race schools. Reynolds v. City of Topeka (Kan.) 72 Pac. 274, 277 (citing Roberts v. City of Boston, 59 Mass. [5 Cush.] 198, 208, 209).

A system of common schools that grants to all the various subdivisions of the state equal and uniform rights and privileges, leaving only to the local authorities the right to govern the local affairs, is a general and uniform system within the statute providing that the Legislature shall provide by law for a general and uniform system for the common schools. Robinson v. Schenck, 102 Ind. 807, 320, 1 N. E. 698.

UNIFORM TAXATION.

See, also, "Equal and Uniform Taxation."

A tax is uniform when it operates with the same force and effect in every place where the subject of it is found. Perfect uniformity or perfect equality of a tax, in all the aspects in which the human mind can view it, is a baseless dream. State Railroad Tax Cases, 92 U. S. 575, 595, 612, 23 L. Ed. 363, 373. The words "uniform throughout the United States," as required of a tax by the Constitution, do not signify an intrinsic, but simply a geographical, uniformity, and such uniformity is therefore the only uniformity which is prescribed by the Constitution. Patton v. Brady, 22 Sup. Ct. 493, 498, 184 U. S. 608, 46 L. Ed. 713.

A tax is uniform, within the constitutional requirement, when it operates with the same force and effect in every place where the subject of it is found. Edye v. Robertson, 5 Sup. Ct. 247, 252, 112 U. S. 580, 28 L. Ed. 798.

"Uniformity," as applied to the constitutional provision that all taxes shall be uniform, means that all property belonging to the same class shall be taxed alike, so that all horses shall be taxed at the same rate, and all lands or stock or merchandise. There is to be no discrimination between property of the same class, and it shall not be competent to levy one rate upon country lands and another upon city lands, or one rate upon horses of one breed and another upon horses of a different breed. Adams v. Mississippi State Bank, 23 South. 395, 396, 75 Miss. 701 (citing Mississippi Mills v. Cook, 56 Miss. 40).

Const. art. 10, § 3, providing that all taxes shall be uniform on the same class of subjects within the territorial limits of the authority levying the tax, means a uniformity of taxes, and not a uniformity of rules or regulations governing the levy. People v. Henderson, 21 Pac. 144, 147, 12 Colo. 369.

The provision in the Constitution for uniformity of taxation has no reference to the power to exempt or to remit taxes. Its design was to secure to every portion of the state and to every class of property taxed a uniform rate; to secure equality, so that property in one quarter should not be taxed at a higher rate than in another, or the same kind taxed unequally. People v. Auditor General, 7 Mich. 84, 90.

UNIFORM TEXT-BOOKS.

The term "uniformity," as used in the general school law, providing that all text-books used in any school district shall be uniform in any one subject, does not mean that all the text-books of one author in grammar, arithmetic, history, physiology, etc., for the different grades of scholars, must be used. Boards of education are at liberty, under this law, to adopt the book of one author for use in all the primary departments, and the books of another author on the same subject in all the grammar or higher departments. All the law requires is that they be uniform in the same grade. Attorney General v. City of Detroit (Mich.) 95 N. W. 746, 749.

UNIFORMITY.

Uniformity indicates consistency, resemblance, sameness, a conformity to one pattern. McConihe v. State, 17 Fla. 238, 270; Town of Enterprise v. State, 10 South. 740, 746, 29 Fla. 128.

UNILATERAL CONTRACT.

"Unilateral contracts" mean contracts that lack mutuality. "Mutuality of contracts" means an obligation must rest on each party to do or permit to be done something in consideration of the act or promise of another; that is, neither party is bound unless both are bound. Laclede Const.

Co. v. Tudor Ironworks (Mo.) 69 S. W. 384, 388.

UNILATERAL MISTAKE.

The words "unilateral mistake," when used in speaking of a unilateral mistake in making a contract, mean a mistake on the part of one of the parties only. A court of equity may rescind a contract for a unilateral mistake, but reformation cannot be granted by reason of such a mistake, but only for a mutual mistake. Green v. Stone, 34 Atl. 1099, 1102, 54 N. J. Eq. 387, 55 Am. St. Rep. 577.

UNILATERAL RECORD.

Records are unilateral when offered to show a particular fact, as a prima facie case, either for or against a stranger. In such a case even parol testimony may be used to explain their applicability. Colligan v. Cooney, 64 S. W. 31, 33, 107 Tenn. 214.

UNIMPROVED.

"Unimproved," when used in an assessor's return relating to land, means uncultivated and unseated. Holloway v. Jones, 22 Atl. 710, 713, 143 Pa. 564.

The word "unimproved," when used with reference to land, expresses an idea opposite to that conveyed by the word "cleared"; the word "cleared" conveying the idea of cultivation, and the word "unimproved" the absence of it—that is, a state of nature. When the word "unimproved" is employed in describing an entire tract of land, it has the same meaning as it has when describing the condition of a portion of a tract. It means uncultivated and unseated. Hathaway v. Elsbree, 54 Pa. (4 P. F. Smith) 498, 506.

A devise of testatrix's unimproved real estate applies to land leased by her to tenants who built thereon under such circumstances that the buildings remained their personal property. As to testatrix, such land was unimproved. It is true that a stranger knowing nothing of the facts would, on looking at the property, assert that it was improved real estate; but this assertion would be based upon want of knowledge, or, to speak more accurately, upon the contemplation of the property as one undivided whole—as being nothing but land. With knowledge of all the facts, he would admit that, in so far as it was real property, it was unimproved. Coles v. Coles (N. J.) 37 Atl. 1025.

"Unimproved real estate," as used in a will giving to a certain person all testator's "unimproved real estate" in the city of Philadelphia, cannot be construed to include real estate upon which there were three dwelling houses, besides suitable farm buildings, with constant annual cultivation by a farmer, with actual money rents received for its occupancy to the amount of more than $12,000 in 18 years, besides the share of the tenant in the growing crops, whether the expression be regarded in its strict legal sense, or in the ordinary and popular sense. In the open country, mere fencing and cultivation are sufficient to constitute improved lands; and when this is accompanied by the erection and occupancy of dwelling houses, barns, and outhouses, there is nothing left for discussion. Robb v. Robb, 34 Atl. 237, 238, 173 Pa. 620.

UNINCLOSED LAND.

A public highway is not a public common nor an "uninclosed piece of land," within Burns' Ann. St. 1894, § 2833, authorizing any resident of the township to take up and impound domestic animals found running at large or pasturing thereon. McManaway v. Crispin, 53 N. E. 840, 841, 22 Ind. App. 368.

A public highway is not "uninclosed land or public common," within the meaning of Burns' Ann. St. 1894, § 2833 (Horner's Ann. St. 1896, § 2639), authorizing the impounding of animals found pasturing in such places. Beeson v. Tice, 45 N. E. 612, 613, 17 Ind. App. 78.

UNINCORPORATED PLACE.

"Unincorporated place," as used in Rev. St. c. 1, declaring that, when an attachment is made in an "unincorporated place," it shall be recorded in the oldest adjoining town in the county, refers to places in which there is no clerk's office in which attachments could be filed or recorded, and would not include an organized plantation, having a clerk and other plantation officers. Parker v. Williams, 1 Atl. 138, 139, 77 Me. 418; Parker v. Williams, 77 Me. 418, 422, 1 Atl. 138.

UNINCUMBERED.

"Unincumbered," as used when speaking of an unincumbered title to property, means not bound by or subject to anything in the nature of a lien or burden upon it. Gillespie v. Broas (N. Y.) 23 Barb. 370, 375.

The word "unincumbered," used in a covenant of renewal in a lease, means exempt from all liens, charges, and provisions which tend to diminish the value of the lot. A lot under an unexpired lease at a particular rent is not unincumbered. Borrowe v. Milbank (N. Y.) 5 Abb. Prac. 28, 30.

UNINHABITED.

A special verdict finding that the defendant willfully and maliciously burned a dwelling house, which was at the time uninhabited, means a house fitted for habitation, but unoccupied at the time. State v. Clark, 52 N. C. 167, 168.

An insurance policy providing that if the premises became "vacant, unoccupied, or uninhabited," the policy shall be void, means that, if the house ceases to be used as a place of human habitation or for living purposes, the policy shall be void. Home Ins. Co. v. Boyd, 49 N. E. 285, 287, 19 Ind. App. 173.

UNINTERRUPTED.

Rev. St. 1858, c. 34, § 2, subd. 7, relating to the relief and support of the poor, and providing that every settlement once legally acquired should continue until lost or defeated by acquiring a new one in this state, "or by voluntary and uninterrupted absence" from the town in which such legal settlement had been granted, for one year or upward, did not include an absence during which the town in which the person had a legal settlement supported the absentee as a pauper in some other town in the state. Town of Scott v. Town of Clayton, 8 N. W. 171, 173, 51 Wis. 185.

UNINTERRUPTED COURSE.

"Uninterrupted course," as used in Laws 1889, c. 19, regulating the practice of dentistry, and exempting from its provisions students in attendance upon "a regular uninterrupted course" in a dental college, does not mean that the course of study shall be without vacation, such as all schools have. State v. Vandersluis, 43 N. W. 789, 791, 42 Minn. 129, 6 L. R. A. 119.

UNINTERRUPTED POSSESSION.

The term "uninterrupted possession," in a statement, admitted in evidence, that a certain person had been in the uninterrupted possession of real estate, was construed to be equivalent to the term "continuous possession." Wilson v. Purl, 34 S. W. 884, 887, 133 Mo. 367.

UNINTERRUPTED USE.

An instruction that "20 years of uninterrupted adverse use of a right of way" will raise a presumptive right to the ground of such right of way is equivalent to stating that the use must have been continuous for the required period. If the use was uninterrupted, it must have been continuous. One of the definitions of the word "uninterrupted" is to destroy continuity of. Davidson v. Nicholson, 59 Ind. 411, 414.

Uninterrupted and continuous enjoyment, when used in reference to an easement, does not mean that the person shall use the way every day for 20 years, but simply that he exercises the right more or less frequently, according to the nature of the use to which its enjoyment may be applied, and without objection on the part of the owner of the land, and after such circumstances as exclude the presumption of a voluntary abandonment on the part of the person claiming it. Cox v. Forrest, 60 Md. 74, 80.
